gether" on measures "necessary to discharge their joint responsibilities" when conditions in liberated or former satellite countries called for such action. No one of them is likely to think that conditions demand previous consultation when its immediate military and political interests are involved, as Russia's were in Rumania. This means, realistically, that some degree of unilateral action is inevitable at least as long as the war lasts. The best one can hope for is that, under the mutual pledge made at Yalta, intervention in the affairs of the liberated countries will not prevent the emergence in those countries of governments which represent a total and drastic repudiation of fascism and Nazism. The wiping out of fascist reaction is still the major political task of the Allied governments. This may have been hastened in Rumania by Russia's unilateral action there; it was tragically delayed in Greece by British action and in Italy by the action of both the British and ourselves. The test of Yalta is not merely, or primarily, whether every move in every area occupied or controlled by the Allies is decided upon jointly. It is rather whether the Allies have accepted jointly a clear-cut anti-fascist policy which will insure basic unity even when unilateral moves are made by one of them.

Words that Breed Trouble

MR. ROOSEVELT launched the lend-lease program with a famous simile. He said we were called upon to lend a hose to a neighbor whose home was on fire. Today Congress seems dreadfully worried lest the neighbor inadvertently use the hose to water his scorched garden after the fire itself is out. The debate in the House of Representatives on the extension of lend-lease was conducted for the most part on just such a petty and churlish plane.

Debate centered about an amendment forbidding the President to use lend-lease for "post-war relief, rehabilitation, or reconstruction." The amendment was fathered by Vorys of Ohio, backed by a Republican minority on the House Foreign Affairs Committee and accepted by the Democratic leadership of the House for fear that extension of lend-lease might be blocked on that issue. The issue itself seems to revolve around another of those unreal questions so dear to the hearts of the cantankerous. The lend-lease agreement with France, which is to be the model for a similar new agreement with the Soviet Union, limits lend-lease to war purposes. But there is a category of products, from essential foodstuffs to locomotives, which have peace-time uses as well. The French agreement provides that if the war should end before delivery of such items the French government would pay for them in cash. Thus the principle of the Vorys amendment was fully recognized and applied by the Administration two weeks before action by the House. This has, indeed, been the basic policy of lend-lease from the very beginning.

Much that was said on the floor of the House by a little group of bitter-enders and isolationists must make the American reader blush with shame. We hope the vote on extension, 354 to 28, and the shouting down of the ultra-restrictionist Buffett and Rich amendments may serve to convince our allies that the statements to which we refer were not typical of the American people. There seemed a disposition, in these minority quarters, to forget the blood and suffering and heroism with which our allies have repaid many times over the support given them by lend-lease. The prize for stupidity should be awarded to Miss Sumner of Illinois. She wanted to know if there was anything in the amendment to prevent us from building "a proposed TVA on the Yangtze River in China." But the most vicious bit of demagogic by-play was between Andresen of Minnesota and Jonkman of Michigan. "Can the gentleman tell me," the former asked, "why it is there are so many people in high places who want to literally take the shifts off the backs of the American people and give them away?" "I presume," Jonkman replied, "because it is to their personal benefit."

Woodruff of Michigan unconsciously described himself and his fellow-obstructionists when he told the House self-righteously of the situation he found in Europe after the last war: "The ruling classes and officials had learned exactly nothing as a result of their participation in the war. The same suspicion of each other; the same sordid selfishness. . . ." Woodruff was one of those few who voted against extension even with the Vorys amendment. The debate grew so ugly that the respected, conservative Republican Wadsworth of New York honorably brushed aside partisan considerations to defend the good faith of the Administration and to rebut some of the worst falsehoods of oppositionists in his own party. We applaud his magnanimity, and we indorse the warning expressed by Mrs. Douglas of California in her able defense of lend-lease. "Words," she cautioned her colleagues, "ring around the world. Words can destroy the peace we are trying to build for tomorrow. Words today recklessly spoken can fill hospitals twenty years from now."

Some overlapping of war aid and aid for reconstruction is inevitable. Factories are loath to take contracts for lend-lease articles which are also of peace-time value if these contracts may be canceled when the war ends. The French agreement seems to us to handle the problem admirably. But there are deeper questions of economic interest, fair dealing, and humanity which are not answered by any legal or financial devices. Devastated countries make poor markets for our products. Self-interest dictates aid in European and Asiatic reconstruction and development. Fairness requires it. Our own country might have been ravaged had not these allies taken the brunt of Axis aggression; the least we can do is to help them rebuild their gutted homes. If it was wise to give them aid to keep the war from our own shores, it is equally wise to give them aid to avert economic collapse. Other evils beside war may sweep from one country to another. Pestilence is one. Poverty is another. For the lack of European and Asiatic markets, our own workers may be without jobs. The small-minded men who spoke on the floor of the House are unworthy of the preeminent position our country occupies in the world today. Our wealth and power impose responsibilities and call for statesmanlike consideration of world problems. Whether under lend-lease or by some other means, we are impelled by necessity and moral duty to help in world reconstruction. The ungenerous, picayune, and pettifogging yammering in Congress disgraces our country in the eyes of the world.

John Collier's Record

BARBARIANS, totalitarians, and bearers of the white man's burden generally view alien cultures with suspicion, whereas the truly civilized appreciate excellence in whatever cultural context it appears. Generously as American Indians have contributed to American culture, the former attitude largely characterized federal policy toward them until twelve years ago, when a drastic change was begun by one of the most civilized and able administrators in Washington, John Collier. After holding the post of Commissioner of Indian Affairs since 1933, Collier resigned this month to work in a broader field of ethnic relations with special emphasis on Indian problems in the Western Hemisphere.

First as a private citizen and later as commissioner, Collier led the fight to restore the rights of American Indians, a group whose exploitation had endured so long as to become almost acceptable. He was outraged by an official policy that was jeopardizing their lands and threatening to obliterate their culture. For over one hundred years a virtual dictatorship of Indian Affairs had sought to impose assimilation through methods which were sometimes benevolent, more often vicious, and before which the Indians had retreated into apathy or hostility. Not until Collier became commissioner was a serious effort made to give the Indians a measure of control over their own destinies. Under the Reorganization Act of 1934 more than a hundred Indian tribes have adopted constitutions, and local self-government has become well established. Indian culture, once on the point of extinction, has been revitalized and has made a remarkable adjustment to the surrounding industrial environment. The process of land loss has been reversed, credit facilities have been extended, and great strides have been made in soil conservation, the utilization of natural resources, and the development of cooperative enterprises. The once vanishing Indian is now increasing more rapidly than the general population; the Indian death-rate has dropped 53 per cent in the past twelve years.

The success of Collier's policies can be gauged by the fact that American Indians are now not a problem but an asset to the nation. While maintaining their ancient heritage they are making a remarkable adjustment to the demands of an industrial environment and are contributing notably to the war effort. This is so because the type of administration which Collier set up is based on a consideration of the needs, hopes,

IN FORTHCOMING ISSUES

Two timely articles by I. F. Stone, The Nation's Washington correspondent:

☞ Must We Feed Europe? UNNRA and the problem of food for Europe's destitute millions.

☞ Who Will Represent Us at San Francisco? A profile study of the United States delegation.

and traditions not only of the dominant group but also of the minority or dependent group. Its goal has been to balance the two in order to liberate the fullest energies and further the welfare of the maximum number of individuals of both groups. Many of the Indian Service's findings and techniques are applicable, Collier believes, in administering the affairs and protecting the rights of other minorities.

William A. Brophy, the new commissioner, has worked with Collier and is in full sympathy with his policies. He has an excellent record as chief of the Puerto Rican section of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions and may be counted on to extend the gains already made as Collier carries on the fight for democratic self-government in a wider sphere.

Alcoa in Wonderland

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 19

THE Aluminum Company of America was formed in 1888. The Sherman Anti-Trust Act was passed in 1890. From 1893 until 1940 the company had a 100 per cent monopoly of all aluminum produced in the United States. A court of last resort has at last held the Aluminum Company of America a monopoly and a violator of the Sherman Act. Thus does anti-trust adjudication move at snail's pace its wonders to perform.

The case of the Aluminum Company evokes satire and despair. The aluminum monopoly has been the subject of two court proceedings and three investigations by the Federal Trade Commission. It has been investigated five times by the Department of Justice. It has accepted two consent decrees, one in 1912, another in 1942, rather than stand trial. It has been sued by private litigants under the anti-trust laws on at least four occasions—and grown steadily larger and more powerful.

The present proceedings began in 1933 and are still far from ended. The record, 58,000 pages long, is already of Penguin Island proportions—so huge that only two employees of the Department of Justice have, between them, read the entire record, each concentrating on one half and meeting midway in the legalistic morass. The current suit was filed in 1933 and was met at once with a piquant argument that required four years for its disposal. The Aluminum Company dug up the long-ignored and violated consent decree of 1912 and sought to use it as a shield. The company argued in substance that since the decree forbade it to engage in the practices with which it was now charged by the government, the new anti-trust suit was harassing, improper, and a mere duplication of the earlier proceedings. The idea that a company could not only violate a consent decree with impunity but utilize the decree to exempt itself from further prosecution might have been the product of a law firm in which Lewis Carroll and James M. Barrie were the senior partners. The ingenious doctrine was learnedly rejected by the United States Supreme Court in 1937.

From the standpoint of the public interest, this litigation was not all waste motion. In the First World War Arthur V. Davis of the Aluminum Company was a member of the War Industries Board. During that war Alcoa raised the price of aluminum from 19 to 38 cents per pound. Over the objections of other members of the board, Davis maintained a differential between ingot, in which Alcoa had a complete monopoly, and fabricated aluminum, in which it had some competition, at a figure which put the squeeze on his competitors.

The current anti-trust action has at least served to keep Alcoa on the defensive. During the great depression, while the price of other non-ferrous metals fell from 39 to 71 per cent, the price of aluminum was augustly maintained at a point but 4 per cent below that of 1927. This was in accord with Davis's philosophy, as he once explained it to the French aluminum company, "that it was better to restrict production and sell at a higher price than it was to go ahead at full capacity and sell at a low price." But Alcoa dropped its price 2½ cents in 1933 "because it feared some action" by the Department of Justice. The words are those of Judge Learned Hand in the new Alcoa decision. Successive reductions since the current Department of Justice investigation began have brought the price of aluminum down from its depression rate of 23.3 cents a pound to 15 cents a pound. This is in sharp contrast to the World War I price record and represents a sizable gain to the government. With aluminum production running upward of two billion pounds a year, a decline of 8.3 cents a pound in price is a saving of $166,000,000 a year. In this sphere at least, the heroically patient and tireless Don Quixotes of the Anti-Trust Division have not been engaged entirely in a futile task.

To their credit also must be marked up the education of a whole generation of progressive Senators and newspapermen. The Truman committee investigation was largely primed from the files of the Department of Justice and in its turn helped to make possible the vast war-time expansion of the aluminum industry against the wishes of Alcoa. Today we also have two independent producers of aluminum, Reynolds and Olin, with 202 million pounds of capacity between them and about 1,293 million pounds of capacity in government-owned plants. Thanks also to the effects of this litigation and to the brave fight waged last year by former Assistant Attorney General Norman Littell against Will Clayton, we have a Surplus Property Act which directs the disposal of these and other surplus war plants in a way which will break the hold of monopoly on the industry. Attorney General Biddle and his Assistant Attorney General in charge of anti-trust enforcement, Wendell Berge, have considerable power under that act and are using it against the aluminum monopoly. We have gained some toe-holds in the ancient battle, and it would be unfair and defeatist not to recognize them, however precarious we may suspect them to be.

The most encouraging aspect of the new Alcoa decision by Judge Hand and his two colleagues of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals is not its belated finding that Alcoa is a monopoly; nor its reversal, by way of a dictum of Cardozo's, of the old United States Steel case decision that "mere size" is not monopoly. "Mere size," the court now holds, if sufficient to dominate an industry, is itself a violation of the Sherman Act, a monopolistic situation subject to legal remedy. The present Supreme Court, had it not lacked a quorum to pass on the Aluminum case, would almost certainly have held likewise. But these are mere paper triumphs. Past experience has shown that the ingenuity of the corporate bar is sufficient to produce new devices for evasion far more rapidly than they can be disposed of in the staid tempo of judicial processes. The encouraging aspect of the decision is that it points to the anti-monopolistic provisions of the Surplus Property Act and puts Alcoa on notice that if government-owned aluminum plants are sold in such a way as to leave Alcoa in command of the industry, the company's dissolution may be ordered. Final action on the government's motion to dissolve the Aluminum Company was postponed until after the war and the disposal of government-owned plants. Thus the court calls attention to the only effective remedy for monopoly, the use of government-owned plants to restore competitive conditions. The remedy lies not in further anti-trust litigation but in the policy to be applied by Congress, the Surplus Property Board, and the Attorney General in the disposal of war plants.

For Judge Hand's decision underscores the futility of depending on the courts for effective action against monopoly. In the first place, the decision leaves the impression that public interest has been sacrificed to judicial good-fellowship. The lower-court decision by Federal District Judge Francis G. Caffey was extraordinarily obsequious to the Aluminum Company of America, and the Judge's conduct called either for rebuke or for a better defense than his brethren of the Circuit Court were able to furnish. I give a sample of his manner. At one point Judge Caffey declined to admit evidence unfavorable to Alcoa with the statement, "It is excluded. Proceed. I exclude it without looking at it. I don't care what is in it." The government was attempting to present evidence showing that Alcoa had bought up a Norwegian aluminum company to prevent General Motors and Ford from obtaining an independent source of supply for the light metal.

I give a sample of Judge Caffey's reasoning methods. One of the important questions in the case arose from the admitted fact that the same stockholders, the Mellon and Davis families, control both the Aluminum Company of America and Aluminum, Ltd., of Canada. This Canadian corporate alter ego engages in practices which would be illegal for an American company, notably in the field of cartels, while the American parent concern enjoys the fruits of these practices. Should an American corporation be allowed to evade the anti-trust laws through a Canadian affiliate? Judge Caffey said it should and buttressed his finding with an analogy of exceptional irrelevance and puerility. Suppose, Judge Caffey asked, ten men formed a steel company and then the "same stockholders at the same time also organized a corporation to engage in the production and sale of cornflakes. Could it be maintained that the fact that the stockholders in these two corporations were identical . . . would render them guilty of conspiracy?"

It is not surprising that the Department of Justice complained to the Circuit Court that Judge Caffey had "sweepingly granted the findings and conclusions of law requested by the appellees [Alcoa] upon virtually every issue." The department pointed out that in one case Judge Caffey denied the existence of unfair price differentials, although his own opinion elsewhere conceded that there were "twenty proved instances" of that very practice. A few of these rulings were too much even for the camaraderie of the Circuit Court, as in the case of Judge Caffey's conclusion that Alcoa only controlled an average of 32.87 per cent of the American aluminum-ingot market. The Circuit Court held that the percentage was above 90. Yet in most cases the Circuit Court declined to look into Judge Caffey's findings and treated them with a respect they rarely deserved. The Circuit Court said weakly of one whopper that it was "not so patently implausible an explanation that the Judge was bound to reject it."

This judicial equivalent of the old school tie entangles the Circuit Court in some odd situations. Judge Caffey found that Alcoa had followed a "long-established policy . . . to live in harmony with the Sherman Act." The Circuit Court holds that Alcoa violated the act. The Circuit Court refers to "unlawful practices" and denies that Alcoa "was the passive beneficiary of a monopoly, following upon an involuntary elimination of competitors by automatically operative economic forces." But since the Circuit Court seemed to feel a gentlemanly compunction about upsetting Judge Caffey's findings, it ended, in all but one case, by accepting the district judge's inability to see these same "unlawful practices." The one case was a price-squeeze method Alcoa stopped using about twelve years ago. The net result is that while the Circuit Court recognizes that Alcoa was guilty of monopolistic practices, it doesn't seem disposed to do anything about it.

There is good ground for the Circuit Court's decision to postpone action on the government's motion for dissolution of Alcoa until after the war and the disposal of war plants. But there is no such excuse for the refusal to grant injunctive relief against specific monopolistic practices or to free Alcoa's patents for use on reasonable royalty by other business men. The greatest weakness of the decision in its unwillingness to divorce ownership of Alcoa from its Canadian Siamese twin; reluctance to take drastic action of this kind is typical of the history of the anti-trust laws. The Circuit Court did, indeed, hold the Canadian company guilty of violating the American anti-trust laws by joining in a world cartel which curtailed competition in the American market. The precedent is important on paper, but the ruling is enforceable only against foreign corporations with property in our jurisdiction. American corporations can evade it by arranging that their Canadian "Siamese twins" keep their funds and offices in Montreal. The real loophole is the use of Canadian subsidiaries as the vehicles for world cartel agreements, and this loophole is left open by Judge Hand and his colleagues.

China and Its Critics

BY LIN YUTANG

IN EDGAR SNOW'S article China to Lin Yutang, in The Nation of February 17, I saw for the first time a real attempt to discuss or dispute the facts contained in my new book. This is important, for only by a fair and open examination of facts in the spirit of sober intellectual inquiry can some clarity be brought into the present confusion. Mr. Snow's opinion of my book is of course not for me to reply to; his statements of fact about China are. I am particularly happy to find the attempt made by a man whose sincerity cannot be questioned and whose friendship I value highly.

As Mr. Snow concedes my honesty and intelligence, he must concede that I knew I had nothing to gain personally by writing against the tide of opinion, even though it was to restore a sane balance. All critics admit that I have allowed merits to, and made severe indictments of, both the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communist Party. By the very nature of my indictments, I can please neither party. No one can say that I have concealed, or failed to score, the failures of the Chinese government in censorship, in conscription, in drawing up a bill of rights, and above all in taking a clear stand for the rights of peasant and workingman, the common people. At least, I have not fallen, like some apologists, into the error of painting one side all white and the other all black. I was fully aware of the sanctity of America's sacred cow, the Chinese Communists, and knew that to suggest that the sacred cow was in fact a red bull in a china shop would be to arouse the ire of the cow-worshippers. Under the circumstances I could do one of three things—jump on the band-wagon and win cheap plaudits, evade the Communist issue and the civil war, or speak the truth as I saw it. I chose to speak out. I have never cared which way the wind blows, and I still don't.

My attitude toward the Chinese Communists is based on two major premises, arrived at after an investigation of sources and documents on both sides: first, that they are not true democrats but totalitarians of the Russian type in theory and practice, and that theirs is not the democracy China wants; second, that they have taken advantage of the war to set up a separate state and separate army for expanding party power at the cost of national unity, and that they have done so and will continue to do so in accordance with a set program. These conclusions of mine are at variance with those of others who have not examined the same sources.

Neither Mr. Snow nor I saw Yen-an after 1940—I never saw it—and the "democratic" reforms were started after the winter of 1941. The main question is the reliability of available sources and documentation. I maintain that sources and documents are adequate and are available to all who take the trouble to read them or have them specially translated. My sources are (1) Kuomintang documents and publications, (2) Communist publications, especially the books and essays of Mao Tse-tung (Yen-an edition), (3) successive Communist resolutions and declarations and published official telegrams on both sides, (4) editorials of the Communist paper Hsin Hua Jih Pao, published in Chungking, and (5) talks with Chinese people, not officials, who have lived in the occupied areas. Tens of thousands of Chinese have come over from the occupied areas, including thousands of students. Their impression of these areas is very different from the romanticized picture given to the American public. I have talked with hundreds of people who have lived and served under Communist rule, or whose relatives have. When the "Grandmother of the Guerrillas" told me that her son was shot in a boat by the Communists from the bank, together with 120 young men and girls fighting as guerrillas in Hopei, I could ignore her evidence simply because she herself had not been to Yen-an.

Some of the Communist writings are extremely important as sources. I note especially Mao Tse-tung's book "The New Democracy," published in March, 1940, now in its fifth edition; the all-important "Chengfeng Wenhsien," first published in eighteen chapters, then, in 1943, revised, in twenty-five chapters (this is the sole educational material and is compulsory reading for all schools, army units, and party members); the Communist resolution of May 26, 1943, on the dissolution of the Comintern and the resolution of September 1, 1942, setting up absolute party control of all civil, military, and mass agencies after the "democratic" innovations; the important exchange of long telegrams in the winter of 1940 between the Communist commanders Chu Teh and Pen Teh-huai and the Chinese War Minister on the civil war; and, lastly, the extremely revealing "Chinese Communist Tactics and Party Lines" by Chang Hao (Lin Yuying), published in 1937, a complete "Tanaka Memorial" of the Chinese civil war, which, like the Japanese Tanaka Memorial, is denied by the originating party but whose authenticity has been vindicated by the ensuing pattern of events, step by step, stage by stage, up to the present month. Unfortunately Lawrence K. Rosinger's "China's War-Time Politics" does not draw on all these, and a continuing volume should be issued. Communist writings are more revealing and more valid sources than what the Communists say through their interpreters to foreigners on a conducted tour. I am sure that after a study of this material any objective student would come to conclusions similar to mine.

Furthermore, there are strange and inexplicable lacunae in the reports on China; about many things an obstinate silence is preserved. Nothing is said about the freedom of the press in Yen-an. Bald statements about the "blockade" and "stopping of pay" and internal "clashes" are made without relation to time and space. When I tried to fill in the lacunae and write a coherent story that made sense, I came out with facts highly unpleasant to the Communist side. I should like to have someone explain to me why it is that intelligent observers are content to repeat bald statements without a search for causes. They uncritically accept Communist figures even where it is possible to check them. They repeat, for example, the figure of a "half-million" troops blockading the border—put out for foreign consumption—whereas the Yen-an editorials and speeches addressed to Chinese people at the height of the controversy in July, 1943, never spoke of more than 150,000. The government version mentions six divisions and two brigades, under 100,000, with specific designations and distribution points.

Mr. Snow's article fairly bristles with inaccuracies, distortions of fact, and reticences about other facts which I cannot let pass. I shall deal with them under three heads.

1. Mr. Snow's distortions and inaccuracies. As these are in the main unfair representations about my book or my journey, I shall make only brief corrections.

Mr. Snow states that "nowhere" did I "give evidence that" I had "lived with workers and peasants for even a few days." I toured the entire Northwest Highway for twenty days with no companions except the drivers and the strangers whom I met; I was squeezed in a bus from Neikiang to Chungking that no foreigner would care to ride in and few could survive. I made the entire railroad journey from Kweilin to Kukong and back without any companion except my nephew, and during my stay of three weeks at Kunming and Kweilin I saw only one commander, Lo Kuan-ying of the Burma campaign, and not one local official. I went back to Chungking by truck with doctors of the Emergency Medical Service Training School and repeatedly stopped at inns definitely not for foreigners. Does Mr. Snow imagine that one could escape eating, sleeping, living, talking with the ubiquitous, garrulous, frank, and classless Chinese people on such a journey? And I came out with fewer reticences and a less one-sided presentation than Mr. Snow in his report on China or Russia (vide William L. White).

Mr. Snow's quotations from my book are intentionally inexact since he used them to point up his contentions. He quotes me as saying baldly, "I am all for the government," whereas I said, "I reserve my criticism of government failures and mistakes [for elsewhere]. . . . Here I am dealing strictly . . . with the question of China's unity in time of war, in which I am all for the government." He quotes what I call an "amusing but sad story" of conflict between guerilla forces as merely "an amusing story," and proceeds to make fun of my "amusement." Mr. Snow says I heard a machine-gun "for the first time in [my] life" and that I "heard it then, ironically enough, not at the front, but . . . at the 'model concentration camp' for Communists, at Sian." Mr. Snow wilfully distorts the truth. I said I heard it at the military academy, not at the concentration camp, and I said it was "the first time I heard the terrific rattle of machine-guns going off ten feet above my head" (p. 137). He represents me as "fearing that they may soon control half of China, especially if America should give them arms, food, medicines, and financial help." Nowhere did I say, directly or indirectly, that the Communists should not receive American arms; do I need to answer that one about food and medicines? I said that the Communists fear American supplies for Chungking and have sabotaged them by groundless rumors, and that America should give supplies to Chungking despite these rumors.

Where Mr. Snow does not misquote me, he questions my sources and authorities. He says, "He thinks [that is, I think] things must be better at the front, where he has heard the soldiers 'have the best of everything.'" I do not think, I know—from my personal visit to the Changsha front, and from Dr. Robert Lim, who has spent the past years at the extended front, where Mr. Snow did not go. The words "have the best of everything" are the exact words of Dr. Lim, as those who heard him in New York will confirm. My authority for the statement that the Communists staged loud cheers of welcome for national troops passing close to Japanese garrisons—when their presence should have been kept secret—is none other than Governor Chungling, who was hounded out of Hopei by the Communists. Mr. Snow refers to an "anonymous informant," implying that my source was unreliable. The informant in question personally witnessed the atrocities I referred to, and I will give Mr. Snow his name and address any time he asks for them.

Mr. Snow sticks to his story that Ho Ying-chin is "pro-Japanese" and says if I "had been in China," "I could have heard 10,000 students denouncing him as such, as early as 1936, on the streets of Peiping." I was on the streets of Peiping in 1936 and witnessed the student demonstration against the Tangku truce and saw wounded students put in rickshaws. That does not alter my statement that "General Ho signed the Ho-Umetzu Tangku agreement before the war under the direction of Chiang Kai-shek, which is the only basis for this persistent charge. If the Chinese Communists attacked Chiang as 'pro-Japan' the charge would sound too ridiculous." Mr. Snow has failed to give any additional basis for this charge. This parroting of fifth-columnist talk is indiscriminating and mischievous, for General Ho is now commander-in-chief of all ground forces for the counter-offensive. It hurts the morale of every American soldier.

2. Mr. Snow's reticences. To further understanding of the China situation there are needed a factual study of the civil war, the blockade, and the stopping of pay, and an examination of the ideology and program of the Communists as expressed in their own writings.

Mr. Snow complains that he "had no way of determining the truth about most of the conflicts. . . . I refrained from writing about them, as did other correspondents, not . . . because both sides did not furnish abundant material, but because of utter lack of means of verification or documentation." It is true that there is an abundance of material, and documentation is perfectly possible. I have read at least a dozen Communist documents on the civil war, including editorials in the Emancipation Daily, published in Yen-an, especially during July, 1943; the speeches of Chu Teh, Ho

Lung, Lin Tsu-han, and Chou En-lai dealing with the civil war; and the important long telegram of Chu Teh and Peng Teh-huai to War Minister Ho, November 9, 1940, in reply to the latter's account of the conflicts. Whereas the government story, based on telegrams from field commanders, gives places and dates, the Communist charges give no details.

Take the case of General Pang Ping-shun, whose name is misspelled by Mr. Snow as Pan Pin-hsien (Russian spellings regularly drop the g in ng, as "Kuomintan"), and who is cited by him as a Kuomintang general who joined the puppets. Mr. Snow conceals the fact that General Pang was forced to surrender by the Communists. According to the telegram of Field Commander Chiang Ting-wen, dated July 31, 1943, Pang, while he was fighting against 20,000 Japanese, was attacked from south of Pingshun by 5,000 Communist troops of the Eighteenth Army Corps; after he broke through, his troops were ambushed by 2,000 Communist troops near Kaoping, and all the sick and wounded soldiers were murdered. At Kubsien he was again attacked simultaneously by 6,000 Communists of the same Eighteenth Army Corps and by 2,000 Japanese. One cannot ignore official telegrams from field commanders with names and dates or brush them aside as "Kuomintang propaganda" or just "charges and counter-charges." In other cases Communist telegrams fit in with Chungking sources, as when the Communist commander Chu Teh, in his telegram of April 14, 1943, apologized for the capture of Governor Han Teh-chin "by mistake." And what about the resolution of the Yen-an Central Politburo, October, 1937? This said, "In Chinese politics the decisive factor is military power. We must in the course of the war of resistance expand as far as possible the military power of the party as the basis for capturing revolutionary leadership in the future." No, Mr. Snow, documentation is perfectly possible. We must sift and scrutinize evidence, but we must not pretend that the documents don't exist.

After two years of ruthless expansion came the blockade and the stopping of pay. I will refer only to (a) a radio communiqué from Yen-an on December 13, 1944, recorded by the FCC, in which Nan Han-chen reported that the "blockade" and the "stopping of money and supplies" began in 1941; (b) the government report to the People's Political Council, March 8, 1941, saying they were "going to" build blockhouses and define the defense lines against the Communist border, after the experience of the "two-year-old conflicts"—this agrees in date with the Communist version; and (c) the regulations issued at Yen-an, January 30, 1941, eighteen days after the New Fourth Army's defeat, declaring that such money as was paid to them was contraband, subject to confiscation under the laws of Yen-an. It is still contraband, and they are still complaining.

3. Are the Chinese Communists true democrats? This question is basic to my attitude. If they were genuine democrats, and permitted liberty of thought and of the press in their own area, I would be for them.

Mr. Snow knows as well as I do that they are genuine Communists ("Battle for Asia," pp. 290-91); that the first phase of their "democratic front" is a "transitional period" during which democratic freedoms can be used to overthrow democracy and establish a "proletarian dictatorship" and a Marxist Union of Soviet Republics in the second phase ("The New Democracy," by Mao Tse-tung, Yen-an edition, p. 22); that "this [present-phase] revolution is again divided into several stages according to changes in enemy and allied camps, but that its fundamental nature is not changed until the time of socialist revolution" (p. 10); that the democratic freedoms are "suitable . . . for directing revolutionary struggles" (p. 24); that, according to Mao, the Kuomintang has only one object, "democratic revolution," but the Communist revolution has two stages, a "democratic revolution" leading to a "socialist revolution" of the proletariat (p. 41). Wang Chia-hsiang, former vice-chairman of the Chinese Soviets, said in 1939—note the date—"They shall never abandon their ideals and the theories of Marxism and Leninism" (quoted by Snow). Now Mr. Snow says guardedly that they "happen to have renounced [in 1937] any intention of establishing communism in China in the near future." That harmless "near future" happens to be defined by Mao Tse-tung as "several years" (p. 89), no longer than the Nazi incubation period after the Munich putsch.

The Communist Tanaka Memorial (referred to above) is as prophetic as the Japanese Tanaka Memorial. After explaining every step of past developments it predicted the present demand for a coalition government, and I can predict future developments, after November 12, 1945, with its help. Explaining the change to the United Front, in the spring of 1937, to Chinese Communists, it says, "We are abandoning the former unworkable line of advance [open communism], and seeking a workable line, a line that is convenient for achieving proletarian dictatorship" (p. 50). Going into greater detail, it says: "(a) Only by cooperating with the Kuomintang can we carry on the proletarian revolution, via the democratic republic, via a capitalist democracy, and pass over to a proletarian democracy to realize the proletarian dictatorship and establish a socialist society. (b) We are now making a compromise with the Kuomintang for the purpose of operating in the open and organizing a struggle for wide popular support. . . . (c) We are now making a compromise with the Kuomintang for the purpose of immediately lifting the ban on the party, releasing political prisoners, obtaining freedoms of the press and assembly. . . . All these are in the direction of the road to proletarian dictatorship, and are at the same time preparations for the realization of proletarian dictatorship. (d) We are now making the compromise, for it is a good method . . . to utilize the democratic republic to overthrow the party dictatorship of the National Government. . . . The success of the democratic republic is the beginning of the second proletarian revolution and at the same time the realization of proletarian dictatorship" (pp. 65-6). To study Chinese events of the past years without studying Chinese Communist writings is to go blindfolded.

The most rigorous "one-headed supremacy" (i-yuan-hua, or "unitary" leadership) of the party over all civil and military administrations was established soon after the "democratic" reforms were introduced by the party resolution of September 1, 1942. The "joint commission of civil, military, and mass organizations" was abolished and replaced by the "unitary" or "one-headed" supremacy of the party committee in any area of a given grade. The all-powerful person was not the elected officer of the local party committee but the party secretary appointed by the Central Politburo. The "unconditional obedience" of other administrations in the same area was decreed. "The responsible officers of the civil and military administrations and mass organizations must execute the decisions of the party committee of the same grade, even if they disapprove of the majority decisions." Even for the Red Army, "concrete military movements shall be decided upon by the political commissioner of the military headquarters—that is, the party secretary."

As early as February, 1942, Mao Tse-tung started the "purification," or chengfeng, movement, "to purify thought, purify education, and purify the party." (Cheng means to "rectify," and feng means "atmosphere.") How thought is purified is evident from the book "Chengfeng Wenhsien," or "Literature of the Purification." The concrete method of purifying thought is the "utter-frankness," or tanpai, movement, a political Oxford Group movement in which everyone's private life is made an open book. If a member is not utterly frank about his thoughts and private conversation, other members will be utterly frank about him. The result is of course unfortunate for those whose private conversations need "purification" or "rectification."

If there is still any mystery about the similarity of these Communists to the members in other countries all over the world, their record of primary loyalty to Moscow will banish it. I cannot exonerate people who fail to report on the extreme isolationist attitude of the Chinese Communists during Stalin's pact with Hitler, or on the sharply anti-British and anti-American attitude of Mao Tse-tung, member of the Executive Committee of the Comintern, 1935-43. Hitler was a "mad dog" before the pact; during the pact he was graciously referred to as "chief of state" (yuan shou); after June 22, 1941, he became a contemptible cur again. I can give the dates of a dozen editorials of the Communist daily published in Chungking. How about the "Hands Off European War" editorial of May 12, 1941, coming awkwardly forty days before June 22? How about the editorial of April 25, 1940, calling joining the European war a "certain road to death"? How about Mao Tse-tung's strident demand for "absolute neutrality" and his assertion that Roosevelt's lend-lease to England was "false neutrality," designed to "embroil" the United States in "the second imperialist war"? How about the sudden flare-up of intensive fratricidal warfare beginning with the signing of the pact in the summer of 1939? How about the Communist indorsement of Stalin's recognition of Japan's "Manchukuo" frontiers? And finally, how about Mao Tse-tung's calling the Anglo-American imperialists "sons-of-bitches" (tama, with a four-letter English word understood), while sparing the Japanese imperialists in the same sentence ("The New Democracy," p. 45)? How about his ridiculing those who think there is a difference between Anglo-American and Japanese imperialists? No, Mr. Snow, documentation is perfectly possible.

Americans owe it to themselves to study Communist programs through Communist writings. At least State Department officials should read and scrutinize the Communist Tanaka Memorial. Americans should ask themselves, Will the Chinese nation follow the Anglo-Saxon or the Russian model, and how will that affect China's alignment in the coming era of power politics in Asia? Will the Chinese gravitate toward the Anglo-American or toward the Russian orbit, and with them the other millions of Asia? And what are the forces in China today that will affect or determine that direction? What course will the 450,000,000 people of China take? Will Mr. Snow help me think and help the American people think?

[Mr. Snow will be given the opportunity for a brief rebuttal in a subsequent issue.]

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE INVESTIGATION of the Congressional committee into the gold conspiracy of last summer has closed, and the upshot seems to be that Messrs. Gould and Fisk were the head and front of the whole affair. . . . Nothing could have been more sensible or upright than the President's [Grant's] course throughout the whole affair. He committed in it only one error, and that was accepting the hospitality of, and entering into conversation with, such people as Gould, Fisk & Co. were then known to be. Their Erie operations had rendered them unfit company for any respectable man. . . . As long as men like Fisk find that they suffer no social damage whatever by any of their iniquities as long as they have any money, there is absolutely no check on them, neither God, man, nor devil having any terrors for them.—March 3, 1870.

THE MINNESOTA LEGISLATURE has provided for the submission to the people, women included, of an amendment to the Constitution adopting female suffrage at all elections. . . . In Utah the system is on trial, but out of 20,000 women in the territory only six or seven voted at the last election. The cause of this abstinence was explained at a recent women's-rights meeting in this city by ascribing it to the tyranny of the husbands, who would not let the women go to the polls.—March 3, 1870.

MR. CULLOM'S BILL for the suppression of polygamy in Utah has been shorn of its most objectionable features in its passage through the House. . . . As it stands, the bill is simply foolish. . . . The true remedy for Mormon polygamy would seem to be the opening of the Mormon territory to the ordinary influences of American civilization, and the influx into it of a large Gentile population. The reason why polygamy does not exist as an institution in civilized countries is not that people are prevented by law from marrying several wives, but that public sentiment is opposed to it. If the great mass of the American people approved of it, large harems would be found all over the country, the statute against bigamy notwithstanding.—March 31, 1870.

The Walls of Stuyvesant Town

BY CHARLES ABRAMS

STUYVESANT TOWN, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company's $50,000,000 plan to rebuild one of New York City's slum areas, has hit another snag. It is finding it difficult to move the thousands of families now living on the site. This strange undertaking involves more than housing, more than urban redevelopment, and Metropolitan's frustrations will serve a useful purpose if they awaken the public to the real implications of Stuyvesant Towns.

The project has aroused nation-wide enthusiasm. It has the backing of an influential group which believes that all social undertakings should be accomplished by private enterprise, at a profit—with government subsidy. It is becoming a spearhead for the effort to shift government powers from the public to the private domain. Ten states have rushed through laws authorizing Stuyvesant Towns.

Robert Moses, New York City's planning commissioner, tailored the New York law specially to suit Metropolitan's demands. It authorizes tax exemption for private enterprise, release of public streets to private enterprise, condemnation of private property for private enterprise. Even public property can be condemned. Public housing is just a public use, but private urban redevelopment is declared a "superior public use."

The city gave lavishly to Metropolitan. It exempted the improvement from taxation, surrendered streets amounting to 19 per cent of the total site area, agreed to use its public powers to force unwilling owners to sell—and slum dwellers to move elsewhere.

The tax-exemption subsidy conferred on Metropolitan amounts to about $25,000,000, almost 50 per cent of the total investment. With the cost of the assembled land not more than $14,000,000, the city could have saved millions by buying up the area and presenting it as a gift to Metropolitan. With all this expenditure not a single slum dweller is actually to be rehoused. The present residents of the area are to be crowded into other slums, making them more profitable for the owners and stabilizing the mortgages of the very institutions which are most vociferous in acclaiming the Stuyvesant Town formula. All the city gets in return is a walled-in town in which even higher-income, average-size families with children will be ineligible as tenants, in which overcrowding, the most objectionable feature of the slum pattern, is to be repeated. But more is involved than planning principles or the mathematics of a city's budget.

No sooner was Stuyvesant Town announced than Frederick H. Ecker, Metropolitan's chairman of the board, made this statement: "Negroes and whites don't mix . . . perhaps they will in a hundred years. . . . If we brought them into this development, it would be to the detriment of the city, too, because it would depress all the surrounding property." He barred Negroes from the project. Nor was Stuyvesant Town to have a school, though its population would be one-fourth that of Nevada, for Ecker feared Negro children might attend. The city meekly complied. It even agreed to raze the existing school in the area and erect a new one outside. It divested itself of all public streets and property within the inclosure. The entrances were to be posted with signs marked "private property." The City Comptroller is permitted to enter, but only during the period of tax exemption!

Organizations like the City-wide Citizens' Committee on Harlem joined with Negro leaders in opposing subsidized discrimination. They declared that Negroes should not be barred from the benefits of subsidies to which they, as well as whites, contributed. With hotels, theaters, and restaurants enjoined from discriminating, it seemed indefensible in a publicly endowed undertaking.

A local ordinance was enacted barring tax exemption for future projects in which discrimination was practiced. But the contract for Stuyvesant Town had been signed, sealed, and delivered before the ordinance could be passed. The ordinance applies to future New York City projects only. Elsewhere in the state, and in other states which have copied Moses's law, the Stuyvesant Town formula remains valid.

Metropolitan then achieved a master-stroke. In a taxpayer's action brought against the company a decision had been rendered holding that Metropolitan's discrimination policy might be challenged when the project was completed and tenants were to be selected. To meet the issue, and to appease its Negro policy-holders, Metropolitan announced a new project, "Riverton," to accommodate 1,200 families in Harlem itself. There would now be one project for whites and one for Negroes—on the Southern pattern. Metropolitan argued that this would give Negroes the "equal protection of the laws." Northern public-housing authorities have demonstrated in their projects that in a self-contained community which creates its own environment segregation is illogical and unnecessary, but the Jim Crow pattern was established for these subsidized private developments. Here was Metropolitan's formula for meeting the discrimination issue in other states where Negro opposition might make itself felt. New York City's Board of Estimate helped by pouring the balm of several million dollars in tax exemption upon the Riverton undertaking. Interest in promoting Stuyvesant Towns has burst forth with renewed vigor. Subsidized segregation is to be the new pattern for urban development. An organized effort is even being made to repeal the anti-discrimination ordinance.

The Stuyvesant Town formula, carried to its logical conclusion in our future living pattern, will mean selected "respectable" families living in fenced-off neighborhoods, while the "undesirables," poor or rich, are relegated to ghettos. More important still, government, in divesting itself of its police powers over the streets in the project and exercising its eminent domain and spending powers for Metropolitan, has used its prerogatives to aid private corporations that openly refuse to abide by the restrictions to which government itself is subject in exercising those powers. Here, in the name of slum clearance, was a device for the evasion of the troublesome Bill of Rights, with its cumbersome insistence on equality and due process. If the bartering of public powers could be carried over from urban redevelopment into other enterprises, a remarkable innovation in government was indicated.

But if the city must pay so dearly for slum clearance, it might at least expect that slums would be cleared. Not even that seems likely as Metropolitan moves to overcome the most recent obstacle in its path. It now appears that the families living in the area to be cleared have no place to go. Neither Mr. Moses nor Metropolitan has made any provision for their rehousing. They can neither afford to pay Metropolitan's rents in the new project nor find quarters in a public project elsewhere.

Moses is not daunted. He has proposed that 12,000 old-law tenements of the 55,000 the city has been trying to get rid of for half a century be given a new lease of life. If their owners would agree to put in heat, hot water, and baths, it was hoped that families would be willing to pay a little more than at present and would move out of the Stuyvesant Town site, allowing Metropolitan to proceed with its venture. The city will even agree to endow the slum owners with a full ten-year tax exemption on these new improvements. Mayor LaGuardia says Metropolitan will lend them the money at 2½ per cent if they will help.

Thus on the one hand the city would be subsidizing Stuyvesant Town to clear a single slum and on the other perpetuating slums all over the city which it had hoped eventually to clear away. The increased site-acquisition cost brought about by the proposed "improvements" would make assemblage for large-scale redevelopment impossible for decades to come. Three official bodies—one in 1920, another in 1926, and a third in 1936—had grappled with the idea of rehabilitating these tenements and concluded that their narrow lots, windowless rooms, lack of yard space, and incurably objectionable design made the task impossible. They found it wiser and cheaper to tear them down and reconstruct the areas. All this was disregarded. When civic organizations objected to Moses's new proposal, he quickly amended his plan to permit remodeling only in areas approved by the Planning Commission. Enactment of legislation to carry out this plan seems assured. Since Moses, the author of Stuyvesant Town, is also the planning commissioner in charge, the disposition of the residents of the area may be awaited with interest.

But even before the bill has become law and with no remodeling begun, Metropolitan has suddenly notified tenants to move from the area. They are being shunted off in station wagons to hovels which Metropolitan says are "not worse" than those they now occupy. Many are being forced to pay higher rents. Hundreds of dwellings which could not be rented even with the present shortage are being pressed into service and again producing revenue. Slums ripe for the wrecking crew are booming. With city officials denouncing landlords of loft buildings and offices for raising the rents of big industries, official encouragement for the crowding of slum dwellers into ramshackle hazards seems incomprehensible. The OPA sits by, "watching with interest." One wonders why, with a war on, all this must be done now, particularly since Metropolitan cannot build now anyway. But there is much to wonder about in this strange undertaking.

The lessons so early derived from Stuyvesant Town are of more than local significance, for urban redevelopment occupies a prime position on our post-war programs. There is a place for private enterprise in urban redevelopment, but our programs can be carried out only if it cooperates with the public-housing authorities. A slum is not cleared simply by tearing it down. Alternative accommodations for the slum families to be displaced, at rents they can afford, must be made available by public-housing agencies. The acquisition by cities of substandard areas and their public resale at use value to anyone willing to build in conformity with adequate planning standards are preferable to the severance of large areas of land from public control and their transfer to specially privileged institutions. Above all, the conferring of public powers on private corporations must be resisted unless it is coupled with public controls adequate to guard against the abuse of fundamental rights.

"... We Shall Never Surrender!"

Much is still to be learned about urban redevelopment. It seems plain that New York City officials were so awed by Metropolitan's offer that they forgot to calculate the costs, examine the problems involved, or consider the long-run political implications. Construction of Stuyvesant Town and Riverton will go on, for these officials seem set upon seeing it through. The two projects may be worth their cost in the end if they demonstrate to the public how not to undertake urban redevelopment.

Conscription Between Wars

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE big debate on permanent peace-time conscription—or "universal military training," as the army leaders prefer to call it—continues to rage, making many loud and strange sounds but very little sense. The issue has been further confused by the astonishing variety of proposals for a labor draft, or "work-or-fight" act, a measure which in some quarters of the public mind has got mixed up with the military-training proposal. Recognizing this confusion, and understanding the importance of pushing only one thing at a time—the old strategic principle of concentration of forces—the army leaders have momentarily called off their high-pressure campaign to get a military-training bill through Congress now and have told the various citizens' committees organized to back the proposal to hold their fire until the smoke of the work-or-fight mêlée has lifted somewhat. But the ammunition is being stockpiled for a new barrage, due to start about the middle of April. The opposition, sensing this, is getting in its own counter-battery work before H hour.

Surveying the scrambled and furious scene with the typically jaundiced eye the ex-service man reserves for civilian foolishness, this veteran is not sure which of the opponents he regards with more disfavor. Such roarings about "teaching men to brush their teeth"! Such counter-roarings about "showing the rest of the world we have no faith in Dumbarton Oaks"! All nonsense, friends. I submit that the only relevant issue is: will the proposal contribute to the future security of the United States?

FEW BENEFITS ON THE SIDE

Friends of universal military training make much of the subsidiary benefits to be derived, and thereby, it seems to me, weaken their chief argument. The training is supposed to contribute to the nation's health, provide discipline for the wayward young, absorb a large number of "the unemployed" every year, mold character, develop better citizens, and heighten democracy and tolerance among racial, religious, economic, social, and sectional groups of the nation. In short, a year in the army will do all the wise and good things which the home, the school, the church, and the community have been trying to do for some centuries without astounding success.

The health argument can be fairly readily dismissed. A year of hard physical work in the open air naturally makes almost anyone pretty rugged, but by age eighteen fundamental defects in health are generally there to stay. Military training can't cure basic defects springing from poor diet, bad housing, or lack of medical attention. To be sure, a yearly reminder from army doctors that 40 per cent of the nation's man-power is physically unqualified for military training might jar us eventually into a program for raising our health standards, but there must be a cheaper way of doing it.

As for discipline, the army variety is most transitory in its effects and is more likely than not to produce a reaction against any form of discipline—I know a veteran of the last war who won't stand in line for a movie to this day, and I find myself baring my fangs when anyone speaks to me peremptorily. The army system is the reverse of self-discipline, encourages gold-bricking and cheating on the boss, and is essentially anti-democratic.

The half-veiled promise of mopping up the unemployed by throwing them into uniform is the best example extant of the poverty-stricken imagination; as Hanson Baldwin says in the current Harper's, "it is the very argument that Hitler used; it is the apologia and last resource of a government which has failed to solve its domestic problems."

The argument that military training molds character and develops better citizens is subject in general to the same objections as the argument based on discipline. In the past few months I've read a great many letters on the subject of conscription from service men overseas, responding to a request from the American Veterans' Committee; and the men are pretty definite in minimizing these particular advantages. One writes: "I object to the continued demoralization of youth. I have seen enough of it already: boys too young to shave gambling and drinking, developing a vocabulary generously embellished with cheap, vulgar, and lewd terms, boys learning first hand about venereal diseases from girls neglected and degraded by their own people. Is there any reason to expect the program to be other than this?" The man is obviously a puritan, but his sermon has its validity. Others object that the army doesn't develop real self-reliance, but so limits the areas of the men's authority as to discourage them from thinking for themselves; this, to be sure, varies enormously, depending on the branch of service, the individual's job, and the character of his commanding officer. The peacetime tradition of West Point and Annapolis emphasizes saying yes to one's superiors; it tends to deaden originality, research, criticism, and the inquiring mind. Transmitted to trainees, this might in a year develop a certain firmness of mind and character, but it could never contribute toward forming the bold, free, and questing citizen we like to think typically American.

As for the heightening of democracy and tolerance, it is true that greater understanding of other men is hard to escape in the army, although I've known men who could do it. I judge the experience as a whole to be a valuable training in democracy, but its influence is strongest on men under fire, where one quickly learns that shells are not choosy about skin color or the church a buddy attends. It is not so effective in quiet rear areas. Again, the fact that an army year may teach men some rudiments of democratic life is not a truly relevant argument in favor of conscription; but to tell the story fairly I'll quote another soldier's list of "factors which have broadened my mental horizon (I hope)":

Living in a different section of the United States. Learning, through trial and error, how to fit into a community, how to gain the respect and friendship of people outside your own walk of life. . . . Living and working with a fair cross-section of the people of the United States. Realizing the complexity of large undertakings of management, and the influence of the "human element" on the efficiency of operations involving large numbers of people.

TRAINED RESERVES MEAN NATIONAL SECURITY

Having decided that a year in the army is primarily useful as training for another year in the army, let us now attempt a small demolition of the side-car arguments of those who oppose universal military training. They say conscription never prevented a war; that a professional force can handle any trouble, at least until we get into a major war, when our great man-power and industrial resources will spring into action; that present weapons will be obsolete, and the first trainees too old; that we must wait to see what our international commitments will be; that enactment of legislation now would serve notice on the world that we had no faith in international cooperation; that we would develop a ruling military caste; and that we should wait till the boys come home before deciding.

True, conscription alone has prevented no wars. No one contemplates conscription alone: it is to be linked to a general system of collective security, in which aggressive steps must be taken to prevent wars from happening. The argument to me represents the worst kind of hangover in liberal thinking from the bad days between the wars when we thought that the way to avoid fighting was to be unprepared to fight. Indeed, the most damaging criticism to be made of the opposition is that most of the statements now issued against military training could equally well have been issued in 1920 or 1936. The reverse argument, I believe, can be shown to be true; Commander Stassen put it well at Minneapolis when he said:

We ourselves should remain strong. . . . We should do this to fulfil the police-force responsibility which will be ours in enforcing and supporting the world code of justice and the United Nations organization. . . . We should make it plain that much as we want peace we will fight again and will fight anyone who basically violates world justice. . . . This position, I am convinced, is more likely to maintain peace than an announced policy of making ourselves weak and of not fighting, even though provoked.

Now it is also true that the professional force—a navy requiring perhaps half a million men, an army striking force of perhaps a quarter-million (with another 150,000 or so to train the draftees), and army air forces of perhaps half a million—will be the first line of defense, sufficient also to squelch aggression under United Nations direction. If this is all that is ever required, we can praise the Lord. But it is the function of the nation's military leaders to plan for the worst possible contingency—namely, a big war, waged at some indeterminate date and for causes not now at all clear, against another major power or combination of major powers. It would be folly, for instance, for the Combined Chiefs of Staff to overlook the possibility that American commercial aggression in foreign trade and airlines might involve us in explosive economic warfare with one or more of our present allies; or that we might export unemployment, causing worldwide economic chaos, always an incentive to war; or that either England or Russia might some day seek to strengthen Germany against the other, which would inevitably draw us in when the conflict came. These are not pretty thoughts, but they must be the thoughts of the strategists: and in a world where the single most important element in foreign policy is the enormous potential of the rocket bomb and the stratospheric bomb- or troop-carrying aircraft, one can afford to think in nothing less than strategic terms.

In these terms, the case for conscription is, I think, made clear. Trained reserves are the nation's eventual security in modern war, and our relatively small professional army might be decimated in the first week of any future war. One soldier writes:

We need the reserves to back up our initial action against any threat to the peace, should our first blow fail. As we learned to our sorrow in this war, the sooner an aggressor is smashed, the less is the cost in men, materials, and unhappiness. And the existence of these reserves—and of the draft as an official policy—will serve notice to the world that we intend to back up our peace policy if necessary.

Another says:

It would seem to be a contradiction emerging from this war, truly a war of liberation, that an intricate and powerful armed coalition be available at all times to remove any threat of aggression. . . . I cannot consider it as such, for the matter of rocket bombs, jet-propulsion planes, and super-super air fortresses—plus the projected economic expansion on a worldwide scale, calling for industrialization of the backward nations in South America, Africa, and Asia—will completely alter the structure of world politics. Just the matter of rocket bombs alone must qualitatively change political thinking on a world scale.

Present weapons will indeed become obsolete, but this is not vital. Thorough basic training not only teaches soldiering but familiarizes a man with the family of weapons he may be called upon to use, and a year's training will produce many specialists whose skills can be brought back to a fine pitch in comparatively short order. The men who train immediately after this war will be too old to go into the front lines of any foreseeable war, but it takes eight men in the rear to keep one man fighting, and again the establishment of the basic draft policy is the major consideration.

As for waiting to see what our international commitments will be, it would appear that this is the very reason for establishing a system of training soon. We at least know that we are in for deeply troubled times, during which it will be prudent to be strong. The same logic knocks out the argument that such legislation would show the world our lack of faith in international cooperation—an argument which may be classified with the charge that a man who takes out fire insurance on his house must be an arsonist. A demonstration of our preparedness to use force on the world scene would convince our anxious friends—and enemies—that we have joined the world and abjured isolationism. I can't see every other nation asking whom we are preparing this army against, for no other nation is going to disarm itself in these times. We should, in the first instance and until the world organization is a tested concern more firmly embodying the machinery for administering justice, work toward a minimum basis of armaments, and only later a maximum.

The objection that we shall thus develop a ruling military caste is best overruled, as Irving Lipkowitz pointed out in a recent issue of this magazine, by the very guarantees implicit in a universal, and therefore a citizens', army. If we choose a professional army, if we leave our military affairs in the hands of West Pointers, then we may indeed breed a ruling military caste. By choosing a citizens' army we attain a certain element of democratizing flux and flow through its otherwise slowly hardening arteries. Further, we teach our citizens to know the army life, therefore to love peace and even to work for it. "Any G. I. will tell you that to really hate the army you have to be in it a while," a soldier writes. "This war has created the strongest anti-militarists we shall ever see—and the peace-time draft would keep up the good work." In a democracy the army is the instrument of policy, not the maker of policy.

Finally, it is objected that we should wait until the fighting men come home. The response to the American Veterans' Committee's question overrules the objection; a large majority of the answers favored universal military training. Having suffered bloodshed and boredom at least partly because their country was not prepared to fight, the soldiers feel that one of the important factors that will help us to avoid another war is to be ready to fight it.

It seems to me that the proponents of the measure have not yet made these matters clear. Their insistence on dubious secondary benefits is misleading and weakens their case; the apparent anxiety of the military leaders to avoid debate and opposition is bad thinking, and gives weight to the argument that they are authoritarian and anti-democratic. I believe that the opponents of universal military training are largely living in a dream world, but I hope they will be brought to see the realities by a frank presentation of the issues, not brushed aside with foolish urgings that "the army wants it so you'd better accept it." If reasonable arguments are used, a large majority of our citizens should come to take an alert interest in matters of national defense and to insist upon a program which would embrace a highly skilled, mobile striking force engaged in extensive maneuvers and the development of new tactics, intensive research into new weapons, and a universally drafted body of reserves to provide a firm foundation for enforcing peace.

In the Wind

THE LEGISLATURE of South Carolina, in revising the salary schedules of public schools, has required recertification of all teachers "in order to avoid any possible discrimination between races." . . . On the other hand, the city council of Columbia, South Carolina, on March 13 unanimously rejected a proposal to put Negro policemen in Negro districts.

NEW YORK NOTES: You can safely take your wife or sister to the Roxy Theater. The song "Rum and Coca-Cola," as currently sung on the stage there, has been de-alcoholized to "Lime and Coca-Cola." . . . Bickford's, a chain of cafeterias, has placed the following sign on every table: "Gentlemen, please remove your hats. You can help us create an atmosphere which will attract some very desirable lady customers."

"POPS PIUS today received General Brunetto Brunetti . . ." (New York Times of March 11). We know there's a movement to make the Holy Father an American institution, but is this a sufficiently dignified way of promoting it?

SPOKESMEN of the undertaking business in West Virginia conferred with Representative Cleveland M. Bailey at Clarksburg on March 5 and asked him to try to have the War Production Board release larger quantities of cloth for lining caskets. The Clarksburg News reports that they put it to their Congressman this way: "Shall we have caskets properly lined to give our dead here decent burials or shall we send the material to other countries to clothe the living?"

RALPH SMITH, an advertising man, defended radio commercials in a letter to the New York Times of March 11 thus: "We have found that nobody relieved of a stomach ache by a remedy purchased through a radio commercial ever complains about them. . . . Persons who complain about commercials are, as a rule, disgustingly healthy."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Nazi sentries in front of certain German-occupied buildings in Copenhagen have recently been supplied with steel screens, behind which they stand. One of these sentries was recently surprised by the smiles he got from Copenhageners who passed him. Finally he stepped out in front of the screen and discovered that a sign had been attached to it. The sign read: "He has no pants."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Fascist Bridgehead in Bolivia

BY JOHN W. WHITE

THE reorganization of the Bolivian Cabinet to make room for three more ministers from the Nationalist Revolutionary Movement (M. N. R.), the closest counterpart of the Third Reich's National Socialist Party that any South American country has produced, completes the worst double-cross the United States Department of State has suffered in recent years. The double-cross has the virtue, however, of making impossible any further wishful thinking about the nature of the Villarroel regime at La Paz. Bolivia is now the second out-and-out pro-Nazi, anti-Yanqui, anti-Semitic, anti-capitalist nation in South America; it has even outstripped the Argentine under the Farrell-Perón team, from which it received its original inspiration and tutoring.

The bridgehead established at Buenos Aires in June, 1943, to make South America safe for Nazi-fascist ideology when it is overthrown in Europe has thus been consolidated into a fourteen-hundred-mile salient driven deep into the heart of the continent, where it presents a serious threat to Chile and Peru. With Paraguay already sucked into the Nazi orbit through a puppet government that takes its orders from Buenos Aires, Hitler's agents in Argentina can boast honestly, as they probably do, that they have acquired control over 24 per cent of the territory and 20 per cent of the population of South America.

When Ambassador Avra Warren went to La Paz last May to survey the situation for the State Department, he made it clear to Major Gualberto Villarroel that his de facto regime would not be recognized by the United States or many of the other American republics until it had purged itself of its pro-Nazi elements, beginning with the clever young Minister of Finance, Victor Paz Estenssoro, recognized Führer of the M. N. R. Paz Estenssoro and the others who were objectionable to Washington were "purged" by being permitted to resign from the Cabinet and set themselves up as candidates for election to Congress. Political leaders in Bolivia who should know what they are talking about say that Villarroel assured Ambassador Warren that not more than 40 members of the M. N. R. would be among the 109 men elected to the new Chamber of Deputies.

Other promises which Villarroel offered in exchange for recognition were the delivery to the United States of the more notorious of the German and Japanese agents operating in Bolivia, general amnesty for political prisoners, early and honest elections, the nationalization of Axis firms, and cessation of the shipment of rubber and tin to Argentina in violation of Bolivia's contracts to sell its entire output of those commodities to the United States. In reliable diplomatic circles in South America it is reported that Villarroel also was required to give a promise not to molest Bolivia's 60,000 Jewish refugees, whose persecution was one of the announced objectives of the M. N. R. and the military clique of young officers who are supporting the regime.

The German and Japanese agents were surrendered and taken to United States prison camps. Most of the other promises were either not kept at all or kept in ways that were farcical. A great to-do was made, for example, over the release of José Antonio Arze, leader of the largest opposition party, the Partido de Izquierda Revolucionario, who had been jailed soon after he returned from exile. But when it was found that he had been elected to Congress, an attempt was made to assassinate him and he had to return to the United States.

Villarroel insisted that in return for his unsecured promises his provisional government be recognized before the elections instead of after, as had been suggested by several of the South American governments, including Chile. He won his point, and the State Department formally extended diplomatic recognition just a month before the elections of July 2 last.

When the ballots were counted, it was found that seventy instead of forty of the new Congressmen were members of the M. N. R., which gave Villarroel's party a clear majority. This majority was necessary if Villarroel was to be elected constitutional President, since in Bolivian electoral practice the President and Vice-President are chosen by Congress. All the "purged" pro-Nazi leaders were elected, and as members of Congress continued to exert control over Villarroel. Paz Estenssoro went to the Senate.

Within six months after the July elections the M. N. R. had become so powerful that Villarroel was obliged to choose between taking the "objectionables" back into the Cabinet or stepping down himself. So Washington's bête noire, Victor Paz Estenssoro, is again in the government, and the entire setup is exactly as it was when the State Department refused to recognize it. There never has been any question that the M. N. R. leaders are pro-Nazi, anti-Yanqui, and closely in touch with Argentine nationalist leaders and Hitler agents at Buenos Aires. The only question has been whether they should have a place in the La Paz government. Washington said no; the M. N. R. said yes. At the present writing the M. N. R. is two up on Washington.

Bolivia's Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario deserves the careful attention of anyone who is interested in the machinery by which Nazi ideology is being transplanted to the Western Hemisphere while we are risking millions of lives and spending billions of dollars to uproot it in Europe. During the Chaco War (1932-35) the youth of Bolivia awoke to the necessity of seeking solutions for the country's many pressing problems. For years the government posts had rotated among the same group of men, leaders of the self-constituted governing class. Successive governments had promoted railroad construction and other expensive public works which yielded an enormous amount of graft to the authorities. They had paid no attention to the more urgent but less profitable needs of the people, such as the incorporation of the enormous Indian population into the national life, the im-

CONFIRMATION

In an article published in the last issue of The Nation, "V-Day and Revolution," we said that the presence of Allied troops in the liberated countries has often prevented existing leftist tendencies from being fully demonstrated. The situation, we said, will change, to the benefit of the progressive forces, once Allied armies withdraw and leave to the European peoples the solution of European problems. Our theory is confirmed by Marquis W. Childs, who, writing from Rome in the New York Post of March 14, reports: "The recent escape of General Roatta, former Chief of Staff under the Fascist regime, and the violence that followed are evidence, on the one hand, of the weakness of the government and, on the other, of the unrest that is close beneath the surface of the country. The government could not cope with the situation but for the presence of Allied troops." [Emphasis ours.]

migration of skilled laborers and farmers, industrialization, reduction of the appalling infant death rate, the cleaning up of malaria, and a general public-health program.

After the war the returning soldiers united with organizations of university students and other youth movements to form several socialist groups dedicated to the improvement of social conditions. These socialist youth movements became strong enough to overthrow President Tejada Sorzano in May, 1936, and the military government of Colonel Toro in July, 1937, and of Colonel Germán Busch in August, 1939. But they had no political tradition behind them, were not properly organized as a national party, and had no coherent program of government after they came to power. They had no trouble in electing Germán Busch President in May, 1938, but were unable to control him for the achievement of their social objectives. A year after his election Busch defied the young socialists and the other political parties and set himself up as a dictator.

It was after the overthrow of Busch and during the provisional presidency of General Quintanilla (August, 1939, to April, 1940) that Bolivia's young socialists became ardent admirers of the Nazis and developed ideas which led to the creation of the M. N. R. and the present pro-Nazi setup at La Paz. General Quintanilla devoted his brief provisional term to preparing the country for the presidential elections of March, 1940, in which there were two candidates—General Peñaranda, representing the old traditional parties, which had banded together as rightists, and José Antonio Arze, representing the leftists. The young veterans of the Chaco War joined the rightists and elected Peñaranda. They had been tremendously impressed by the sweeping military victories of the Nazis in Europe. And they believed that the strongly nationalist doctrines of the Nazis in Germany and the Fascists in Italy were just what was needed in Bolivia. In this belief they began to combine the various existing nationalistic groups in what since June, 1942, has been known as the Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario.

The organization, the program, and the political methods of the movement are almost identical with those of the Nazi Party. The close relations between the leaders of the movement and the German legation at La Paz were revealed in the State Department's memorandum to the South and Central American governments urging the non-recognition of the Villarreal government.

Nazi influence is also strong in the young officers' movement which grew up after the close of the Chaco War. Feeling the same urge to face and solve the nation's problems, the returning officers organized themselves into several secret lodges. Many of the younger members were sent to Germany and Italy to complete their military studies and returned imbued with Nazi and Fascist ideology. When the Bolivian War College was founded in January, 1939, these converts were enrolled in the first classes. By the middle of 1943, when President Peñaranda began to totter, most of them had become majors. At the War College they had studied political and international law, finance, and government, and they felt themselves capable of governing the country better than the politicians. They merged their lodges into a single unit, known as the Mariscal Santa Cruz Lodge, and plotted the overthrow of Peñaranda on December 20, 1943.

When the military plot was complete, the majors of the Santa Cruz lodge found that in order to keep the revolution in power they would have to have the support of a political party. So they invited the M. N. R. to take part in the revolt. After Peñaranda had been overthrown, the important positions in the government and the army were distributed among the majors of the Santa Cruz Lodge and the leaders of the M. N. R. The officers became so occupied with their new duties that they had no time for the lodge, and Santa Cruz ceased to exist about March, 1944.

Resenting the way the government plums were monopolized by the majors, a younger generation of captains and lieutenants who had been admitted to membership in the Santa Cruz Lodge now organized a new lodge, called the Ingavi, which has become one of the most powerful forces in the present situation in Bolivia. Ingavi officers run the police department, the detective bureau, and the traffic bureau, and also are in control of most of the army regiments. Neither the M. N. R. nor the majors are strong enough to defy Ingavi, nor could they long remain in power without its support.

Ingavi is accused of responsibility for the present reign of terror in Bolivia. It was Ingavi which kidnaped and tortured the Jewish tin-mine owner, Maurice Hochschild. Both the M. N. R. and Ingavi have threatened to clear the Jews out of Bolivia. Paz Estenssoro, the recognized brains of the M. N. R., is a notorious Jew-baiter.

It is generally agreed that Victor Paz Estenssoro is the man to be watched in the Bolivian situation. Members of the M. N. R. refer to him as El Jefe, the Spanish equivalent of Führer. He is a smart economist and shrewd politician, with strong presidential ambitions. He has long been in close contact with Hitler agents at Buenos Aires and was a bitter opponent of Peñaranda's cooperation with the war effort of the United States. His position in the Bolivian government is very similar to that of his close friend, Colonel Juan D. Perón, in Argentina.

Diplomatic observers at La Paz have reported that President Villarreal is virtually a prisoner of Ingavi and the M. N. R., the leaders of which permit him to carry on the routine administrative duties of the presidency but dictate to him on all matters of policy, internal as well as international. It would not surprise some of these observers if Villarroel should be forced out of the presidency eventually and his place taken by Paz Estenssoro.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

AN ADMINISTRATIVE official was to be appointed in a rural district near Aachen, a sort of liaison man between the inhabitants and the American authorities. The district has always been Catholic—it came under Prussian control after the Napoleonic wars—and the four hundred peasants who stayed after the retreat of the German armies had defied the express command of the party. They could certainly not be considered fanatical Hitlerites. On the contrary, almost all showed disgust and resentment in speaking of the party which had brought so much unhappiness to the country. The American authorities decided, therefore, to let the people choose the man whom they considered best fitted for the post. For the first time in many years the principle of democracy was to be applied in one tiny little part of Germany.

The four hundred peasants were gathered together in Aachen in the ruins of a former hall to cast their ballots. The result was an almost unanimous vote for Farmer X. That was fine—until it came out that Farmer X had held office under the Nazis and was therefore unacceptable to the American authorities. Another election was then held, and the voters obediently chose someone else. They remained of the opinion, however, that Herr X was the best man for the position. And they could not see that it made any real difference whether or not he had held a Nazi office. Of course, they said, they would not have voted for one of the higher Nazis or for any bully from the Gestapo. But X was not a "richtiger Nazi." What did it matter if he had been used by the Nazis?

I have related the incident because it throws light on the chief difficulty that will be encountered in setting up an administration in Germany purged of Nazis. New German areas are constantly being occupied. Conditions are desperate everywhere, and it is urgently necessary to organize a new administration as quickly as possible. Allied personnel can furnish no more than the skeleton. Unquestionably most of the officials will have to be Germans, and it is generally agreed that no Nazis shall be used. But what is a Nazi? How can the Allies determine who is a Nazi and who is not?

The difficulty is very real. For the actual situation is not at all what many people naively imagine. Germans do not fall neatly into two categories—Nazis and non-Nazis. The great mass of Germans, let us say 95 per cent, were in fact both Nazi and non-Nazi at the same time—in every possible degree and gradation and mixture. And furthermore there are practically no outward criteria by which they can be reliably sorted out. Yet it is from this 95 per cent that the Allies must select their administrative personnel.

In the tiny minority outside this 95 per cent there are undoubtedly some uncompromising anti-Nazis, people who have always, as believers in democracy and in peace, been against the regime. Since an organized German underground has never existed—all accounts of it were pure fiction—it will be pretty hard to find out who belonged to this honorable order. And unfortunately not many persons of this group can be supposed to be still alive—however many there were once. Occasionally individuals will turn up who can prove their claims, and of course the Allied authorities should make every possible use of them. There are also persons who can be classified as total Nazis, who in every respect are the embodiment of the Nazi doctrine. Among these are the several thousand officials at the top of the Nazi hierarchy, all members of the Gestapo, and all members of the Nazi Party who joined it voluntarily, that is, before 1933. The criteria by which they can be known are relatively simple, and certainly they should be absolutely barred from the new administration.

Membership in the party does not really prove anything, for from 1933 on hundreds of thousands were forced to join. Nor does the fact that a man held office in some Nazi organization mean much, for that too was often a matter of compulsion. Without any question every single German belonged to one or more of the countless Nazi organizations and discharged the duties required of him. Every German had one or more Nazi membership cards in his pocket. That fact does not prove that he was a Nazi at heart. But neither does the fact that he was compelled to become a member prove that in his heart he was not a Nazi.

As a result of all this, the distinction between a "Nazi" and a "non-Nazi" became less and less important in the mind of the people. The dividing line was still further obliterated by the war, which all Germans experienced together as Germans, more closely united than ever, in the exaltation of victory as in the misery of defeat. The word "Nazi" is not heard less often in Germany than formerly, but when it is used it refers to Hitler, or Himmler, the bigwigs, the Gauleiters, or the Gestapo. It is not applied to neighbors, to employees in the rationing office, to the postman or the traffic policeman at the corner. Such people are not criticized for being Nazis—if they are just ordinary Nazis, they are normal types. They are criticized only if they are "Nazi-Schweine"—defiant, evil exaggerations of the norm. That seems to be the criterion used today.

I don't believe the Allied administration will be able to judge people by any other standard. With 95 per cent of the population former Nazis—though of all possible degrees and shades—the Allied authorities will be able to avoid the use of exaggerated, defiant, evil Nazis but not of ordinary Nazis. And that such a limit must be set to the purging of the administration is less of a misfortune than it may seem. No one should have the illusion that the Germans who accept posts in the government set up by the Allies are, in their innermost hidden feelings, anything but anti-Ally. If the foreigners at the top of the new bureaucratic hierarchy show any weakness, if they are unequal to their task, the Germans in the lower ranks will snipe at them on every possible occasion. No method of selection will alter that fact. On the other hand, if the Allied administrators prove strong and efficient, they will be obeyed to the dot—even by former Nazis, or rather especially by them.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

I ONCE WROTE a series of articles showing up columnists. Now I've become a columnist; and I'm looking forward to the day when I shall be included in a series showing up columnists.

This week I am confronted with the occupational problem of columnists—what to write about. I had fondly hoped that, like other practitioners, I should have become so well conditioned to being a columnist by the time I met the problem that I wouldn't recognize it.

As a matter of fact, I do have things to write about—a list neatly inscribed in a notebook. There are even some things I feel I "ought" to write about. Which reminds me of a remark of Joseph Wood Krutch's when he heard me say that we ought to review a certain dull book because it was "up our street." He said it might be a good idea to move to another street.

My real trouble this week is that I have spring fever, which I caught from spending an afternoon in the sun. I was merely sitting on a bench in a park beside the Hudson near the George Washington Bridge. But the jut of land seemed like the prow of a great vessel. I had to leave, unfortunately, before it sailed.

I think I shall surrender to the season and content myself with a few minor notes, or notes for notes.

ITEM: The behavior of most dispensers of cigarettes is becoming unbearable. It just shows what even a little power can do to the human ego. I hate the look in the eyes of the man who tells you he has no cigarettes when you know very well that he has but that you are not to be favored. And the worst thing about the encounter is your own willingness to appease the liar for the sake of a few cheroots.

ITEM: In the January issue of Horizon John Lehmann protested against the statement in an earlier issue implying that books published in England during the war compared unfavorably with the French production. To prove his point he gave a partial list of English books. I must say it's impressive and far richer than anyone might have expected it to be.

Cyril Connolly, by the way, has been in Paris, and some of his reports will appear in The Nation. . . . Another English journalist who has been in France mailed an article from Paris which arrived here uncensored. He had written on the envelope waggishly, "Censored by [his own name]." Apparently the real censors took him at his word.

ITEM: Somebody ought to do a piece comparing the excitement and division among intellectuals in England during the generation after the French Revolution with the effect in our own time of the course of events since the Russian Revolution of 1917. Not long ago I picked up Edward Dowden's life of Robert Southey in the English Men of Letters series and was much struck by the parallels. I quote:

The rough draft of "Joan" was hardly laid aside [this was in 1803] when Southey's sympathies with the revolutionary movement in France, strained already to the utmost point of tension, were fatally rent. All his faith, all his hope, were given to the Girondin Party, and from the Girondins he had singled out Brissot as his ideal of political courage, purity, and wisdom. . . . But now the Girondins . . . were in the death carts . . . and Brissot was among the martyrs. Probably no other public event so deeply affected Southey.

Southey was an anti-Napoleonist. "I did not fall into the error," he wrote in 1809, "of those who, having been the friends of France when they imagined that the cause of liberty was implicated in her success, transferred their attachment from the Republic to the Military Tyranny in which it ended, and regarded with complacency the progress of oppression because France was the oppressor."

There was a Spanish question. "Since the stirring day of the French Revolution," said Southey, "I have never felt half so much excitement in political events as the present state of Spain has given me." What Southey ardently desired, according to Dowden, was "a federal republic which should unite the Peninsula, and allow the internal governments to remain distinct."

And there was Greece.

Of course all parallels break down. But they are interesting none the less, if only because they prove that everything has happened before—but never in the same way.

ITEM: Harper's reprinted in its February issue excerpts—text and pictures—from a book called "Old Homes Made New" by William M. Woollett, which was published in New York in 1878. The views before and after alteration show with what success a fine colonial house could be turned into gingerbread.

"This house," says Mr. Woollett in gingerbread prose, "was found to be a substantial brick edifice. . . . On the exterior, the plan being rectangular, the effort to overcome this has been made by the breaking up of the features of the roof, and in conjunction with the brickwork, wood and shingle work have been freely introduced. . . . The introduction of new piazzas on the front and rear gives breadth to the exterior. A bay at the end of the hallway over the piazza and balcony formed in front of same; and balcony canopied, again corbeled out over the bay, help to remove this center gable from the ordinary. The chimney at the end of the bay is carried up full height with a portion of the gable on the side brought out to meet and support it, supplying at the same time a cover to the balcony over the bay."

You get the idea. But you should see the pictures.

ITEM: Here is something new in complaints. A landlord called up during a party to complain that one of the guests, on the way downstairs, had barked at his dog.

THE INTERIOR VOYAGE

BY PAUL ROSENFELD

THE old feeling that "one person has written all the books" may be renewed in wondering readers of Kenneth Patchen's "The Journal of Albion Moonlight," which recently has been reprinted (United Book Guild, $3). Though in mood the volume is singularly inhuman, in method and symbol mysteriously it resembles a small group of lovely and infrequently noticed pieces of literature, some of which are centuries old. All were by Frenchmen excepting one which was by an American of French descent who lived in France, and there is nothing in "Albion Moonlight" to suggest that Patchen was familiar with any of them when he wrote his book.

They were given the generic name of The Interior Voyage by the critic Albert Thibaudet in 1920. The occasion was an arrival in their thin rank, that of "Suzanne and the Pacific" by the late and lamented Jean Giraudoux. The method in all of them is that of a Log or Voyage; the symbols are incidents of travel through an unfolding landscape—which in one case is that of a walled garden, in another that of a tropical island, in a third that of a many-colored archipelago and an ocean stretching toward the Pole. The incidents are arranged along the lines of unverifiable experience, and somewhere in each book its author's voice is heard declaring that the journey is his dream or imagining. He marks his fiction thus as a piece of self-reflection. Indeed, the scenes and details, the personages and their adventures are allegories or symbols of the interior life and its impulses, objects, and conflicts. The Voyages are the upshots of combinations of the motives of romantic fantasy and exclusive self-reflection.

According to Thibaudet, the classic specimen of the Interior Voyage is the sweet thirteenth-century poem which Chaucer paraphrased in part and Spenser studied, "The Romance of the Rose"; at least the portion of it which was composed by Guillaume de Lorris, a clerk of Orléans. In the "Romance" it is May, and the dreamer's self approaches a garden whose wall is painted with effigies of the shabby attitudes. A damsel called Idleness opens a secret door to him. Inside the garden there are trees, bird song, water in springs and brooks, and the dance of the company of a beautiful lord and lady called Mirth and Gladness. The dreamer's "I" passes the pool fatal to Narcissus and finds a bush of roses "dyed with rich deep crimson hue" and on it a queen rose. Masculine personages urge him to pluck the flower, while feminine ones seek variously to stay him. One of the feminine locks one of the masculine personages in a tower. The "I" exhales his grief in a monologue—in the midst of which the De Lorris section of the "Romance" ends. Jean Clopinel, a student of Paris, later continued it in a social-satirical, anti-ecclesiastic spirit.

Imitations of "The Romance of the Rose" abounded for two centuries; then before 1900 certain French symbolists unconsciously resumed its method and symbols in their effort to mirror the psyche and her complex contents. Across the Channel "The Romance of the Rose" was retranslated into English verse. Among the new Interior Voyages was "The Ride of Yeldis" by Viélé-Griffin, a narrative poem whose rapidity of motion has caused it to be considered the best

BLACK BOY

"If enough such books are written, if enough millions of people read them, maybe, someday, there will be a greater understanding and a more true democracy."

—ORVILLE PRESCOTT, New York Times

"... one of the most revealing documents I have read in a long time. Mr. Wright, so far as I know, has done what nobody has done before. He has told the truth about the Negro, and, along with this, what the Negro thinks about the white man's world. This quality of truth, absolute and uncompromising, runs through his book like a charge of electricity; reading it is not unlike taking hold of a high-tension wire... It comes out of life, it is a part of life, and it lets a light into places that have not seen this kind of light before."

—HAMILTON BASSO, The New Yorker

"It should be read word for passionate word." —STERLING NORTH, New York Post

"In turning the leaves of his life, Richard Wright has turned many a bitter page of America's chronicle... He shows us again here the power of prose, the warm, urgent use of word and phrase that made us recognize his great talent as a writer in Native Son." —LILLIAN SMITH, PM

"A triumphant gain... Black Boy is the fulfilment of the knowledge and power that was intermittent in Native Son and the stories in Uncle Tom's Children."

—The New Republic

By the author of NATIVE SON

RICHARD WRIGHT

A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection for March

At all bookstores • $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS • 49 East 33rd Street, New York 16

piece by this American constituent of the French movement. The radiant Yeldis rides to a new country on the death of her father, "gloved in violet," followed by her five various lovers. The poet's "I" is in the cavalcade. One rider drops aside, another dies, a third inquires, "Whither leads the way?" a fourth bears Yeldis off. The solitary poet confesses there exists no lovely thing "that is not loved by him in Her." The Poet's attitude toward "his Muse, his Love, his Life," it has been called. The very symbolistic attitude and an adieu to this attitude became the substance of another of the little species, Gide's purple "Voyage of Urien." A band of shadowy young mystics sail in the previous book from magic island to island, retained by nothing, by the song of the Sirens no more than by the gardens of the Queens. Their ship is paralyzed in a Sargasso Sea, and they wander toward the icy Pole, only to realize that they have not traveled. The extended prose poem gives the state of those who are prevented from acting by habitual self-contemplation.

That post-World War Voyage which moved Thibaudet to his definition, "Suzanne and the Pacific," wittily, humorously, playfully reflects inner self-sufficiency and contentment. Its principal symbol, a tiny coral island, is a tranquil spot inhabited by fabulous birds and a castaway college girl clad in feathers. Man temporarily troubles it, Man who is revealed by the intrusive World War in the form of floating corpses. But Suzanne vanquishes "the demons of Oceania"—fears and egoism. In "Albion Moonlight" there are references to Apollo in the names of certain of the persons—Delian, Carol, Chrystle. The diary portrays a soul's unsuccessful search for its faith. The unrolling landscape is dismal and anarchic and identified as the United States. Because of its universal blasphemy and its facility one hesitates to associate this book with the finer Interior Voyages. Besides, plainly it exhibits the weaknesses of the genre stressed by the scholar Gaston Paris in writing about the offshoots of "The Romance of the Rose." "This new kind of mythology," he wrote, "personified the transitory and evanescent dispositions of the individual rather more than his universal deep-seated ones—and dispensed poets from observing, almost from thinking." Still we cannot ignore the wry humor and pathos in Patchen's lyric flux and chains of images, or his proof of his craftsmanship. Without doubt his Voyage conveys the mood of many persons who were green before Pearl Harbor.

The Chinese Communists

REPORT FROM RED CHINA. By Harrison Forman.
Henry Holt and Company. $3.

IN THE early days of China's war against Japan several highly enthusiastic accounts of the exploits of the Chinese Red Army were published in this country. But in recent years considerably less has been heard of the military and political achievements of the Communists of China's Northwest. Chungking propagandists have hinted that this was because the Red Army was no longer fighting the Japanese. Rumors were circulated to the effect that writers like Edgar Snow, Colonel Evans Carlson, and Agnes Smedley were so partisan that their accounts had to be taken with a substantial measure of salt. It was difficult to refute these allegations because the Chungking government refused to permit any accredited journalists or foreign government representatives to visit the Communist areas. This ironclad blockade was finally broken last summer when a small party of American, British, and Chinese correspondents visited the Border Region. Harrison Forman, who made the trip representing the New York Herald Tribune, has recorded his experiences in a notable book that should be read by everyone interested in the dramatic developments now taking place in China.

The Kuomintang authorities in Chungking had always assured the correspondents that the stories that the Border Region was being blockaded were Communist propaganda. But Mr. Forman found that as his party approached the Communist areas no effort was made to deny the existence of the blockade. The blockhouses which surrounded the region were too real to be ignored. Instead, the local Kuomintang officials sought to divert the group's attention by elaborate entertainment, and arranged meetings with "refugees" from the Red areas who told lurid tales of Communist outrages. These elaborate precautions backfired, however, when some of the alleged "refugees" managed to get word to the correspondents secretly that the stories had been manufactured out of whole cloth especially for their benefit.

When the correspondents' party finally arrived at Yen'an after having been carefully shepherded along a devious route, they were immediately impressed by the appearance of the population. Soldiers and civilians alike were quite obviously better fed and better clothed than in any of the sections of Kuomintang China that had been visited. This was surprising in view of the rigid blockade which Chungking had maintained since 1939 and the fact that the area had been, until within the past two or three years, one of the most desolate and impoverished of all China. The transformation had been accomplished by a carefully planned "Production Movement" which put everyone in the region to work—soldiers, officials, merchants, and even habitual loafers—reclaiming vast stretches of barren wasteland, much of which had not been cultivated for centuries. At the same time scores of primitive factories were set up, largely on a cooperative basis, for making essential civilian and military supplies. As a result the area had not only attained virtual self-sufficiency but had reached a level of living in war time that was far above what it had enjoyed in peace time.

The tales of Red terror which he heard in Chungking and on his journey to the Border Region made Mr. Forman particularly eager to assess the political characteristics of Chinese communism. His experiences in the villages, with the army, and at public meetings at Yen'an and elsewhere convinced him that the Kungchintang is not Communist in the Soviet sense at all, but is a peculiarly Chinese movement reminiscent of Jeffersonian democracy in nineteenth-century America. Instead of attempting to set up a dictatorship, the Chinese Communists have consciously sought to develop self-government in the villages and country districts, and have invariably limited the Communist representation on governing bodies to one-third the total membership. When asked why the party persists in calling itself Communist when it does not practice communism, Mao Tze-tung, the head of the party, declared that a change in name would only provide the party's enemies with an opportunity to make political capital of the action. He declared that the label is unimportant; that ideas and deeds count.

Mr. Forman had plenty of opportunity to assure himself that along with their economic achievements the Communists were carrying on a constant and effective struggle against the Japanese. Almost half of his book is devoted to a graphic account of his visits to guerrilla groups and their fighting on widely scattered parts of the front. He saw enough to be convinced that the secret of the Communist strength is to be found in the unity of home front and war front. In contrast to Kuomintang China, where outbreaks between peasants and soldiers are not infrequent, he found that the peasants throughout the Northwest kept the Red Army closely informed regarding Japanese movements and joined in the battles wherever possible.

The popularity of the Communists among the local population obviously has an important bearing on the protracted conflict between the Kuomintang and the Communists. When Chu Teh, commander-in-chief of the Eighth Route Army, was asked if he was not apprehensive over the possibility that after the war the Kuomintang would inherit the vast quantities of American supplies that would be needed to drive the Japanese out of China, he replied that if civil war came, the Kuomintang would find that they had to fight not merely the Red Army but the people of China. The Communist leaders refused to concede the inevitability of a civil war, however, and insisted that China's political problem could be solved under Chiang Kai-shek's leadership if the government would intensify the struggle against Japan and if the government was "elected by the people with the co-operation and support of all classes and all parties." Since the Communist program, stated in these terms, appears to coincide with American policy for China, Americans will profit by a careful study of the resources and prospects of this little-known movement that has sprung up in China's Northwest.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

BRIEFER COMMENT

Gertrude Stein's Wars

IT IS A LONG WAY from "Toasted Susie is my ice cream," a famous and representative example of Miss Stein's middle style, to the subject of her new book, "Wars I Have Seen," Miss Stein's direct experience of the Nazi occupation of France (Random House, $2.50). Yet Miss Stein has made the long journey without losing any of her possessions or prepossessions, her prose rhythm, her affectation, her common sense, her complacency, her fascination with herself, or her love of unqualified generalization about the inner essence of anything and everything.

This book was begun during the early part of the occupation, when the German victory seemed overwhelming, and thus there is a mounting excitement as the book continues until finally the G. I.'s arrive to discuss geography with Miss Stein, to take her for a ride in a jeep, to tell her that she is read in public schools in America, and to show her how different they are from older generations in America.

"...the first considerable American work of art to come out of the war."—Clifton Fadiman

By GLENWAY WESCOTT

Author of The Grandmothers and Goodbye, Wisconsin

Apartment in Athens

"...what he has to say will stay said. His new novel, sharply different from his earlier books, seems to me the best of all the fine work he has done."—Dorothy Parker, PM

A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection for March

At all bookstores • $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

- ☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

- ☐ 10 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

In Between Miss Stein's studio obiter dicta a clear picture of the anxiety and the terror of the occupation comes through. There is even a moment when Miss Stein feels that "this kind of war is funny it is awful but it does make it all unreal, really unreal." Miss Stein does not understand this war or the other wars she has lived through. But who does? Her mind triumphs in her effort to understand war and peace in terms of the mystique of the avant-garde of Picasso's youth. Through her anecdotes and her observations her prose rhythm asserts itself like an unbroken sea, saying more than any statement can about the beautiful serenity, wakefulness, and egotism of her being. Hence even when she performs such feats of pure irrelevance as the thought that wars may have as their cause the presence of kings named George on the British throne, she remains delightful, full of intuition and self-indulgence, full of pleasure and truth, writing as if she might write and the reader might read forever, an assumption which shows the essential bond between genius and courage.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

In the Bed of Eternity

THE LITTLE POLISH CANON who four hundred years ago discovered that the earth moves and turns around the sun defied everyone's belief and the most sacred authorities—including God Himself as He is quoted in the Bible. Even for the "rebels" of his time Copernicus's discovery was too rebellious. Luther called him "a fool." Calvinus asked: "Who will venture to place the authority of Copernicus above that of the Holy Spirit?" Two hundred and fifty years later Goethe stated that "of all discoveries and opinions none have exerted a greater influence on the human spirit than the doctrine of Copernicus."

The miraculous story of this total victory against ignorance and prejudice won by a single man is told by Hermann Kesten in "Copernicus and His World" (Roy, $3.50). Kesten, a German novelist of stature, does not novelize his hero but sticks conscientiously to the meager established facts about the life of Copernicus. By his art and power of penetration, however, Kesten succeeds in bringing the Polish canon alive, in showing the reader the man and his surroundings, his modest manners and his promethean ideas, the routine of his daily job and the greatness of his eternal work. Copernicus, in his own words, wrote "for mathematicians only." Kesten makes intelligible even that part of Copernicus's works which seems impenetrable for non-mathematicians. He reveals himself in this book as an excellent pupil of those great humanists who were poets as well as scientists, playwrights as well as historians. Splendid pictures of the fascinating men and women who populated Copernicus's world and exciting historical adventures are included in Kesten's report of the development of mankind's knowledge from Ptolemaeus to Einstein—from the belief that we live in the stable center of the universe to the opinion of modern astronomy that we are, as Kesten puts it, "insects on the surface of one of the smallest satellites of a dwarf star in a local system of one of the millions of milky ways."

"Copernicus and His World" does not deal with Hitler or Stalin or Germany's reeducation. Its author—a refugee from Germany and France—might be accused of escapism. Mr.

Kesten has a reply in the sentence he quotes from the astronomer Johannes Kepler, who during the Thirty Years' War wrote as follows: "When a storm is raging and shipwreck threatens the ship of state we can do nothing more dignified than to cast the anchor of our peaceful studies in the bed of eternity." There are, it seems, two kinds of escapism. One leads astray, the other to higher observation points and deeper understanding. Kesten's is of the second variety.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

Tom Paine's Trigger Words

IT IS PART of the universal genius of Thomas Paine that interest in him and his writings can be revived among successive generations of rebels. Paine dealt with the immediate issues that stirred the men of his time—British tyranny in "Common Sense," French egalitarianism in "The Rights of Man," deism in "The Age of Reason." There were other propagandists as potent maybe as Paine—Sam Adams comes to mind—but the works of none of the others come down to us with the vitality that makes the reading of Paine today so exciting an experience.

Howard Fast, in editing "The Selected Work of Thomas Paine" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $3.50), gives us the glowing gist of the man whose crowded life he novelized in "Citizen Tom Paine." Mr. Fast devotes a few pages to setting his well-chosen selections in the framework of the career of their liberty-intoxicated author and then lets Paine have his way with us. For lovers of freedom everywhere there is no better spring tonic than the rereading of the trigger words that set off such magnificent explosions.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

DRAMA

PHILLIP BARRY is a playwright with a considerable gift for sophisticated comedy and a great yearning for something else. Time and time again he has, in the same play, wavered uncertainly between mysticism or moralizing on the one hand and mere sophistication on the other, and in "Foolish Notion," which the Theater Guild is presenting at the Martin Beck, he was apparently resigned to wavering again. But this time he reckoned without his star, Miss Tallulah Bankhead, who has undertaken to do for him what he has seldom been able to do for himself in the course of more than twenty years of usually successful playwrighting—namely, make up his mind. Quite possibly the role was written with her in mind, but almost certainly the intention was not that she should take the whole thing quite so completely into her own hands and make it, as she does, her show. In one respect the result is fortunate. Without her the play would almost certainly have been a commercial failure. Thanks to her large and loyal public it is very likely to be a success. But we shall never know precisely what the author's original intention was.

Whether foolish or not, the notion on which the play is based is certainly elaborate. The plot concerns a celebrated actress, or rather a celebrated stage personality, whose whimsical husband disappeared into the British army before we entered the war. As the action begins, she is about to marry again, choosing this time her leading man, when a mysterious message arrives by wire intimating that the supposedly dead husband is about to turn up again. The leading man is furious; her adopted child is delighted; and her father is annoyed. She herself sees the whole thing in terms of a very fat part for which fate has obligingly cast her. Each of the four imagines what will happen when the long-lost husband walks in, and we see acted out in four separate versions of the return what each is imagining. Then, at last, he does really come back, and, thanks to the presence of a young girl whose unsuspected love for him was the original cause of his disappearance, everything ends much more easily and much more satisfactorily than anyone had imagined it would.

Two of the four fanciful versions of the soldier's return are moderately dull; two are highly diverting. That imagined by the child, full of elementary dramatics and ending with a murder, is very amusing in a manner rather similar to that of a famous scene in "A Kiss for Cinderella" by Mr. Barry's namesake. Miss Bankhead's version is hilarious and more, for it is a biting, almost a cruel, exposé of the special sort of exhibitionist egotism it parodies, and Miss Bankhead plays it con amore. A few years ago in "The Skin of our Teeth" she discovered the delight of mocking herself and her profession, and she does it again superbly, reaching the climax in an almost farcical scene where she uses an urn supposed to contain her husband's ashes as the essential prop for an impromptu sketch in which she plays the role of the wife discovering too late what true love means.

If "Foolish Notion" were simpler, one could accept it as no more than a vehicle for Miss Bankhead and think, perhaps, that that was enough. As it stands, the whole structure is too elaborate not to seem intended to be something more; too cluttered with the loose ends of ill-defined emotions and imperfectly stated themes not to suggest that Mr. Barry intended originally something much more complicated, as well as, possibly, more profound. One is left with the feeling both that there is a vast amount of lost motion in the play as it stands and that the members of the supporting cast—including Henry Hull as the missing husband and Donald Cook as the prospective one—have been reduced to the status of mere feeders for Miss Bankhead. To a certain extent she saves the evening. But she cannot quite save the play, which lacks clarity because it lacks simplicity. Apparently the intention is that four people shall be revealed to us by means of the four imaginary dramas which they stage for themselves. That intention is never sharply enough defined to be really effective.

"It's a Gift" (The Playhouse) is a rather elementary but also fearfully elaborate farce about a puritanical college professor whose daughter stands to inherit a fortune by the will of a once erring aunt provided the said daughter produces an illegitimate child by a certain date. As an actor Curt Goetz, the author-star, has a gift for broad comedy which might serve to good advantage in musical comedy or vaudeville, but this play will hardly do.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Next week in The Nation

THE THEATER IN PARIS—by FRANK JONES

BALLET

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE April 1st to April 28th

S. HURDK presents

RUSSIAN BALLET

by the BALLET THEATRE

Featuring
Antony Tudor's New Psychological
Murder Ballet 'Undertow'

Leonide Massine's 'Moonlight Sonata'
Bronislava Nijinska's 'Harvest Time'

OPENING NIGHT: $6.00, $4.80, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80

Evenings 8:30 (incl. Sun.), $1.20 $4.80. Mat. Sat. & Sun., $1.20 to $3.60
2000 SEATS $1—$1.50 PLUS TAX AT ALL PERFS.

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents

"BELONGS ON THE MUST LIST."—Roscoe, World-Telegram.

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 59th Street. Matinee Wed. & Sat.

YOU WILL NEVER
MISS the pint of blood
you give to the Red Cross, or the contribution you make to the Red Cross War Fund. But the first may save the life of a fighting American, and the second will help furnish him with "a home away from home."

DO IT NOW! Give your blood to replace blood shed in your defense;
telephone your Red Cross Blood Donor Center today and make an appointment for a donation. Send your check today to the Red Cross War Fund.

WILL THE PEACE ENDURE??

A Vital and Timely SYMPOSIUM

on
"VEGETARIANISM:

A Way to Permanent Peace"

Speakers

WILLIAM V. MAHONEY
of Washington, D. C.

PROF. LI YUYING
of China

SADIE STAVE
of Brooklyn

DR. J. HOWARD CRUM of Connecticut

SYMON GOULD

Associate editor, The American Vegetarian

Sunday Afternoon

APRIL 1st, at 2:15 P.M.

N. Y. TIMES HALL

230 West 44th Street

Tickets—$1.00 (plus 20¢ war tax)

On sale at

The League for Public Discussion

117 W. 42 St. or Box Off., N. Y. Times Hall
Phone BR. 9-5214 or LA. 4-1000

P.S. Subscribe to The American Vegetarian, 117 West 48th Street, New York City, a monthly, $1.00 per year.

IS THIS the LAST WAR??

Alcoholics

ARE

Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.

Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist

JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL

(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)

Book Dealers' Agent

REMINGTON PUTNAM CO.

Baltimore 1, Md.

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS

2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.

☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound

Name.....

Address.....

Films

JAMES
AGEE

THE Paramount newsreel issue about Iwo Jima subjects the tremendous material recorded by Navy and Marine Corps and Coast Guard camera men to an unusually intelligent job of editing, writing, and soundtracking. I noticed with particular respect a couple of good uses of flat silence; the use of a bit of dialogue on "intercoms," recorded on the spot, in a tank; and the use, at the end, of a still photograph down whose wall the camera moved slowly. Still photographs of motionless objects have a very different quality from motion-picture photographs of motionless objects; as Jean Cocteau observed, time still moves in the latter. The still used here was of dead men, for whom time no longer moved. The device is not a new one; Griffith (or William Bitzer) used it for the same purpose at the end of a battle in "The Birth of a Nation," and René Clair used stop-shots for a somewhat related purpose in "The Crazy Ray." But it is a device too basic to poetic resource on the screen to discard as plagiarized, and I am glad to see it put back into use so unpretentiously and well.

The Fox version of the same battle—the only other version I could find—drew on the same stock, and is interesting to compare with the Paramount. In one way it is to its credit that it is much less noisy and much less calculated to excite; it is in other words less rhetorical, and the temptations to rhetoric must be strong in handling such material, and usually result in falseness. But in this Paramount issue it seems to me that rhetoric was used well, to construct as well as might be in ten hours' work and in ten minutes on the screen an image of one of the most terrible battles in history. And that is not to mention plain sense: the coherent shape of violence in the Paramount version, which moves from air to sea to land; its intact, climactic use of the footage exposed through a tank-slit, which in the Fox version is chopped along through the picture; and its use of the recorded dialogue, which Fox didn't even touch. The Fox version does on the other hand have two shots—a magically sinister slashing of quicksilver water along the sand, and a heartrending picture of a wounded Marine, crawling toward help with the scuttling motions of a damaged insect—which I am amazed to see omitted from a piece of work so astute as Paramount's.

Very uneasily, I am beginning to believe that, for all that may be said in favor of our seeing these terrible records of war, we have no business seeing this sort of experience except through our presence and participation. I have neither space nor mind, yet, to try to explain why I believe this is so; but since I am reviewing and in ways recommending that others see one of the best and most terrible of war films, I cannot avoid mentioning my perplexity. Perhaps I can briefly suggest what I mean by this rough parallel: whatever other effects it may or may not have, pornography is invariably degrading to anyone who looks at or reads it. If at an incurable distance from participation, hopelessly incapable of reactions adequate to the event, we watch men killing each other, we may be quite as profoundly degrading ourselves and, in the process, betraying and separating ourselves the farther from those we are trying to identify ourselves with; none the less because we tell ourselves sincerely that we sit in comfort and watch carnage in order to nurture our patriotism, our conscience, our understanding, and our sympathies.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

ALTHOUGH to my knowledge Arshile Gorky is having his first one-man show (at Julien Levy's through March 31), he is by no means a fledgling painter. Examples of his work have in recent years appeared in many group exhibitions. From the first there has been no question about the level of his art, regardless of the varying quality of individual pictures; his painting early won a central position in the main stream flowing out of cubism and until recently stayed close to the most important problems of contemporary painting in the high style.

The critical issue in Gorky's case was how much of the value of his work was intrinsic and how much symptomatic, evidential, educational. He has had trouble freeing himself from influences and asserting his own personality. Until a short while ago he struggled under the influences of Picasso and Miró. That he fell under such influences was ten years ago enough proof of his seriousness and alertness—but that he remained under them so long was disheartening. He became one of those artists who awaken perpetual hope the fulfilment of which is indefinitely postponed. Because Gorky remained so long a promising painter, the suspicion arose that he lacked independence and masculinity of character.

Last year his painting took a radically new turn that seems to bear this suspicion out. He broke his explicit allegiance to Picasso and Miró and replaced them with the earlier Kandinsky and—that prince of comic-strippers, Matta. Formerly he had adhered to the cubist and post-cubist convention of flat, profiled forms and flat textures—the convention within which the main current more or less of high painting since Seurat and Cézanne has flowed. But now he changed suddenly to the prismatic, iridescent color and open forms of abstract, "biomorphic" surrealist painting. And these lately he has begun to cover with the liquid design and blurred, faintly three-dimensional shapes of Kandinsky's earlier abstract paintings.

This new turn does not of itself make Gorky's painting necessarily better or worse. But coming at this moment in the development of painting, it does make his work less serious and less powerful and emphasizes the dependent nature of his inspiration. For the problems involved in Kandinsky's earlier abstract paintings were solved by Kandinsky himself, while the problems of "biomorphism" were never really problems for modern painting, having been dealt with before impressionism and consigned since Odilon Redon to the academic basement. What this means is that Gorky has at last taken the easy way out—corrupted perhaps by the example of the worldly success of the imported surrealists and such neo-romantics as Tchelitchew. Certainly, his paintings register success within their own terms more consistently than before, but those terms are lower than they used to be. And certainly his art radiates more charm and has become much easier for the uninitiated to take. But it all goes hand in hand with the renunciation of ambition.

Yet perhaps Gorky was meant to be charming all along; perhaps this is his true self and true level; perhaps he should have pastured his imagination in the surrealist meadow long before this; perhaps his "corruption" was inevitable.

And yet again, it is not quite that simple. For one thing: whether or not he is a first-rate artist, Gorky is definitely a first-rate painter, a master of the mechanics and cuisine. He does far, far more with the "biomorphism" of Matta et al. than they themselves can do. For another thing: Gorky still continues to show promise! The most recently executed picture at his show, called "They Will Take My Island"—black looping lines and transparent washes on a white ground—indicates a partial return to serious painting and shows Gorky for the first time as almost completely original. It is not a strong picture and still makes concessions to charm, but it is a genuine contemporary work of art.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THERE is important news in the fact that Victor has resumed production of a number of recordings which it placed on the inactive list for the duration of the war. And I have thought that readers of this column might want to know some of the outstanding things that are to be available.

Of Mozart there will be the Piano Concerto K.453 (Set 481), one of the greatest of the series, in a performance with Edwin Fischer that rushes the music too much for its proper effect but is pretty good otherwise. Also the superb Budapest Quartet recording of the Quartet K.465 (Set 285); and the Quintet K.593 (Set 350), performed very inadequately by the old Pro Arte Quartet and Hobday. Still missing are the Piano Concerto K.450, the Quintet K.515 and Quartet K.428, the Sonata K.526 for violin and piano.

Four volumes of Haydn's quartets have been restored, including Set 527 which offers three of Haydn's masterpieces in the form—Opus 20 No. 4, Opus 74 No. 2, Opus 77 No. 2. Another masterpiece, Opus 64 No. 3, is in Set 689, together with two fine works, Opus 50 No. 6 and Opus 74 No. 1; Set 595 offers three excellent works, Opus 20 No. 1, Opus 55 No. 3, Opus 76 No. 4; and Set 525 three others, Opus 33 No. 2, Opus 64 No. 6, Opus 71 No. 1. The Pro Arte performances range from poor to fair. Still missing are Set 528, with the great Opus 64 No. 4 and the fine Opus 54 No. 3 and Opus 55 No. 1; and the recordings of the Symphonies Nos. 67, 80, 86, and 97.

The superb Budapest Quartet performance of Beethoven's Opus 130 (Set 157) will be available again; and one can only hope that the new pressings of the recording will give as good reproduction of it as the old. And Schnabel's performance of the Sonata Opus 106 (Hammerklavier) (Set 403), with its distortion of outlines and slovenliness of execution in the first and last movements, but with its statement of the slow movement that makes it a tremendous experience. Still missing are the Casals performances of the Cello Sonatas Opus 102 No. 1 and Opus 69.

Verdi's "Otello" (Set 152), with beautiful singing by Carbone and Granforte, has been restored. Also two excellent single records of passages from Act 3 of Wagner's "Meistersinger": 7682, with the quintet sung by Elisabeth Schumann, Melchior, Schorr, Parr, and Williams, and Eucht macht ihr's leicht sung by Schorr; and 7681, with Abendlich glühend sung by Melchior and Schorr, and Aba! da streicht die Lene sung by Schorr. But not the Rethberg-Schorr record of the lovely duet beginning with Sieb' E'chen! Dächt' ich doch and the later Hat man mit dem Schutwerk.

And still missing are Elisabeth Schumann's Schubert Recital, Lotte Lehmann's two Song Recitals, and Lehmann's volume of Wolf songs.

To the foregoing report of good news I must add a warning—that production

The Babylonian TALMUD

$3.00

LEO AUERBACH

Retruthals • Leavings for the Poor
Levirate Marriage • Criminal Law Festivals • Penalties
Wisdom of the Sages

"This TALMUD . . . is certainly worthwhile to anyone who desires to taste of the sea of Talmudic knowledge, without having recourse to the original sources." —Rabbi Samuel K. Mirsky, Prof. Yeshiva College, N. Y.

NOW for the first time there is available in English a large representative cross-section of the Original TALMUD.

LIMITED EDITION.

ORDER NOW!

Philosophical Library, Inc., Dept. N,
15 E. 40th St., N. Y. 16, N. Y.

Please send me . . . copies of THE BABYLONIAN TALMUD, at $3.00 each.

Enclosed are $ . . . . .

Name . . . . .

Address . . . . .

Crossword Puzzle No. 108

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Can be cut without injury
- 4 Keep a watch on this
- 6 It may fill the mattress or just a fold
- 9 A rum soul, perhaps, but he founded Rome
- 10 The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles
- 11 It's not only the rooster that sleeps thus
- 13 What we call a billion the French call this
- 15 Waldeufel, the Alsatian composer, was a favorite of this French Empress
- 16 A case comes before the Royal Navy concerning troops
- 17 "And how can man die better than facing fearful ----?"
- 19 Insinuated contempt
- 21 The word women love best
- 23 Scattered senses
- 25 Member of the firm of Pullen & Fillem
- 27 The alternative seems to be an Italian sort of conservative
- 28 The right to eat
- 31 Those who make tracks are likely to get him on their trail
- 32 Visitor making his voice heard?
- 33 An ass
- 34 Did care really kill one?
- 35 Dog that is another animal

- 3 It's something to get a real rest from these story tellers
- 4 "Thick and ---- they came at last"
- 5 A man might make his quietus with it, said Hamlet
- 6 The length of a dismal face
- 7 Garden of fruit-trees, mostly apple
- 8 Naked (anag.)
- 12 Comparatively bright
- 13 A keepsake from men to me
- 14 Liberty carried to extremes
- 16 Very chic, old girl. Where did you get it? (hidden)
- 18 "Naughtinesses"
- 20 Told off
- 22 Is a dame, literally and anagrammatically (hyphen, 3-4)
- 24 Auto to vocalize about
- 25 The ubiquitous beast of Spain
- 26 An explosive acid
- 27 This is all my eye!
- 29 "Lord above us" (Wordsworth)
- 30 The great novelist is incomplete, but betrays his nationality

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 107

ACROSS:—1 PUNIC; 4 HEADS; 7 RIPE; 8 REBETS; 10 TRIER; 12 ROOK; 13 TRET; 15 RED BOOK; 17 LINDER; 18 TIMING; 19 AXE; 21 VERNAL; 23 NODDERS; 24 RED; 26 OBTUSE; 28 REBETS; 31 ENTERED; 32 ACRE; 33 EAST; 34 HEXAD; 37 AUBURN; 38 ODIN; 39 TOTAL; 40 HERTS.

DOWN:—1 PEEK; 2 NEUTER; 3 CASHBOX; 4 HOT-POT; 5 ADIT; 6 SURE; 7 RURAL; 8 PRONE; 11 ERKINE; 14 TAGES; 15 RED NOSE; 16 KINDRED; 19 ALB; 20 END; 21 VIOLA; 22 RETIRE; 23 EYEWASH; 27 BNODAL; 28 BERBER; 29 ELAND; 30 SATIN; 33 CHIT; 34 EXIT; 35 BROS.

DOWN

- 1 Bacon's physician
- 2 Self-important

of the restored recordings probably will be as limited as that of the recordings which have been supposedly available during the past two or three years, and as insufficient for the demand. That means you should place your order with your dealer immediately; but it also means that you will be able to get some of the things you want only by going from store to store repeatedly to see what has come in.

Though Victor has announced the recording of Berlioz's Symphony "Harold in Italy" made recently by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, it has not arrived; and all that I have received from Victor that falls within the range of interest of this column is a reissue in a picture album of the set (740; $6.50) of Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 2 performed by Horowitz with Toscanini and the N.B.C. Symphony. The work is characteristic of Brahms's large-scale writing—the first movement in the way it communicates pumped-up grandiosity in a synthetically contrived large structure, the third in the way it drips saccharine; but I can stand listening to the finale. An unsuitably simious and svelte performance of the solo part by Horowitz is fitted into a superb orchestral framework created by Toscanini; and the whole is beautifully reproduced by a recording made not in Studio 8H but in Carnegie Hall. The surfaces of my copy are pronouncedly audible.

I have also received Marian Anderson's old record (14210; $1) of Schubert's "Ave Maria" and "Aufenthalt." My copy is afflicted with various noises, some of which get mixed in with and aggravate the shrill high notes that Anderson has recently learned how not to produce; and there are lifeless accompaniments by Kosti Vehainen.

CONTRIBUTORS

LIN YUTANG is perhaps the best-known Chinese interpreter of China to the West. His most recent book, "The Vigil of a Nation," has occasioned a controversy, in which the author himself joins in this issue of The Nation.

CHARLES ABRAMS is counsel to the American Federation of Housing Authorities and author of "Revolution in Land."

JOHN W. WHITE, who has represented American newspapers in Santiago, Chile, for many years, recently completed a trip through South America.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 31, 1945

NUMBER 13

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

The Battle of Germany	345
The Shape of Things	346
Bretton Woods Is Vital	348
The Lesson of the Defeat	349

ARTICLES

Bridges and Some Broader Issues by I. F. Stone	350
Veterans at San Francisco by Charles G. Bolté	351
John L. Lewis, Challenger by James A. Wechsler	353
Hitler's Last General by Joachim Joesten	354
Two Were Hanged by Gerold Frank	357
China to Lin Yutang—II by Edgar Snow	359
In the Wind	359

POLITICAL WAR

Spain and the Peace A Poem by Bernardo Clariana	360
Neo-Democracy in Brazil by Paulo Duarte	361
How Many Germans? by Max Mandellaub	362

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Theater in Paris by Frank Jones	363
Briefer Comment	366
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	368
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	370
Films by James Agee	370
Music by B. H. Haggin	371

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No 109 by Jack Barrett	372
--	-----

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON	Washington Editor I. F. STONE	Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
--	---	---

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE	Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN	Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX	Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL	JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER	CAREY MCWILLIAMS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 313 Kellogg Building.

The Battle of Germany

WITH six Allied armies across the Rhine, the Battle of Germany has begun. The manner of their crossing makes the beginning an auspicious one, and holds out much promise for the future.

Exactly one month before the 21st Army Group made the most significant of these crossings in the north, the Allies were apparently stuck against a firm German line running along the Maas, the Roer, the Ardennes, and the Saar Basin to the Rhine south of Lauterbourg. The accomplishments of Allied arms in the four weeks' offensive were tremendous. All Germany west of the Rhine except for an insignificant bridgehead south of Speyer in the Palatinate was cleared of enemy troops; four German armies were destroyed; Allied armies lined up solidly on the great river's west bank all the way from Cleve to Karlsruhe and at Remagen thrust across it. The last week of this preliminary offensive saw the boldest handling of troops, the most sweeping advances, and the most damaging defeat to the enemy when the American Third and Seventh armies executed a classic hammer-and-anvil movement in the Saar-Palatinate region, taking a bag of prisoners that may run over the 100,000 mark.

By last Friday the Rhine line had ceased to exist, and the enemy was clearly demonstrating his weaknesses. The rapid shuttling of precious divisions from the Ruhr front to the Remagen bridgehead had weakened the former without containing the latter: the First Army continued to make gains north, east, and south against a surprising lack of resistance. To the south, the Third Army seized upon the enemy's evident and unanticipated deterioration to make a virtually unopposed crossing between Mainz and Worms. Hodges's line of advance north from the Remagen bridgehead threatened an envelopment of the Ruhr; Patton's advance northeast threatened a sweep over the Main and up the Frankfurt superhighway toward Kassel and the upper Weser—indeed, by Sunday night the Main was crossed. Even before the long-planned and carefully prepared main blow across the Rhine could be struck, the Germans could no longer depend upon their traditional western barrier.

The main blow was delivered in decisive force, with traditional Montgomery thoroughness and with a traditional Montgomery order of the day: "And having crossed the Rhine, we will crack about in the plains of northern Germany, chasing the enemy from pillar to post"—a fair description of what will happen soon. It was the greatest combined operation since D-Day in Normandy; and like that operation it involved American, British, and Canadian soldiers, sailors, and airmen. On paper the Germans could muster as many troops against the Allied thrust as they did in Normandy; they had the material advantage of fighting closer to their bases of supply and the moral advantage of defending their native soil. But the failure to offer serious opposition up to Sunday night suggests a profound disintegrating process eating at the whole capacity of resistance of the Germans in the west.

Undoubtedly the enemy was so light on the ground along the Rhine that Kesselring pulled back the mobile elements of his one remaining first-class army, the First Paratroop, to wait for Montgomery to show his intentions and then deliver a counter-attack. That counter-attack should come early while Montgomery still has one foot on land and one in the water; but it is difficult to see how it can have serious consequences. The main German force, presumably held back in the devastated fortresses of the Ruhr, is confronted by the tough veterans of the American Ninth Army; it can expect to find road crossings blocked by the Airborne Army, and every junction blasted by Allied aircraft, which shot up 6,000 German vehicles on Sunday alone. Any German force seeking to drive south out of Holland should be met by the Canadians. With his flanks thus secured, Montgomery may be able to swing the British Second Army around in a wide envelopment of the Ruhr; and with a quick building up of the base of operations east of the Rhine apparently assured, this movement should be possible far sooner than the similar break-out in Normandy.

The Shape of Things

THE WHOLE ROW ABOUT THE MIDNIGHT CURFEW and Mayor LaGuardia has left us feeling rather terse and dogmatic. (1) We think the Byrnes order was foolish and unnecessary and will probably do more harm than good; (2) we think people who complain about it—except war workers on night shifts—are making a disgusting spectacle of themselves; (3) we think the Mayor should have accepted the order and done his best to enforce it in spite of his objections to it; and (4) we don't think he ought to be impeached for doing the contrary.

✱

GENERAL DE GAULLE IS REPORTED TO HAVE been irritated because there was no immediate response to his appeal for aid for the French forces that have risen against the new Japanese regime in Indo-China. Some assistance has now been promised by the American government. Chinese guerrillas and American planes based in China are reported to be already supporting the French in their efforts to prevent complete Japanese seizure of the colony. But the amount of assistance given must depend on the over-all strategy of the war against Japan. While we have no inside information about this strategy, the return to the Philippines, the conquest of Iwo Jima, and the air raids on Japanese cities indicate that our military plans call for an accelerated drive against the Japanese mainland by way of the China coast rather than a clean-up of outlying Japanese possessions. Reconquest of Indo-China would open up an alternate route to China, but obviously a much smaller amount of material could be moved into China in this way than by the seizure of a Chinese port. If despite these considerations American plans call for an invasion of Indo-China, De Gaulle is wholly within his rights in insisting that the French be permitted to participate in the operation. He must recognize, however, that we cannot allow sympathy for brave Frenchmen in Indo-China to influence basic military strategy.

✱

PROSPECTS FOR A COMPROMISE MAN-POWER bill which will enable the country to surmount the difficulties that are bound to arise after V-E Day brightened considerably last week as a result of suggestions made by Senator Austin. His proposals are based primarily on the Senate's voluntary measure, but go beyond it in permitting the drafting of men of military age for war jobs in industry or agriculture and in "freezing" workers in essential war jobs as long as their services are needed. Penalties would be imposed on employers and employees alike for violation of the man-power regulations. The need for enforcement powers to supplement the present restricted authority of the War Manpower Commission has been illustrated by the failure of the commission's attempt to shift workers from non-essential to essential war jobs. Of more than 4,000 workers requisitioned from non-essential industries in New Jersey, only 500 were actually transferred to essential occupations; 200 workers refused to accept essential jobs because they involved a cut in pay, even though their refusal made it illegal for any employer to hire them during the war. Senator Austin proposed that workers should be required to accept the jobs to which they were referred but that employers should be penalized for labor hoarding. Although strong support for the Austin compromise is reported, several of the Republican conferees seem determined to delay action until after a European victory in the hope that they can then prevent any measure from being adopted.

✱

BAD TIMES ARE BACK FOR AMERICAN INDIANS IF the Supreme Court's opinion that the Box Elder Treaty does not provide a legal basis for Shoshone land claims is an omen. The court's weird opinion, written by Justice Reed and affirmed by a five-to-four vote, reflected the views of three members—his own, and those of Justices Jackson and Black. The court had been called upon to determine whether the Box Elder Treaty, concluded in 1863, recognized Indian title to 15,000,000 acres of Western land, for whose loss the Indians are seeking to recover damages amounting to $15,000,000. In a confused concurring opinion Justices Jackson and Black gave the Indian his due—but no right to seek compensation for his lost land. They inferred that Indians could not have owned property since they had no such concept and no word to denote it. "Ownership meant no more to them," stated the justices, "than to roam the land as a great common and to possess and enjoy it in the same way that they possessed and enjoyed sunlight. . . . Acquisitiveness, which develops a law of real property, is an accomplishment only of the 'civilized'!" All very true, but still no reason for concluding, as they did, that the treaty provided no basis for Shoshone land claims. As Justice Douglas pointed out in a dissenting opinion, concurred in by Justices Frankfurter and Murphy, the United States could have extinguished Indian title by force. It chose to negotiate a treaty and through it obtained rights of way and of settlement. In obtaining these cessions the United States clearly acknowledged Indian claims to the land. Senate amendments ratifying the treaty further supported these claims. Admittedly the Indians weren't advanced enough to place "keep off" signs on their ancient tribal lands, but the enlightened trespassers who took over the continent knew who "owned" Manhattan when they bought it for $24. Treaties concluded with individual Indian tribes have formed the basis of the federal relationship with Indians and are the framework for their future protection. The Supreme Court should immediately grant a rehearing of the Shoshone case.

✕

ONTARIO IS WORTH WATCHING THESE DAYS. ITS government was defeated last week when the Liberal Party, led by Mitchell Hepburn, swung in behind the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation lack-of-confidence amendment. Premier George Drew, leader of the Progressive-Conservative Party, will waste few tears over his defeat. A bitter foe of Prime Minister Mackenzie King, he has wanted a wartime election to take advantage of the anti-King feeling over conscription. And he wants an election while Ontario is prosperous under the impetus of the war-industry boom and before reconversion, lowered farm prices, and unemployment raise ugly problems for which the Conservatives have no easy answer. The government party draws its strength from the farm areas and the upper and middle classes of the cities. The C. C. F., official opposition party, is strong in the mining north, the industrial towns, and the working-class metropolitan districts. In the present house, it holds almost as many seats as the Progressive-Conservatives; after the election it may well become the government. Its leader, Ted Jolliffe, a young Toronto lawyer, is brainy, competent, and a good parliamentarian. He represents a new type of Canadian politician which the left-wing movement has raised to prominence. Mitch Hepburn, political poltergeist, onion farmer, opponent of the C. I. O., came out of retirement to resume leadership of the Ontario Liberals. He has patched up his quarrel with Ottawa, he has color and drive, and he expects to make gains at the expense of the Tories. But the chief spectator at the Ontario election fight will be Prime Minister Mackenzie King. He must go before the Canadian people this summer and Ontario will be regarded as a preview of the big show.

✕

NEARLY 1,200 AMERICA FIRSTERS GATHERED AT the Plasterers' Benevolent and Protective Association (A. F. of L.) Hall in Chicago on March 15 to listen to Gerald L. K. Smith, who has been trying for some months to hold a meeting in the city. A heavy picket line surrounded the hall; some rocks were thrown, but an adequate police detail prevented disorder. Engaging in his usual antics, Smith announced the formation of a Nationalist News Service to compete with the AP and UP, said that "twenty-one national groups" were participating in an organized nationalist lobby in Washington, and stressed the future importance of the Nationalist Veterans of World War II—a group that he has recently organized. Waving "the new flag" which he charged had been designed by "the internationalists"—a combination of the Rising Sun, the Union Jack, and the Stars and Stripes—he loudly denounced communism, President Roosevelt, Walter Winchell, Dumbarton Oaks, and the Yalta conference. Sprinkled through his tirade were the familiar anti-Semitic remarks: denunciation of the B'nai B'rith; castigation of Morgenthau; and references to a list of names he could not read, so he said, for fear of being called an anti-Semite! With various polls indicating a fairly high incidence of latent anti-Semitism in the Middle West, the potential threat which Smith represents should not be minimized. Currently he is biding his time, content merely to keep the old fires and calumnies alive. The crowd in Chicago was largely made up of elderly people trailing, as Robert Lasch of the Chicago Sun said, "the fragrance of Townsendism." Should a mood of frustration and disenchantment sweep the ranks of younger Americans after the war, he would have the opportunity that he so obviously, and confidently, expects—one more powerful argument for a post-war program of full employment.

✕

THE STRIKE NOW GOING ON IN THE MOTION picture industry, which finds 19,000 studio workers supporting the demand of seventy-eight set designers for recognition of their local union (a part of the Painters' Union), does not present a "jurisdictional dispute" in the usual sense of the term. What the set designers are seeking to accomplish is the preservation of their autonomy against encroachment by the powerful racket-ridden International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees. Over the years, the I. A. T. S. E. has attempted several bold forays upon other unions affiliated, as is the I. A. T. S. E. itself, with the American Federation of Labor. These forays have been based not upon any claim of membership or any real claim of jurisdiction over the type of work performed, but rather upon its ability to coerce the industry through its control of the projectionists in the motion picture theaters. In the past the industry has been a willing victim of this "coercion," so called, since it has used the I. A. T. S. E. as a means of battling other unions in the industry and, also, for the purpose of keeping the members of the I. A. T. S. E. under the control of its agents. During the period when it was directly controlled by Messrs. Bioff and Browne, the I. A. T. S. E. levied a 2 per cent assessment upon its members, from which it collected a fund in excess of one million dollars which was turned over to George Browne to expend as he saw fit. While busy raking in money from this source, Bioff and Browne were collecting a king's ransom from the motion picture producers. Faced with the possibility of being forced into such an organization as the I. A. T. S. E., the set designers have properly decided to strike for the protection of their rights. And they will win. The entire trade-union membership in Hollywood (with the exception of the I. A. T. S. E. locals) is solidly behind them and they have, in Herbert Sorrell, a spokesman of great force and ability.

✕

IN THE HALF-PAST-ELEVENTH HOUR RESERVED for the more cautious quislings, General Franco summoned his Cabinet and asked for a declaration of war on Japan.

On the desk of every minister was a list of Spanish civilians bayoneted by the Japanese fleeing from Manila. They numbered around a hundred and thirty—an infinitesimal fraction of the number of Spanish civilians killed by the German and Italian fascist aviation and artillery during the Spanish war, not to mention those massacred by Franco troops. But those civilians were "reds" and moreover there is no code of patriotism requiring that one declare war against oneself. Times have changed and even for a regime that is responsible for the death of a million Spaniards, 130 casualties offer sufficient grounds for swapping sides—though not too brusquely, not by declaring war on both ends of the Axis at the same time. That would be asking too much. A declaration of war on Japan alone, even if it does not win Franco the desired place at the United Nations conference, should facilitate the work of his agents who, according to our information, are already busy in San Francisco. Later there will always be time for declaring war on Germany, at precisely the right moment, perhaps on the day following the fall of Berchtesgaden.

✱

BUT FOR A DAY AT LEAST THE PRETENDER TO the non-existent Spanish throne seemed to have out-manuevered Franco—at least in the headlines. The aim of Don Juan's manifesto, published last Thursday at Lausanne, was also a seat at San Francisco. To this end he rang all the possible changes on the theme of liberty and constitutional rights and proclaimed that "the regime established by General Franco, modeled on the totalitarian system of the Axis powers, is fundamentally inconsistent with conditions prevailing in the world as a result of the present conflict." With this judgment no democratic Spaniard will quarrel, but when Juan offers himself as the alternative few will go along with him. To the total bankruptcy of the monarchical institution in Spain must be added his own miserable personal record: during the Spanish war he offered his services to Franco as a navy officer; later, when the general struggle began, his sympathies were consistently with the Axis, until the tide turned in 1943. Apparently his manifesto had little effect even among Spanish reactionaries; its repercussions in Madrid, according to the United Press, were practically nil. To the promises of such a man the old Chinese adage seems applicable: "If there be no faith in words, of what use are they?"

✱

OF COURSE, THE ORGANIZATION OF PEACE MUST include Spain, and there is only one Spain that can be included—Republican Spain. For that reason we have been watching with satisfaction the progress recently made toward unity among the Republican forces. On March 26, for example, the New York Times published a dispatch from London reporting that Dr. Negrín had "grown enormously in prestige in the past six months" and describing him as the leading factor in the process of unification. Equally encouraging were the results of a meeting in New York of several members of the last Basque autonomous government, whose President was José Antonio de Aguirre, the well-known Catholic leader. The decisions reached open the way to the organization of a united Republican government in exile in which Basques and Catalans will be adequately represented. But the most significant bit of news is that reported through private channels from Mexico. During the Chapultepec conference Indalecio Prieto, until now Dr. Negrín's most stubborn Republican opponent, discussed the Spanish situation at a luncheon in one of the Latin American embassies. He criticized sharply the lack of a constructive policy toward Spain on the part of the Western democracies. The British government, he said, had been determined to force the reestablishment of the monarchy but lately had begun to realize that nothing could be accomplished in that direction. More recently it had taken up Maura, only to drop him within a month. The one clear policy was that of Russia, "which had always been consistently on the side of the Spanish Republic." He spoke in unexpectedly high terms of Negrín and even declared his readiness to meet the Prime Minister, although "with witnesses" present. Should Negrín insist upon including Communists, Señor Prieto said he would not enter the government, but he would "not be an obstacle to its formation." That, coming from Señor Prieto, is a long step forward.

✱

WE HOPE OUR READERS IN THE CAPITAL WILL join with the Southern Conference for Human Welfare in honoring Supreme Court Justice Hugo L. Black at the dinner to be tendered him in Washington on April 3. The occasion will be the presentation to this great Southern progressive and judge of the annual Thomas Jefferson award. No one in the South more fully deserves it. It is a pleasure to note that the well-known Negro lawyer Charles Houston will be one of the speakers and that Senator Barkley will be toastmaster. Senator Pepper, Judge Sherman Minton, Fred Vinson, and Frank Graham will speak, and Mrs. Roosevelt will be present. This is the second time the Jefferson award has gone to Black. It was presented to him seven years ago for his services as Senator. It goes to him this time for his work on the court.

Bretton Woods Is Vital

THE Bretton Woods agreements have come under such heavy fire from both British and American quarters that the average Congressman can hardly be blamed for becoming confused on the basic issues. Many of the criticisms are so technical that only a few experts understand their implications. Yet a little study will reveal that even the most technical objections spring in no small part from unreconstructed nationalist views. In a previous issue The Nation pointed out that British criticism was largely based on the assumption that Uncle Sam is taking John Bull for a ride, and that the effect of the International Monetary Fund is to put British economy in a gold strait-jacket at the mercy of uncontrolled business fluctuations in the United States. In the hearings before the House Banking and Currency Committee, the opposite view has been expressed by numerous witnesses. This was particularly evident in the testimony of Leon Fraser, president of the First National Bank of New York, who constantly stressed the benefits which Britain would enjoy under the fund to the disadvantage of the United States. The opposition of the big commercial banks to the fund does not spring entirely, however, from fear that we are being hoodwinked by John Bull. Other important banking groups, particularly the investment bankers, have come out strongly for the Bretton Woods program as a whole. The difference is not one of relative patriotism but of conflicting interests. The investment bankers stand to gain by the governmental guaranties and international supervision of long-term international loans. The big commercial banks, on the other hand, are loath to part with the profits on foreign exchange which have traditionally been theirs.

That is not to say that the criticisms of the Bretton Woods program are wholly unfounded or that they are entirely based on selfish considerations. The fund represents a compromise between the clearing union proposed by Keynes and the stabilization fund proposed by the American Treasury. It is not a very satisfactory compromise. Its weaknesses are largely of a technical nature, but they would become important if the United States should decide to fly in the face of economic law by simultaneously encouraging exports, restricting imports, and seeking to collect from its debtors. This policy would inevitably drain dollars from any international clearing arrangement, and the efforts which were made at Bretton Woods to safeguard the new fund only appear to have made it cumbersome and difficult of operation.

Although it may be far from perfect, no one denies that the fund will facilitate international trade and reduce the danger of an international economic collapse such as occurred in the early 1930's. It does not solve the problems created by America's anachronistic commercial policies, but it may reduce their gravity. Even its critics do not seriously propose that the entire program be scrapped. They merely want it made over to accord with their special views or interests. The severest critics of the fund profess to see great value in the International Bank and urge its acceptance. Yet under the Bretton Woods Agreement the bank is open only to fund members. If the fund is rejected, there can be no bank.

From a political standpoint, moreover, Bretton Woods has a significance that goes far beyond the immediate economic advantages of the fund and the bank. The bill now before Congress for the implementation of the Bretton Woods program is a test. What happens to it will determine whether the United States wants to have a stable international economy after the war or plans to revert to unrestrained economic warfare. There is no middle ground. The alternative to Bretton Woods is no agreement at all. The agreement represents a compromise reached after weeks of negotiations. No major amendments suggested at this late date are likely to prove acceptable to the forty-four other nations represented at the conference. Since the program is the outcome of negotiation, the attitude of Congress toward it is being watched throughout the world as indication of American sincerity with respect to post-war collaboration of all kinds. If the plan is rejected, Britain will probably feel it necessary to embark on a policy of bilateralism which, in turn, will provoke intensified nationalistic reactions in this country. While Russia's interest in monetary stabilization is nominal, rejection of the Bretton Woods scheme might be interpreted in Moscow as a threat to the Yalta agreement. For no real distinction can be made between economic and political cooperation. Political security can be built only on a foundation of harmonious international economic arrangements. The whole edifice of post-war security thus rests on the cornerstone laid at Bretton Woods.

The Lesson of the Defeat

THERE is one clear and urgent conclusion to be drawn from the Senate's refusal to confirm Aubrey Williams as head of the Rural Electrification Administration (REA). It is the need for preparation now by progressive farm, labor, and middle-class organizations for the 1946 Congressional elections. Williams was right when he said that "the crime" of which he was convicted in the Senate was that he really believes "the wage-earners, the farmers, and the little people should be an articulate part of our economic life." They never will be an articulate part of our economic or political life so long as we are content to elect a progressive President every four years—and then leave his program and his nominations to the mercy of a reactionary majority in Congress. We are glad that Williams is going back to his old job as director of organization for the Farmers' Union and that its militant president, Jim Patton, has declared his intention to take the issues in the Williams fight to the people in the states represented by those Senators who voted against him.

The charges against him were significantly vague. The best indication of the excellent job done by Williams in his years as deputy administrator of the WPA and head of the National Youth Administration is that his enemies could find so little in his record to use against him. The actual issue is that Williams is an uncompromising New Dealer. There is little doubt from the record of the hearings before the Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee that Williams might have been confirmed despite his New Deal record if he had been willing to "play ball" with certain copper interests. His unwillingness to do so was followed by a covert and then an open smear campaign. He was termed a Communist and a "nigger lover." A Presbyterian minister in Birmingham, Dr. Joseph M. Broady, was brought forward to play the central role in a shamefully un-American campaign against him. Williams's rejection for public office was asked on the ground that, although trained for the Presbyterian ministry, he decided not to follow that calling because he could not believe in the divinity of Christ. Neither did our Unitarian President, William Howard Taft. Neither did some of the Founding Fathers, several of whom had the skeptical and agnostic attitude toward religion typical of the eighteenth century. It is pertinent to recall that the Constitution not only forbids the setting up of an established church in America but bars any religious test for public office. It is also pertinent to recall that no less a figure than George Washington declared as President that this was not a Christian country but one made up of men of all creeds and none.

We applaud majority leader Barkley for his able speech in defense of Williams and the four Republicans—Aiken, Langer, Morse, and Young—who voted for confirmation. We call attention to the fact that the hearings and debates again disclosed a familiar situation: the Grange, the Farm Bureau Federation, and the National Milk Cooperatives spoke in the name of "agriculture"—against Williams, of course—without consulting their own members. They did so on the orders and anti-New Deal prejudices of Fred Brenckman and Ed O'Neil, their powerful Washington lobbyists. We hope that in the coming campaign the Farmers' Union will continue to bring home to farmers how often their leaders are stooges for reactionary industrial interests rather than authorized spokesmen for agriculture. And we hope that the P. A. C., quiescent since November, will take the Williams defeat as a warning and prepare to fight in the next Congressional primaries and elections.

Bridges and Some Broader Issues

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 23

THE case of Harry Bridges will reach the United States Supreme Court for argument on April 2. The decision will be of worldwide significance. Should the court rule against Bridges, it will provide a sardonic background for the forthcoming international security conference at San Francisco. The deportation of an outstanding labor leader at this time would not increase confidence abroad in our country's dependability as an influence for freedom. A favorable decision would create new hope for the future. It would mark the final defeat of reactionary American forces in one of the longest and hardest-fought episodes in the history of class struggle in the United States.

The facts are well known. In San Francisco, the very city in which we hope to lay the foundations for a freer world, an Australian dock worker rose from the ranks to leadership of his fellows little more than a decade ago. An organization drive on the San Francisco waterfront culminated in a great strike which not only improved the conditions of the longshoremen but reverberated throughout the ranks of labor in industrially feudalistic California. Migratory workers in the lettuce fields and girls behind the counters of department stores were inspired to a new militancy. The 1934 strike also brought Bridges the enmity of powerful capitalist interests accustomed to docility and venality in California's labor leaders. Private and governmental agencies set out to "get" Bridges by methods we like to think of as peculiarly European. "The San Francisco police department," one federal official told a Congressional committee some years back, "has followed him [Bridges] unremittently for years, and our men have also."

The voluminous record of the Bridges case will bring before the Supreme Court an unsavory procession of spies and stool pigeons, hard-shell reactionaries and weak-kneed liberals. All the contradictions of our society are in those pages—the fighting potentialities of the American working class, the gains they have achieved against terrific odds, the power which reaction still wields here, the compromising and vacillating nature of the New Deal. The San Francisco strike was only one of many ultimately stimulated in that period by the encouragement which the Roosevelt program gave to labor. Yet these same California interests were so influential, the anti-New Deal undertow so strong, that departments of government subject to the President spent years hunting for means to punish a labor leader who had merely put into practice the collective bargaining Mr. Roosevelt advocated.

The deportation law in this case traces back to statutes enacted during the anarchist scare in the last century. It was tightened up, with the Bridges case in mind, in 1940. It provides for the deportation of any alien who has been a member of, or affiliated with, any organization which advocates overthrow of the government by force and violence. The Department of Justice, relying principally on the "Communist Manifesto," Lenin's "State and Revolution," and the 1920 theses of the Third International, says the Communists are such a group. The department would be hard pressed to prove it by anything the Communists have ever said during the past ten years or more. The court may have to decide, in the light of the party's actual policies, how much of a "clear and present danger" is created by things Marx said in 1848 and Lenin in 1917.

The court may choose to let sleeping ideologists lie. The court may consider it unnecessary to answer that question if it finds unsatisfactory the evidence that Bridges has been a member of, or affiliated with, the party. After all these years of well-financed private and government snooping, with a dash here and there of subornation of perjury, there are only two witnesses to membership. One of them is an odd specimen for the law books. This witness, O'Neil, swore on the stand that he never said Bridges was a member of the Communist Party. Two Department of Justice employees swore that in an unsworn statement O'Neil told them otherwise! Lawyers will appreciate what an extraordinary bit of "evidence" this is. The other witness, Bridges's rival labor leader, Lundeberg, told federal agents on three different occasions—in 1939, in 1940, and again in 1941—that he had no information to indicate that Bridges had ever been a Communist. But in the hearings before Inspector Charles B. Sears later in 1941 something new was elicited from Lundeberg. On the witness stand Lundeberg was thrice taken over the story of a meeting he said he had in 1935 with Bridges and the Communist Sam Darcy. Judge Sears in this examination warned government counsel against leading questions. In the third account given on the stand that day Lundeberg testified that when Darcy asked him to join the Communist Party, Bridges laughed and said, "You don't have to be afraid because I am one, too."

Neither the minority nor the majority opinions handed down in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals on the Bridges case found this evidence impressive. Judge Healy, in the minority dissenting opinion, referred to "the paucity of the evidentiary product as contrasted with the magnitude of the effort expended in producing it." But for reasons to which I shall turn in a moment the scope of appeal and review in deportation cases has been very limited. The Circuit Court majority, in upholding the deportation order, said it did not feel "the pleasurable satisfaction that, barring a very slight possibility of error, the truth has been revealed." But the majority did not feel that in a deportation case it had the right to weigh evidence. It affirmed that "the simple question this court must answer is: Is there some evidence to sustain the charges? There is." (My italics.)

This brings us to one of the key questions the Supreme Court may have to answer. Until now the courts have generally held that deportation is a mere civil procedure. The due-process clause, which proliferated a whole series of subtle defenses for corporate property rights in the last half of the last century, was reduced in the same period to a mere shadow in deportation cases. No less an authority than Madison, in the Constitutional Convention, declared the banishment of an alien "among the severest of punishments." But our courts held that to separate an alien resident from his home, family, business, and associations and deport him was a civil procedure not subject to the safeguards and the full review provided in property and criminal cases. Counsel for Bridges cite a decision by Chief Justice Stone which deviated from this pattern and are asking in effect for a reversal of the older doctrine. Should they win this point, it would greatly increase the protection of alien residents here against abuse of the Deportation Act by government officials.

This, like several other aspects of the Bridges case, is of importance to citizens as well as alien residents. Labor unions can be weakened and strikes broken by deportation raids, as after the last war. These affect the rights and bargaining power of all members of the union. In this connection it is important to note that Attorney General Biddle is seeking in effect to reverse an Immigration Bureau order of 1934. This order dealt with members of unions affiliated with the old Communist-controlled Trade Union Unity League. The order declared that mere membership in a Communist-controlled union was not to be used as grounds for deportation, that union membership of this kind was not to be held proof of "affiliation" with an organization which advocated overthrow of the government by force and violence. Biddle, who appears as a very poor disciple of Holmes in this case, relies upon some aid given Bridges by the Communist Marine Workers' Industrial Union during the 1934 strike as evidence of "affiliation" within the meaning of the Deportation Act.

There are two other ways in which the doctrines argued by Biddle in this case are a danger to civil liberties in America. The Attorney General contends that an alien may be deported "for utterances, beliefs, or associations in which he would be protected from punishment by the First Amendment." Admittedly this amendment and the rest of the Bill of Rights apply to aliens as well as citizens. Biddle does not deny that. What he does argue is that an alien may be deported under certain circumstances for exercising freedom of speech, assembly, or association. This is a departure from historic American doctrine and an injustice to 3,500,000 alien residents who are subject to the same liabilities and duties as citizens. They are, for example, subject to the draft.

The argument made in defending and interpreting the deportation laws is also a departure from tradition in another respect. It is proposed that a man be punished by deportation, not for what that man did, or said, or himself believed, but for his alleged association with Communists. This notion of "guilt by association" or "group guilt" is, as Professor Chafee of Harvard has noted, a break with time-honored legal concepts, which hold that guilt must be personal, that no man may be punished for the deeds of others except in an actual criminal conspiracy. "It is the essence of the institution of liberty," Charles Evans Hughes said in 1920, when he opposed the expulsion of the Socialists from the New York Assembly, "that it be recognized that guilt is personal." The establishment of the idea of guilt by imputation, guilt by association, would place a powerful weapon in the hands of post-war reaction.

It is these vital, if obscure, legal and constitutional issues which may make the coming Bridges decision crucial for the future of civil liberties and trade unionism in America.

Veterans at San Francisco

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

IT IS wise to run for cover when a speaker, freshly returned from a flying two weeks' visit to several war fronts, clears his throat and says, "Now what our boys are fighting for is. . . ." It usually turns out that the fellow finds all the soldiers pining for the same things the fellow himself was pining for prior to his tour of inspection: service men and new veterans are likely to prove nationalist or internationalist, free-enterprisers or planned-economy boys, depending on their "interpreter." The fact is, of course, that in a military force of some 12,000,000 men individual war aims are about as diverse as they would be in any comparable cross-section of the population. This is perhaps especially true in the United States armed forces, fighting men of a nation which has never defined its war aims clearly.

One war aim, however, is, I venture to say, basic to 99 per cent of American service men. This is the desire for peace—I leave out the 1 per cent which enjoys the war. It is not only the desire for personal peace, for an end to death, wounds, destruction, boredom, khaki clothes, spit and polish, the top sergeant; it is also a very real desire, generally inarticulate, that the personal sacrifice of blood, time, and talent will mean something. It is a desire that the terrible, corroding waste of the war will add up to something positive, some guaranty of peace for one's children.

Now I will not go on from there and say that the 99 per cent are unanimously agreed that international cooperation is the only road to this peace. There are soldiers fighting today in Germany who think that if Roosevelt had never meddled in the European mess they might be resting back home. There are soldiers and marines in the Pacific who are fighting William Randolph Hearst's war, a war against the yellow peril. There are fighting men in all theaters who are sure we shall have to fight Russia after we have taken care of Germany and Japan. There are sailors who despise the British navy and scoff at the limeys; soldiers who are contemptuous of the French; soldiers who want to hurry home as soon as this particular mess is over and let the dirty, starving, naked Wops and Wogs and Frogs continue to be dirty, starving, and naked.

Having said that much I want to present quite frankly the views of one veteran and report on the stand that is being taken by the veterans' association with which I have been closely associated. In its Statement of Intentions the American Veterans' Committee called for:

Active participation of the United States in the United Nations organization to stop any threat of aggression and promote social and economic measures which will remove the causes of war.

Establishment of an international veterans' council for the furtherance of world peace and justice among the people of all nations.

That brings us to San Francisco. There has been a growing feeling throughout the country that the new veterans should be heard at the Golden Gate conference: after all without their efforts the conference could never have been held. The proposal came directly to the American Veterans' Committee in a letter from one of its founders who is a sergeant of the Army Air Forces in the Philippines. He demanded that the organization send representatives to San Francisco to tell the delegates what kind of world organization the fighting men want to see come out of the war and listed the advantages to be gained:

Your presence and the ideas you advocate will show some of the delegates who fear that the United States will not take up its responsibilities after the war that there is a large part of that most important body of men—the veterans—who not only want us to take up that responsibility, but who will fight vigorously for the idea of taking it up and extending it.

It will strengthen the hands of our own delegates if they wish to propose the more forward-looking schemes for the organization, or it will perhaps encourage them to propose the more forward-looking schemes if they seem reluctant to do so.

It will impress upon our foreign-affairs men and upon our Congressmen that veterans are going to take an interest in how they vote on such matters as well as on matters of aid to themselves.

Another Air Forces man, a corporal in New Guinea, wrote at the same time saying that "A. V. C.'s men should be there as reporters to veterans and fighting men who cannot be there but who have pledged themselves to work throughout their lives for continuing peace. . . . Right now you are our eyes and ears. Go with backing from all our men."

To get this backing, A. V. C.'s Planning Committee sent out an airmail edition of the organization's Bulletin last week containing eight questions for the members to vote on. Here are the questions:

1. Do you want A. V. C. to represent you at San Francisco?

2. Do you favor immediate formation of the United Nations security organization, with the United States joining before peace treaties are written?

3. Do you oppose reservations which would weaken the organization?

4. Do you support the use of United States armed forces to stop aggression without specific Congressional approval in each case?

5. If the United Nations Security Council asked for United States armed forces to take positive action to preserve the peace, would you be willing to serve?

6. Do you support the voting plan agreed upon at Yalta?

7. Do you want the United States delegation to pledge its unanimous support of the United States government policy?

8. Do you want as much power as possible placed in the hands of the Economic and Social Council for the purpose of removing the causes of war?

Questions 2, 3, and 4 were asked of the Presidential candidates in October by Senator Ball, with famous results; the same three, plus question 5, were asked of A. V. C. members in November, with results not yet famous but certainly of deep significance. The answers were very nearly unanimous—"yes to all four." Asking a man still in a foxhole if he would be willing to serve in some future battle is, as one member pointed out, "plenty rugged—the $64 question for fair. But if I say yes to the other three questions, I have to say it to this one." The current Bulletin explains the Yalta plan for voting in detail before posing question 6, and points out Senator Vandenberg's strange insistence on "the right of free action" as prelude to question 7. It adds, "The hope of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals is that they will give the world a period of enforced peace—a time in which we can all work for the removal of the underlying economic and social causes of war," and then asks question 8.

As the Bulletin points out, "This is a movement not just for A. V. C. members but for 12,000,000 service men—and the more votes we get the more we'll be listened to in San Francisco." Members are urged to "show this Bulletin around, get as many men in your outfit as you can to send us their votes, or write a letter with your vote and get others to join you in signing it." Already, a week after the Bulletin was mailed, the response from discharged men and from soldiers in the states has been great—and encouraging: "Yes on all," signed by five sailors in Washington; "The Chicago Tribune has been crying that the 'boys' should be represented at San Francisco. I agree. I hope the Colonel will be pleased with A. V. C."; "Send the delegates—let us be heard—O.K. on all eight—For a smashing Victory—lotsa peace!"

"Lotsa peace!" is the word." Enough evidence will undercut the isolationists' slogan: "Wait till the boys come home." The plans are laid; a delegation is going; the votes will be presented to the United States representatives; the proceedings will be reported back to veterans and service men.

John L. Lewis, Challenger

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Washington, March 24

THERE is an unchanging quality in the Lewis tragedy. Once again the massive, morose leader of the Mine Workers goes through his familiar theatrical routine of contract negotiations. This is his second major war-time show. The first led to four coal strikes. Probably nobody, not even Lewis himself, knows how the new adventure will end. It is clear, however, that the stakes are infinitely bigger than the union's listed demands. Lewis is still trying to recapture the place of power in the labor movement which he lost when the C. I. O. repudiated his leadership. He is still waging his war of revenge—the private war to which he has devoted most of his time and resources since Pearl Harbor.

Watching him tirelessly quibble with the operators, maneuver for position, assume old postures, and triumphantly turn new phrases, one cannot escape the sense of enormous human waste. At history's turning-point his battles remain personal and local; amid momentous realignments of world labor he recites his picturesque polemics against the coal barons, cries out anew against Roosevelt's Administration, haggles with men who are half his size. The most dramatic performer on labor's stage should have a more majestic role. This is the one Lewis chose.

It is fruitless to speculate on the outcome of the current talks. Official announcement of a deadlock is momentarily expected as this is written; the bituminous pact expires on April 1. The two most explosive items in the U. M. W. program are Lewis's unexpected proposal for a ten-cents-a-ton union royalty on all coal mined and his insistence that the union have the right to strike to prevent shipments of coal to firms whose employees are on strike. The first proposal, if granted, would give the U. M. W. the most fabulous war chest in labor annals. The second would make other unions vastly dependent on the good-will of the Lewis machine. Both have created minor panic among the easily terrified operators. They are willing to discuss the "fringe" wage increases sought by Lewis, such as payment for explosives; they would undoubtedly yield a lot of ground on this point. Will Lewis force a showdown on the royalty and boycott issues? Will the government seize the mines before the showdown comes? No one is sure yet. Much of Lewis's strategy may hinge on day-to-day developments in the European war. A sudden Nazi collapse would probably alter his time-table and dispel any mood of compromise.

Regardless of the tactical moves Lewis decides to make, his long-range plan is unchanged. It is reflected in his speeches at the wage conferences. It is mirrored in the sullen pages of the Mine Workers' Journal. As the war nears its end, he believes that labor will be in a mood for militant leadership—and will find itself in the arms of John L. Lewis.

Throughout the war Lewis's thinking has been shaped by the conviction that the stabilization program was doomed to failure: inflation, profiteering, and inequalities of sacrifice were inevitable. Rank-and-file unionists would become disgruntled and disheartened. The prevailing temper at the war's end would be disillusionment. The labor chiefs who faithfully adhered to the President's leadership would find themselves generally discredited. And labor would roll out the carpet for Lewis's victorious homecoming. His strategy has required extraordinary patience, but Lewis has never wavered in his belief that it would be vindicated.

The Mine Workers' Journal has hammered away on the theme of the Administration's "betrayal" of labor's interests. Lewis has punctured long silences with clamor against profiteering and scornful thrusts at pro-Roosevelt laborites. Now he has the floor again; the coal case gives him a national audience. "The rich get richer," he laments, calling the roll of corporate profits. Undeniable loopholes in the stabilization set-up provide him with his text. Administration blunders—such as the price increase granted to company stores in the coal regions—strengthen his hand. A. F. L. and C. I. O. leaders continue their futile demands for the relaxation of the Little Steel formula. In Detroit 300,000 members of the Automobile Workers' Union participate in a referendum on the no-strike pledge; one third vote to rescind the pledge on the eve of the war's climactic engagements. In Washington the Senate Banking and Currency Committee hears a long line of lobbyists for profit-laden industries demand new concessions to special interests in the price-control law. Lewis might have written the scenario himself. The outbursts of left-wing C. I. O. leaders against him are relatively unimportant; he is addressing labor's rank and file.

He began the negotiations in characteristic fashion. Demands for a general wage increase representing a frontal assault on the wage-stabilization line were generally forecast; instead he brought forth the royalty rabbit. One paradox in this proposal has not been widely noted. Throughout his career Lewis has sneered at "social-service" projects in trade unions. The union's business, he maintained, was wages and hours; let Dubinsky stage "Pins and Needles" or build a summer camp for unionists. Now he pledges that funds accruing from the royalties will be used to give U. M. W. members "modern medical and surgical service, hospitalization, insurance, rehabilitation, and economic protection." Surely none can contend, he asserts, that this device is inflationary; no one can brand it a violation of the stabilization rules.

On the surface this proposal seemed to represent a major if belated chapter in Lewis's education. On the one hand he was recognizing that unions could serve human needs beyond the collective-bargaining table. He also appeared to be tacitly conceding that the economics of the anti-inflation program made some sense. But inevitably the thoroughness of Lewis's conversion was open to question. Who would administer this huge royalty fund? Presumably the Executive Board of the U. M. W. Who is the Executive Board? John L. Lewis and the yes-men who have survived his purges. What guaranties are there that the money will be used for the lofty purposes outlined? None at all.

The phrase "economic protection" could readily be the justification for using most of the fund to finance post-war organizing enterprises which Lewis has long been planning.

Lewis's other surprise move was his filing of a strike notice. The ill-conceived Smith-Connally law, framed to "get" Lewis, gave him the opportunity to call for the biggest strike ballot in labor history. The vote, which will have occurred before this appears unless the government takes over the mines at the eleventh hour, is to be conducted by a government agency—the National Labor Relations Board. The result is a foregone conclusion. On Election Day the miners follow Franklin D. Roosevelt. In union affairs they follow Lewis. To the miners this is strictly union business. Anything more than a token vote of opposition will represent a sensational upset.

It had been anticipated, of course, that Lewis would avoid any discussion of strikes, as he did two years ago, and that the miners would act without written or public orders. "No contract, no work" needs no elaboration in the coal fields. Instead, Lewis proclaimed his respect for law and order; to protect the legal interests of his members—in the event of an unpleasant interruption of work—the notice was duly filed.

As soon as the strike vote is over the miners are free to stop work without fear of reprisal until the government seizes the properties. Once the walkouts begin, the Administration will unquestionably intervene; presumably the miners will resume work, and the long process of War Labor Board mediation will start. But the fact that a strike ballot was taken will vastly enhance Lewis's strength, both in the bargaining process and in his labor public relations. The operators are almost pathologically fearful of government seizure; this time, they are convinced, they won't get their mines back for an indefinite period—although their profits will continue. As the threat of seizure mounts, the temptation to capitulate grows.

The vote will also be heralded by Lewis as an affirmation that he is solidly supported in the coal fields. It will be a new demonstration of his supremacy in the U. M. W. It will offer him at least minor solace for the recurrent defeats he has suffered at Roosevelt's hands in national affairs. And, as in 1943, his foes will be divided. Suspecting Lewis, many will nevertheless be reluctant to join the witch-hunt against the miners. The opulence of the coal operators will caricature their squawks of patriotic indignation.

Whatever happens, the 1945 coal conflict remains primarily another incident in Lewis's long campaign. His real battleground will be the post-war world. The present skirmishing is a build-up for the decisive rounds in the fight for leadership of labor. Lewis shows no signs of senility.

Hitler's Last General

BY JOACHIM JOESTEN

AT THE climactic stage in the Battle of Germany Hitler once again seeks to stave off his inevitable fate by a shuffle of top commanders in the western theater of war. Field Marshal Sir Bernard L. Montgomery's headquarters confirmed on March 22 what had earlier been rumored in Swedish and Swiss dispatches—that Field Marshal Karl Rudolf Gerd von Rundstedt has been relieved of his command in the west.

The only surprise in Montgomery's statement was the name of Rundstedt's successor. Previous reports had suggested that the man picked by the Führer to carry on the most thankless job in the world was Field Marshal Walther Model. Instead, Hitler's last hope is Field Marshal Albert Kesselring, who steps into Rundstedt's shoes. His deputy is Field Marshal Johannes Blaskowitz, who recently succeeded General Kurt Student in the northern army command, facing the Canadians. The southern wing of Kesselring's Rhine front is commanded by Obergruppenführer Paul Hausser of the Waffen-S.S. Rundstedt's Chief of Staff, the young and brilliant Lieutenant General Siegfried Westphal, is still at his post. Significantly he served for almost two years as Kesselring's chief of staff in Italy before he was transferred to Rundstedt's command last November.

Of the new team Hausser alone can be regarded as a 100 per cent Nazi. Westphal and Blaskowitz are career officers of the old school. The latter is less than lukewarm in his Nazi faith; he is known to have vigorously opposed Hitler's attack on the Soviet Union, and he frequently disregarded the Führer's strategic concepts in Russia. Early in 1943 he was transferred to the west, and led the German withdrawal from southern France with considerable skill.

Kesselring himself is almost as cryptic and ambiguous a figure as Rundstedt. Both men played highly mysterious roles in the plot that led to the attempt on Hitler's life last July 20. Undoubtedly they both had a finger in this affair, but with equal adroitness they knew how to extricate themselves at the critical moment. Immediately after the bomb attempt a usually well-informed Swiss newspaper, La Suisse of Geneva, reported that Kesselring, with two generals and two colonels of his staff, had been arrested on suspicion of complicity. On July 25 the official Deutsches Nachrichtenbüro said that Kesselring had been slightly wounded in Italy—similar mishaps occurred at the time to several other Nazi field commanders who subsequently were revealed to have been implicated in the plot.

On November 2 Kesselring again was reported to have been wounded when an Allied plane strafed his automobile near Bologna. Then, on December 31, a broadcast by the Brussels radio quoted what was said to be the copy of an order of the day by Hitler, dated November 27, announcing the death of Marshal Kesselring and of several other high officers. This drew an immediate denial from Allied headquarters, whose spokesman in Rome categorically declared that Kesselring was still alive. Probably the Brussels story was planted by the Germans in an attempt to mislead the Allies about Kesselring and thus prepare the ground for his assumption of command—which the Nazis never announced. There is unmistakable significance in Kesselring's appointment to his present post.

Whatever his feelings toward Hitler and the Nazi regime, the Marshal is known to belong to the "no surrender" school. Although as a strategist he is not so highly rated as Rundstedt, he is a master of the slow, hard-fighting retreat. He proved in Italy that he is able to make the most of the defensive opportunities offered by difficult terrain. So it is logical to assume that Hitler's choice of the man at this crucial stage, when the Allies are about to cross the Rhine and the Oder in strength, is closely tied up with the Nazis' well-known plans for a desperate last-ditch stand in the inaccessible mountain areas of Bavaria, Austria, and northern Italy. Apparently Kesselring is the man picked to conduct the retreat from the indefensible plains of northern Germany to the "Alpine citadel," where the Nazi desperadoes hope to last through at least another winter. Rundstedt would hardly have been fitted for such a task.

Originally Kesselring, a fifty-eight-year-old Bavarian, was an air-force man. He was a captain in World War I and distinguished himself in many dog fights. It was largely because of his old friendship with Hermann Göring that he advanced rapidly under the Nazi regime. In June, 1936, he was made Chief of Staff of the Luftwaffe, in which he had previously headed the department of training. In this capacity, he had been the first to develop the technique of mass air attacks in support of ground forces which came to be known as rollender Einsatz.

As commander of Luftflotte I since the Wehrmacht reform of February, 1938, Kesselring took a prominent part in the Polish campaign, where his rollender Einsatz worked perfectly. Later he directed aerial campaigns in Belgium, France, and Britain. He was made a field marshal at the Reichstag "victory" meeting of June 30, 1940. After the outbreak of war with Russia he directed aerial operations on the central sector. In February, 1942, he was transferred to Italy, where he won most of his laurels.

Rundstedt's removal has dealt a severe blow to Allied hopes of getting the bulk of the Wehrmacht to surrender once Germany's military situation has become hopeless beyond any shadow of a doubt. Whether or not Rundstedt recently made overtures to General Eisenhower looking toward an armistice, as reports from various European capitals have suggested—Berlin took pains to issue an official denial—there can be little doubt that the hope was entertained in Allied circles that Rundstedt at the proper time would surrender the regular army. He was the only German general with sufficient prestige and authority to swing a major portion of the Wehrmacht away from Hitler's and Himmler's leadership.

Field Marshal von Rundstedt is a unique phenomenon—unique not so much for his accomplishments in the military sphere, where he achieved solid distinction, as for the fact that for more than twelve years he managed to be a Nazi and an anti-Nazi at the same time. Virtually alone among the Reichswehr old-timers, whose somewhat qualified allegiance Hitler won when he became Chancellor, Rundstedt weathered all subsequent purges. In order fully to appreciate this achievement, let us glance back at the Reichswehr set-up before February 4, 1938, when Hitler first assumed direct command over all the armed forces of the Reich.

At the beginning of 1938 this was the distribution of top commands in the Reichswehr:

War Minister and Commander-in-Chief of the Wehrmacht.
Field Marshal Werner von Blomberg

Commander-in-Chief of the Army
General Werner von Fritsch

Chief of the General Staff      General Ludwig Beck Gruppenkommandos

Berlin: General Karl Gerd von Rundstedt

Kassel: General Wilhelm Franz Ritter von Leeb

Dresden: General Fedor von Bock

Wehrkreiskommandos

Koenigsberg: General Walther von Brauchitsch

Stettin: General Johannes Blaskowitz

Berlin: General Edwin von Witzleben

Dresden: General Siegmund W. W. List

Stuttgart: General Geyer von Schweppenburg

Muenster: General Gunther von Kluge

Muenchen: General Walther von Reichenau

Breslau: General Paul Ludwig von Kleist

Kassel: General Hermann Dollmann

Hamburg: General Knochenhauer

Those were for many years the foremost names in the Germany army. These generals, with a few others, won most of the early blitz victories for Hitler. Few of them survived defeat.

Fritsch and Reichenau were murdered by the Gestapo; Beck and Witzleben were executed last July; Dollman was killed in the Battle of France; Kluge committed suicide; Knochenhauer is dead; Blomberg, in retirement since February 4, 1938, is believed to have fallen into Allied hands when Capri, where he lived, was taken; Brauchitsch has been inactive since his dismissal from the army High Command on December 19, 1941; Bock, Leeb, List, and Kleist were relieved of their commands on the eastern front in 1942 and 1943 and have not been heard from since the great purge of July, 1944; Geyer von Schweppenburg reportedly was killed on that occasion. The only ones of the sixteen who at the beginning of this year were known to be alive and still holding top commands were Rundstedt and Blaskowitz.

This is the more remarkable as Rundstedt, so far as is known, never joined the Nazi Party and for years was regarded as one of the leaders, if not the leader, of the secret Wehrmacht opposition to the Nazi regime and Hitler's "intuitive" conduct of the war.

It is not accurate to say that Rundstedt was one of Hitler's earliest backers among the Reichswehr generals. He was no friend of the Weimar Republic, it is true, and in 1932 he arrested the Prussian Socialist Ministers Braun and Severing, but his sympathies were with the anti-Nazi-minded General Kurt von Schleicher rather than with Hitler or Franz von Papen. Rundstedt, in fact, scarcely concealed his Junker's contempt for the "inflated lance corporal" and the "brown filth" (the S.A.) that carried him to power. He openly despised and opposed the Führer's handyman in the High Command, Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel. Though he did not speak up when his good friend Schleicher and his wife were murdered by the Gestapo in the blood purge of June 30, 1934, he never forgave the Nazis this affront.

In the latter part of 1943 the rumors about Rundstedt's disaffection took very definite shape. On December 16 a dispatch to the New York Times from its well-informed Stockholm correspondent George Axelsson said that Rundstedt, at that time military governor of France, had fallen into disgrace because he "responded to the appeal from German officers in Moscow to overthrow Nazism." The Times did not say how Rundstedt had "responded" to the appeals of General Walther von Seydlitz's "Union of German Officers in the U. S. S. R." beyond saying that he had made "overtures" to Moscow. The paper added that the Gestapo got wind of Rundstedt's moves and that the Marshal's neck was only saved by the intercession of his fellow-generals. About the same time reports were current in London that Rundstedt had dispatched one of his trusted aides, a Lieutenant Colonel von Harbour, to Lisbon on a secret peace mission. Later it was rumored that Harbour had been caught and shot by the Gestapo.

As D-Day approached, a strange game of backstage intrigues and unexplained shuffles of command began, and Rundstedt's character and position became even more ambiguous. In the early months of 1944 it was generally understood in Allied circles that Rundstedt had been shunted aside and that the task of defending the Atlantic Wall against the impending invasion had been turned over to Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, one of Hitler's favorites. The prominence given to Rommel in German news dispatches and pictures and his highly publicized tour of the Atlantic defenses bore out this impression.

On May 18, 1944, however, the German Transocean News Agency announced that Rundstedt had been named commander-in-chief of all German forces in Western Europe. Nevertheless, rumors persisted that the Marshal was wavering in his loyalty to Hitler and planning to let the Allies into France. While events proved this story to be untrue, it is a fact that the Atlantic Wall was breached far more quickly and at less cost to the Allies than had been anticipated. One month after the start of the invasion, on July 6, Hitler replaced Rundstedt with Field Marshal Günther von Kluge.

What had happened? There was no explanation until July 22, when a United Press dispatch from London quoted Allied intelligence quarters as saying that Rundstedt's dismissal was due to "a serious conflict between Nazi Elite Guard troops and the German army over the recent Oradour-sur-Glane massacre in France, which resulted in the assassination of a German general."

Thus when Colonel Klaus von Stauffenberg's bomb exploded at Hitler's headquarters on July 20, Rundstedt was in retirement. Reports immediately sprang up that he was in league with the rebels, that he had joined a secret "peace government," that he had fallen a victim of Himmler's purge. For a few days, while some of his colleagues hastened publicly to reaffirm their loyalty to the Führer and others were openly implicated in the assassination attempt, nothing at all was heard from Rundstedt. Then, on August 4, an amazing thing happened. A special announcement from the Führer's headquarters stated that Rundstedt, together with Keitel, Heinz Guderian, the new chief of the General Staff, and two obscure generals, had been appointed by Hitler to a military "court of honor" charged with investigating army officers who were suspected of participation in the putsch of July 20. The announcement went on to say that those found guilty by the "court of honor" were to be expelled from the Wehrmacht and handed over to the dreaded People's Tribunal for trial as "common criminals."

Incredibly, Rundstedt consented to sit in judgment on his peers. He acquiesced in the degradation of twenty-two army officers, most of them above the rank of major and including eight who were dead. He handed over to the Nazi Party's kangaroo court masquerading as the People's Tribunal his good friend Field Marshal Erwin von Witzleben, who for many years had served directly under him as commander of the Third Military District of Berlin. Witzleben and seven other officers were ignominiously hanged on August 8.

Shortly afterward Rundstedt's successor as commander-in-chief on the western front, Field Marshal von Kluge, committed suicide. This has been officially confirmed in a German High Command order of August 31, signed by Keitel, a copy of which fell into the hands of the British in December. According to the official Nazi version, Kluge's suicide was due to his "depressing responsibility for the outcome of the Battle of Normandy," but a B. B. C. correspondent, Hugh Carlton Green, who investigated the matter in Paris, arrived at the conclusion that the Marshal killed himself in despair over the execution of so many of his personal friends and out of a feeling of guilt. Kluge, Mr. Green declared, had known of the plot to remove Hitler and approved of it in principle, although he was reluctant to commit himself. This was the attitude of many high-ranking German officers in the July 20 affair, with generally disastrous consequences for them.

Whatever the reasons for Kluge's suicide, a few days after his death Rundstedt was back at his old post as commander on the western front. There was no announcement of this, and it was not until some weeks later that Allied intelligence officers began to recognize the Rundstedt touch in German military operations. Once the secret was out, the Nazis confirmed it.

Meanwhile, Field Marshal Rommel, with whom Rundstedt never got along well, had been eliminated by an Allied airplane that strafed his staff car near Caen on July 17. Rommel was critically wounded and died a few days later. This left Rundstedt the real master on the western front.

Although we have no official information on the subject, there is good reason to believe that Rundstedt resumed his old command on his own terms. He did so at a time when the military situation in both west and east had taken a disastrous turn for the Germans. For the first time since the days of Frederick the Great, the Fatherland was threatened with invasion from several directions. All we know for certain at this stage is that some time in late August or early September Hitler's "intuitive" conduct of the war was cut short by a bloodless palace revolution engineered by Heinrich Himmler, Joseph Goebbels, and Albert Speer—the influential, if little publicized, Minister for Armament and War Production—with at least the tacit support of Martin Bormann, the Deputy Leader of the Nazi Party. The purpose of the coup was to override Hitler's objections to giving Rundstedt a completely free hand in the west. The Marshal had refused to resume his command without an iron-clad guaranty that there would be no more interference "from above" with his strategic and tactical decisions. Himmler, who in spite of his ruthlessness is a far more judicious person than Hitler, granted Rundstedt's demands and saw to it that the Führer did, too. All this is no longer in doubt. Every bit of information that has come out of Germany in recent months bears out these basic facts.

The salient fact in German military operations on the western front from last fall up to early March was Rundstedt's untrammelled control. High Allied officers have attested to this on several occasions. The great German counter-offensive in the Ardennes last December was planned and executed by Rundstedt, although according to reports credited by some Allied officials Hitler inspired it. It was a good, professional job, even though it ended in failure.

In launching his offensive on December 16 Rundstedt issued an order of the day in which he exhorted his men to "give everything and to achieve the superhuman for our Fatherland and our Führer." In subsequent proclamations, too, he made a show of unquestioning loyalty and subordination to the Führer. By all appearances, then, Rundstedt was a faithful paladin of Hitler's, and all those rumors suggesting that some day he might become Germany's Badoglio were so much eyewash. Or were they?

If Rundstedt, the Junker, the old-school general, the friend of Schleicher, Fritsch, and Witzleben, really turned Nazi at a time when practically all his old colleagues had deserted the Führer, or had been eliminated by him, he would be a rare bird indeed. One may argue, of course, that in shouldering the hopeless task of pulling Germany out of the military quagmire into which Hitler's intuition had dumped it Rundstedt was prompted by purely patriotic motives. He may have wished to "save" Germany even at the cost of preserving Hitler and the Nazi regime. If that is the case, then Rundstedt's loyalty was bound to end the day it became obvious in his eyes that further resistance was senseless.

But it is far easier to climb on the Nazi band-wagon than to get off. According to Swiss reports, Rundstedt is now under arrest, awaiting trial. The Germans have officially announced that the Marshal's only son, Hans Gerd, a high official in the War Ministry, has been arrested. This alone is proof that the foxy "first gentleman of the German army" is in a bad way. He weathered all purges—except the last.

Two Were Hanged

BY GEROLD FRANK

ELIAHU HAKIM and Eliahu Bet-Souri are dead. They paid with their lives on the hangman's scaffold in Cairo for the murder, the deliberate and premeditated murder, of Lord Moyne, British minister resident in the Middle East. There is no question that they died firm in the belief that they were martyrs, and there is no question that a small segment of Palestine Jewry will agree with them. But the tragedy is one that goes beyond mere sympathy for two misguided youths and the family of the man they murdered.

I attended their trial in Cairo, and like the other correspondents in the courtroom day after day, I was deeply affected by the dignity with which they stated their case, by the courage with which they faced their judges, and by the closely reasoned argument they presented. They killed Lord Moyne. There was never any question of that. "We came to Egypt to kill the lord," Bet-Souri said. He said it without histrionics. "He was a symbol of British rule in Palestine, and as a symbol we killed him." They had nothing against him as a man. This was not a murder of passion. He was a symbol. Perhaps you saw photographs of Hakim and Bet-Souri which showed them as dark-jowled, shift-eyed guttersnipes. They were not that. Hakim, no more than eighteen, was a thin, sallow boy, and when he spoke, it was in a strained, hesitant voice, and he quoted the Bible. Bet-Souri was fair-haired and blue-eyed, with a close-clipped blond mustache above a firm mouth and strong chin—a steady youth who stood with folded arms between his impassive guards and now and then leveled a forefinger at the presiding justice and said calmly, "I disagree with you," or "That is not the fact." He was only twenty-three, but he spoke with the measured precision and maturity of a man twice his age. He carried the trial.

His premise was an astonishing one—we correspondents agreed on that—and yet so persuasive was his sincerity and so carefully reasoned his argument that if you accepted his premise you found yourself driven almost to his conclusion—that he and Hakim should be acquitted. What was this premise? It emerged from the charge that Great Britain was given the mandate precisely because it promised to facilitate immigration into Palestine, that immigration was deliberately halted by the White Paper in contravention of the mandate at a time when thousands of Jews, now dead in Europe, could have been brought into Palestine, and that he, Bet-Souri, and other "Sons of Palestine" had pleaded and protested and appealed—without avail.

"If we have given up propaganda and speeches as a method and have turned to the gun," said Bet-Souri, "it is because that is how the situation is in Palestine." Lord Moyne was a symbol, and he was killed. What was their premise? Bet-Souri stated it in what was undoubtedly the most electrifying moment of the trial. The presiding justice, thin-faced, gray-haired, exact, wearing the inevitable red tarboosh and seated on a throne-like chair, had abruptly halted Bet-Souri in his speech and snapped impatiently, "Here, stop this! You are giving us political propaganda. Get down to facts. What has all this to do with the killing of Lord Moyne?" And Bet-Souri, suddenly losing his calmness as he stood in the prisoners' dock behind the spike-tipped iron staves fencing him off from us, took one step forward toward the presiding justice, leveled that accusing finger at him, and in a voice so impassioned and carrying the accents of such righteousness that it almost brought us out of our seats, cried, "Our deed stemmed from our motives, and our motives stemmed from our ideals, and if we prove our ideals are right and just, then our deed was just!" The presiding justice, taken aback, stared at him for a moment, looked down at his blotter, and said in Arabic, "Continue."

The court suppressed note-taking when Bet-Souri made his speech explaining the motives behind the murder, but to anyone who has been in Palestine they are no secret. It has been charged before that the Criminal Investigation Division of the Palestine government has used torture to elicit information, that men have been arrested and held in jail without benefit of trial. There have been charges of misrule and dictatorial acts. But, above all, an entire generation of youth have felt a terrible sense of frustration when they saw their people massacred throughout Europe by the million and were given no opportunity to fight as Jews against the monstrous enemy or even to rescue those who could be saved.

Why did Hakim and Bet-Souri kill Lord Moyne? It was to bring their grievances violently to the attention of the world. In their extremist philosophy the Zionist method of seeking a solution for Jewish homelessness by working in concert with Great Britain was ineffectual. "Our deed was a political deed," Bet-Souri told the court. "We did not know the lord personally. We carried a photograph of him so we could recognize him. It was a political act. What other reason could we possibly have?" For that reason he wanted their case tried before an international court, a "court that does not yet exist, based on pure morals and pure justice." I was told by an advising defense attorney that he first suggested to the boys that they plead temporary insanity and throw themselves on the mercy of the court. They refused. Lord Moyne was a symbol—and their act was a symbol. If they could not explain it, they said, it would have been in vain. I asked Bet-Souri, when the defense rested, if he had said all he wished to say. He looked at me. "About 85 per cent," he said.

For much of the trial it seemed that Bet-Souri had the audience, the correspondents, and, if truth be told, even the judges, with him. His speech made a tremendous appeal to a courtroom of Egyptians many of whom in their own youth had belonged to similar extremist nationalist organizations. When Bet-Souri, arms folded, eyes fixed on space, said reflectively, "I remember how as a boy in Tel-Aviv, standing on the terrace of my father's house, I saw British police quell a demonstration, and I asked myself, 'What are these strangers doing in my land? Why should a man leave his home and family in a far-away country and come into my country to do these things?'" There was a rustling through the audience, and Egyptian turned to Egyptian with a knowing smile. Bet-Souri played upon Egyptian nationalism. "We had definite orders not to harm any Egyptian," he said. "Our fight is not with the Egyptians. Our orders dealt with Lord Moyne and only Lord Moyne."

Three Egyptian attorneys spoke in the boys' behalf, but it was Bet-Souri who stated the case and Bet-Souri who made the plea, and it was Bet-Souri who rose when his attorneys had finished and said, "I want to thank my attorneys. I want to thank this court for its treatment of me. I am sure we could not have received better treatment anywhere in the world. But I want to make it clear that I do not agree with everything my attorneys have said in my defense. The political views stated by the defense relating to Palestine are not my views." In this he was denying a statement that the aims of the Zionists and the Sternists were identical. In his own speech he had emphasized that his ideas were "not Zionist ideas," that he and his fellow-Sternists disassociated themselves from Zionism, that they represented the Sons of Palestine who had fought for Palestine's freedom before a Balfour Declaration existed. The Sternists, who at most number some 150 active members and who are part of an extremist group totaling about 2,000, do not represent Palestine Jewry, which numbers more than 600,000.

How was the assassination taken in Palestine? It came as a tremendous shock. People could not believe the first Cairo dispatches which stated that the two killers "spoke Hebrew."

I was listening to the radio in the office of a high Zionist official in Jerusalem when Winston Churchill, speaking from London, declared that he, one of the "architects of Zionism," might have to reconsider his position if terrorism continued. The Zionist leader had been telling me how he, personally, had been overwhelmed by the news of the murder, and how terrible a blow his cause had suffered. Now, after Churchill's warning, tears actually sprang to his eyes as he said, "When I think how proud we have been that Zionism could always come before the world with clean hands as a constructive, creative movement of the highest human order, and when I think of what these boys have been led to do—" He walked around his desk and clenched his fists in helplessness. "It is something so exasperating to us, something so awful and dreadful, that I cannot find words to express myself."

Lord Moyne is dead. Bet-Souri and Hakim are dead. They committed murder. They have paid for what they did. It is one more tragic chapter in the history of a tragic people.

China to Lin Yutang—II

BY EDGAR SNOW

IN the latest issue of The Nation I notice that the learned Dr. Lin Yutang has written an extensive footnote to his "Vigil of a Nation" by way of a reply to my comments on that extraordinary opus. In the main he does not refute my observations about the paucity of reliable testimony and documentation in the book itself, but is obliged to draw upon new data from official Kuomintang sources to support his position. Evidently the industrious Dr. Lin is now compiling a sequel; so I think we may safely wait for "Vigil No. 2," in toto, before dealing seriously with the latest results of his research into the iniquities of Confucius with a red flag.

Meanwhile, it doesn't require too much energy, or take too much of the reader's attention away from the business of fighting our real enemy, the Japanese, to make the following comments on his essay:

1. Dr. Lin denies that he is opposed to the United States arming the Communist partisans against the enemy. I got quite the contrary impression from his book—but very well; I must have misunderstood him, and I shall now assume that he is henceforth in favor of our giving the partisans "arms, food, medicine, and financial help" and expects in return only that the Communists shall not oppose continued lend-lease aid to Chiang Kai-shek. That seems a constructive attitude; all that Lin has to do now is persuade Chungking to adopt it.

2. The analytical Dr. Lin detects a sinister Russian influence behind the fact that in my review The Nation inadvertently dropped the "g" from General Pang's name. Am I, then, to assume a similar influence at work on Dr. Lin because in his reply the "g" is also missing from the name of General Peng Teh-huai? If we are going to be technical why did Dr. Lin omit the aspirate in writing both "P'eng" and "P'ang"? Why, for that matter, does he omit it in "yu-t'ang"? The Japanese usually omit aspirates when romanizing Chinese names. Could there be any hidden significance in this coincidence?

3. The main burden of Dr. Lin's remarks seems to be that the Kungchintang has utilized the war as a means of strengthening its military and political power. That much is self-evident; all his documentation on that point is quite superfluous. At the same time Dr. Lin will doubtless readily concede that it is equally obvious that the Kuomintang has likewise utilized the war emergency in order to suppress, wherever possible, all serious political opposition to the perpetuation of its own one-party dictatorship.

4. Elsewhere Dr. Lin asserts that I "distorted" his meaning or inaccurately quoted him. I do not think so; his attempts to prove otherwise seem quibbling to me. Readers of his book may draw their own conclusions about that.

5. There is nothing new or startling in Lin's "revelation" that the Kungchintang has not abandoned its ultimate aspiration to complete the revolution in China and establish socialism there. The Communists have never denied that, but apparently Lin only recently discovered it. Why assume, however, a similar ignorance on the part of the American public?

6. There is also no doubt that the Chinese Communists are very close in their sympathies to the U. S. S. R. and that during the war they have sought to defend Soviet policies.

Finally, Dr. Lin asks what course China will follow in the future and whether it will "adopt the Anglo-Saxon or the Russian model." He asks what I think. I think the dynamic elements of society are far too complex for any great people like the Chinese to adopt any other one country as a model. In the long run the Chinese will work out a social pattern which synthesizes all the living economic, political, cultural, and social forces of their own environment and their great history—in other words, an authentic Chinese pattern. I think Dr. Lin's anxiety and fears on this subject are somewhat neurotic, and unworthy of a distinguished philosopher in the long bright tradition of Lao Tze and Master Kung—whether under a white sun or a red star.

In the Wind

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL, a prolific writer of tracts extolling free enterprise, has this to say in a leaflet currently being distributed by the Committee for Constitutional Government: "The present hollering for sixty million jobs is a con game, pure and simple. . . . Let us not fall off the earth reaching for the moon."

JOHN LEUTHOLD of Breckenridge, Colorado, writing to the Denver Post of March 11, quotes with approval Pope Pius's speech contrasting "a people's government by honest and far-seeing men" and "a democratic state left to the whims of the masses." "I claim," says Leuthold, "that there is practically as big an intellectual difference between the honest and far-seeing men whom the Pope had in mind and a human mass formation as there is between the cowboys and the steers." And the editor comments, "Not a bad comparison."

ALEX SMALL, a staff writer for the Chicago Tribune syndicate, came East about six weeks ago to write up the magazines for his readers. This is from his report on The Nation and the New Republic, as it appeared in the Tribune and other papers of March 18: "Like Harper's and the Atlantic, these weeklies are read by people who have weight in their communities. If asked which has the more effect on policy, the Saturday Evening Post with its 3,400,000 circulation or The Nation with its 42,000, my choice would be the latter. . . . They are for war, war everywhere and with everyone who is not of their religion. An itch for mischief especially seems to possess the dynamic Freda Kirchwey, today the dominating spirit of The Nation. If there is anything anywhere to add to the misery of this tortured world, any blazing injustice, any despicable sham, any foul deed, you may be sure that the New Republic and The Nation are for it."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Vidkun Quisling having taken over the Norwegian King's summer residence near Oslo, all bushes on the road leading to it have been removed. . . . And down in Denmark the Nazi Gauleiter, Dr. Werner Best, travels between his villa and his office in an ambulance.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.].

Spain and the Peace

BY BERNARDO CLARIANA

(Translated from the Spanish by Dudley Fitts)

"This peace is the true end of the war."

—Don Quixote: I, xxxvii.

1

MESSIEURS THE DELEGATES TO THE GREAT SAN FRANCISCO PEACE CONFERENCE

Illustrious cartographers of the pursuit of collective happiness
Precise pilots
Babylonian guests
Inexorable judges of the crime of war
Forgers of the peace,
A Spaniard in exile addresses you
Compressing his speech into three short questions:

Is it the Peace of Governments, or the Peace of Peoples?

The Peace of Arms, or the Peace of Ideas?

The Peace of the Dead, or the Peace of the Living?

As you leave the train in San Francisco

—How very odd that its name should be the same as

Franco's!—

Upon your return from the Crimea and from Mexico,

A Spanish Ariel glides among

You Prosperos obsessed with the idea of denying his presence,

But his spirit conquers you and compels you

Murmuring at your ears

"Spain . . . Spain . . . Spain."

What are you going to do with the Spanish people?

The Peace of Governments, or the Peace of Peoples?

How can you deny a seat at San Francisco

To the Spanish Republic?

Perhaps you will prefer to offer it to Francisco Franco?

Will you sentence twice to solitary confinement

An innocent and heroic people?

Review your own shortcomings

At that time when Spain alone worked the miracle

Of being itself, the sole incarnation

Of all the United Nations of the earth,

And a few men of good-will

Raised high in their agony

The lance and targe of the Knight of La Mancha.

—How then can you condemn an entire people

To loneliness and exile

And silence?

Place but a small chair in San Francisco

And label it with the name of the people's Spain,

And you will see how the applause of the worlds old and new

Will give you the cubic measure

Of the ubiquitous heart of my country.

2

The Peace of Arms, or the Peace of Ideas?

It is time now to have done with propaganda and to begin with truth

Since it is impossible to utter a single word about peace

Without taking Spain into account,

Just as it is impossible to speak of justice

And ignore Don Quixote.

—When this war is ended

Remember simply

The place where it began,

And you need not say like Cervantes,

"In a town in La Mancha, whose name I do not wish to recall" . . .

For all of us remember perfectly well,

And some of those nations

In whose names you pronounce

Your disquisitions on the peace

Have their own dead also in Spain.

The peace of arms, or the peace of ideas?

—or as the anguished Don Miguel de Unamuno would say,

Neither the one nor the other

But the peace of men's souls.

Messieurs the Delegates to the great San Francisco Peace

Conference,

How shall you order

The triumphal cavalcade

Of the Four Freedoms

If you keep Prometheus chained

To the rocks of Spain?

3

The Peace of the Dead, or the Peace of the Living?

It is all said now in that restless Bible of my land,

Filled with the bitterness of insult

Is the cup of loneliness

That our Lord Don Quixote

Drains in solitude,

While shattered on the ground

Lies the valiant lance

That in knightly career

He bore against the windmills of Germany.

And you may point out that San Francisco

Is not the meeting of the Twelve Peers of France

Or of the Knights of the Table Round

That Don Quixote should be given a place in it.

But listen to what Ariel is whispering into your ears

As you leave the train in California;
 "Invite the Spanish Republic
 "If you would bring peace to men's souls;
 "Begin your justice with Spain
 "And proclaim far and wide
 "That the heirs of Quixote
 "Will rebuild in peace their workers' republic,
 "Ransoming the gentle pasture land
 "From the dukes and the canons."
 This is the only justice that Spain demands of you
 The only reason for what you are doing now
 At this very moment
 When you so cruelly maintain
 Your obstinate silence
 As to Spain,
 Messieurs the Delegates to the great San Francisco Peace
 Conference
 Babylonian guests
 Inexorable judges
 Forgers of the peace
 Precise pilots
 Of the drifting ship of the world.

Neo-Democracy in Brazil

BY PAULO DUARTE

THE present scramble of fascists and quislings to leave Hitler's sinking ship for a safe haven in the post-war world from which they may comfortably conduct new fifth-column activities was to be expected. But although we have been warned of this many times, there is still a surprising inclination to accept at face value the democratic protestations which these fascists are now putting in circulation. Since President Vargas of Brazil has become one of the most lavish spenders of these spurious coins, it is important that his recent democratic words and gestures be analyzed in the light of his past record.

In the fourteen and a half years of his regime fascism has established itself in Brazil. It has gone through three violent stages—revolutionary, constitutional, and dictatorial. The revolutionary period began with the popular national revolution that brought Vargas to the presidency in October, 1930, and lasted until July, 1932. The revolution had demanded the setting up of an electoral tribunal to guarantee free and honest elections, but once in power Vargas not only failed to restore the long-disregarded public liberties but rigidly enforced their restriction.

The reaction was the 1932 Sao Paulo revolution, which demanded that a constituent assembly be called immediately and legal order reestablished. Many leaders of the 1930 revolt participated in this new constitutional revolution. It was put down and its leaders were exiled, but its ideas remained so firmly fixed in the public mind that in 1933 Vargas was forced to call the constituent assembly. Less than a year later many of the exiles were elected deputies to this body and returned to the country. Vargas's involuntary constitutional period began at this point, July, 1934, and lasted until November, 1937. During these years Parliament enacted some of Brazil's best social legislation; Vargas was generally opposed to it at the time, but he now frequently cites it in defense of his administration.

In accordance with the democratic 1934 constitution, a presidential election campaign opened in 1937. Armando de Salles Oliveira, candidate of the Brazilian Democratic Union, an alliance of all democratic and liberal parties, had the enthusiastic support of Vargas's native state of Rio Grande do Sul and of other regions. Facing certain defeat, Vargas allied himself with the Integralistas, the Brazilian fascist party, and induced Parliament to declare the country under martial law, on the pretext that the government needed extraordinary powers to combat communism. Parliament demanded documentary proofs of the existence of a Communist menace. Vargas pledged the word of honor of the army and navy. He also stated that the proclamation of martial law would never be used to evade presidential elections or to restrict public liberties permanently. After receiving these solemn promises Parliament passed the desired measure. Vargas promptly dissolved the Chamber of Deputies, the Senate, the state legislative assemblies, and all political parties, promulgated a fascist constitution which abolished all public liberties, prolonged his rule for six more years, and imprisoned or exiled all democratic leaders. This inaugurated a completely fascist period which still continues.

On March 2, after the press had been muzzled for seven years, the dictator held a conference for some hundred reporters. The statements he made at this interview reveal him as a political adventurer pure and simple. According to newspaper reports Vargas denied that the constitution of November, 1937, was a "fascist document." Yet the author of that constitution, Francisco de Campos, Minister of Justice, has frankly defined as fascist both the constitution and the type of government it established. Vargas himself has praised the fascist laws of his "New State" in numerous speeches, and on June 11, 1940, on the eve of the fall of France he publicly proclaimed the failure of the decayed democratic regimes.

In discussing the request that amnesty be granted to political prisoners and exiles, Vargas told reporters that each case should be considered individually. As to elections, he had the audacity to assert that "only political parties may present candidates" for the presidency of the Republic. As everyone knows, there are no political parties in Brazil; they were dissolved by Vargas in 1937.

Now that the Brazilian people are enjoying a brief respite from censorship and have chosen Eduardo Gómez as their candidate for President, Vargas has the effrontery to say, "Let's wait. Who knows whether some name will not appear—a name not yet thought of—to bring tranquillity?" Vargas plans to use the same trick that served him so well in 1937. First present a candidate to oppose Gómez; that has already been done by the announcement of the candidacy of General Dutra, the Minister of War. Later, under the pretext that the election is disturbing national peace, a third name will be proposed—that of Getulio Vargas. The same maneuver worked excellently in 1937, when in opposition to De Salles Oliveira, Vargas sponsored the candidacy of Americo de Almeida, whom he then double-crossed in order to perpetuate himself in office, asserting that he wished "to save the country from the shock of an electoral campaign in such a moment of serious preoccupations."

In the eight years since then Brazilians have had their fill of Vargas's bag of tricks, and all indications are that he won't be able to get away with it this time.

How Many Germans?

BY MAX MANDELLAUB

THE Nazi hope that Germany would emerge from the war as the most numerous as well as the strongest nation of Europe has completely collapsed. On November 11 last, Hans Hertel, a prominent Nazi official, told the Germans: "The fight with arms yields merely temporary decisions. The birth rate decides the fate of nations for a long time ahead." That is what the Nazis had in mind when they ruthlessly exterminated potential mothers and fathers of "non-Germanic races." German demographers, in spite of their satisfaction over the falling French birth rate, were concerned about certain of their own population trends and alarmed by the continuing high fertility of the Slavs. They decided to use military and political intervention to establish a new ratio of human reproduction in Europe.

When Hitler invaded Poland, the Third Reich contained 15 per cent of the population of the European continent. The Swedes, Norwegians, Danes, Dutch, Flemish, Alsations, and Swiss, together with German ethnic minorities scattered through Europe, were to yield approximately 25,000,000 people whom the Nazis, with the Gestapo as their instrument, hoped to make conscious of their Germanic blood. The plan was to create a block of 100,000,000 Germans or re-Germanized people and to step up the yearly rate of natural increase to 1.5 per cent. In less than two generations there would then be almost 200,000,000 of the Herrenvolk. Berlin propagandists have insisted that since 1940 the German birth rate has not followed the catastrophic trend it showed during World War I. They have announced that "in 1942 there were 15.7 births per 1,000 Germans, in 1943 the figure was 16.4, and in the present year, 1944, it is 17.6." The Reich's Central Statistical Office has calculated, however, that 820,000 births have not materialized during the last five years owing to the war, which suggests an average yearly decline of 160,000 births. If we apply these figures to the population of the Reich, which was about 68,500,000 at the end of 1939, we find that Germany's "normal" growth between 1939 and 1945 was about 1,700,000. The anticipated 3,800,000 Volksdeutsche refugees within the Reich's borders by the end of the war raises the hypothetical number of Germans in 1945 to 74,000,000. War losses of course must be deducted.

Hitler has never published a complete casualty list. Die Nation, a Swiss periodical, reckons that by the fall of 1944 the Nazis had lost 8,500,000 dead, four times as many as in the Kaiser's war. This figure, however, includes Austrians, Italians, Hungarians, Rumanians, and "volunteers" from the subjugated countries serving in the German armies, and probably 2,000,000 must be deducted to obtain the figure for Reich Germans. Thus in five years of war the master race has lost approximately 6,500,000 dead.

Bitter Nazi resistance will probably increase the death toll by another 1,500,000. At least 5,000,000 Reichsdeutsche will be prisoners of the Allies by the end of hostilities; 4,000,000 have already been captured, with Soviet Russia holding at least 65 per cent of them. Germans killed during the inevitable social chaos following military defeat, plus the soldiers that die of their wounds, may add another million to the losses. The population of the Reich, therefore, when the Allies take over the control, will have been reduced by some 14,000,000, and about 60,000,000 will remain.

Comparative population trends in the Kaiser's and in Hitler's Reich are shown in the following table:

GERMAN POPULATION (IN THOUSANDS)

The Kaiserreich*	Hitler's Reich without his conquests
1910.....64,568	1935.....66,871*
1911.....65,359	1936.....67,349*
1912.....66,146	1937.....67,831*
1913.....66,978	1938.....68,072*
1914.....67,790	1939.....68,450†
1915.....67,883	1940.....68,700†
1916.....67,715	1941.....68,500‡
1917.....67,368	1942.....67,300‡
1918.....66,811	1943.....65,800‡
	1944.....63,500‡
	1945.....60,000‡

* Official statistics.

† Estimates.

‡ These figures take into account the absence of prisoners of war and the presence of Volksdeutsche refugees.

It is apparent that at the end of the Second World War there will be nearly 7,000,000 fewer Germans within the Reich than in 1918, and 8,500,000 fewer than on the day Hitler attacked Poland.

But these figures do not tell the whole story. Of the 60,000,000 remaining, at least 15,000,000 live in border territories which will be attached to Germany's neighbors or internationally controlled. Furthermore, the age and sex composition of the German population will show a significant disequilibrium.

In 1940 the Nazis, according to their reckoning, had a reserve of approximately 19,000,000 German males of military age. Ninety per cent of the 14,000,000 losses estimated above will be from that age and sex group, which suggests that there will be 36,000,000 females as against 24,000,000 males in 1945, and that 17,000,000 of the males will be under sixteen or over sixty-five. The whole male population between the ages of seventeen and sixty-five will have been cut to a small percentage of its normal size. At best, 7,000,000 young or middle-aged men, many of them invalids, will be left. With 17,000,000 to 18,000,000 women between the ages of sixteen and forty-five, there will be two and a half times more women of procreative age than men. Such a disproportion constitutes a powerful threat to traditional concepts of morality and family stability. Towns and villages will be filled with women, children, old men, and cripples. In coming years the German birth rate will reach an all-time low, in comparison with which even the French pre-war rate will look like an index of fertility.

This is the prospect for a nation whose leaders planned a mass grave for "inferior peoples." They have succeeded in preparing the biggest cemetery of all for their own people.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE THEATER IN PARIS

BY FRANK JONES

Paris, February 8

YOU asked me to let you know what I found in Paris. I hope you'll be interested in what I can tell you about the only Paris activities I've had much chance to observe—those of the theater and press. After all, going to Paris in peace time was a creative act, a source of vision, enabling, for example, Joyce to see and write down his Dublin, Henry James and Henry Miller their Americas. Going there in war time, as a choiceless soldier, is an accident, but what an accident! It makes possible, for the first time in an army career, the feeling that one is somewhere; anywhere else one merely exists in a place which will soon be exchanged for another, and sometimes isn't even a place, but a jumping-off place, a stopping-off place, Joe's Place or Stinky's Place or simply an inferno of ennui.

So, being somewhere, let me try to tell you about something in this place—the theater. There are fifty-one theaters now presenting plays. But, first, a word in general. Paris is seething with intellectual activity. It's the one thing of which there is no shortage. Even the paper shortage, which has recently halved the newsprint allotment of every periodical in France, doesn't dim the basic fact: there are more and better politico-literary weeklies now than before 1939—all young, vigorous, independent. Each of the resistance movements has one—Volontés, Bataille (formerly La Marseillaise of London), Fraternité, and so on. The Communists, of course, call theirs Marseillaise. Here too they are taking over the national past, as at home they have knighted Lincoln. Even non-political weeklies devoted wholly to books and the arts have an independent air—I say "even" remembering publishers' house organs like Les Nouvelles Littéraires. All these journals keep up such a high standard in articles, reviews, gossip, and cartoons that you hardly miss the great vanished monthlies like the Nouvelle Revue Française, which gave up the ghost more than a year ago, having run out of literary topics at once "collaborative" and in vogue—Stefan George, for instance. My point in mentioning these weeklies is that everybody buys them, that the day after they come out you are likely to see a sign in the kiosk: "No more Lettres Françaises."

And everybody goes to the theater. Prices are way above pre-war level; there is no heat, even in the national theaters (the Comédie Française is oldest and coldest); there are electricity troubles and restrictions so that matinees start at five; but the intensity of projection and response is all the greater. The plays? There you touch the weak spot, as in London and New York. There are biographies—the loves of Molière on the left bank, those of Liszt on the right, and the dear old Brontë sisters on the way to Montparnasse—adaptations of novels, and many frothy comedies—you can take your choice of "Private Lives" or "Design for Living" if you don't trust their French equivalents. The English vogue extends to serious plays, too. Barrie's "Dear Brutus" and Priestley's "Dangerous Corner" are successes. No American plays. I don't think we are doing very well here yet as ambassadors of the arts. For one thing, we seem to have sent Paris no movies newer than "His Girl Friday"—which sounds quaint as "La Dame du Vendredi." I provoked an outcry of reproachful envy at dinner with some French friends by saying in all innocence that I'd seen "The Great Dictator" three times. Paris, which adores Chaplin, hasn't seen it yet; Rome, which doesn't, has. Policy, I suppose. Well, as I was saying, many of the serious plays now running in Paris are translations. The Odéon is giving "The Cherry Orchard"—about once to every five performances of Florence L. Barclay's "The Rosary"; Charles Dullin is still going strong in the Stefan Zweig-Jules Romains "Volpone"; other avant-garde companies are doing Strindberg and Gogol; and one may even see dramatizations of "Wuthering Heights" and "Tess of the d'Urbervilles."

So what about French plays? The biggest hits in serious native drama are Paul Claudel's "The Satin Slipper" at the Comédie Française and a new "Antigone" by Jean Anouilh at the Atelier. Religion and politics: the familiar French pre-occupations. Both plays have been running for more than a year—the Claudel as part of a repertory, of course, but the other nightly.

Claudel's vast panorama—over four hours' playing time—is a success because the direction given it by Jean-Louis Barrault, a young actor with a face like a hatchet and a voice like a sword, enables its poetic genius to outsoar its dramatic defects. Barrault plays the lead, opposite Marie Bell, who, you'll recall, searched for her youth in "Carnet du Bal"—but didn't find it in time to do justice to Claudel. Madeleine Renaud, Mme Barrault in private life, exquisitely plays another important part. The Barraults—known as the model household of the Comédie Française—both made their name in the movies: he in "The Puritan" and she in "La Maternelle." Barrault has been a big man at the Comédie for some time, and I wonder how he will take it if, as is widely rumored, Louis Jouvet is made managing director of the institution in succession to Edouard Bourdet. Jouvet with a small company has been touring France and North Africa for years, adding patriotic color to his already huge renown as actor and director; so he is due to have a triumphal return to Paris. Barrault also had an avant-garde company before the war. In general, the invasion of the august house of Molière by people known primarily for work in films or experimental theaters—even Raimu, the baker who had "The Baker's Wife," is rolling them in those plush aisles now—has gone still farther than under the Popular Front, when Léon Blum, the ex-drama critic, first gave official sanction to the policy. Oldsters who "You can't escape from the novels of Granville Hicks. They reach out and grab you."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

BEHOLD TROUBLE

By Granville Hicks

This is the story of one man's revolt against society, and of the confusion and tragedy his rebellion brings to a small town. $2.75

- "An extraordinarily compelling book."—Common Sense.
- "A solid character study of people meeting a strong and violent situation."—San Francisco Chronicle.
- "Vivid and powerful."—Indianapolis Sunday Star.
- "Genuinely thought stirring."—Springfield Union.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

AMERICA AND PALESTINE

by
REUBEN FINK

This well-indexed volume, of 544 pages, is a stimulating and important source book containing the most pertinent information relating to Zionist and Hebraic trends in America from the earliest Colonial days to the present time. Fully documented. Of concern to all Americans. A "must" for all those interested in foreign affairs, social and political work, Zionism, and kindred subjects. For libraries, religious institutions, churches, schools, colleges, magazines, newspapers and research bureaus. Hailed by many American leaders as an absolutely indispensable book.

Price $4.00

HERALD SQUARE PRESS, Inc.

233 Spring Street, New York 13, N. Y.

like their classics straight, and more of them, grumble about having their Racine rationed along with bread and cheese, and dream of the old days of the grand style, which died, as everywhere in Europe, with the last war. The situation, as usual, is neatly summarized at my favorite boulevard theater, the A. B. C., which is presenting some "excerpts" from current Comédie performances, including "The Cid" as it would be played by Charles Trenet, which might be paralleled by Frank Sinatra as Hamlet.

But Barrault's Claudel production showed me how a classic is made. The play when read may seem an impossible hodge-podge of farce, fantasy, and melodrama, with its saints and friars and guardian angels, its Moorish villains and Negro lasses and Chinese lackeys, its voyages and passionate interviews and speeches by the moon; a simple plot complicated by self-indulgent invention, making at unnecessary length a Catholic retort to "Tristan and Isolde," to the effect that adultery, even though a grand passion, must not be committed, because it is followed not by a warm mystical love death but by the everlasting damnation of the soul. For years Claudel's lovers grope toward each other, but do not meet, kept apart by moral sense and religious scruple, until late in life, when the woman presents the man with a daughter begotten through her husband by her lover's spirit—it says so in the book—and dies soon after; and the play ends with an epilogue showing the lover, a very old man, being taken on as a servant in a convent to keep from being sold into slavery.

That such a castle in seventeenth-century Spain should be made credible and exciting to twentieth-century France, in which nevertheless it was written, is a tribute to the marvelous work of Barrault, who had the Germans to cope with when he started the run, justice to cope with when they left—his first guardian angel only recently got out of jail—and the hardest winter in years to fight, as I discovered on the January night when I saw the spectacle. I rushed to the buffet in the one intermission to warm myself with champagne for want of coffee. Some of his pictures, with Honegger's perfect incidental music, I shall never forget: the opening scene, a shipwrecked friar (a student of rhetoric at the Conservatoire) praying, in most divinely sounding French, for the salvation of his brother's soul; the absurd and colorful bit parts—servants, messengers, fantastic animals—rushing in and out of the wings in their delicious costumes; the votary of pleasure, Dona Musique (Madeleine Renaud), weaving about her lover with gauzy garments and honey speech in a blue Sicilian cave; and the great scenes where the lovers speak and dream of each other in wild, bitter gestures and cadences high with pride and heavy with tears.

From the new Catholicism to the ancient Greeks is no farther than from the Rue de Richelieu to Montmartre, where André Barsacq's production of the latest "Antigone" has been packing them into the tiny Atelier Theater (formerly Charles Dullin's—he is now running the Sarah Bernhardt, whose name the Germans changed during their visit—guess why. The author, Jean Anouilh, has been challenging Cocteau on his own ground: his "Orpheus" having been produced some time ago, he now treats the Antigone story much more daringly than did the other Jean, who merely stripped it of its stateliness to make its bare bones do a sensational dance of love and death. Anouilh makes it favor Creon, whom he conceives as an extremely intelligent man determined to bring Thebes into a rational condition after the horrors perpetrated by the other members of his family—brother-in-law Oedipus, mother-in-law and sister Jocasta, and nephews Polynices and Eteocles, who have lately plunged the poor city into civil war, as if the plague and royal incest weren't enough. Creon hates having to decree that the rebel nephew be left unburied and that death shall be the penalty for trying to bury him, but does so because it is the custom of the country, "pour encourager les autres," knowing that the "stupid people" will be impressed by it, as by all his speeches, which he knows to be brilliant, statesman-like, and full of lies.

When Antigone, a strange girl suffering from sex frustrations and a martyr complex, disobeys the edict and gets caught, Creon first offers to have the whole thing hushed up. She haughtily refuses. He then tells her the full facts about the two brothers (as seen by Anouilh, not Sophocles!): how they were both degenerate rascals, betting the royal wealth on the horses and beating and cursing their father, until one started the civil war because the other owed him money. Neither of them deserved to succeed to the throne, but since it was the elder's by legal right, Creon has puffed him up into a national hero in his speeches, following the only policy that will preserve the principle of legitimacy in a waste of shame. Antigone's will to die for her brother's memory is at first shaken by these revelations, but at last she insists on being put to death, leaving Creon no alternative but to execute the decree. Her fiancé, Creon's son, whom she has won away from her younger prettier sister by suddenly doing herself justice in dressing for a dance, kills himself in grief. So does his mother, Creon's wife, a good soul who preferred knitting to talking ("I could never see," muses Creon, "why the poor need all those knitted goods"). "She just put her needles down and cut her throat," says the messenger, simply. Creon sits silent a while, gazing pensively at a little boy who is his confidant. "Come!" he says at last. "There is a council meeting at five." An exit—and a performance—justly cheered by the audience the night I went.

Excellent written and beautifully staged in modern dress, the play has the prime element of Parisian success, something to argue about. Some say it degrades the high moral tone of the old story. It seems to me one must either modernize thoroughly and frankly or leave the Greeks alone; the contemporary tragic heroine does not make sublime speeches about divine law, she simply whips up her natural impulses until they conquer her natural fears. Others assert that the play is collaborationist in intent because it belittles Antigone's resistance to the state. But she is not portrayed as rash or silly: of her speeches, which are instinct with the wisdom of the heart, one is a superb hymn to liberty—oh, metaphorical of course—fine words about being free to rise before the dawn and breathe great drafts of pristine air, but one hears the undertones of the seemingly harmless words the Germans doubtless pretended to appreciate. On the whole I find the politics and psychology of the play quite sound. It is less fantastic than Giraudoux's treatments of the ancient themes, "Amphitryon 38," "There'll Be No Trojan War," and "Electra," which set the style for this sort of thing some years ago. Anouilh's writing is grimmer, sparer. For the Giraudoux influence at its worst—that fine writer, who died just a year

---

Are we in danger of remaining isolationist on economic lines?

---

America's Role in the World Economy

By ALVIN H. HANSEN

While the San Francisco Conference may prove that we will work with other nations for world peace along political lines, it still remains to be seen whether we sufficiently understand the world economic problems that are just as urgent.

In this book one of the world's leading economists offers a positive program for American economic action in the postwar world. He explains the new international bank and monetary fund, UNRRA, the International Labor Office, economic and social proposals of Dumbarton Oaks, and offers his own proposals for an international trade authority and commodity corporation. A book certain to influence public policy.

At all bookstores • $2.50

W. W. NORTON & CO., 70 5th Ave., N. Y. 11

ago, is having his apotheosis now—one should see something called "Happy Ulysses," about Ulysses's homecoming, by a new playwright in uniform who sensibly remains anonymous. The ravishing décor and costumes furnished by a young company in this their first production do not prevent one from being battered and stunned by assaults of whimsy that would make not only Homer but Barrie retch. It must be said, though, that the actors, including four little girls about five years old, braved the cold in Homeric costumes, something that cannot be said of greater theaters. The Odéon was going to revive "Oedipus Rex" two weeks ago, but put it off until the current thaw.

So you see the "literary theater," as Broadway tolerantly terms it, is still popular in Paris, and the new is still old and tradition stands. Still the greatest innovators, Anouilh and Claudels, Péguy and Cocteau knowingly draw on the Greek and Christian origins for their most breath-taking novelties. When shall we learn that skill? Perhaps when Billy Rose, like the A. B. C., can put on a number entitled "The Purge in 435 B. C.," which describes an older attempt to punish collaboration with a conquering foe. An Athenian judge grills some suspects, including Phryne the courtesan, about services rendered to the invader. "On vous accuse," he informs the lady, "de collaboration horizontale avec les Perses." "Mais oui," she cheerfully agrees, "et les Mèdes aussi . . . Les Mèdes et les Perses, voyez-vous?" Case dismissed. Toujours gais, these French!

BRIEFER COMMENT

A Forgotten Agrarian Revolt

IN THESE DAYS "tinhorn" is a little flower of speech applied to shady gambling promoters, but a hundred years ago it had a nobler connotation, for it was both the symbol and instrument of an agrarian revolt in New York State. In the counties bordering on the Hudson the Van Rensselaers and other "patroon" families had flourished on a "durable-lease" system of land tenure. They "sold" property to farmers in return for a perpetual annual rent in produce and labor and the payment of all taxes on the land. If the farmer wished to resell the land, he was bound to pay the landlord one-quarter of the price or, at the landlord's option, to surrender it for three-quarters of the market value.

While Stephen Van Rensselaer, "the good patroon," lived, resentment merely smoldered, for he refrained from pressing his full claims, and when he died in 1839, there were uncollected rents amounting to $400,000. His heirs decided to collect; the farmers determined to resist. Gradually the farmers built up an active organization which used direct, as well as political, action against the hated feudal system. When landlords' agents or sheriffs approached their stony hills, the tin horns normally used to summon them to meals sounded a warning. Disguised in calico Indian robes, with stained faces, they forced more than one armed expedition from Albany to retreat.

In "Tin Horns and Calico" (Holt, $3.75) Henry Christman, an Albany newspaperman, has told the full story for the first time, drawing on old letters, diaries, and newspapers. Fortunately his narrative skill matches his pertinacity in research, and his book is absorbing reading as well as a real contribution to American history.

It is strange that the professional historians have so neglected this anti-rent movement. It kept New York State in an uproar for a decade as it spread through half a dozen counties on both sides of the Hudson, and it formed a principal issue in several elections. Through the Free Soil movement it links up directly with the agitation which finally led to the Homestead Act; and some of its active adherents, after migrating to the West, assisted at the birth of the Republican Party. Mr. Christman is to be congratulated on recognizing its importance and rescuing it from oblivion.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Inside the Ghetto

THE GHASTLY STORY of the Nazi extermination of Warsaw's half-million Jews is told in "No Traveler Returns" (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50), the material for which was supplied by Dr. Henry Shoskes and put into book form with the assistance of Curt Riess. The general outline of the story has been known—that the Nazis first herded the Jews into a ghetto and then began slaughtering them in various ways and increasing numbers until none were left. In this book we have for the first time details as seen from inside the ghetto. New, hideous facets of Nazi sadism are presented. More important, we have a study of how a peaceful people reacted to events beyond their comprehension. For many months the conservative Adam Czerniakow, mayor of the ghetto, honestly thought he could save his people by "adjusting" to the German conquerors. He was their Neville Chamberlain. Ultimately he swallowed poison.

For two years there was no organized resistance among the Jews of Warsaw because the Germans kept promising special immunities to this group and that group, all the while killing Jews. A few farsighted men, among them the Socialists and Communists, had seen the doom of the Warsaw Jews from the first. They had said it would be more glorious and more satisfactory to die fighting. Finally these men prevailed. For six flaming and bloody weeks in April and May two years ago, the remaining Jews in Warsaw threw themselves into heroic, ingenious, and successful warfare against the "master race." They expected to die and they did, and in so doing they killed a disproportionate number of Germans. In so doing—the world being what it is, not all Gandhis—the Jews of Warsaw ennobled their tragedy. They kindled a beacon to other peoples of Europe.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Guide to Mexico

GOOD NEWS FOR TRAVELERS to Mexico is the new edition of "Frances Toor's New Guide to Mexico" (Crown Publishers, $2.50). Entirely rewritten, compact in format, and sturdily bound, it can be guaranteed to return high dividends for its place in the suitcase. The expert archaeologist or historian, or the explorer intent on remote villages, will not, to be sure, find all the information he needs within these pages. But most travelers are not experts, and a surprising number of references to specialized interests will be found here to start the curiosity of the amateur: markets, fiestas, arts and crafts, social experiment, colonial and pre-conquest culture.

For the special counts on which one judges a guidebook, the score is pretty good. There are seventeen maps showing motor routes and cities. Although the guidebook writers' contention that local automobile clubs and oil companies supply maps is generally true, we still need more maps in a guidebook like this. It will always seem to me ridiculous to publish a guide to Mexico without (1) a good folding map of the entire republic, (2) a detailed map of the Valley of Mexico. There are ten pages of indexes; the General Index might be much more ingenious, but it serves for most questions. Means of transportation, hotels, and other accommodations are treated practically, with such remarks as, "There are second-class buses, but they are not advisable."

There are two ways to write a guidebook: either to begin in a scholarly way and work up through the difficult mass of available material to a thorough knowledge, or to begin on the surface in familiar acquaintance with the things described, and to dig out just as much background as each fact seems to warrant. This book is the second sort; its compiler has known and loved Mexico for many years, and she sets out to tell what people will want to know on the spot. Most important of all, this is current information, checked in the year 1944: for the traveler that outweighs any other consideration.

ELIZABETH WILDER

A Common Tongue

EXHIBIT 1: Address by the Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill at Harvard: the possession of a common tongue is of incalculable benefit to the two great Western democracies, and Churchill would like to see the whole world enjoy the same advantage.

Exhibit 2: from the subtlest of logicians and critics, I. A. Richards: "[A common language] must be clear from any threat to the economic, moral, cultural, social, or political status of any person or any people. It must carry no implications of intellectual, technological, or other domination. No one in learning the world language must have any excuse for even the least shadow of a feeling that he is submitting to an alien influence or being brought under the power of other groups." Words of gold, which bar out English, whether basic, standard, pidgin, or straight Menckenesese.

A fabricated language then? "Crackpot schemes!" (like a World Union for International Security). Here comes:

Exhibit 3: a volume entitled "The Green Star," by Joseph W. Dubin (National Institute of Esperanto, $2.50). Mr. Dubin shows very convincingly that a number of scholars, scientists, business men have taken the problem very seriously, and especially that Esperanto has provided a large-scale prolonged demonstration that such a scheme is perfectly feasible. Esperanto has been in practical use for over a half a century. The movement has held yearly congresses attended by thousands. It has had periodicals by the dozen and books by the hundreds. It can be done.

Esperanto is not perfect. Its "absurdities," if you like to call them so, are venial compared with the ambiguities and inconsistencies of all great languages. Zamenhof was a practical idealist. He did not believe in his own infallibility; he

"A literary treat . . .
a veritable masterpiece."

THE Hideout

By EGON HOSTOVSKY

➡ The story of a man and his fear, and of his refuge from the world and the war—a prison with an unlocked door which he dare not open.

A haunting new experience in reading, introducing to the American public one of modern Europe's finest novelists.

CHICAGO SUN: "A veritable little masterpiece, great in its modesty. A literary treat which should not be missed by anyone who values good writing." $1.75

RANDOM HOUSE

20 EAST 57 ST., NEW YORK 22, N. Y.

Erica Mann vs. Fritz Sternberg

"Nation" readers interested in Erica Mann's answer to Fritz Sternberg's recent article, "Why the Nazis Fight On", may write to:

Society for the Prevention of World War III

515 Madison Avenue, New York 22, N. Y.

Copy of the March-April issue of the bulletin "Prevent World War III" with Erica Mann's article, "Why the Germans Fight On," will be mailed free of charge.

THE PLACE of the JEW in the MODERN WORLD

A Series of Six THURSDAY Evening Lectures at 8:30 P.M.

YMHA Building

92nd Street and Lexington Avenue, N. Y. C.

Sponsored jointly by

LEAGUE FOR LABOR PALESTINE

Religious Department

YOUNG MEN'S HEBREW ASSOCIATION

APRIL 5, Dr. Oscar I. Janowsky • APRIL 19, Dr. Paul Klapper

APRIL 26, Dr. Abraham Katsh • MAY 10, Rabbi Joshua Trachtenberg

MAY 24, Dr. Alexander H. Pekelis

MAY 31, Symposium

Dr. Samuel Joseph, Dr. Ruth Landes, Dr. Hortense Powdermaker

For registration cards, apply LEAGUE FOR LABOR PALESTINE

1140 Broadway, New York City, Murray Hill 2-8257

knew that, in order to be applied, a scheme must have a certain degree of stability. On this firm basis the language could and did freely evolve but without losing its identity. If an official authority would take hold of the problem, Zamenhof was ready to accept reforms, and even to abandon his own solution altogether.

I happen to prefer a different project, which might be called "Basic Anglo-Latin," or Interlingua. I follow with interest the scholarly labor of the International Auxiliary Language Association. But I am glad to testify that the generous spirit of Zamenhof, "la interna ideo," is in harmony with our present efforts for world peace; that Esperanto has a vigorous life of its own, and a strange, undeniable fascination; that it is an immediately available solution, with an abundant supply of textbooks and dictionaries, of teachers and translators. The present volume is a well-rounded encyclopedia of the whole problem. It contains all the essential facts, including a complete Key to Esperanto.

ALBERT GUERARD

FICTION IN REVIEW

WHEN, some weeks ago, instead of writing about a certain novel at the usual length I confined my review to the statement that I had been able to read only 200 of its 600 pages and these with only the greatest self-discipline, it was protested that this represented an evasion of my reviewer's duty. The protest was not very widespread, but even the mildest flurry of disapproval surprised me. For to my thinking there is no more responsible method of book-reviewing than honestly to declare, if the occasion warrants, that a book is too dull or opaque to finish. If a case-hardened reviewer can't penetrate a novel, why should she suppose that other readers will be able or want to? It even seems to me to be a generous method: it spares an unreadable book the circumstantial indictment which is earned by bad books that are at least readable.

At any rate, protest or no protest, accepted critical practice or not, I am afraid I must follow the same procedure with Alex Comfort's "The Power House" (Viking, $3). Because of its author's place among the younger British intellectuals, "The Power House" claimed my attention. It was not able to engage it. I read the first two dozen pages three times without having any notion of what I was reading; then I made several firm attempts to break into the story at a later point of its development, each time without success. This report must therefore stand for the whole of my review.

On the other hand, there is Frederic Prokosch's "Age of Thunder" (Harper, $2.50), which I could perhaps wish I had not been able to finish since to complete it was only to confirm the suspicion which took hold of me after a chapter or two—that I was following a clearly charted path through a miasma. That is, while Mr. Prokosch's novel presents no difficulties from sentence to sentence or even from page to page—its prose, although fancy, is perfectly navigable, and I can recount every incident and index every character—it raises the rather unanswerable question of what Mr. Prokosch had in mind when he conceived and wrote it.

"Age of Thunder" opens reasonably enough: a young man has dropped by parachute into occupied France with a mission to uncover the point of disaffection in the underground. But what follows this conventional gambit is a series of incidents which are not only unconnected with each other but in themselves connected with reality only as a dream is. The young man joins a party of secret travelers to Switzerland, but we are not told why the journey is being made or why the characters behave as they do in the course of it. Accusations of darkest treachery are made without being either confirmed or dispelled; the group swells and diminishes without purpose; two members of the group—including a Negro who especially activates his author's gift for inappropriate adjectives and adverbs—are murdered, but we know of their death only what one can learn from a corpse. The young man wanders into a hotel, where he is visited by a grim Hollywood type who strangely reminds Mr. Prokosch's hero of someone named Robinson; but who is Robinson? who, even, is the grim Hollywood type? Even when the hero is arrested by the Gestapo—oh, most corporeal of incidents!—he is dismissed with a philosophical talk and a cigarette. And so on, through four nights of fantasy on the loose, in which, among other adventures, Mr. Prokosch's young man is housed in a castle, eats campfire spaghetti with a party of Italians, discusses love with a euphonious trio consisting of an Arab, an Annamese, and a Macedonian, is wounded among a garrison of comrades. We are understandably relieved when, the Alps sighted, we are told that the hero's mission has been accomplished.

"Age of Thunder" is not presented as a surrealist novel; I suppose, however, that if we must have a category for it, that would do as well as any, since it combines recognizable details and dream conception in the orthodox surrealist fashion. But whatever its aesthetic or philosophical intention, I have small patience with it because, to me, it is simply a narrative without sequence, larded with conversations more fabulous than enlightening. I still hold to the opinion that fiction doesn't approach poetry by merely turning its back on sense.

John O'Hara has a new collection of short stories, "Pipe Night" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.50), with many of which you may be already acquainted from the New Yorker. They are very much worth looking at again. For whereas a

SIX WEEKS' SEMINAR ON "JEWS IN THE WORLD TODAY" Wednesdays from 8:00 to 9:30

April 4th—What Does It Mean to Be a Jew ..... Dr. Frederick Ewen
April 11th—Background of the Jews in Europe ..... Dr. Raphael Mahler
April 18th—Problems European Jews Face ..... Dr. Raphael Mahler
April 25th—The Jew in America (From Colonial Times to Civil War) ..... Morris Lipschitz
May 2nd—The Jew in America (From Reconstruction to Present) ..... Morris Lipschitz
May 9th—Towards Jewish Unity ..... Valya Hirsch
$7.00 for series    $1.25 single admission

To be held at
AMERICAN ORT HEADQUARTERS
212 Fifth Avenue • Suite 1400, Room 2 • AS 4-7452, Ext. 2

REPLY TO DEL VAYO

by EARL BROWDER

Mr. Del Vayo's article, "V-DAY AND REVOLUTION" in March 17th NATION, discussed in April 3rd NEW MASSES — Now on sale.

great deal of our short fiction loses by being published in book form, Mr. O'Hara's pieces seem to me to gain in intensity; and they achieve a kind of cumulative seriousness. I am also especially struck, and quite freshly, by their craft—the impression of an enormously careful plotting and of a precision and economy of means which should be a model to the vague and garrulous. Then there are always Mr. O'Hara's eye and ear, those instruments of something so much deeper and better than ordinary accurate reporting.

DIANA TRILLING

CONTRIBUTORS

JAMES A. WECHSLER, national-affairs editor of PM, is the author of "Labor Baron: A Portrait of John L. Lewis."

JOACHIM JOESTEN is a well-known writer on European affairs. His article in this issue is adapted from a forthcoming book, "The Nazis at Bay."

GEROLD FRANK is a war correspondent who has recently returned from the Middle East.

BERNARDO CLARIANA is considered one of the best of the younger Spanish poets. After fighting in the Spanish War he escaped to this country and is now living in New York.

DUDLEY FITTS is the editor of an "Anthology of Contemporary Latin American Poetry."

PAULO DUARTE, an exiled Brazilian journalist, was formerly Brazil's representative on the Committee for Intellectual Cooperation of the League of Nations.

MAX MANDELLAUB, a well-known European scholar was formerly connected with the Institute of International Studies at Geneva.

FRANK JONES, before he entered the army, taught Latin and Greek at Yale and contributed many reviews to The Nation.

BALLET

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE April 1st to April 29th
S. HUOK presents

RUSSIAN BALLET

by the BALLET THEATRE

Featuring

Antony Tudor's New Psychological
Murder Ballet 'Undertow'

Leonide Massine's 'Moonlight Sonata'

Bronislava Nijinska's 'Harvest Time'

OPENING NIGHT: $6.00, $4.80, $3.00, $2.40, $1.80

Evenings 8:30 (incl. Sun.), $1.20 $4.80, Mat. Sat. & Sun., $1.20 to $3.60

2,000 SEATS $1 to $1.50 (PLUS TAX) AT ALL PERFS.

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents
"BELONGS ON THE MUST LIST."—Roscoe, World-Telegram.

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 59th Street, Matinee Wed. & Sat.

Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade

invite you to a

DINNER

honoring the fourteenth anniversary of the

REPUBLIC OF SPAIN

HOTEL COMMODORE

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 11, Six Forty-five o'Clock

Reservations may be secured from

Suite 406, 13 Astor Place, New York City 3

AL 4-8587

MOTION PICTURES

The Amazing Adventures of A FIGHTING FOOL ABOUT WOMEN

The very private life of a great lover, soldier, fighter, hero . . . a man among men with a way . . . and what a way
. . . with women!

G. C. F. presents

"COLONEL BLIMP"

IN TECHNICOLOR

Starring

ANTON WALBROOK • DEBORAH KERR
ROGER LIVESEY

Written, Directed and Produced by

Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger

Released Through United Artists

NOW! Doors Open 8:30 A.M.

Brandt's GOTHAM B'way 47th St.

Paramount Presents

CLAUDETTE COLBERT
FRED MacMURRAY

in

PRACTICALLY YOURS

A MITCHELL LEISEN Production

In Person

BENNY GOODMAN
His Clarinet and his Orchestra

Plus

Condos Bros.

Plus

Bob Evans

With

Jerry O'Leary

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

SOME three years ago the Messrs. Howard Richardson and William Berney won a Maxwell Anderson prize for poetic drama. Their play was based on a North Carolina version of the Ballad of Barbara Allen, and the Shuberts have just given it an elaborate, thoroughly professional production under the title "Dark of the Moon" (Forty-sixth Street Theater). Cautiously described as "A Legend with Music," the whole turns out to be one of the most interesting dramatic novelties I have seen in some time and one which appears to have a much better chance of surviving in the hurly-burly of Broadway than the prize-winning efforts of amateurs usually have.

Folk material on the American stage is, of course, nothing new. Almost two generations ago earnest municipal souls used to plod through the high-minded pageants of Percy Mackaye, and more recently a whole school of regional dramatists have flourished somewhat precariously under the devoted ministrations of Paul Green. But only very rarely has a "Sun Up," a "Hell Bent for Heaven," or a "Tobacco Road" really established itself in the commercial theater, and it may be that "Oklahoma" is more than an isolated masterpiece. It may be, that is to say, that while folk material does not lend itself to straight realistic treatment, it is destined to inspire a rich series of "legends with music."

Only, to be sure, in a very general way does "Dark of the Moon" resemble "Oklahoma." Here the story is supernatural and tragic rather than sunny and comic. Here there is only incidental music and a sprinkling of old ballads rather than a full operatic score. But in both grotesque folk humor plays a part; in both music is used to sustain a mood which bare prose words could scarcely support; in both a similar style of pantomimic dancing is lavishly employed. And the striking fact is that methods basically similar should, in the case of "Dark of the Moon," so successfully create eerie and tragic effects. No one could suppose that the story of a "witch boy" who becomes human in order to marry a mortal girl and who loses his humanity again when his wife is unfaithful to him would be a story easy to tell effectively. But in this version it is told very effectively indeed.

One reviewer described the piece as being sometimes like "Oklahoma," sometimes like "Sing Out Sweet Land," and sometimes like "Tobacco Road." One knows what he meant, since ancient ballads are sung and there are moments of grotesquely earthy humor. Perhaps, at times, the elements are not completely fused. But "Dark of the Moon" is certainly no hodge-podge such as the description just quoted might suggest, for it is, on the contrary, remarkable for the extent to which a unified style capable of making the strange fable seem convincing and valid is actually achieved. Certain striking scenes, like that of the al fresco dance at which the witch boy steals his girl from the local bully and that of the revival meeting where, after she has borne a monstrous child, the girl is thrust back into the embraces of her former lover, are vivid and exciting even standing alone; but they are not the most difficult ones. All through the performance I felt that ultimate success or failure would depend upon the treatment of the catastrophe. Would the scene in which the witch boy becomes a witch boy again and must lose, not only his humanity, but almost his memory of it, be dodged or be muffed? And I must report that it is neither. On the success of that scene the whole ultimate effectiveness of the legend stands or falls. If the conclusion had been merely grotesque or merely quaint, the whole would have descended to one of those levels. But, instead, the imagination of the authors holds up, and the scene becomes, as it should, eerie, tense, and terrible. Indeed, I cannot remember a more successful treatment of the supernatural in recent dramatic writing.

On the whole the production is well conceived and well acted. I thought the costuming of the witch girls in a curiously operatic fashion a serious mistake, especially since their dialect speech makes it clear that they were conceived in terms of the mountaineer's imagination. I thought also the first scene of a conventionalized mountain top similarly incongruous; but the other settings were excellently designed and the acting first rate. Carol Stone is Barbara, and a newcomer, Richard Hart, plays the witch boy with great dignity and great fire.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

IN THE English-made "Colonel Blimp" David Low's lovingly malicious archetype—and by implication, every Tory—has been relieved of all selfish motives for his actions and of nearly all dangerousness or even obstructiveness in those actions. This is annoying, and worse; but at the same time the movie's characterization of an innocent, brave, honorable, and stupid man is, within its own limits, so persuasive and so endearing, and so rare to movies, that I am at least as grateful as I am annoyed. If Low's and the movie character were blended, Blimp would be a great tragic-comic character. Lacking that, I wish that some publisher would get out a 25-cent volume of the cartoons, to brace and extend the picture among the many people who otherwise will get their only idea of Blimp through the gentlest kind of Technicolor. There is nothing brilliant about the picture, but it is perceptive, witty, and sweet-tempered, and it shows a continuous feeling for the charm and illuminating power of mannerism, speech, and gesture used semi-ritually, rather than purely realistically, which owes a good deal to Lubitsch in the good second-best of his comedies. I very much liked the performances of Roger Livesey as the Colonel, Deborah Kerr as his imago in three instalments, and Anton Walbrook as his German friend.

In "God Is My Co-Pilot" the Flying Tiger hero, Dennis Morgan, tells a priest, Alan Hale, that he has killed a

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.
MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. 29 LANGUAGES Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

Is MEAT necessary?
FOR HEALTH

NO! say 6 doctors and Food Experts

Hear them present the case for

"VEGETARIANISM"

IN A VITAL AND INFORMATIVE

SYMPOSIUM

(Question and Answer Period)

This SUNDAY EVE., APRIL 1st — 8:15 p.m.

N. Y. TIMES HALL

240 WEST 44th STREET

TICKETS $1 (this last on sale at box office)

Phone: LA 4-1000 and BR 9-5214

Subscribe to The American

Vegetarian, a Monthly Magazine

813 W. 46th Street, N. Y. C. Only $2 Per Year

hundred men that day; he obviously feels deeply troubled by the fact, and is asking for spiritual advice. Since the priest does not answer him in any way about that, but pretends to by commenting comfortably on a quite different and much easier perplexity—every death makes a difference to God—it is regrettable, not to say nauseating, that they bothered to bring up the problem at all. Aside from these religious conversations, any one of which would serve to unite atheists and religious men in intense distaste for the lodgers in the abyss which separates them, there is a good deal of air combat on process screens, obstructed by the customary close-ups of pilots smiling grimly as they give or take death in a studio, for considerably more than soldiers' pay, a yard above the ground. The picture is not as bad, I must admit, as I'm making it sound; but it is not good enough to make me feel particularly sorry about that. God is my best pal and severest critic, but when He asked for this touching March afternoon off, I didn't have it in my heart to refuse Him.

I would like to be able to make "The Affairs of Susan" sound half as bad as it is, but I know when I'm licked. In this interminable film, which might be described as a Make's Progress, Joan Fontaine is photographed as Joan of Arc; the Maid looks as if she were testifying, for a handsome fee, to every nice thing the Voices told her about Lysol. Miss Fontaine also appears as a lake-shore innocent, in trousers and a thinly knit jersey; in a series of gowns and negligees which are still more earnestly calculated to refute the canard that, if the Hays Office permitted, she would be ashamed to make a clean breast of her "development" (I think the word is); and in a collusion of hornrims, tight hair, ties, and sharp tailoring which, if they suggest nothing admissibly human, may at least roughly approximate Mayor LaGuardia's mental image of "Trio." This sort of thing makes me all the angrier because Miss Fontaine has proved that she is an actress worth building a good picture around—or even worth using in one which doesn't build around anyone. About Dennis O'Keefe's characterization of a writer, I feel less kind. He achieves it purely by letting his hair get rather long behind the ears. In objecting to this, I am probably the only living writer who has to cast his stone through a glass house; and much as I loathe haircuts, I have been trying ever since I saw the picture to brace myself to enter a barber shop.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IN his New Republic review of Tovey's latest books Ralph Bates pointed out that Tovey's wonderfully illuminating statements about music are almost entirely incidental to his expositions of the progress of ideas and form in particular works; and that such expositions are further enriched in the same incidental way by his general literacy. Bates cited, as an example, the discussion of the nature of tragedy that occurs in one of the essays on chamber music; then, revealing that the essay is concerned with a work by Brahms who is today "least enjoyed by really intelligent listeners," Bates concluded that the fact "that Tovey thought him one of the very great masters makes one decide to think again, and if possible to feel anew, about that unfashionable genius."

That argument would require one to be similarly influenced by what Tovey writes about C. Hubert H. Parry—for example, about his choral works "with their unsurpassable truth and depth in the setting of words." And Bates stopped with verbal argument in a matter where any number of words are less conclusive than even one action. It would have taken too long to do the complete job; but he should have listened at least to the finale of Brahms's Piano Quartet Opus 60 that was the occasion of Tovey's remarks about tragedy, and reported whether the experience had brought him to a new conclusion about it—not so much whether he had found it to be tragedy, as whether it had proved, as tragedy, to be convincing and moving; or in other words whether as music it had communicated something genuinely felt which had dictated the flow of substance into form, or had communicated only pumped-up attitudes through a synthetically contrived large structure. The "really intelligent listeners" Bates referred to include some who have listened again to Brahms after reading Tovey, and who haven't discovered anything new in Brahms but have learned something important about Tovey—that his scholar's and composer's interest in the mechanics of musical construction sometimes leads him to hear great or important utterance where there is only elaborate manipulation of the devices of melody, harmony, counterpoint, and orchestration; and that, as a result, the statements about music and the general obiter dicta that are so illuminating and enriching are elicited by poor music as well as good.

No; where men like Brahms and Parry are concerned one does better to be influenced by Shaw, who has sharp perception and no tolerance for "attempts to pass off the forms of music for music itself." Brahms is not for him the great composer that he is for "learned musicians" when, in the German Requiem, he "sets a pedal pipe booming and a drum thumping the dominant of the key for ten minutes at a stretch, while the other instruments and the voices plough along through every practicable progression in or near the key, up hill from syncopation to syncopation, and down dale from suspension to suspension . . . Brahms seems to have been impressed by the fact that Beethoven produced remarkable effects by persisting with his pedal points long after Mozart would have resolved them, and to have convinced himself by an obvious logical process that it must be possible to produce still more remarkable results by outdoing Beethoven in persistency. And so indeed it is, as Bach proved before Mozart was born. Only somehow it has not come off in Brahms's hands."

The Sewanee Review

Edited by ALLEN TATE

(Spring Issue, 1945)

ANNOUNCES, in collaboration with PRENTICE-HALL, Inc.

THE JOHN PEALE BISHOP MEMORIAL LITERARY CONTEST
$1,500.00

FICTION CRITICISM POETRY

In the Spring Issue:

THE ECONOMY OF THE AMERICAN WRITER (essay)
by R. P. Blackmur.

SNOWS (poem) by St.-John Perse.

PROSE and VERSE by: Jean Paulhan, Joseph Frank, Roger Chailois, Louisa Bogan, Weldon Kees, Dylan Thomas, John Peale Bishop, James Ross, Theodore Spencer, John Berryman, Jerome Melquist, Vivienne Koch, Willard Thorp, W. B. C. Watkins, Oscar Williams, A. H. Scouten, R. M. Weaver.

Published by

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH
Sewanee, Tennessee

75 cents a copy $3.00 a year

New York Agent:

Gotham Book Mart, 51 W. 47th Street

Crossword Puzzle No. 109

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Jocose—at having got five vowels in their proper order, perhaps
- 6 Sewell returns with L knocked out of him
- 9 Friday p.m. to Monday a.m. (hyphen, 4-3)
- 10 Reveals (anag.)
- 11 Did Opal ever meet her? I once did (hidden)
- 12 Moves by slow degrees
- 13 She was a good cook, as cooks go; and as cooks go, she ---
- 15 He is doubtless well-versed in "coast use" (two words, 3 and 5)
- 16 Pugilistic
- 18 An ogre transforms himself into an ass
- 20 Inaugural opportunities
- 23 There are many such small expenses at election time
- 24 Robin Hood's maid
- 25 You might mistake this dog for a Boxer
- 28 Passage from a book
- 29 Might make tin rust
- 30 Suit-able material for a Russian
- 31 Silly asses!

DOWN

- 1 Not so many here
- 2 No cream, but possibly a violin
- 3 Appropriate name for a boys' preparatory school? (two words, 3 & 7)
- 4 Term of endearment for Buffalo Bill? (two words, 3 and 5)

- 5 Poetic relationship of Judy O'Grady to the Colonel's lady
- 6 "Perhaps it was right to dissemble your ---, but why did you kick me downstairs?" (Kemble)
- 7 Closest
- 8 They occur in June and December
- 14 Sweet-scented flower
- 15 The answer tells you what to do if you want this clear atmosphere
- 17 Mark Tapley was one
- 19 The one who encourages sounds like a gambler
- 21 A writer turns to music and produces something far above our heads
- 22 Crooks are. So are cooks
- 26 Stage entrances
- 27 Where the hair usually thins first

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 108

ACROSS:—1 CAPER; 4 FOB; 6 FLOCK; 9 ROMULUS; 10 DIDACHE; 11 ROOSTS; 13 MILLARD; 15 EUGENIE; 16 CASERN; 17 ODDS; 19 SNEERED; 21 LAST; 24 NESSES; 25 DENTIST; 27 ORATORIO; 28 EATAGE; 31 TRACKER; 32 CALLING; 33 CUDDY; 34 CAT; 35 DOGIE.

DOWN:—1 CURER; 2 POMPOUS; 3 RELATERS; 4 FAST; 5 BODKIN; 6 FIDDLE; 7 ORCHARD; 8 KNEAD; 12 SUNNIER; 13 MEMENTO; 14 LICENSE; 16 COL; 18 SOS; 20 DETAILED; 22 SEA-MAID; 24 SCARING; 25 DONKEY; 26 NITRIC; 27 OPTIC; 29 EAGLE; 30 SCOT.

Nor is it any better when it is done by the learned musicians. One of the products of the English professorial school of composers elicits from Shaw the comment that if he worked at it he could "turn out five acts about King Lear that would be, at least, grammatical, superficially coherent, and arranged in lines that would scan," and that friendly critics would be able to praise by dodging the one important question, "Has the author been able for his subject?" There are, he adds, in Parry's "Job" "no end of nice little things I could point out about the workmanship shown in the score, its fine feeling, its scrupulous moderation, its entire freedom from any base element of art or character, and so on through a whole epitaph of pleasant and perfectly true irrelevancies"; the only important thing is that "there is not a bar in it that comes within fifty thousand miles of the tamest line in the poem."

And on another occasion it is Stanford's "Eden" that makes Shaw "wonder what Mr. Stanford would think of me if I took advantage of my literary craftsmanship to write inane imitations of Milton's 'Paradise Lost' with all the latest graces of style, and got my friends to go into raptures over its grammar and its correct scansion. However, who am I that I should be believed, to the disparagement of eminent musicians? If you doubt that 'Eden' is a masterpiece, ask Dr. Parry and Dr. Mackenzie, and they will applaud it to the skies. Surely Dr. Mackenzie's opinion is conclusive; for is he not the composer of 'Veni Creator,' guaranteed as excellent music by Professor Stanford and Dr. Parry? You want to know who Dr. Parry is? Why, the composer of 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' as to the merits of which you have only to consult Dr. Mackenzie and Professor Stanford." If only Shaw could be turned loose on the musicologists and their reviews of each other's books!

A friend reports that the worst of these Savonarolas, Professor Paul Henry Lang, who has made the musical atmosphere hideous with his harsh-voiced exhortations, referred to Shaw in a recent article on Wagner in the Saturday Review of Literature: Shaw, said Lang, had, in his "Perfect Wagnerite," correctly understood some fact or other about Wagner's "Ring," but had of course been hampered by his lack of knowledge of music. The kind of knowledge the musicologists have Shaw did not have; but they, on the other hand, haven't the kind he had.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • APRIL 7, 1945

NUMBER 14

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

373

EDITORIALS

- Tariffs Must Be Cut 375
"Sovereign Equality" 375
Out of the Ashes of Europe by Freda Kirchwey 377

ARTICLES

- If They Ask for Bread . . . by I. F. Stone 378
The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolte 379
25 Years Ago in The Nation 380
Lloyd George by Kingsley Martin 381
Is This "Peace in Our Time"? by Reinhold Niebuhr 382
Bill White's Bazooka by Alexander Kendrick 384
Unseat the Poll-Taxers! by J. Mitchell Morse 385

POLITICAL WAR

- India Looks Beyond the War by B. Shiva Rao 387
Behind the Enemy Lines by Argus 389

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- A Tragic Situation by Lionel Trilling 390
Briefer Comment 392
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 394
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 395
Films by James Agee 395
Art by Clement Greenberg 396
Dance by B. H. Haggin 398

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

399

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 110 by Jack Barrett

400

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARK

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE EASTER DAY LANDING OF THE TENTH ARMY on Okinawa furnishes the most impressive evidence of the rapid growth of Allied power in the far Pacific. It would have taken a brave man a year ago to say that at this time American troops would be three to five hundred miles from Japan, or that such a large operation—the biggest amphibious landing to date in the Pacific—could be undertaken so soon after the end of the major campaign at Iwo Jima. It is encouraging to see the Pacific commanders continuing to learn new lessons and to put them into effect so early. The ten days of pre-landing bombardment at Okinawa are apparently the result of the previous experience at Iwo Jima, which had only three days of pre-landing bombardment. This careful preparation paid dividends at Okinawa in the seizure of two air strips the first day. The effects of the Okinawa campaign will be tremendous: greatly increasing the number of bombers over the home islands, severing the last tenuous supply line to the empire in southeastern Asia and the East Indies, and posing the early threat of further landings in Japan or China.

✱

THE MAGNIFICENCE OF MILITARY VICTORY stands in sharp contrast with the sad state of political confusion among the major Allies. Within a week the prospects for San Francisco have suddenly grown dim. The proposal to change the distribution of votes in the future United Nations Assembly appears to us unreasonable and mischievous, as we point out in an editorial elsewhere. But as if this were not enough, the sudden demand of the unreconstructed Warsaw government to be represented at San Francisco has dropped like a bomb into the Allied camp. It is too early to know what lies behind this proposal. Some observers in Washington suggest that it may be a Russian move to counter the apparent purpose of Britain and the United States to invite Argentina to San Francisco. If this is the case, indeed whatever may be the case, we hope that the powers will get together immediately and clear up the differences which threaten the hope of international agreement. The present situation is the best evidence that could be given of the absolute necessity of continuous political consultation between the major Allies. Such misunderstandings would never have reached the point of hostile maneuvering if a United Nations Council had existed to deal with them as they arose. We hope the plan for an immediate five-power meeting will be put into effect and the issues of Poland, of Argentina, and of the disposition of Assembly votes will be thrashed out and settled. The unity pledged at Yalta cannot be allowed to crumble.

SORRY, BUT WE CANNOT JOIN IN THE REJOICING that Argentina has come over to our side—the Argentina of Farrell and Perón. And we maintain our composure not only for reasons of decency. We can understand of course, the feeling of shame which, as Arnaldo Cortesi wrote in the New York Times on April 1, fills every man in Buenos Aires at seeing his country become an international joke. What a moment to declare war on Germany! But it is not that. We refuse to rejoice because we consider Argentina and Franco Spain the two principal bases for Nazi post-war activity. Last week the Voz Argentina, the radio program conducted by Argentine exiles in Montevideo, said that Argentina's declaration of war on the Axis followed a secret meeting of German and Argentine fascists at which it was recognized that a declaration of war was necessary to the preservation of the Nazi beachhead in Latin America. Whether or not that is true, a declaration of war by the Farrell government amounts to exactly nothing, so far as the democratic cause is concerned. The same Nazi agents who are active in Buenos Aires today will continue their work. Moreover, the Nazis will use to good advantage the place Argentina may be granted in an international organization. Once they have gained entry, the Nazis can apply their old fifth-column technique, just as the quislings in the old League of Nations—the Albanian, Hungarian, and other pro-fascist delegations—worked to further the interests of Hitler and Mussolini and to undermine the peace. We are absolutely opposed to the acceptance of the present Argentine government, in fact, of any fascist government, as a member of the San Francisco conference or of the world security organization.

✱

BY KILLING THE MAYORS OF AACHEN AND Monschau, the Nazis have proved that they were not making idle threats when they warned Germans against working with the Allies. The three parachutists who descended upon Aachen and, under the very eyes of our soldiers, shot the mayor appointed by the American commander, can be considered heralds of a terrorist movement of which we shall hear more as the invasion of Germany proceeds and until the country is freed from every nucleus of resistance. One of the techniques of the ultra-fanatics who, according to the general assumption, will make a last stand in the Bavarian mountains will consist of murdering all those Germans who might be used in a democratic reconstruction of the country. That orders for the execution of both murders came from above was made evident by the joy with which Radio Berlin broke the news. It was as though we had gone back twenty years to the time when Erzberger and Rathenau fell—under the same hand. For the ideological link between the parachutists of Aachen and the reckless volunteers of the Frei Korps is undeniable. It is hardly surprising that Dr. Goebbels, who in 1935 gave his official blessing to the film "Hangmen and Soldiers," a glorification of the murders committed by the organization Consul and the Erhardt Brigade, should now exhibit his triumphant satisfaction over the murder of the two collaborating mayors. In reply to this act, there is only one course the Allied authorities can take. Every Nazi who commits a deed like the one in Aachen must be court-martialed and shot just as though he had taken the life of an Allied soldier; and the Allies must select for administrative posts in every German community the best anti-fascists they can find.

✱

THE GENEVA CONVENTION ON WAR PRISONERS has long since proved a scrap of paper in Nazi Germany. The treatment of Russian and Polish prisoners has rivaled for sheer brutality the treatment of the Jews of Europe. Recent reports from prison camps on the western front indicate what we may expect as the war goes into its last desperate phase. In the German prison hospital in Heppenheim 290 Americans lost an average of thirty-five pounds each from undernourishment, all were verminous, and several died of neglect. By contrast, within the American lines in France German prisoners have fared so well that the comparative luxury of their standard of living is provoking bitter resentment among French civilians. In this country the army has lately refused to permit prisoners of war to be used in lumber camps because conditions are not fit for the Herrenvolk, and only recently has conceded that the P. O. W. diet might reasonably be brought into line with that of meat-short American civilians. It will be a pity if our guests return to Germany believing that Americans are soft of head as well as soft of heart and that the symbol of our great free republic is the full belly. Certainly, there have been few if any attempts to educate German war prisoners in the basic principles of the democratic system we intend to install in their homeland, and it has been common practice to leave Nazi non-coms in subordinate positions of control in the camps. We suggest that general improvement of the prisoners and heightened morale among our Allies would result from shorter food rations and more liberal servings of democracy.

✱

THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION, LONG RIPE for an investigation, is going to receive one. Last week even the Journal of the American Medical Association took tardy notice of the "continuous flow of charges . . . from a variety of investigators, commentators, periodicals, and publications whose observations have led them to believe that medical care in the Veterans' Administration is on a standard far lower than that prevailing in ordinary practice in the United States." The policies of the Veterans' Administration will eventually affect the health of nearly one-sixth of our total population. Nation readers will recall Edward M. Maisel's carefully documented exposé, Should Veterans Have Legs? (March 10), which showed that limb manufacturers, aided by General Hines, had been able to sabotage improved appliances for the crippled. Other investigators have reported on conditions in the veterans' hospitals. A thoroughgoing investigation is in order. Unfortunately, Representative Rankin has managed to persuade the House of Representatives to authorize his Veterans' Committee to look into the hospitals, and, apart from Mr. Rankin's well-known record, it is clear from his preliminary announcement that a whitewash may be expected. It is up to the public to see that a real investigation is conducted. The American Medical Association proposes that it be made "by a committee responsible directly to the executive office of the President."

AN EXCELLENT EXAMPLE OF CONSTRUCTIVE action in a matter involving interracial relations is afforded by the recent transfer of Council House, a settlement house in the East Bronx section of New York, from the Council of Jewish Women to an intercultural group which will administer it in the interest of a neighborhood now predominantly Negro. The house was built in 1929 to serve the needs of a thickly populated Jewish neighborhood where there were few cultural or recreational facilities. As the Negro population of Harlem began to overflow into the East Bronx in 1941, the proportion of Negro children served by the house increased rapidly, and it became apparent to the directors of this Jewish enterprise that they would soon be operating a completely Negro community center. Other organizations faced with the same anomalous situation have reacted differently: some have boarded up their establishments, others have sold them. The neighborhood has thereby suffered social loss, and the ill feeling between races has been exacerbated. The Council of Jewish Women, wishing to be more constructive, consulted with Negro, Catholic, and Protestant leaders in the neighborhood, set up a new corporation representing all groups, presented the house to it as a gift, and contributed $30,000 toward its expenses for the first three years. Forest House, as it has been renamed, will serve henceforth not only as a community center but as a symbol of interracial good-will.

Tariffs Must Be Cut

THE President's request for a renewal of the Trade Agreements Act is in many ways the most important he has made to the present Congress. Mr. Roosevelt expressed the interests of the country as a whole when he declared that the tariff issue is no longer a question on which Republicans and Democrats should divide. Elimination of trade barriers is essential if we are to have full employment and higher living standards. It is also necessary if we are to lay sound foundations for international peace and security in the post-war period. Yet there will be partisan attacks on the Trade Agreements Act, supported by many sincere persons who believe that the American standard of living is being "protected" by the tariff and that any reduction in our customs duties is a threat to their pocket-books or their jobs. They fear that if it were not for the tariff this country would be flooded with "cheap" goods, forcing American producers to cut their wages to meet this competition.

Economists have been pointing out for years that these fears are groundless—that no one is ever the loser when he trades something he has in abundance, or can make cheaply, for something he does not have, or can only produce expensively. They have shown that our "protected" industries are not the high-wage industries that have contributed to making American living standards the highest in the world but are low-wage industries. On the other hand, the industries which produce goods for sale abroad, and would benefit most from an increase in foreign trade, pay relatively high wages. Thus it is to the worker's as well as to the country's interest to specialize in the things we can turn out most efficiently and cheaply so that they can be exchanged for the things which other countries can produce cheaply and abundantly.

The reciprocal-trade program was rather cleverly concocted to offset the prejudices of protectionists. Tariff reductions have been made only as part of a bargain in which foreign countries agreed to remove restrictions against American exports. And in actual fact we have succeeded in forcing greater concessions from other countries than we have granted in return. The reduction in trade restrictions achieved as a result of the reciprocal-trade program has not gone far enough to enable the United States to discharge its responsibilities as the world's leading creditor. Because of high tariffs, our people have not been able to buy enough abroad to provide foreigners with the dollars they require to buy the American goods they want and at the same time meet their contractual obligations to this country.

In the post-war period we shall have to place more emphasis on imports. For only through an increase in imports can we hope to expand exports and create the conditions of equilibrium that are necessary for a stable world economy. In practice this means acceptance of the President's request for authority to reduce tariffs 50 per cent below their present rates. The duties on many key products have already been cut under the Hull program by as much as 50 per cent without injury to American producers. We must be prepared to make additional reductions if there is to be a substantial increase in trade after the war.

To a much greater extent than is commonly understood, trade barriers were erected by other countries as a defense against American protectionist policies. But since there is bound to be a tremendous demand for American goods after the war, foreign countries will have every incentive to lower the barriers against these goods if we show that we are prepared to buy more of their goods in exchange. By grasping this opportunity to reverse the forces of economic nationalism which plagued the world between World War I and World War II, we can help build a sound international economy based on rising living standards throughout the world. Failure to grant the President's request would be a bad omen for the San Francisco Conference.

"Sovereign Equality"

LAST Thursday's announcement from the White House opens up a deplorable prospect. Britain and the United States agreed at Yalta to support Moscow's proposal that the Ukrainian and White Russian Soviet Republics should be represented, with one vote each, in the proposed General Assembly of the United Nations.

Formally, the Soviet proposal is unobjectionable. Two political communities, which Moscow describes as self-governing even in foreign policy, are being put up for membership in the United Nations organization. But this is not quite the view of the matter taken at Washington. There it is interpreted as two more votes for the Soviet Union as one entity. Other governments will share this opinion. President Roosevelt, therefore, unlike Mr. Churchill, attached a condition to his agreement. If the San Francisco Conference accedes to Moscow's request, the United States will ask three votes in the General Assembly. As it cannot make even a pretense of having junior partners with autonomous foreign policies, who could be separate voting members, it will appear in the undisguised and unpopular role of demanding a triple voice in a body which was supposed to give full expression to the "sovereign equality" of states.

Of course, the comedy won't stop there. France will refurbish its claim to representation for a string of dependencies. Why should not the Netherlands, and any other state with colonies, follow suit? If they do, "middle powers," like Canada and Brazil, will almost certainly demand a multiple vote. The mass of small states will be asked to acquiesce in a formalized hierarchy of power which leaves them on the lower steps. Some of them have qualms enough already about inequalities in the proposed organization. This last indignity may keep them out.

The essential purpose of the San Francisco Conference was to reconcile the lesser nations to a plan of organization which gives special prerogatives and immunities to five great powers. A substantial case had been made out for permanent representation of the great powers on the Security Council, and for allowing them a veto on decisions involving the use of force. The justification rests on a difference of function marking off the nations that must bear the chief responsibility and supply the chief means of enforcement. No such differentiation has any place in a body which, like the Assembly, is largely consultative, which cannot command action, and which has no responsibility for enforcement. Its decisions will nevertheless be highly important in the whole economy of the organization, and equal participation in them was held out as one of the chief attractions for the small nations. The newly disclosed bargain would end all that, and if the "Big Three" insist, it may wreck the conference.

Worse than that, it throws back into the arena the whole question of American participation in security organization. Again the old myth of "six British Empire votes" is on parade. In sober fact Great Britain will have no more control over the vote of a dominion than the United States over that of Cuba or the Soviet Union over that of Poland. But sober fact will weigh nothing with those who, now that the subject is thrown wide open, are already insisting that the United States must have six votes or stay out. Their opposition will be reinforced by the international perfectionists, who will condemn the scramble for multiple votes as another manifestation of the "power politics" which, in their view, vitiates the whole Dumbarton Oaks plan. The fat is in the fire; and nothing short of a withdrawal of the proposal will pull it out.

Out of the Ashes of Europe

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

"If the day should ever come when we must go, if some day we are compelled to leave the scene of history, we will slam the door so hard that the universe will shake and mankind will stand back in stupefaction."

—Joseph Goebbels.

NOTHING Hitler's Wehrmacht can attempt now will stop the torrent of Allied armor pouring through the breached walls of Fortress Europe. The defeated Nazis can do just one thing more: they can organize their defeat, plan it as they would any other campaign so as to gain from it all possible advantage. The alternative would be surrender, and even in this past week, when Allied victories crowded so close upon one another that they could not be marked on the map, few military men predicted German surrender. The German officers who fell into Allied hands through capture or capitulation assumed that the army as a whole would fight on. They knew they were licked, but they expected the Nazi bosses to hold out until the whole land was conquered, and after. Hitler and Goebbels and Himmler have nothing to lose by resisting—except their country. For themselves they delay the predestined end and gain time to organize total catastrophe.

This plan has won a good Nazi-Teutonic label, "Operation Götterdämmerung." It demands a defense of strategic "islands of resistance" such as ports, the rocket-launching bases in Holland, the submarine hide-outs in Norway, even after surrounding territory has been lost; it demands an attempt to make a stand on any lines of defense capable of being held even briefly; and it demands a final withdrawal into the inner fortress of the German-Austrian Alps, from where Nazi bitter-end fighters would carry on guerrilla warfare—by arms and by assassination and by propaganda—to the point of physical annihilation.

In carrying out this strategy of defeat the Nazis will undoubtedly win many successes along the line. They will multiply the casualties among Allied troops. They will give themselves time to kill off their own weak-kneed members, as they have been doing at an increasing rate ever since last July, and perhaps to slaughter wholesale the remaining anti-Nazis in concentration camps and jails, along with those new elements of resistance which emerge as collapse and chaos increase. They will kill the last Jews in Germany if any still survive to be killed. They will plan and carry out the systematic assassination of local officials who take orders from the occupying authorities: two already are dead.

And while these details are being attended to, the more permanent policies of the new underground Nazi Reich will begin to be put into effect. Last Saturday the State Department released a report on a Nazi scheme for post-defeat industrial and commercial activities aimed at rebuilding German power for a new war. The information on which the report was based fills several volumes. It shows exactly how the Nazis plan, through every form of infiltration and especially through existing ties with foreign commercial interests, to revive their pre-war cartel agreements, recover their seized industrial plants in other countries, and reestablish their control over important patents. Another story, told by I. F. Stone in PM almost a week earlier, of a meeting of German industrialists and officials held last August in Strasbourg, exposed even more concretely Hitler's scheme of permanent political warfare. To provide the best possible conditions for this come-back, the effort to divide the Allied nations will be stepped up and every other familiar form of political sabotage continued.

No one knows the detailed Allied plan for the future control of Germany. Perhaps more exists. In any case what actually happens is likely to follow no predevised program. We can only hope that the disastrous mistakes made in other reconquered countries—and in the areas of Germany first invaded—will not be repeated in the Reich as a whole. It is encouraging to read that the AMG officer in Frankfurt, Lieutenant Colonel Howard D. Criswell, appointed as Bürgermeister and Police Chief two anti-Nazis; and he did it immediately, while the snipers were still at work. This is an innovation, as American war correspondents on the German front can testify. If it is made a precedent, the breakdown of civilian morale and of whatever democratic sentiment exists in Germany may be avoided. The reconstruction of any sort of ordered life is going to be hard enough, no matter how wise the occupying authorities. It will be impossible if Nazis—however passive or perfunctory—are left in office. To root them out will require a genuine wish, which was nowhere evident in Italy or North Africa, to identify and work with anti-fascists. What is done in this regard in the early days of our occupation may determine political developments for years to come. A repetition in Germany of the Badoglio-Roatta policy would guarantee the survival of those military and industrial interests on whom the Nazis depend for the success of their continued revolution.

The defeat of that revolution will be accomplished not by victory in war, not by "hard" peace terms or severe and prolonged military control, not by the security system to be built at San Francisco—not by any of these, although all are necessary prerequisites—but only by a democratic counter-revolution. If fascism is to be crushed in its vital center—in Hitler's Germany—a new policy must be instituted from one end of Europe to the other. The Allies must reconcile themselves to the rise of popular forces, they must permit radical social and political change, and they must systematically give democrats rather than fascists the responsibility for directing civilian life.

It is commonly said that the future of Germany will determine the future of Europe. The reverse is closer to the truth. One might say: As Europe goes, so goes Germany. Only in a Europe freed from reactionary political and industrial control, from the domination of Junkers—of whatever nationality—and their political spokesmen, from the subtle controls of the church of Rome, can one hope for the rise of a decent, democratic Germany. While the Allied armies sweep into the heart of Hitler's Reich we are bound to ask how they intend to use their massive victory. As Hanson Baldwin said in the New York Times on Sunday: "A challenge to all we have fought for lies in the ashes of Europe."

If They Ask for Bread . . .

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 31

THE first concrete tonnage figures on the UNRRA are not impressive. The Canadian Ambassador, L. B. Pearson, who is chairman of the UNRRA's committee on supplies, issued a statement yesterday in which he said that 30,000 tons of goods had already been shipped or loaded. He said that the UNRRA hoped to load 60,000 more tons in April and to send at least 480,000 tons to Europe by the end of June. The magnitude of these actual and prospective figures may be gauged by some others recently disclosed by Carl Levin in two excellent articles on the UNRRA published in the New York Herald Tribune of March 12 and 13. Levin reported that the United States Army, assuming that the Germans would give up once we gained a secure foothold on the continent, had planned to send 2,000,000 tons of relief supplies into France in the first six months after D-Day. Actual shipments between June 6 and December 31 were only 262,000 tons. This was admittedly inadequate for France alone, but it seems enormous beside the 30,000 tons the UNRRA has so far "shipped or loaded." The UNRRA figures hardly measure up to the promise implied when the President told the first meeting of the UNRRA in November, 1943, that "we mean business in this war in the political and humanitarian sense just as surely as we mean business in the military sense." The "business" has not been very lively.

This is neither the President's fault nor the UNRRA's. Mr. Roosevelt's sincere desire to help is beyond question. Unfortunately it is not a situation which can be solved by pressing a button, even a button in the White House. Governor Lehman and most of his staff are about as sympathetic, conscientious, and able a group as the President could have gathered for the purpose. But they are hemmed in on all sides by men and agencies concerned with other matters. Ambassador Pearson indicated some of them when he warned that the prospective UNRRA shipments he had announced depended on the full support of the supplying countries and on improvement in the tight shipping situation. Ships are the major bottleneck. The army and navy naturally and properly have first call upon them, but I wish it were possible for some independent agency, perhaps a committee of Congress, to give us some insight into how wisely ships are being used. Even civilian agencies of government such as the UNRRA seem unable to get any clear picture of what shipping is available or how it is being used. In this, as in other contacts with civilian officials, the army tends to be high-handed.

I know very little about shipping. But in an investigation I made at the time of the Indian famine in the fall of 1943 I did find evidence that political considerations—Anglo-American shipping "spheres of influence"—blocked the rationalization of routes, that a good deal of food could be stowed away on boats carrying munitions, and that suggestions from the maritime unions for greater efficiency were not being given the attention they deserved. I was told that the army could economize on shipping space without hurting the war effort. An example cited was Coca-Cola, which is shipped in bottles already carbonated instead of in the condensed form of syrup to which carbonated water can be added when served. I suspect that in many similar instances room could be found for relief supplies without impairing military efficiency; and I rather imagine most of our soldiers would be glad to give up Coca-Cola to get a little more food and clothing into liberated Europe, however painful the sacrifice might be to soda-pop manufacturers.

With all due respect to many humane and thoughtful individual officers, among them men of the highest rank, the fact is that the army has never been too understanding about the civilian relief problem. The military were the nemesis of the carefully worked out European relief requirements of the Inter-Allied Committee under Sir Frederick Leith Ross, which was set up in September, 1941, and worked almost two years with little result. When the President placed Governor Lehman in charge of an Office of Foreign Relief and Rehabilitation in November, 1942, the latter soon found himself stymied by brass-hattism. A year later, when the UNRRA was being established, the military staged a behind-the-scenes coup and obtained a directive from the President giving them responsibility for relief in liberated areas for the first six months after liberation. A war President cannot easily ignore the advice of his generals, but the directive created justified dismay among those who had worked on relief problems with the army in the African invasion.

The UNRRA has many political problems abroad. The richer Western European countries, with gold balances and assets in London and New York, prefer to do their own buying in the hope that they can get more than their share. The poorer Eastern and Central European countries that depend on the UNRRA have been fearful lest food be used as a political weapon. Experience after the last war and more recently in Greece indicates that such fears are not unjustified. The UNRRA is overcoming most of these difficulties. Little attention is paid by the press to its major political headache, which is the United States, where the importance of the relief problem is but imperfectly understood. Ambassador Pearson touched politely on this when he said that some countries are behind in their promised UNRRA appropriations. One of these is the United States. So far Congress has only authorized $450,000,000 of our $1,200,000,000 quota. An additional $350,000,000 was to have been transferred from lend-lease. Each country's appropriation is to be spent for UNRRA supplies within its own borders, and we are even farther behind in terms of supplies than in terms of money authorizations. Ambassador Pearson provided some graphic figures in this field. The UNRRA was supposed to get 400,000,000 pounds of meat during the current six-month period, but only 33,000,000 pounds are available, all of this from Canada.

The experience of the UNRRA is not without relevance for the forthcoming conference at San Francisco. It shows that in international organizations action is not determined by theoretical voting powers but by whichever nation "has what it takes," whether this be military power or relief supplies. Supplies are in the hands of the Joint Anglo-American Combined Boards on Food, Shipping, Raw Materials, Production, and Resources. And on these boards the United States is distinctly the senior partner since it has most of the available resources. The UNRRA cannot even go direct to the Combined Boards any more. Between the UNRRA and the boards now stands the new inter-agency committee established by War Mobilization Director James F. Byrnes on March 11 to screen all past relief and supply programs and pass on all future ones. FEA Administrator Leo T. Crowley is chairman, but the dominant figures on the committee are Will Clayton of the State Department, General Somervell, and Marvin Jones of the War Food Administration. None of these are likely to be too sympathetic about the relief problem, and all are strongly under the influence of commercial considerations unfavorable to extensive shipments of relief.

The big food interests and their spokesmen within the military procurement services and in the War Food Administration have deliberately pursued a "bare-shelf" policy designed to leave us at the end of the war with as little surplus as possible. The considerations uppermost in the mind of the food industry were indicated by Lee Marshall in a speech last May at the Quartermaster Corps Food Service Show in Cincinnati. Marshall is head of the Continental Baking Company and was then director of distribution for the War Food Administration. He pleaded for greater care in buying food for the army. "This constant readjustment of food supplies to needs is important for at least one paramount reason," Marshall said; "it can very definitely stunt the growth of post-war problems concerning the disposition of government-owned food stocks." It can also stunt a whole generation of children in Allied countries. "You might say," Marshall went on in a burst of frankness, "that we have a selfish interest in keeping stocks as low as practical."

Next to food, the liberated peoples most need clothing; we should be ashamed only to give them our cast-off garments. But the textile industry does not even want to produce low-cost garments for the home market, much less for our allies. I hope to discuss the food and textile problems in more detail in a later letter. The heart of the relief problem is our capacity effectively to mobilize the food and textile industries. And that depends in part on our willingness as a people to pull in our ample belts a little. The Germans starved the peoples of the occupied countries deliberately to strengthen their own future military position in Europe. It is already apparent that we may treat them worse out of sheer carelessness, shortsightedness, and lack of planning. If we do, we weaken our own allies against German revival. If humanity and moral obligation will not move us, let us remember that devastated countries make poor markets, that poverty is contagious in the modern economy, and that pestilence too can spread.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

GENERAL EISENHOWER'S order of last Saturday calling on German troops to surrender summed up the situation within the Reich accurately: "The German government has ceased to exercise effective control over a wide area. The German command has lost effective control over many units, large and small, of the German forces."

The German high command has indeed lost control to such an extent that captured senior officers were still not sure who was their commander in the west, Rundstedt or Kesselring, and even before Eisenhower's order many Germans, both individually and in units, were giving themselves up. Allied armies took 85,000 prisoners in the seventy-two hours ending Saturday afternoon, 34,000 of them on Thursday alone, and on some sectors of what was once the German front between Switzerland and Holland thousands of enemy troops were simply being disarmed and told to walk west without guard.

The collapse of that front was certainly one of the fastest and most complete breakups in military history. Eight days ago—I write on Sunday—the Twenty-first Army Group crossed the Rhine north of the Ruhr in what then seemed the beginning of a large-scale and bitter battle to obtain a bridgehead so that supplies might be built up for a breakthrough into the flat Westphalian plain leading toward Berlin. To the south the United States First and Third armies were already over the river, but the First was apparently being contained in the Remagen bridgehead and the Third seemed doomed to slow progress in the hills of South Germany. By the beginning of last week, however, it was apparent that the German situation was far gone. Eisenhower had in fact, as he promised, won the Battle of the Rhine on the river's west bank, where the enemy lost a quarter of a million men and became consequently far too weak to hold the long river line.

This in no way detracts from the skill and dash of the Allied performance on the east bank or from the courage of the Allied troops, which met heavy opposition and broke it down. As sheer exercises in the practical handling and rapid supplying of mobile columns Hodges's and Patton's sweeps to the east and then to the north will long be studied in the war colleges—the First Army's tanks advanced from one to one hundred miles in four days. Both generals showed a heartening lack of concern about their exposed flanks as they hurried to drive into Germany and to aid in the envelopment of the Ruhr.

While these headline gains were registered through the soft center of the western front, Marshal Montgomery's three armies to the north were finding the going much harder. As in Sicily, Normandy, and the Maas-Rhine battle British and Canadian troops pounded at the hinge of the enemy line where it was strongest. In all these actions the cautious, thorough Montgomery and his dogged, hard-working infantry-artillery teams have drawn the unspectacular but vital assignment of grinding away the hinge while Patton's fast tanks pushed through the opening door and swung it back.

By the end of last week the door was off its hinges and in splinters. On Sunday the United States Ninth and First armies joined behind the Ruhr, encircling perhaps 50,000 Germans and cutting off the Wehrmacht's last basic industrial resources. The Germans reported American troops in Kassel and British troops in Münster. A correspondent cabled through Montgomery's security blackout that British and Canadian columns had burst through the last resistance at the northern hinge and were driving north into Holland, northeast toward the Baltic ports, and east over the Westphalian plain. Once again it seemed as if—from Frankfurt to the north at least—lengthening supply lines would offer greater hindrance to the Allied advance than would any coherent German defense. The picture was not so rosy south of Frankfurt. The Germans were fighting hard along the upper Main, around Aschaffenburg, where the United States Seventh and French First Army were heading toward Nürnberg, Austria, and a possible junction with the Russians which would seal off the Nazis' last-ditch "national redoubt." The bulk of the Germans in the west might be "a whipped army," as General Eisenhower had said, but the forces in the south fought with the tenacity and skill of S. S. men.

It is entirely possible that we shall witness a comparatively rapid disintegration of the Germans in the north, while those in the south continue to offer heavy resistance. The fall of the Ruhr in nine days is almost too easy: it suggests that the best enemy troops are in the south prepared to swing back on a line through Württemberg, Bavaria, and Austria. Continued heavy resistance to the large-scale Russian offensive toward Vienna, plus the fact that the Russians apparently value the Vienna drive more highly than that toward Berlin, suggests that a similar decision has been taken by the German command as regards the east.

All this gives rise to the interesting conjecture that we may still have Germans to kill after North Germany and Berlin have fallen into our hands. The historians may thus have to wrestle with the problem of when the European war ended. General Eisenhower has now given official weight to the theory long advanced in these columns and elsewhere that there will never be a formal German surrender but rather a gradual disintegration of the Wehrmacht, with progressively larger units surrendering but with the machinery of the state disappearing so that no one man or power can eventually sign a piece of paper admitting the German nation's capitulation. It is obviously to the Allied interest that Eisenhower be able to issue a statement proclaiming the end of organized German resistance before too many troops get into the "national redoubt"; so that any further resisters can be shot as criminals and the Allies can be relieved of the necessity for another major campaign. On the other hand, it would serve a kind of rough justice if the Nazi leaders and S. S. bully boys slipped away to the south, if the end of organized resistance were proclaimed after the fall of Berlin, and if the southern Nazis were then hunted down and executed in the field.

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

AT A PRIVATE GATHERING in Paris a year ago Lloyd George was told to his face that the expectation in England, among the Tories, was that he would presently land squarely in the Conservative camp. "They think so, do they?" he replied. "Well, they may find themselves greatly mistaken." But now he has clearly made the jump.—April 3, 1920.

THE ALLIED STATESMEN have shoved Hungary over the edge of the civilized world into the dark void of chaos. By indifference and starvation and force of arms, they threw out their friends. With a futile gesture of disapproval they disposed of the Hapsburg Joseph, leaving in power his supporters. Those supporters and their rule of horror the Allies have formally, definitively recognized.—April 3, 1920.

MUNICH, FEBRUARY 15.—The political situation in Germany today is so confused that it must be impossible for an outsider to form any conception of it. The political ability and acumen of the Germans are being put to a test now that the people have the power to decide their own fate. . . . The bureaucracy is to a large extent monarchistically inclined and utterly opposed to the existing government. This is one of the sources of weakness of the Ebert regime; it has not been willing to or has been unable to clean house in the departments.—MAX HIRSCHBERG, April 3, 1920.

FOR EVERY JACK there is some compliant Jill; from all the plains and valleys the couples scramble up to the difficult ark of matrimony. Sheba travels to Solomon and the event is set down in the Book of Kings. Caesar rules over Rome and Cleopatra over Egypt, but the wet sundering leagues cannot separate them. . . . How then should Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks fail to swing into the orbit calculated from the beginning? . . . In this wedding the royal lines cross. It is as expected and as gratifying as the conclusion of a feature film.—April 10, 1920.

NEVER DID WHAT WAS HERALDED as a grand and inspiring cause collapse more completely of its own weight than the movement for universal compulsory military service. Its backers, who were so confident a little while ago that it would easily pass the Senate, did not dare to bring it to a vote in that body.—April 17, 1920.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH: Henri Bergson, "Mind and Energy"; Van Wyck Brooks, "The Ordeal of Mark Twain"; James Branch Cabell, "The Cords of Vanity"; Gabriele D'Annunzio, "Tales of My Native Town"; Paul Gauguin, "Noa Noa"; Walter Lippmann, "Liberty and the News"; Friedrich Nietzsche, "The Anti-Christ," translated by H. L. Mencken; Eugene O'Neill, "Beyond the Horizon."

Lloyd George

BY KINGSLEY MARTIN

London, March 28 (by cable)

I WOULD hesitate to say that Lloyd George was the most brilliant man I've known, but he was among the very few of undoubted genius. Today, with the European war ending, it is a comparison with Winston Churchill that first comes to mind. Lloyd George too led the country to military victory and knew what it was to encounter the bitter resistance of a party machine. If the quality of generous leadership comes out less clearly in him than in Churchill it is because, once installed in office, Churchill was through birth, tradition, and training a military and national chief, while Lloyd George was a man of the people, of peasant stock, and had continuously to fight not only the enemy but also the military and social hierarchy.

His war memoirs are unequalled as a source book for the history of the last war. Written with a vigorous intensity that was his special characteristic, they have as their underlying theme the justification of the Premier in his struggle with Field Marshal Haig.

At the end of the book a critic asks why, if our generals were as bad as that, Lloyd George didn't get rid of them. He would have replied that as a civilian with a pacifist record in the Boer War he couldn't risk an all-out open struggle with the military hierarchy. He would have added that he only held his position by his own dexterity and capacity, and he would have recalled that in the period immediately before the war he was bitterly hated by all the propertied class and during his fight to tax the landlords and curb the power of the House of Lords was regarded as the most dangerous radical who ever reached power.

That he had in him the same qualities of courage, tenacity, and leadership which Winston Churchill has displayed no one will deny. On one occasion, which his biographer will some day describe in full, at the end of March, 1918, he pulled the British Cabinet through its darkest hour as Churchill did in 1940. The Germans were nearing Paris and Calais, and some of the members of the Cabinet went to him in despair. They arrived to find Lloyd George singing a Welsh hymn about the Valley of the Shadow, with Smuts, likewise a peasant and a religious man, joining in. He went on to deliver a short speech which invigorated and united the Cabinet.

Lloyd George was the first man of the people who ever reached the highest post in Britain.

A Welsh solicitor, he first became known for defending the right of dissenters to be buried in consecrated ground even against the will of an Anglican parson. He was the natural champion of the nonconformist middle class against the landlords, the church, and the aristocracy. In the House of Commons he fought brilliantly for education, free trade, and the taxation of the rich. He, more than anyone else, was responsible for making the state accept the duty of public welfare. To this day you may hear working people describe their health-insurance benefit as "my Lloyd George." At the outbreak of the First World War, which he supported only after the invasion of Belgium, he stood as the chief champion of the small man. Why was it, then, that after the war he lost power and never again held office?

The complex reasons may be summarized by saying that his judgment was far less sure in the years immediately after the war, and the Tories took the first opportunity of ridding themselves of a leadership they had always detested; that Lloyd George was responsible for splitting the Liberal Party, which would have decayed in any case with the rise of Labor but which need not have fallen into rapid and total disaster; that he was unable to join the Labor Party mainly because he had won the undying distrust of Labor, which attributed to him many of the evils of Versailles and the economic miseries that followed it. The pre-war wizard came to be regarded as totally untrustworthy. Above all, his broken promise to the miners who trusted him to carry out the nationalization proposals of the Sankey Report and his share in the period of the Black-and-Tans in Ireland made people forget the great credit due him for the Irish settlement.

Though Winston Churchill was rightly regarded as the main force making for war with the newly formed Soviet Union, and Lloyd George in fact always opposed intervention in Russia, Labor blamed the Premier for our anti-Soviet policy and attributed to him far more than his share of blame for Versailles. In fact Lloyd George fought with much dexterity against many of the worst provisions of the settlement. But Labor was right in regarding as unworthy his conduct in the 1918 election, when unnecessarily he allowed himself to be stampeded by the ballyhoo of the press lords. So it came about that, feared by the Tories and distrusted by Labor, the ablest politician and executive in England was left with the funds of the Liberal Party but no party machine behind him. Without a party following, a member of Parliament, even if he has been Prime Minister, can seldom attain office.

Lloyd George had a dazzling personality and unequalled charm which worked even with his enemies. Those who called to curse often left with benedictions; those who called to resign came away flattered, wreathed in smiles, only to discover later that their grievance was unremedied. Partly it was his golden voice, flexible, friendly, and disarming; partly it was his lightning quickness of perception, what Lord Keynes called his sixth sense. He was a superb negotiator, and no one has ever had his capacity for gauging intuitively the feeling of a meeting. He could rise on occasions to the very highest peaks of oratory. Introducing visual images, sometimes flamboyant and sometimes comic—one thinks of his perorations about Welsh mountains and his famous description of City magnates as penguins—his speeches were not in the classical form and were much better to hear than to read. Their effect came from gesture, intonation, and the sudden unexpected parenthesis. He had, moreover, the rare gift of being able to speak with such intimacy to a ragged House of Commons that every member felt his words were addressed individually to him. In common with others who have been political opponents of Lloyd George, I was never able to dislike him after I met him. He was a superb raconteur and never in the least bitter about his exile from office.

Lloyd George wasn't unhappy during the last twenty years of his life. Indeed, I'm not sure that he was prouder of anything in his career than of the long series of memoirs or, even more important, of his extraordinary achievement as a farmer. I used to go periodically to Churt, where he had turned a huge sandy area which naturally grew little but heather and pine trees into one of the most profitable farms in Britain. He imported from the Aldershot barracks many tons of manure; I remember his remark that it was the only use he ever had for cavalry. And he was immensely and rightly proud of his show crop of fruit and vegetables. They were very pleasant, familiar visits to a man who lived with the personal simplicity of the peasantry from which he sprang.

It is one of the tragedies of British history that this man of unique quality should have been diverted from political leadership at a period when we so sorely lacked leaders. The history of England might have been different if MacDonald and Lloyd George had been friends and had jointly led a radical government capable of carrying on and extending the work of social reform which Lloyd George began in his great days before 1914.

Is This "Peace in Our Time"?

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

AMERICAN progressives and liberals have wisely decided to accept, and to work for, the adoption of the Dumbarton Oaks and Yalta international agreements in basic outline. In doing so they are exposing themselves to the criticism of purer internationalists, who continue to express the principles of a more consistent constitutional approach to international issues. Those principles were once the creed of the whole democratic international movement in this country. The British, in fact, used to criticize American internationalist thought because it proposed to create an international authority by pure constitutional means instead of by a more organic process. They believed that the unity of the international community must be achieved by the coalescence of national forces, a process analogous to the growth of the British Commonwealth, rather than by a process analogous to the establishment of the League of Nations.

The decision to support Dumbarton Oaks and Yalta is based on the view that it is safer to try to extend the core of world community created by the war partnership of the great powers than to attempt the constitution of a world authority above and beyond the sovereignty of the great powers. Critics of this position assert that American internationalism has capitulated to expediency and has forsaken principle, that it supports a system of power politics rather than international justice, and that it is preparing another "Munich," this time to appease Russia (here the internationalists join hands with the nationalist critics of our foreign policy).

While the majority of American liberals have taken a thoroughly sound position, their defense of it has been weak, and their efforts to improve the Dumbarton Oaks agreement have been ineffective. To say that we must accept an imperfect peace in an imperfect world is not an adequate defense. Nor would the Dumbarton Oaks agreement be substantially improved by the insertion of some international bill of rights which has no relevance, and would have no efficacy, in a world alliance of states.

Let us admit more freely that Dumbarton Oaks envisages, not a world authority, but a world alliance of states, and that the authority of the great powers is to be the core of world order. Let us admit the perils of this procedure. The great powers may try to hold the world together merely by their force. They may not mete out sufficient justice to the small powers to make the peace sufferable. They may not build the mutual trust necessary to create the central core of international stability which the plan intends. We must not deny that a peace secured through preponderant power may not deal adequately with all the economic and social relations of the nations, that it may center its attention too much upon the final suppression of aggression. And we must not deny that when preponderant power has been established through the cooperation of several great nations, whose partnership is still very tentative and incomplete, divisions may develop which would wreck the instrument of order. We ought not to deny these things even though our apprehensions may be overheard by the cynics and nationalists who are ready to use any argument to asperse a plan placing a check upon the power and self-will of our own nation.

Let us confess these apprehensions and then state clearly why we still hold resolutely to the basic outline of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement. We do so because we know, or dimly sense, what our critics do not admit. We know that decisions of nations may perfect and amend, but not reverse, the main currents of history. We know that modern technical warfare has made strong nations stronger and weak nations weaker. We may not like this tendency, but it is part of the general historical pattern; modern technics centralize power in both national and international life, in both the economic and the military realm. Our whole program for achieving a future international community requires that we make this inexorable tendency of a technical civilization serve the ends of justice. This is a desperately difficult task. It cannot be accomplished at all if we attempt to defy the process. The present plan for international order undoubtedly makes concessions to the pride and power of the great nations. It qualifies the sovereignty of nations which have already lost some of their sovereignty through the historical process. It qualifies the sovereignty of the great powers only in so far as their mutual agreements place restraints upon their self-will and oblige them, in order to maintain these agreements, to draw the smaller powers further and further into them.

If we accept such a system, despite its dangers, it is because we see no better alternatives within reach. There are undoubtedly many ways of perfecting the proposed agreement. But there are no better alternatives in terms of basic principles. The defects of the present system are not derived from the inadequacy of this or that statesman or the recalcitrance of this or that nation. They are derived from the fact that nations can do only what is implicit in the historical process in which they are involved. Nations cannot create a new universal sovereignty above themselves by a pure fiat of will and then turn around and subject themselves to this sovereignty. Individual idealists can of course envisage such a procedure. But the traditions and habits, the collective instincts and impulses of the nations run counter to the ideal concept.

We need only analyze the impulses of our own nation to perceive the impossibility of a pure constitutional solution of the international problem: we have given the world one example of national schizophrenia. After the last war American idealists contrived a constitutional solution, but it was sabotaged by American cynics, nationalists, and realists. Whatever may be the defects of our present foreign policy, Roosevelt must be given great credit for having avoided a new display of this kind of political immaturity.

It is true of course that Russia seems particularly intent upon establishing a system of unilateral security and that its hegemony in Eastern Europe may threaten the stability of a mutual system. But even so its policy differs in degree rather than in kind from that of the other great powers. Let those of our critics who insist that we are dealing not with "one world" but with "two worlds" state their alternatives clearly. Do they want to prepare for the next war between Russia and the West? Dumbarton Oaks is different from Munich because Russia is different from Germany. Russia is not driven by the mania of world conquest, though it obviously has residual fears of the Western world. Shall we seek to quiet those fears by efforts to achieve a mutual-security system, or shall we play upon those fears and make another war inevitable? Is it not quite clear that our idealist critics are offering us nothing but another war under the guise of an unattainable purer constitutional system? The cynical and nationalist critics offer it without any disguise. That is what they want.

We do not show ourselves to be cowardly compromisers with "power politics" or mere exponents of expediency in working for the acceptance of the present plans in basic outline. We advocate those plans because we have some understanding of the processes of history and are not willing to be led into another war by the mirage of a perfect international society of democratic socialist republics.

On the other hand, there are possibilities of improving the Dumbarton Oaks plan which we are not exploiting to the full. Many of our criticisms betray our old abstract notions, not yet completely disavowed. The organization "Americans United," for instance, which is effectively marshaling American opinion in support of Dumbarton Oaks, believes that the most important amendment to the charter should be a "provision for the establishment of a commission on human rights and fundamental freedoms." The same proposal is made by the Federal Council of Churches. It assumes that we have in fact an international government, when we have only a world alliance. If our own national government is unable to establish certain human rights in some of our states in opposition to the prejudices and traditions of the local communities, it will hardly be possible for a new-born world alliance to enforce particular ideals of freedom upon all its members. National sovereignty will not be sufficiently abridged to make such enforcement possible.

Our efforts to improve Dumbarton Oaks ought to be much more within the framework of the plan. The recent demands of Russia and our own country for three votes each in the General Assembly seem quite unjustified in view of the equal authority of the great powers in the Security Council and the already heavy preponderance of power of the Security Council over the General Assembly. On this issue the combined criticism and pressure of the smaller powers and of democratic opinion within the great powers may well effect basic changes in the charter. The General Assembly in which the smaller powers will express themselves must be given and will undoubtedly obtain greater authority. It is particularly important that military strategy be not left completely in the hands of the great powers.

Though a complete constitutional system is not possible, more elements of constitutional justice are possible within the framework of the charter. The social and economic council, for instance, is in its present outline too much a welfare organization. This council must become an international agency for administering and completing trade and monetary and credit agreements, such as the Bretton Woods accord, if real substance is to be given to a United Nations partnership.

The contemplated treatment of the vanquished nations is vaguely defined, and present proposals contain contradictory objectives which reveal the failure of the great powers to reach real agreement on how the continents are to be organized. The West does not know what to do with Germany politically or economically because it has no real plan for Europe. Russia knows what it would like to do with Germany. It does not want to destroy German industries but to use them. It does not want to destroy Germany politically but to keep it in subjection. The Yalta agreement suggests that we have not resolved these contradictions but merely piled one proposal on top of the other so that we shall try both to destroy Germany and to make it yield reparations.

The contradictory purposes of the Allies can only be resolved through more complete forms of partnership; and these cannot be made effective without drawing the smaller powers into them more fully. In that sense, if the international problem is solved at all, the method of solution will tend to mitigate both of the present dangers—the danger of dissension among the great powers and the danger of injustice to the small powers.

It is not at all certain that the agreement achieved will yield to historic improvement. This may be only "peace in our time." But unlike Mr. Chamberlain's peace it is not foredoomed to failure. It has a fighting chance of success. And the alternatives have no hope of success at all.

Bill White's Bazooka

BY ALEXANDER KENDRICK

[Mr. Kendrick was Moscow correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer until last October, when he returned to the United States in protest against "the refusal of the Soviet government to afford adequate, reasonable facilities for war coverage." He is now the Inquirer's Washington correspondent.]

LAST of seventeen "Roving Editors" listed on the masthead of the Reader's Digest is W. L. White. For a long time Bill White wanted to get to Russia, but he discovered to his chagrin that the Digest did not provide credentials that satisfied the Soviet authorities to whom he applied for a visa. He appealed for help to several persons supposedly "close to the Russians" in this country, but to no avail. At last he invited Eric Johnston to take him along on his trip to Russia as president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. As a member of Johnston's party he could hardly be refused a visa. But he was still the Reader's Digest's "roving editor," as he announced quite frankly to the regular American correspondents when he arrived in Moscow.

I was in the Soviet Union when Bill White arrived, and I was there when he left. I shared with him the experience of being bombed by German planes at the American airfield in the Ukraine. I base the following criticism of his book, "Report on the Russians," either on my own knowledge of his thirty-day stay or on the statements of two other American correspondents who made the Urals trip with him.

There seems to be no point at this stage in citing the dozens of errors in names and facts that appear in his report. In the book version he admits a number and corrects them. Through the Digest version the errors had already been circulated among its millions of readers, and nothing could be done to retrieve them. Again it is not very important, except as throwing a light on his own scale of values in war time, that White found all Russians shabby, grim, and solemn; that he observed they did not smile ("I suddenly remember that neither do the Prussians"); that Moscow streets are "incredibly empty" and have dingy shops and "dilapidated buildings"; that Soviet factories are dirty and slow-moving.

This is trivial stuff—deceptively trivial. But it leads slyly into his central thesis: that a socialist society is a poor and tawdry affair in contrast with a capitalist society. It lacks competition and incentive. Its citizens are inefficient, drab, sheeplike. White is irked that Johnston is not more vigorous in his pro-capitalist utterances, that he even talks about doing business with Russia after the war. And behind the outward contempt is fear, fear that socialism in Russia is not failing but succeeding, that it challenges Western capitalism in spite of our shiny bathrooms and clean streets.

Viewed objectively, therefore, the book is less a report on the Russians than on a state of mind toward the Russians. It is a political document rather than a literary work. Its appearance in the Reader's Digest and its wide distribution through this medium in the United States and Latin America must be regarded as political warfare aimed at undermining the whole idea of world security through cooperation and mutual trust.

The little errors play their part. (Most good reporters check before they commit themselves in final copy.) The choice of adjectives, the interpretation of incidents contribute to the total picture that is built up. But in addition to inaccuracy and conscious "angling" it is necessary to report that White has resorted to pure invention.

Here are two incidents in which White has summed up his most venomous appraisals of Soviet society. Both are presented as fact. Both are fiction.

He describes a meeting with two American engineers working in the Soviet Union, salt-of-the-earth characters named Tex and Ed. He bumps into them at the Omsk airport, where they are waiting for a plane. For ten pages they tell him what is wrong with the damned country—lack of home life, promiscuity, barbarism, constant surveillance, heartlessness, and kindred items. He sets all this down in the readable dialogue form he used in "They Were Expendable." Later, when he returned to this country, he was questioned about the incident by correspondents who were with him on the Urals trip and who had somehow failed to see Tex and Ed. White then admitted that he had invented it. His story was based on a meeting he had had with two engineers in Casablanca when he was on his way to Russia. He thought it better for the purposes of the book to put the meeting in Omsk.

The second invention is much more malicious and scandalous. Early in the book White introduces an American correspondent whom he nicknames the Field Marshal. The man is easily identifiable. Later in his account of a party given by the city officials of Novosibirsk this same man crops up. He is drunk and covets a pretty brunette waitress. He goes over to the secretary of the Communist Party in Siberia, places his arm about the latter's shoulder, and makes known his wants. The party secretary nods agreement, and the next scene shows a NKVO man forcibly leading the protesting girl upstairs to the Field Marshal's room. Luckily for her, the Field Marshal is too drunk to entertain.

Now, the American correspondents on the trip say that the Field Marshal was not one of their party and that the incident did not occur in any shape or form.

White does a distinct disservice to his newspaper colleagues on two other counts. First, he quotes some of their disparaging remarks about Russia completely out of context, and since he names them by name, he impugns their professional standing as competent reporters. Second, he recites their bill of grievances against the Soviet censorship and then demolishes their excellent case by writing a book which in Russian eyes is proof that American newspapermen can't be trusted. Moreover, he cuts the ground from under the valid and constructive criticism of the Soviet Union which many of us have offered and which eventually should have led to better understanding. Soviet censorship has been too drastic. Soviet officials have failed to dispel suspicion of the foreigner; they have had an exaggerated concern for security and have been unduly secretive about military and government policy. Bill White has not helped to improve this situation. The task of Americans inside Russia is vastly harder than it was before White's jaunty arrival last June.

One important footnote must be interjected to account for White's slant. Finland rides on his back like the old man of the sea. He makes it plain to the Soviet vice-consul taking his visa application that he was a reporter on the Finnish side during the late mutual unpleasantness and chuckles at the vice-consul's decision that in the Finnish war White's opposition to the Soviet Union was "purely verbal." But he fails to report that when he arrived in Moscow he told correspondents that, psychologically speaking, he was still on the other side of the Finnish-Soviet frontier.

Bill White enjoys most of his present reputation because in "They Were Expendable" he was able to put down what people told him dramatically and well. In "Report on the Russians" he uses the same literary technique. It would be difficult to analyze a complicated, prejudice-ridden subject like Russia by such a method even if the reporter were unprejudiced himself. White is not in this category.

Among those getting ready to convert from war to peace are the people who hate Russia. During the war-time alliance they have dropped their previous "I like Russia, but—" Now they watch the clock for the time when the Russian armies will no longer be needed, for the time when they can open what may turn out to be the most virulent anti-Soviet campaign in history. Bill White has jumped the gun on the clock-watchers. But the others are wasting no time. They are reaching out gratefully for White's custom-built bazooka—an excellent weapon for the dirty in-fighters of political warfare.

Unseat the Poll-Taxers!

BY J. MITCHELL MORSE

FIRST the Georgia legislature voted three to one to keep the poll tax; then it voted three to one for repeal. One thing that helped it change its mind was a telegram to Governor Arnall promising that if the tax were repealed a campaign to unseat Georgia's ten Congressmen would be dropped. The telegram was signed by Arthur Dunn of New York, counsel to the Southern Electoral Reform League, on behalf of Moss A. Plunkett of Roanoke, Virginia, president of the league. This organization of liberal Southerners is continuing a campaign against the sixty-nine Representatives from the seven remaining poll-tax states. It has formally notified them of intention to contest their election, and has presented more than a thousand pages of evidence to the House Elections Committee to show that their election was unconstitutional. The last of the law's delays will run out toward the middle of May, and the sixty-nine must then appear before the committee and show cause why they should not be unseated. They have not yet presented any evidence in their own behalf. Their time for doing so will expire about April 7—the date is indefinite because the sixty-nine replied to the notice of contest at different times; after that they will have thirty days in which to prepare briefs, and then they must stand trial, evidence or no evidence, briefs or no briefs.

According to the letter of the law their situation is desperate, but all the human factors are on their side. The Elections Committee is divided into three sections to facilitate its work; the chairman of the first section is Thomas G. Abernethy of Mississippi, one of the accused; the chairman of the second section is Ed Gossett of Texas, one of the accused; the chairman of the third section is Hugh Peterson of Georgia, who was originally one of the accused. Of the other members of the committee, three are among the accused and eleven are Republicans; only eight are Democrats from non-poll-tax states. In few actions are the accused so well represented on the bench.

However, there is good constitutional ground for contesting the seats of poll-tax Representatives. The Fourteenth Amendment is known chiefly as the dull matrix of that many-faceted diamond the "due-process" clause, but it contains other diamonds also, among them this one discovered by Mr. Dunn:

... when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a state, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such state, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein [i.e., in Congress] shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such state.*

* The word "male" was made superfluous by the Nineteenth Amendment, but has been allowed to stand.

After the decennial census of 1940 the Seventy-seventh Congress was required by the same amendment to determine the number of Representatives to which each state was entitled by its population. This it did. It allotted nine to Alabama, seven to Arkansas, seven to Mississippi, six to South Carolina, ten to Tennessee, twenty-one to Texas, and nine to Virginia. In all these states payment of a poll tax is a prerequisite for voting. The following table shows the average percentages of possible voters who actually voted in the last three elections:

	Poll-Tax States	Non-Poll-Tax States
1940.....	23 per cent.....	73 per cent
1942.....	5 " ".....	39 " "
1944.....	21 " ".....	60 " "

Such figures, says the Southern Electoral Reform League, indicate that the poll tax abridges the right to vote. As a matter of fact, when the Virginia tax was provided for at the state constitutional convention of 1901, Senator Carter Glass was very frank about its undemocratic purpose:

The chief purpose of this convention is to amend the suffrage clause of the existing constitution. It does not require much prescience to foretell that the alterations which we shall make will not apply to "all persons and classes without distinction." We were sent here to make distinctions. We expect to make distinctions. We will make distinctions.

In 1939 the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals held that the poll tax was primarily intended, not to produce revenue, but to limit the suffrage (Campbell v. Goode, 172 Va. 463, 2 S. E. (2d) 456).

If the penalty were enforced, the seven poll-tax states would be entitled to only twenty-three Representatives instead of sixty-nine. Their legislatures would have to call special elections, either redistricting the states to make a smaller number of districts or providing for the election of all their Representatives at large.

There doesn't seem to be much chance that the Elections Committee will go so far to uphold the Constitution. One Congressman told Dunn, "We're like a club up here in matters of this kind, so I think your contest is going to die in committee." Dunn replied that it was "a matter of the Constitution against Congressional courtesy." Representative Woodrum of Virginia, who favors repeal of the poll tax, told Dunn that it could be achieved only by public pressure. Dunn and Plunkett believe their action may be effective in creating pressure for a federal anti-poll-tax law.

The idea of enforcing the penalty provided in the Fourteenth Amendment was first put forth by Dunn in a book "Arithmetic or Revolution?" published in 1934. Carter Glass's newspaper, the Lynchburg, Virginia, Daily Advance, once called the seventy-two-year-old Dunn a "carpetbagger," which shows what century it lives in, but as a matter of fact his mother was a Virginia slaveholder and a relative of Governor Henry Alexander Wise, who refused to reprieve John Brown. Dunn himself was, if anything, more conservative than Glass until 1933. He studied economics at Princeton, accepting as eternal laws of nature the pre-machine-age theories of Adam Smith, Malthus, and Ricardo. After graduation he became a corporation lawyer with offices at 25 Broad Street, across the street from the New York Stock Exchange. His social views were just what you would expect: he voted for Herbert Hoover against Al Smith and against Roosevelt—in fact, the only time he deviated from the straight G. O. P. line was in 1912, when he voted for Theodore Roosevelt as a Progressive.

It took an almost fatal accident to make him a Democrat. On December 21, 1931, he was knocked down by an automobile and injured so severely that it took him five years to recover. He didn't set foot in the financial district for three years. The depression was in full career; the casualty company in which he was insured, one of the largest in the country, paid him $2,500 in settlement of a $5,000 policy; a friend, the president of an even larger firm, told him there wasn't a solvent insurance company in the United States; his three sons, all Princeton graduates, all intelligent young men, were all unemployed; two of them voted the Socialist ticket in 1932. Thus Dunn, who had always been an employer, saw the depression as if through the eyes of a man out of work. The corporation lawyer began for the first time to doubt that Adam Smith was the Messiah. On May 31, 1934, following doctor's orders, he started out on a leisurely automobile trip that lasted two and a half years, covered 42,000 miles, and took him through forty-four states and a part of Canada. He had no time-table, no fixed itinerary; he stopped wherever he felt like it, staying sometimes a day, sometimes a week, looking around and asking questions. He saw the New Deal at work, and was converted.

He began to write down his impressions, and a conversation with a newspaper editor led to the production of a daily column, "The Compass," which eventually was syndicated to seventy papers. This continued until the fall of 1936, when he came out for Roosevelt. When that happened, 90 per cent of the newspapers dropped his column and Dunn discontinued it. By that time he was back in New York and had resumed his law practice, which he still continues. In 1944 he organized the Parents and Wives of Fighting Americans, Inc., to agitate for a quick federal ballot for service men; it has since developed a broad liberal program and is now an ally of the Southern Electoral Reform League in the fight against the poll tax.

Moss Plunkett, president of the Southern Electoral Reform League, must be equally incomprehensible to those who think of reformers in the terms of a J. N. Darling cartoon. His family has been in Virginia for three hundred years, slaveholders, Revolutionary patriots, and Confederate patriots. He himself saw action at Chateau Thierry, Belleau Wood, and St. Mihiel. Yet he works for progressive causes! It was largely due to his efforts that the Virginia legislature last year provided funds to double the salaries of grammar-school and high-school teachers in the state, which then averaged $14 a week.

Dunn and Plunkett are not alone in their fight. They have the active support of the National Committee to Abolish the Poll Tax, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and the C. I. O. But they are cheered most of all by the fact that a number of youth organizations, on their own initiative, are conducting a campaign to have their members' parents write a million letters to Congress.

India Looks Beyond the War

BY B. SHIVA RAO

I HAVE found people in America under the impression that once peace, disrupted by the political upheaval of 1942, has been restored in India there will be no cause for anxiety about the future. They fail to consider, however, the new factor which will be introduced into the political situation by the demobilization of the army. Two and a half million Indian troops will be looking for employment after the war. During their years in the army they have learned the use of arms, absorbed the virtue of discipline, and realized the effectiveness of common action combined with resourceful leadership. More than that, they have come to regard themselves as the equal of the best Allied troops, having surpassed all expectations in every theater of war. These qualities will make them formidable challengers of the peace unless they obtain employment which will assure them the standard of living to which they have become accustomed in the army. The old type of Indian soldier, the picturesque and loyal sepoy admitting without question the right of every white man to give him orders, no longer exists. Nor can the British follow any longer the old policy, adopted after the great Indian uprising of 1857, of preventing the growth of national sentiment in the army.

Today India is kept under firm control by means of a great number of ordinances which have been promulgated by the Viceroy without consultation with either the executive or the legislature. More than three hundred of these decrees have been issued since 1939 and given the validity of laws, though they have no legislative sanction behind them. Mr. Amery, in his first speech in the House of Commons after assuming charge of the India office in the summer of 1940, gave an assurance to Parliament that the peace-time provision limiting the life of an ordinance to six months was being dropped for the purpose of enforcing military discipline and the conscription of British residents in India. By a singular accident this vital passage did not appear in the reports of the speech published in the Indian press at the time and was only discovered three years later by an Indian legislator studying parliamentary debates.

It is the same story in the provinces. In five of the biggest provinces, where the Congress Party held office until the outbreak of the war, the governors are virtually dictators, with a few officials, mostly British, acting as advisers. The legislatures have not been summoned for more than five years, and public meetings cannot be held without permission of the executive. The experience of provinces where "popular" governments are still supposed to function has been scarcely different. In Bengal, during the critical days preceding the famine, the governor frequently conveyed orders to his officials without even informing the Cabinet. So drunk with power has the executive become in India that practically all the high courts and the federal court have from time to time recorded their sharp disapproval of its acts. In a number of provinces, police officers have had to answer charges of contempt of court.

In a total war in which any information may be held to be "of value to the enemy," censorship is a handy instrument for dealing with embarrassing reports. For months in the early part of 1943 cable messages intended for publication abroad could not refer to "famine" or "epidemics" in India. Not only ordinary journalists but even Mr. Amery has had to bow to the superior wisdom of the censors. When President Roosevelt made an important speech in Washington in February, 1943, the seemingly complete text appeared in the Indian press on the following day. Only weeks later, when the New York Times reached India, was it discovered that a passage interpreting the Atlantic Charter as of universal application had been omitted from the cabled reports of the speech.

The war is offered as the excuse for many things in India. It seems the more fantastic, therefore, that Nehru, the greatest anti-Axis force in Asia, should have been in prison for the greater part of this war, and that his party, which, from the time of the Japanese aggression in Manchuria, through all the humiliations of Abyssinia, Spain, Czechoslovakia, right up to Munich, has consistently pointed out the danger of appeasement to world peace, should be labeled defeatist and opportunist.

Worse things have been said about Gandhi. He is of course a pacifist, with a faith in his creed which no world tragedy can shake. But the discussion of the technique of non-violent resistance to the Japanese in the spring of 1942 did not start with him. A month before the arrival of Sir Stafford Cripps in Delhi the deputy chief of the British General Staff declared at a press conference, over the air, and again in a Rotary Club speech that it would not be possible to prevent the Japanese from landing in certain parts of India and that the army looked to the civilian population to delay and hamper enemy operations in the best way it could. Gandhi's crime was that he reproduced the statement in his paper, Harijan, and commented on it from the point of view of a non-violent resister.

Gandhi is seventy-four and cannot live much longer. It has suited his critics to discredit him and his creed of non-violence. They seem to forget the value of his influence in checking the terrorist movement in Bengal immediately after the last war; they are blind to the stupendous forces that will be released at the end of this war. With Gandhi will disappear the principles which have inspired India's political life in the interval between the two wars.

The official bureaucracy in India, adept at drawing up plans and reports but at nothing else, has imposing reconstruction schemes ready for the post-war period. But who

After the decennial census of 1940 the Seventy-seventh Congress was required by the same amendment to determine the number of Representatives to which each state was entitled by its population. This it did. It allotted nine to Alabama, seven to Arkansas, seven to Mississippi, six to South Carolina, ten to Tennessee, twenty-one to Texas, and nine to Virginia. In all these states payment of a poll tax is a prerequisite for voting. The following table shows the average percentages of possible voters who actually voted in the last three elections:

	Poll-Tax States	Non-Poll-Tax States
1940.....	23 per cent.....	73 per cent
1942.....	5 " ".....	39 " "
1944.....	21 " ".....	60 " "

Such figures, says the Southern Electoral Reform League, indicate that the poll tax abridges the right to vote. As a matter of fact, when the Virginia tax was provided for at the state constitutional convention of 1901, Senator Carter Glass was very frank about its undemocratic purpose:

The chief purpose of this convention is to amend the suffrage clause of the existing constitution. It does not require much prescience to foretell that the alterations which we shall make will not apply to "all persons and classes without distinction." We were sent here to make distinctions. We expect to make distinctions. We will make distinctions.

In 1939 the Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals held that the poll tax was primarily intended, not to produce revenue, but to limit the suffrage (Campbell v. Goode, 172 Va. 463, 2 S. E. (2d) 456).

If the penalty were enforced, the seven poll-tax states would be entitled to only twenty-three Representatives instead of sixty-nine. Their legislatures would have to call special elections, either redistricting the states to make a smaller number of districts or providing for the election of all their Representatives at large.

There doesn't seem to be much chance that the Elections Committee will go so far to uphold the Constitution. One Congressman told Dunn, "We're like a club up here in matters of this kind, so I think your contest is going to die in committee." Dunn replied that it was "a matter of the Constitution against Congressional courtesy." Representative Woodrum of Virginia, who favors repeal of the poll tax, told Dunn that it could be achieved only by public pressure. Dunn and Plunkett believe their action may be effective in creating pressure for a federal anti-poll-tax law.

The idea of enforcing the penalty provided in the Fourteenth Amendment was first put forth by Dunn in a book "Arithmetic or Revolution?" published in 1934. Carter Glass's newspaper, the Lynchburg, Virginia, Daily Advance, once called the seventy-two-year-old Dunn a "carpetbagger," which shows what century it lives in, but as a matter of fact his mother was a Virginia slaveholder and a relative of Governor Henry Alexander Wise, who refused to reprieve John Brown. Dunn himself was, if anything, more conservative than Glass until 1933. He studied economics at Princeton, accepting as eternal laws of nature the pre-machine-age theories of Adam Smith, Malthus, and Ricardo. After graduation

he became a corporation lawyer with offices at 25 Broad Street, across the street from the New York Stock Exchange. His social views were just what you would expect: he voted for Herbert Hoover against Al Smith and against Roosevelt—in fact, the only time he deviated from the straight G. O. P. line was in 1912, when he voted for Theodore Roosevelt as a Progressive.

It took an almost fatal accident to make him a Democrat. On December 21, 1931, he was knocked down by an automobile and injured so severely that it took him five years to recover. He didn't set foot in the financial district for three years. The depression was in full career; the casualty company in which he was insured, one of the largest in the country, paid him $2,500 in settlement of a $5,000 policy; a friend, the president of an even larger firm, told him there wasn't a solvent insurance company in the United States; his three sons, all Princeton graduates, all intelligent young men, were all unemployed; two of them voted the Socialist ticket in 1932. Thus Dunn, who had always been an employer, saw the depression as if through the eyes of a man out of work. The corporation lawyer began for the first time to doubt that Adam Smith was the Messiah. On May 31, 1934, following doctor's orders, he started out on a leisurely automobile trip that lasted two and a half years, covered 42,000 miles, and took him through forty-four states and a part of Canada. He had no time-table, no fixed itinerary; he stopped wherever he felt like it, staying sometimes a day, sometimes a week, looking around and asking questions. He saw the New Deal at work, and was converted.

He began to write down his impressions, and a conversation with a newspaper editor led to the production of a daily column, "The Compass," which eventually was syndicated to seventy papers. This continued until the fall of 1936, when he came out for Roosevelt. When that happened, 90 per cent of the newspapers dropped his column and Dunn discontinued it. By that time he was back in New York and had resumed his law practice, which he still continues. In 1944 he organized the Parents and Wives of Fighting Americans, Inc., to agitate for a quick federal ballot for service men; it has since developed a broad liberal program and is now an ally of the Southern Electoral Reform League in the fight against the poll tax.

Moss Plunkett, president of the Southern Electoral Reform League, must be equally incomprehensible to those who think of reformers in the terms of a J. N. Darling cartoon. His family has been in Virginia for three hundred years, slaveholders, Revolutionary patriots, and Confederate patriots. He himself saw action at Chateau Thierry, Belleau Wood, and St. Mihiel. Yet he works for progressive causes! It was largely due to his efforts that the Virginia legislature last year provided funds to double the salaries of grammar-school and high-school teachers in the state, which then averaged $14 a week.

Dunn and Plunkett are not alone in their fight. They have the active support of the National Committee to Abolish the Poll Tax, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and the C. I. O. But they are cheered most of all by the fact that a number of youth organizations, on their own initiative, are conducting a campaign to have their members' parents write a million letters to Congress.

India Looks Beyond the War

BY B. SHIVA RAO

I HAVE found people in America under the impression that once peace, disrupted by the political upheaval of 1942, has been restored in India there will be no cause for anxiety about the future. They fail to consider, however, the new factor which will be introduced into the political situation by the demobilization of the army. Two and a half million Indian troops will be looking for employment after the war. During their years in the army they have learned the use of arms, absorbed the virtue of discipline, and realized the effectiveness of common action combined with resourceful leadership. More than that, they have come to regard themselves as the equal of the best Allied troops, having surpassed all expectations in every theater of war. These qualities will make them formidable challengers of the peace unless they obtain employment which will assure them the standard of living to which they have become accustomed in the army. The old type of Indian soldier, the picturesque and loyal sepoy admitting without question the right of every white man to give him orders, no longer exists. Nor can the British follow any longer the old policy, adopted after the great Indian uprising of 1857, of preventing the growth of national sentiment in the army.

Today India is kept under firm control by means of a great number of ordinances which have been promulgated by the Viceroy without consultation with either the executive or the legislature. More than three hundred of these decrees have been issued since 1939 and given the validity of laws, though they have no legislative sanction behind them. Mr. Amery, in his first speech in the House of Commons after assuming charge of the India office in the summer of 1940, gave an assurance to Parliament that the peace-time provision limiting the life of an ordinance to six months was being dropped for the purpose of enforcing military discipline and the conscription of British residents in India. By a singular accident this vital passage did not appear in the reports of the speech published in the Indian press at the time and was only discovered three years later by an Indian legislator studying parliamentary debates.

It is the same story in the provinces. In five of the biggest provinces, where the Congress Party held office until the outbreak of the war, the governors are virtually dictators, with a few officials, mostly British, acting as advisers. The legislatures have not been summoned for more than five years, and public meetings cannot be held without permission of the executive. The experience of provinces where "popular" governments are still supposed to function has been scarcely different. In Bengal, during the critical days preceding the famine, the governor frequently conveyed orders to his officials without even informing the Cabinet. So drunk with power has the executive become in India that practically all the high courts and the federal court have from time to time recorded their sharp disapproval of its acts. In a number of provinces, police officers have had to answer charges of contempt of court.

In a total war in which any information may be held to be "of value to the enemy," censorship is a handy instrument for dealing with embarrassing reports. For months in the early part of 1943 cable messages intended for publication abroad could not refer to "famine" or "epidemics" in India. Not only ordinary journalists but even Mr. Amery has had to bow to the superior wisdom of the censors. When President Roosevelt made an important speech in Washington in February, 1943, the seemingly complete text appeared in the Indian press on the following day. Only weeks later, when the New York Times reached India, was it discovered that a passage interpreting the Atlantic Charter as of universal application had been omitted from the cabled reports of the speech.

The war is offered as the excuse for many things in India. It seems the more fantastic, therefore, that Nehru, the greatest anti-Axis force in Asia, should have been in prison for the greater part of this war, and that his party, which, from the time of the Japanese aggression in Manchuria, through all the humiliations of Abyssinia, Spain, Czechoslovakia, right up to Munich, has consistently pointed out the danger of appeasement to world peace, should be labeled defeatist and opportunist.

Worse things have been said about Gandhi. He is of course a pacifist, with a faith in his creed which no world tragedy can shake. But the discussion of the technique of non-violent resistance to the Japanese in the spring of 1942 did not start with him. A month before the arrival of Sir Stafford Cripps in Delhi the deputy chief of the British General Staff declared at a press conference, over the air, and again in a Rotary Club speech that it would not be possible to prevent the Japanese from landing in certain parts of India and that the army looked to the civilian population to delay and hamper enemy operations in the best way it could. Gandhi's crime was that he reproduced the statement in his paper, Harijan, and commented on it from the point of view of a non-violent resister.

Gandhi is seventy-four and cannot live much longer. It has suited his critics to discredit him and his creed of non-violence. They seem to forget the value of his influence in checking the terrorist movement in Bengal immediately after the last war; they are blind to the stupendous forces that will be released at the end of this war. With Gandhi will disappear the principles which have inspired India's political life in the interval between the two wars.

The official bureaucracy in India, adept at drawing up plans and reports but at nothing else, has imposing reconstruction schemes ready for the post-war period. But who will carry them out? The men who might succeed in setting a pace for India's social and economic program that would satisfy the impatient masses, groaning under prohibitive high prices, are languishing in prison. The administrative machine in India today is run by landlords and capitalists and their supporters. The Bengal famine of 1943 alone is enough to condemn them as a self-seeking, visionless, unrepresentative set of men, unworthy of respect or confidence.

The impression one gets of India from within is very different from the optimistic view that prevails in this country. On the one hand there is a piling up of discontents—

Jawaharlal Nehru

political, economic, and racial—awaiting only a suitable opportunity for a massive outburst. On the other hand there is an inert and reactionary upper class blindly imagining that ordinances, censorship, British troops, and all the other war-time expedients for maintaining law and order can be carried into the post-war world. It is not difficult to foresee a head-on clash between these two sets of forces. In visualizing such a situation one must consider the role that will be played by the demobilized Indian soldiers, the organized industrial workers, and the thousands of political (now underground) "absconders," as well as the effect on the masses of the disappearance of the restraints associated with Gandhi's creed, restraints which marked past civil-disobedience movements.

As a political weapon for winning India's freedom non-violence attracted thousands of votaries, despite the grave provocation of the Amritsar massacre immediately after the last war. But the experiences of the past twenty-five years have brought disillusionment to the vast majority of Gandhi's followers. The new generation in India does not feel bound by his principles. Large numbers have died in detention or, after release, of illnesses caused by detention. It is a mistake to think that treatment of political prisoners in India, especially of the rank and file, has been of the same kind as the much-advertised "Aga Khan palace" conditions provided for Gandhi and the members of the Congress Working Committee. Those who have survived the ordeal of prison life—the harsh treatment by the police, the bad food, even in some cases solitary confinement in underground cells or Delhi's red fort—are not demoralized; they are only waiting for a favorable opportunity to resume the struggle. But not in Gandhi's way!

Under existing circumstances the consequences of a clash can only be large-scale civil strife, which the authorities must attempt to control by martial law or something very like it, or the kind of order that the landlords, capitalists, and autocratic princes would like to see established permanently in India. In short, the choice is between revolution and dictatorship.

There is perhaps one way out of this increasingly perilous situation. The forces which want rapid progress must come together under Nehru's leadership; then India's freedom will have a sound democratic foundation, and in the post-war world India can throw its entire weight on the side of a lasting peace. Nehru's last words to me on the eve of his arrest in August, 1942, were, "It would be dishonorable betrayal of the Allied cause for India to think of a separate peace, with any of the Axis powers; we stand not only for our freedom, but for that of Burma, Malaya, and the other Japanese-occupied areas in Asia." If Nehru were to be at San Francisco, he would strike that note and reflect the views of the six hundred million people of southeastern Asia. But what significance can an Indian delegation have that has been selected by Lord Wavell and speaks according to a brief prepared by the British Foreign Office?

Indo-British relations seem to be marked by a curious fatality. In 1942 the Cripps mission had an unequaled opportunity to obtain a settlement; it failed because the Churchill Cabinet and Lord Linlithgow would not indorse the interpretation originally placed on the offer by Sir Stafford. Today a settlement seems considerably more difficult. After the war it may become impossible—except after a long struggle.

What India wants above all things is, first, a change in its external status, which today is that of a political dependency. Nothing arouses such universal and deep resentment as the enforced compliance of India's delegations at world conferences in the decisions of their British masters. The white man's prestige in Asia has been destroyed in this war, and it will not be restored by the old-fashioned conceptions of the Kipling generation.

After it has been recognized as an equal among the world's major powers, India will want to settle down to a period of social and economic progress, which will be possible only under the leadership of a radical like Nehru. Its problems demand a completely new approach, one inspired predominantly by a consideration of the welfare of the masses, not, as hitherto, by regard for the convenience of landlords, princes, and the wealthier classes which have grown up under British rule. Internationally it will exercise all its influence to end colonial rule and to hasten the emergence of other peoples from subjection to imperialist powers. The future peace of the world cannot be guaranteed by pacts and creeds which lack moral sanction. Aggression from without will be met by a timely demonstration of adequate force. The foundation on which imperial authority in Asia has been built, the submissiveness of the colonial peoples, has been destroyed forever.

These things need to be understood in America, for it is easy to misrepresent the struggles and aspirations of far-off people like those in India. Ours is an essentially human problem; it concerns the health, the education, and the feeding of four hundred million people. Nothing else matters in India in comparison with this, and no one on the outside can solve it for us. Our own leaders, commanding the confidence of the Indian masses and the sympathy and support of democratic and progressive forces throughout the world, can lead India through the difficult post-war years to a new conception of its responsibilities as one of the guardians of peace in Asia.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

FORMER wars almost without exception have come to an end in three sharply defined stages. First the fighting has stopped. Then the treaties have been drawn up—in full knowledge of the general situation, exactly counterbalancing conditions of peace have been worked out. Finally, in full knowledge of the general settlement, a start has been made toward carrying out these conditions.

In this war these three final stages have merged. While the world is still shrouded in the smoke of battle, various resolutions—erratic, scattered, vague—are being formulated about the post-war order. And even if such resolutions were lacking, there would still be countless faits accomplis to shape the post-war world. At the same time it is becoming clearer every moment how uncertain, until the very last day, will be the basis for decision. The farther the Allied armies drive into Germany the more plainly we see that the war is going to end under markedly different circumstances from those envisaged a year ago.

The Allied governments have announced the three fundamental principles by which their treatment of Germany will be governed. The first is military: Germany shall be rendered completely incapable of waging another war. The second is economic: Germany shall make compensation for the damage it has done, but it shall be left capable of working back gradually to a decent standard of living. The third is political: Germany shall, if it is at all possible, be made into a democracy.

Conditions in Germany, however, as they are being revealed at this stage of the war, make the application of these principles a different matter from that formerly contemplated. The military potential of the Reich will have been destroyed to a degree that was not foreseen some months ago. The Nazis themselves have been the ones who have most thoroughly and most savagely disarmed their country. If there have been people in Germany who during World War I have thought of preparing for World War II, the Nazis obviously have not been among them. If they had been planning a third world war they would have acted as General Ludendorff and Prince Max von Baden did in 1918. As soon as the war became hopeless they would have capitulated, in order to save as much of their strength as possible for another attempt. The Nazis have done just the opposite. Although the war has been hopeless for months they have fought on in a suicidal orgy until all sources of national power have undergone such physical destruction as no country has known for centuries. That is the difference between 1918 and today. Germany's capacity to wage war was temporarily exhausted in 1918, but its inherent war potential was not really affected. Given a period of recuperation and a good opportunity, it could begin the whole thing over again. Today even its war potential has been largely destroyed.

Viewed realistically, this means that the first of the three fundamental purposes of the Allies, the military, is no longer difficult of attainment. The problem now is not how much and what shall be demolished in the Reich but how much and what the Germans shall be allowed to rebuild. In other words, a very small amount of supervision can insure the military impotence of the Reich for any desired length of time, certainly for a longer time than any political calculation can take into account. A much smaller occupation force will suffice than had been supposed necessary, and its task will be much less difficult than the more timid had feared. Moreover, a number of other measures that were justified only as insurance against future German aggression will be superfluous. Future German aggression has been ruled out by the Nazis' suicidal orgies. A few supplemental restrictions will be all that is needed to perpetuate this achievement of theirs—the only one that will outlive them.

The tremendous devastation in Germany will also affect the application of the fundamental economic principle proclaimed by the Allies. The hope of finding in the German ruins a great quantity of goods which the victim countries could use for their reconstruction must be largely written off. When an inventory is taken, it will be seen that the little that is left, if divided among the victims, would not be enough to help any one of them appreciably. There can be no objection to confiscating part of what the Germans will still possess intact—their standard of living does not need to be higher than that of the most unfortunate of their victims. But it will not be possible to squeeze out much. A bankrupt Germany can contribute little to the reconstruction of the liberated countries. Indeed, if the Germans are really going to be allowed to work up to a better life, the amount they can furnish will be still further limited.

The world will have to accustom itself to the idea that morality and economics are at variance in this case just as they are in the case of a defaulter who has spent the money he stole. The man can be locked up and justice thereby served. But that will not bring back the money. Germany can be made to suffer economically—such action would be only just. But if that is done, no large repayments can be obtained.

Existing conditions affect the third, or political, principle even more drastically than the other two. With things as they are, how can one hope to democratize Germany? How much support can a democracy expect if it must first reduce the people's living standard to the lowest level ever reached and then keep it at this level for years? I am inclined to think that a democracy could not get off to a worse start. Inevitably a political system is identified with the conditions prevailing under it. If rules were to be formulated on how to establish a democracy, the first should run: don't try it unless you can foresee that living conditions are going to improve—if ever so slightly.

History will perhaps decide that the Allies made their greatest mistake in Italy when they began to play with the idea of democracy just as conditions were necessarily going from bad to worse. The rudimentary democratic system they set up was utterly powerless to better conditions or to keep them from deteriorating further—and in the eyes of the people it bore the odium of these conditions. It would have been wiser to let the AMG rule quite frankly and to put off democracy until a silver streak showed along the horizon.

In Germany the Allies will be obliged to reduce the standard of living still further and to keep it very low. If they attempt the difficult task of establishing democracy while conditions are at their worst, they will totally discredit democracy.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Tragic Situation

BLACK BOY. By Richard Wright. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

RICHARD WRIGHT'S "Black Boy" is a remarkably fine book. Perhaps a Negro's autobiography must always first appear under the aspect of sociology—a fact that is in itself a sociological comment—and "Black Boy" has its importance as a "document," a precise and no doubt largely typical account of Negro life in Mississippi. That it is the account of a tragic situation goes without saying. Here is the Negro poverty in all its sordidness; here is the calculated spiritual imprisonment of one racial group by another; here, above all, is the personal humiliation of Negro by white, the complex cruelty of the dominant race practiced as a kind of personal, spiritual necessity, sometimes direct and brutal, sometimes sophisticated with a sensual, guilty, horrible kindness.

But if "Black Boy" were no more than a document of misery and oppression, it would not have the distinction which in fact it does have. Our literature is full of autobiographical or reportorial or fictional accounts of misery and oppression. I am sure that these books serve a good purpose; yet I find that I feel a little coolness toward the emotions they generate, for it seems to me that too often they serve the liberal reader as a means of "escape." With honest kinds of "escape" there can be no quarrel—to find a moment's rest in dreams of heroic or erotic fulfilment is as justifiable as sleeping. But the moral "escape" that can be offered by accounts of suffering and injustice is quite another thing. To sit in one's armchair and be harrowed can all too easily pass for a moral or political action. We vicariously suffer in slippers and become virtuous: it is pleasant to exercise moral indignation at small cost; or to fill up emotional vacancy with good strong feeling at a safe distance; or to feel consciously superior to the brutal oppressor; or to be morally entertained by poverty, seeing it as a new and painful kind of primitivism which tenderly fosters virtue, or, if not virtue, then at least "reality"; or to indulge in self-pity by projecting it—very pleasant, very flattering, a little corrupting. Mr. Wright's autobiography, so far as it is an account of misery and oppression, does not tempt its readers to such pleasures. This is the mark of the dignity and integrity of the book.

In other words, the sociological aspect of "Black Boy" is the field—I will not say merely the field—for a notable exercise of the author's moral and intellectual power. It is difficult to describe that power except, as I have tried to do, by speaking of its effect, by remarking that it does not lead us into easy and inexpensive emotions, although the emotions into which it does lead us are durable. If I try further to understand this, I can only surmise that it comes about because the author does not wholly identify himself with his painful experience, does not, therefore, make himself a mere object of the reader's consciousness, does not make himself that different kind of human being, a "sufferer." He is not an object, he is a subject; he is the same kind of person as his reader, as complex, as free.

"Black Boy" is an angry book, as it ought to be—we would be surprised and unhappy if it were not. But the amount of anger that Mr. Wright feels is in proportion not only to the social situation he is dealing with; it is also in proportion to the author's desire to live a reasonable and effective life. For what a Negro suffers in the South—what, indeed, he might suffer in the North—calls for illimitable anger. But the full amount of anger that would be appropriate to the social situation alone would surely have the effect of quite destroying the person who felt it. And Mr. Wright, almost from infancy, seems to have refused to be destroyed. For example, by what, as he describes it, seems to have been a kind of blessed unawareness, even a benign stupidity, he simply could not understand the difference between black people and white. That his grandmother was so white as to be almost white may have had something to do with it. In any case, the young Richard had to be taught the difference, and it seems to have been at best a learned thing. This, to be sure, could scarcely have protected him from all psychic wounds and scars. But although he suffered, he seems never to have been passive. He seems thus to have been saved from the terrible ambivalences of the oppressed, from the self-indulgence, the self-pity, the ripe luxuriousness of sensitivity; and he does not, as the oppressed so often do, give himself or his oppressors a false glamour.

Mr. Wright's autobiography does not go beyond the time when he left the South at the age of nineteen. To me this is a disappointment, for Mr. Wright's life after his departure from the South is a great theme—the entrance of an aspiring and relatively ignorant young man into the full stream of national life is always a subject of the richest social and moral interest, and Mr. Wright's race makes that interest the richer. The chapters which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly under the title "I Tried to Be a Communist" are not included in "Black Boy"; they are not so interesting as they might be, although they have their point, but they suggest the kind of cultural and social experience I should like to see Mr. Wright explore. He has the directness and honesty to do it well. He has the objectivity which comes from refusing to be an object.

It is this objectivity that allows Mr. Wright to believe that oppression has done something more than merely segregate his people. He dares, that is, to take oppression seriously, to believe that it really does oppress, that its tendency is not so much to exempt the oppressed from the moral flaws of the dominant culture from which they are excluded as it is to give them other flaws of feeling and action. He himself suffered from the fierce puritanical religiosity of his own family. He can speak tenderly of the love that his mother gave him, but he can speak with sorrow and bitterness of the emotional bleakness in which he was reared.

After I had outlived the shocks of childhood, after the habit of reflection had been born in me, I used to mull over

WAS YALTA ANOTHER MUNICH?

Chamberlain returned to a rejoicing world with a promise of "peace in our time." We know what happened. Did we repeat that mistake at Yalta? Will history lump our sacrifice of Poland and the Baltic States with the fate of Czecho-Slovakia? What happened to the Atlantic Charter? Was it re-affirmed, saved in part, indecently buried? Did we lay the foundation for a solid, lasting, principled peace, or did we plant the dragon's teeth of another and more terrible war? Was Yalta a compromise? Or was it once more—appeasement? . . . Eugene Lyons answers these questions in his searching, searing "Appeasement in Yalta," in the April MERCURY.

CAN WE LIVE TO BE 135?

That age has actually been attained, and if some have done it, more can do it. Not by stretching old age, but more gratifying, by stretching the years of our prime. What kills us off today as mere children of 40 or 50 or 60? Is it worry, tobacco, alcohol, faulty diet, lack of exercise? What progress is being made in medical research toward this dramatic and attainable extension of life? . . . An eminent medical authority, Dr. Theodore G. Klumpp, tells us in "What We Know About Longevity."

THE AMERICAN MERCURY—for April—OUT NOW

Where did the German planes and robot bombs come from after German industry had been so thoroughly bombed out? How will Franklin Roosevelt appear in the perspective of history? Do you know the terrific infant death toll from suffocation—the principal cause of accidental death of babies? What South American country is a model of democracy? Must a rattlesnake be coiled in order to strike? How permanent are the dreadful disfigurements caused by filariasis—the tropical disease that has caused such havoc among our Pacific forces? . . . These questions are arranged thus in startling juxtaposition to give some idea of the variety and scope of the April issue. There is a rare, exciting stimulus in a magazine that ranges thus among widely differing fields of interest . . . Here's the bill-of-fare. Twelve Years of Roosevelt . . . Living in the Country . . . Washington Discovers Hollywood . . . My Children and the Progressive Schools . . . Germany's Underground Arsenal . . . Show-Window for Democracy . . . Art in a Squirrel Cage . . . The Saga of the Soo Canal . . . Molnar . . . The Tropical Disease, Filariasis . . . The English Character . . . Rattlesnakes: Facts and Fancies . . . Infants' Death by Suffocation . . . Our Gods Are Always Comic . . . and the regular departments . . . Poetry . . . The Library . . . The Check List and the Open Forum.

LISTEN TO
THE
AMERICAN MERCURY
ON THE AIR
WQXR
SUNDAYS 12:45 P. M.

Credit for Courage

THE MERCURY is flattered by the number of letters it receives commending its courage. "No other magazine," runs a typical letter, "would have the courage to publish an article like that." If it takes courage to print unpopular truths, regardless of whose ox is gored, then we suppose we're courageous. But let us give credit where it is really due. It belongs to the thinkers and writers who make THE MERCURY what it is. We can promise them that they will never have to "pull punches" in articles written for THE AMERICAN MERCURY.

Frederic E. Spurr PUBLISHER

the strange absence of real kindness in Negroes, how unstable was our tenderness, how lacking in genuine passion we were, how void of great hope, how timid our joy, how bare our traditions, how hollow our memories, how lacking we were in those intangible sentiments that bind man to man, and how shallow was even our despair. After I had learned other ways of life I used to brood upon the unconscious irony of those who felt that Negroes led so passionate an existence! I saw that what had been taken for our emotional strength was our negative confusions, our flights, our fears, our frenzy under pressure.

Whenever I thought of the essential bleakness of black life in America, I knew that Negroes had never been allowed to catch the full spirit of Western civilization, that they lived somehow in it but not of it. And when I brooded upon the cultural barrenness of black life, I wondered if clean, positive tenderness, love, honor, loyalty, and the capacity to remember were native with man. I asked myself if these human qualities were not fostered, won, struggled and suffered for, preserved in ritual from one generation to another.

I suppose that it is for saying this, or other things of a similar objectivity, that Mr. Wright has, as I have heard, come under the fire of his own people. And that, perhaps, is understandable. But if, like Mr. Wright, we believe that oppression is real, we must sadly praise his courage in seeing that it does not merely affect the body but also the soul. It is only a grim and ironic justice that the deterioration is as great in the oppressor as in the oppressed.

LIONEL TRILLING

BRIEFER COMMENT

Farm Against City

"TWO BILLION ACRE FARM," by Robert West Howard (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50), is a gusty, swift-moving, turbulent story of the growth of America and the struggle of American farmers to conquer a continent and to hold their own against a rising city civilization. It has the sweep as well as the staccato quality of Pare Lorentz's documentary film "The River," and perhaps its greatest value lies in the fact that its author sees America as a physical whole, a two-billion-acre farm, and thus brings a unifying concept to our thinking about agriculture and even perhaps about our political and economic life.

I know of few more fascinating accounts of how our early self-sufficing agriculture succumbed to a driving urban culture and a dominant money economy. Production for cash transformed American agriculture under the impetus of the expanding Industrial Revolution, the growing cities with their demand for food, and the wiles of distributors and middlemen seeking profit. The old securities, the old skills, were lost as farmers were driven into being "sellers in a buyers' market." As the nineteenth century advanced and rural people, once in the majority, became a minority in America, the city sat in the saddle. Engaged in meeting its demands, in building our vast nation, we failed to build a permanent agriculture, with the resulting evils of soil erosion and a growing race of landless tenants. Some men grew rich, but many grew poor, and the usual cleavages of the money economy appeared.

Perhaps what makes Mr. Howard's book most vital is his account of the men who developed this production-for-cash agriculture and its attendant distributive system. Here are stories of Swift and Armour, of Eli Whitney, of Borden, of Pillsbury, and of Luther Burbank. One of the most interesting is about William Saunders, who believed that cooperation was the farmer's salvation and who founded the Grange. Saunders is Mr. Howard's hero, and I think one grasps the author's concept through his feeling for this man.

But I, too, am a farmer, and though I share wholeheartedly Mr. Howard's belief in the farmer's need for cooperation and for becoming less dependent on the city and the money economy, and though I share his feeling about the American Farm Bureau, agree with a good deal of what he says about the Extension Service, and think with him that if democracy is to survive we must have more decentralization, yet I am quite sure more people are concerned about the solving of our rural problem than Mr. Howard admits. There is a bitterness in this book which underrates many of the constructive forces at work, and which somewhat dulls the edge of an otherwise interesting and important story.

P. ALSTON WARING

Ripe for Federation

FELIKS GROSS is a scholar and a fighter. Both capacities are reflected in "Crossroads of Two Continents" (Columbia University Press, $2), which is at once a systematic analysis of the basis for a democratic East Central European federation and a plea for such a development. Reading this book, one wonders why it is that in matters of international relations and government people are so slow to recognize and accept even the most elementary truths and solutions.

The second part of this study, which is the best reference book to be had on its subject, contains many important documents. There is, among other things, the "Declaration of Common Aims of the Independent Mid-European Nations" signed at Philadelphia in 1918 by T. G. Masaryk and eleven other representatives from Middle Europe. The group declared that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," and that "there should be formed a league of nations of the world . . . for genuine and practical cooperation to secure justice and therefore peace among nations." These men in Philadelphia had seen the truth, but millions of others had not, and as a consequence the nations of East Central Europe, together with many others, have gone through the ordeal of the Second World War, have suffered once again the destruction of their cities, tyranny, and oppression.

As the end of this war approaches, men of good-will, who have seen the truth, are struggling again for a better world. The author of this book is one of them. He knows, as many of us do, that there is today an unavoidable need for "a global system of cooperation, of international solidarity." But he believes, and rightly, that in view of the existing differences among the various nations, the first logical step to such an organization is the regional federation. These federations should not be created by diplomatic maneuvering or imposed from above but should be the natural products of an "integral and democratic federalism" after equalization of the social and economic standards and strengthening of the democratic institutions within the various states.

The part of Europe which is today most in need of such a regional organization and in which the idea of a democratic federation is more ripe than anywhere else, is the eastern and central region. The special conditions and the history, nature, and extent of the federal movement in the countries of this area are analyzed in the first part of Mr. Gross's book. The author makes a really valuable contribution to the understanding of the problem and the need for its early solution by the peoples themselves, with the cooperation of the great powers.

BASIL J. VLAVIANOS

Exploring Old New England

"IN NO WAY, PERHAPS, could the visitor who would explore New England do better than to travel the routes of some of the old coaching roads." In this day of gas rationing it will be difficult to follow this advice of George Francis Marlowe, architect, artist, and writer, but it is easy, and extremely pleasant, to read his "Coaching Roads of Old New England; Their Inns and Taverns and Their Stories" (Macmillan, $3.50). Mr. Marlowe follows five of these old routes, discoursing in an informal manner about what remains and what used to be. The many drawings are a delightful addition to an unusual book.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

Contemporary Educational Problems

AMONG THE WELTER OF BOOKS on education that have been streaming from the presses in the last few years V. T. Thayer's "American Education Under Fire" (Harper, $2.50) is one of few which combine topical interest and grasp of philosophic fundamentals. Through a series of related essays it takes the reader directly to the heart of central issues of contemporary educational discussion. It is also well written, free both of deadly pedagogues that converts "students" into "educands" and of brilliant chatter that skirts basic problems without clarifying them. Dr. Thayer, who is educational director of the Ethical Culture schools, is an intelligent and sensitive advocate of progressive education. He defends it in this volume by positive statement and constructive programs as well as by vigorous criticism of alternative doctrines and practices.

Dr. Thayer's volume has the additional merit of showing that "progressive education" is not a label for a narrow set of principles but covers a broad movement within which there is considerable variation. He himself expresses the personalist wing. Although he recognizes the social components in the content and method of education, he never loses sight of the fact that it is the individual person, and his moral and intellectual integrity, that must be the educator's prime concern. In his discussion of whether members of fascist, Communist, and other totalitarian political parties should be allowed to teach in the public schools Dr. Thayer takes a position which is in substantial agreement with the declared policy of the Graduate School of the New School for Social Research: no one can teach honestly who permits

JUST OFF THE PRESS! A NEW EDITION!

THE FLIVVER KING

A Story of Ford-America

BY UPTON SINCLAIR

What is Henry Ford? What have the years done to him? What has his billion dollars made of him?

Here is the man, and the story of his life. Here also are his workers, a family of them over a period of three generations. What has the billion dollars done to them?

A dramatic labor struggle is under way. Here, in story form, are the facts needed to understand events.

The United Automobile Workers of America, the C.I.O. union, is taking an edition of 200,000 copies of this book for its members.

A Detroit lawyer writes: "I lived as a boy one block from the old Ford plant. Henry Ford lived on the same street — a block west of me. I remember the old '99's. I saw the 'buggies' on the streets. I watched the Ford establishment grow. Your book is splendid. I congratulate you upon the job which you have done."

119 large pages, 5 1/2 x 8 1/2 inches in size; 60,000 words.

Price, 50c, prepaid; 10 copies for $2.75; 100, $25. Send orders to:

Box F-22,

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS

Girard, Kansas

The Future of the American Indian

DINNER MEETING

TOWN HALL CLUB, New York City

TUESDAY, APRIL 10, 1945, 7 p.m.

In Honor of

JOHN COLLIER

retired Commissioner of Indian Affairs with WILLIAM BROPHY, the new Commissioner, Undersecretary of the Interior ABE FORTAS, and others.

Assistants:

American Assn. on Indian Affairs, Home Missions Council,

National Congress of American Indians,

American Civil Liberties Union.

TICKETS, $3.00, from American Association on Indian Affairs

48 East 86th Street, New York 28

Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade

invite you to a

DINNER

honoring the fourteenth anniversary of the

REPUBLIC OF SPAIN

HOTEL COMMODORE

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 11, Six Forty-five o'Clock

Reservations may be secured from

Suite 406, 13 Astor Place, New York City 3

AL 4-8587

SPRING BOOK NUMBER

Publishers wishing to run announcements in The Nation's Spring Book Number, to appear on April 21, are urged to inquire immediately as to the availability of space. The advertising quota is almost filled at the time this notice goes to press.

Deadline for space reservation and copy to set is April 9; O.K.'s or complete plates are required by Thursday night, April 12.

Publishers' advertising rate is $200 per page. Current circulation averages 41,000 weekly.

Advertising Department

THE NATION

BA 7-1066

20 Vesey Street

N. Y. C. 7

The Amazing Adventures of
A FIGHTING FOOL ABOUT WOMEN

The very private life of a great lover,
soldier, fighter, hero . . . a man among men with a way . . . and what a way
. . . with women!

G. C. F. presents
"COLONEL BLIMP"
IN TECHNICOLOR

Starring
ANTON WALBROOK • DEBORAH KERR
ROGER LIVESEY

Written, Directed and Produced by
Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger
Released Through United Artists

NOW! Doors Open 8:30 A.M.
Brandt's GOTHAM B'way at
47th St.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE—NOW to April 29th
S. HUROK presents

RUSSIAN BALLET
by the BALLET THEATRE

Featuring
Antony Tudor's New Psychological
Murder Ballet 'Undertow'
Leonide Massine's 'Moonlight Sonata'
Bronislava Nijinska's 'Harvest Time'

Evenings 8:20 (incl. Sum.), $1.20-$4.00. Mat. Sat. & Sun., $1.20 to $3.60
2,000 SEATS $1 to $1.50 (PLUS TAX) AT ALL PERFS.

Paramount Presents

CLAUDETTE COLBERT
FRED MacMURRAY

In

PRACTICALLY
YOURS

A MITCHELL LEISEN Production

NOW
PLAYING

PARAMOUNT

In Person!

BENNY GOODMAN
His Clarinet and his Orchestra

Plus

Condos Bros.

Plus

Bob Evans

With

Jerry O'Leary

TIMES SQUARE

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
& DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 98th Street, Matinee Wed. & Sat.

himself to accept dictated truths in the field of science and scientific opinion. In the present temper of "liberal" thought this is extremely courageous. A questionable note is introduced in his contention that American education has helped to undermine respect for values by emphasizing the neutrality of scientific method toward life's ethical issues. I have never seen any evidence for this quaint notion. Before you can emphasize the neutrality of scientific method, you must at least give it curricular importance. As I read the evidence, science as subject matter is taught widely but the logic of scientific method hardly at all.

SIDNEY HOOK

FICTION IN REVIEW

INASMUCH as I had heard of Rumer Godden's "Take Three Tenses: A Fugue in Time" (Little, Brown, $2) as an experimental novel, I was surprised, on taking it up, to discover that it had appeared in a condensed form in the Ladies' Home Journal. Either, I reasoned, the women's-magazine field was bolder than I thought, or Miss Godden's book had been misrepresented. But by the time I had finished reading it I realized that neither assumption was entirely correct. It seems to me to be perfectly fair to call "Take Three Tenses" experimental: borrowing a method from music, it manages three tenses—three widely separated periods of time, that is—more or less simultaneously; and so far as I know, this is Miss Godden's innovation. The result is one chapter of bewilderment until we are oriented among the generations, and then a simple acceptance of what amounts to little more than a narrative trick. On the other hand, the story Miss Godden tells and her people are women's-magazine stock in trade. Whether Miss Godden is describing the beautiful and spirited Griselda and her unsatisfactory mid-nineteenth-century marriage to the gentleman called the Eye, or the love of Grizel and her flier in the latest generation, whether she is disclosing the tyranny of Griselda's daughter, Selina, or the weakness of Griselda's youngest son, Rolls, or following the ill-starred love of Rolls for his step-sister, Lark, there is scarcely a situation or emotion for which we haven't been prepared—sensitized or anaesthetized, according to our lights—by popular fiction and Hollywood.

Yet this isn't meant to deny all charm to "Take Three Tenses." Almost the contrary. I enjoyed it as I would enjoy an unselected but pleasant movie. For Miss Godden's characters make for only a soothing encounter—at worst they meet their fates with a reassuring British tranquillity; I like stories in which a house is an important member of the cast; and even the war-time servants of "Take Three Tenses" speak encouragingly of permanence and stability. In addition, Miss Godden not only handles her own words nicely but chooses excellent ones to quote—some of T. S. Eliot's, for instance.

And I can't help thinking, as I make the comparison between this novel and an evening at the neighborhood movie, what a pleasant job Hollywood could make of it if it matched Miss Godden's own light gift with a gifted director. Handled improperly, Miss Godden's fugue in time could of course lend itself beautifully to either pretension or confusion. But handled right it could be fun for the camera.

DIANA TRILLING

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

TWENTY years ago the great success of "The Show-off" and "Craig's Wife" made George Kelly famous. Several unsuccessful works followed one after another, and "The Deep Mrs. Sykes" (Booth Theater) is his first play in eight years. Only to the older generation of theatergoers does his name mean much, and many of the morning-after reviews were grudging or worse. Yet I am not, I know, alone either in finding the new piece impressive or in realizing a certain important fact: Mr. Kelly no longer wins easy success because he no longer cares to win success of any kind on terms other than his own. The simple theatricalism which helped make "Craig's Wife" enormously popular has been conspicuously lacking in every play since, and the public has been offered instead the honest, careful, rather bleak dramatic studies of a man bent on anatomizing to the best of his ability human egotism and vulgarity as he sees them exhibited in the characters whom he has selected as his victims. Mr. Kelly's temperament is not, I should imagine, a very rich one. Even his acerbity is dry, and the admirable persons whom he draws to contrast with the egotists and vulgarians upon whom he lavishes his attention are usually stoically disdainful rather than warmly appealing. But his workmanship is fine as well as honest, and the effect of "The Deep Mrs. Sykes"—much the best of all the plays in this his second manner—is to me impressive and absorbing, even though the whole is sober and almost somber.

Several reviewers complained that the story is too slight. It would be, I think, more accurate to say that very little action takes place on the stage or, for that matter, is supposed to occur during the course of the play. What one is offered instead is the gradual unfolding and exploration of a situation which exists when the curtain rises and an analysis of the characters who have created it. In some respects the method is therefore rather more like that of the psychological novel than like that of the conventional play, and in this particular instance it is justified so far as I am concerned by the fact that from the rise to the fall of the curtain I was more completely absorbed than I often am in the contemporary theater.

The scene, though never specified, is apparently a wealthy suburb of Philadelphia; the central character is a cold, complacent woman whose maddening faith in the infallibility of her "feminine intuition" is only a device by which she justifies to herself her habit of assuming the worst about everyone. She "knows" that her husband is the mysterious admirer who has been sending lilacs to a somewhat spectacular neighbor, and she continues to the end to nurse this "knowledge" with a secret, superior smile, even though the unhappy alcoholic wife of the doctor is equally—and just as wrongly—sure that the doctor is the guilty one, even though she has been told who the lover really is. Unlike Craig's Wife she is overtaken by no calamity which punishes her. She ends as she begins; but she pays and always has paid the penalty of being herself, a despicable woman whom her husband goes on despising as he has despised her for twenty years.

Obviously in such a play everything depends upon the dialogue, the acting, and the direction. Mr. Kelly himself is responsible for the last, as well as for the selection of the actors, and he has seen to it that the two women upon whom the attention chiefly rests are superbly played—Mrs. Sykes with quiet, superior self-absorption by Catherine Willard and the more spectacular role of the unhappy alcoholic with a really terrible intensity by Jean Dixon, who has the most obviously big scene of the play when she exposes herself in a drunken tirade, and who makes that scene unforgettably tragic. But it is, above all, in the dialogue—usually written in a low key though curiously and incisively convincing—that Mr. Kelly's skill shows itself most impressively. Perhaps it is too quiet, too far from either the wisecrack or the purple passage, to please most tastes, but two specimen sentences—inaccurately quoted from memory—may serve to illustrate a certain calm deadliness. When the doctor's wife, tipsy as usual, is asked why she is sure the mysterious admirer must be somebody's husband, she replies, irritated at so stupid a question, "Why, it's got to be. There is nothing interesting about two people being lovers unless there is some reason why they shouldn't be." And when, near the end, Mr. Sykes is asked by his son why Mrs. Sykes was so sure the former was the guilty man, he merely says quietly, "What do you suppose a woman's intuition is for?" The author of those lines must, I imagine, find La Rochefoucauld congenial reading.

Mr. Kelly is too much a moralist, even too conventional a moralist, to be a cynic, and I must say that the little sermon preached at the end by Mr. Sykes, who urges his son to stay with the wife he no longer loves even as Mr. Sykes has stayed with his own wife, seems to me to make out a very weak case for the sacredness of a union ick-some to one of the parties, and it is difficult to see who has profited from the preservation of the marriage between the speaker and his despicable mate. But that does not keep the play from being both impressive and absorbing.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

PRACTICALLY YOURS" is an interestingly nasty Colbert-MacMurray comedy about a war hero on leave, a girl who gets the mistaken impression that he loves her, and some of their misadventures with her boss, her white-collar suitor, the newsreels, the radio, bond selling, a commercial photographer, and a war wife played straight. In a roughly typical scene the leads watch what has been done to them on the screen in the darkness of a newsreel theater, the hero cannot keep his disgust to himself, and an inflamed civilian turns and busts him in the jaw. In another they are aboard a rush-hour subway car when, by nightmarish chance, his emergency life-raft inflates. It is one measure of the movie quality of these and many more scenes and bits of business and detail in the picture that—though few of them are done as well as they might be—they are much better on the screen than they can be made to sound in words. Taken as a whole, the picture doesn't amount to much; the same cynicism which is responsible for most of its good points has helped take care that it won't. But lurking in a great many odd corners of the show there is a really remarkable amount and variety of coldly perceptible hatred.

"Without Love" is a satiny translation of a Philip Barry play; I like it all right and have very little to say for or against it. Unlike Mr. Barry, I don't find the expression "by gum" charming on lips which use it for charm's sake, and enjoy even less the heroine's recalling, of her dying husband, that he "grinned that grin of his." But a good deal of the dialogue is happy to hear and happier in its skill; Katherine Hepburn and Spencer Tracy are exactly right for their jobs; it is good to see Lucille Ball doing so well with a kind of role new to her; and I have a hard time braking myself against the idea that Keenan Wynn is the best actor in Hollywood, rather than just a very good one indeed.

I am of that majority opinion about Tallulah Bankhead which will forgive her anything, and likes her so well that that seldom comes into question; but in spite of her randy impersonation of Catherine the Great, I did not much enjoy "A Royal Scandal." Possibly I am too owlish a democrat to be sufficiently thrilled by the thought that queens and the women in the windows are centaurs under the skin; and probably I take too seriously the fact that bawdiness, especially "sophisticated" bawdiness, bores and annoys me beyond mailable description unless it is handled with enough style or energy to absolve it, through heart or magic, of its infantilism. But so far as I know, it's just that nothing was one-tenth well enough done, and that all the laughs are played for at their cheapest, far down the ramp. I suspect that if I saw Ernst Lubitsch's original version of this story, "Forbidden Paradise," again, I might think a good deal of his pantomime just as tiresomely prurient at its roots; but I am almost certain it would stand up even so as a much more delicate and forceful and amusing version. I wish this twenty-year-old show were revived, both for its own sake as I remember it, and because between the two versions I believe you could get a pretty good measure of the difference between talking and silent pictures. I realize, of course, that talking pictures can be better than "A Royal Scandal," and as good as anything silent, and conceivably even better; but in order even to try to be so, they have to know the value of pantomime, and they have to know when to shut up.

Very late in the 20th day after any proper one, I want to add to Manny Farber's, and Orson Welles's, my own respect for the Monogram melodrama "When Strangers Marry." The story has locomotor ataxia at several of its joints, and the intensity of the telling slackens off toward the end; but taking it as a whole I have seldom, for years now, seen one hour so energetically and sensibly used in a film. Bits of it, indeed, gave me a heart-lifted sense of delight in real performance and perception and ambition which I have rarely known in any film context since my own mind, and that of moving-picture making, were both sufficiently young. Thanks to that, I can no longer feel by any means so hopeless as I have, lately, that it is possible to make pictures in Hollywood that are worth making. When I think even no farther than of the people who made this, and of the Val Lewton contingent, and of the various journeymen who put so much venom into "Practically Yours," I know there are enough people out there of real ability to turn the whole place upside down. I doubt they will ever do it, partly because I doubt it could be done without a good deal of gunfire, and that on no parochial scale. But quite a few of them mean business, and some of them are wedging out small ways, at least, of doing it.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

ACADEMICISM shows itself nowhere more nakedly than in painting and sculpture, being much more immediately depressing there than in literature. One brief glance at the recent annual exhibition of the National Academy of Design was enough to fill the visitor with gloom. Van Wyck Brooks's resentment of advanced literature's lack of "affirmation" would find greater justification if it were directed to backward art. These painters of purple and emerald landscapes, of glazed figurines and wax flowers, these niggers, these picklers of nudes and bakers of mud pies plumb depths of negation and pessimism T. S. Eliot or Joyce, much less Picasso, could never remotely reach. But it is in the very nature of academicism to be pessimistic, for it believes history to be a repetitious and monotonous decline from a former golden age. The avant-garde, on the other hand, believes that history is creative, always evolving novelty out of itself. And where there is novelty there is hope.

The hope shining from Piet Mondrian's white canvases with their criss-crossed bands of black has little to do with his platonizing theories except in so far as they express an almost naive faith in the future. Rationalized décor—rectilinear lines and bright, clear colors—means the conviviality and concord of an urban tomorrow stripped of the Gothic brambles and rural particularities that retarded life in the past. Mondrian's pictures are an attempt to create conditions of existence and stabilize life itself. They are not "interesting" the way Titians are; you are supposed to go on with life in their presence. Aside from the fact that he was a pioneer who pushed the implications of modern art to their last consequences, Mondrian was one of the greatest painters of our time. Unfortunately, the memorial show at the Museum of Modern Art (through May 13) includes too few of his works to give a really adequate notion of the scale of his art and the heights it reached in his best periods. (I realize that Mondrian's paintings need lots of empty wall around them, but then the show should have received more gallery space.) It is also unfortunate that the white areas in many of his pictures have by now become discolored or dirty. The artist himself should have foreseen that; and while his art is inseparable from the

"HEAVEN AND HELL"
The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of famed scientist, philosopher, theoclast and statesman. His book on HEAVEN AND HELL, FROM THINGS HEARD AND SEEN, may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents.
EMANUEL SWEDENBORG
SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, INC.
Room 1636, 51 East 42nd St., New York 17

FREE
to All
AUTO
owners

196 PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS

that will help you to get

- better gas mileage
- longer tire life
- better performance
- lower upkeep costs

Get a FREE COPY from any General Motors dealer, or use coupon below.

Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.

Please send FREE COPY of new edition 64-page "Automobile User's Guide"—containing 196 practical suggestions on wartime operation.

Name..... please print
Address..... please print
City..... Zone..... State.....
Make of car..... Year owned.....
year model.....

qualities induced by canvas and oil, he might have done more wisely and equally beautifully had he used tempera on board or gesso panel. Perhaps the fact that he made many changes and over-paintings during execution kept him away from the relative inflexibility of tempera. In any case it suffices that he put together pictures that are completely at rest—solid, unshakable—and at the same time tense and dramatic.

Along with the memorial exhibition a sixty-four-page book containing six of Mondrian's essays on art has appeared, edited by Robert Motherwell and Harry Holtzman (Wittenborn and Company, $2.25). (The assistance of Charmion von Wiegand, who practically put one of the essays into English, is for some reason or other not acknowledged.) Acquaintance with Mondrian's theories may expand one's idea but will hardly deepen one's experience of his work. They are real feats of speculative imagination but seem to have been more a rationalization of his practice than a spur to it. Theories were perhaps felt necessary to justify such revolutionary innovations. But Mondrian committed the unforgivable error of asserting that one mode of art, that of pure, abstract relations, would be absolutely superior to all others in the future.

The late Kandinsky, Mondrian's only true compeer, whose life work is reviewed in a splendid exhibition at the Museum of Non-Objective Painting (through April 15), fell somewhat short of Mondrian in practice but maintained a better concept of what was going on. His chief mistake was to draw too close an analogy between painting and music. And while he did not give "non-objective" art the absolute primacy, he did hold that only through the non-objective could "absolute" works of art be approximated. Like Mondrian he spoke of "liberation"—from the past, from nature—and was optimistic, anticipating a future of inner certainty and the "growing realization of the spiritual." (As far as I can make out, Kandinsky's "spiritual" means simply intensity and seriousness and has no religious connotations.)

Kandinsky was more a landscape painter at heart than anything else. Even before developing his abstract "lyrical" style he seems, according to the evidence, to have proved himself the best of all the Blau Reiter artists in Germany. His parti-colored expressionist landscapes are better than we, who have been brought up on the School of Paris, may rightly realize.

Jackson Pollock's second one-man show at Art of This Century (through April 14) establishes him, in my opinion, as the strongest painter of his generation and perhaps the greatest one to appear since Miró. The only optimism in his smoky, turbulent painting comes from his own manifest faith in the efficacy, for him personally, of art. There has been a certain amount of self-deception in School of Paris art since the exit of cubism. In Pollock there is absolutely none, and he is not afraid to look ugly—all profoundly original art looks ugly at first. Those who find his oils overpowering are advised to approach him through his gouaches, which in trying less to wring every possible ounce of intensity from every square inch of surface achieve greater clarity and are less suffocatingly packed than the oils. Among the latter, however, are two—both called Totem Lessons—for which I cannot find strong enough words of praise. Pollock's single fault is not that he crowds his canvases too evenly but that he sometimes juxtaposes colors and values so abruptly that gaping holes are created.

The ninth annual exhibition of the American Abstract Artists at Riverside Museum (through April 15) suffers from a lack, not of optimism, but of strong personalities. The rules laid down by the epigones of cubism are a little too carefully observed. Some of the animation that comes with surrealism is needed. Three women painters, however, show a good deal of promise: Nell Blaine—whose large white picture struck me as the best in the show—Fannie Hillsmith, and Eleanor de Laitre. There is one colorist present, Giorgio Cavallon, who may come to more than anyone else once he controls his design.

The large European Artists in America show at the Whitney Museum (through April 11) represents international, ipso facto School of Paris, art. All the works were executed in this country except those of a single artist. The mood is one of resigned optimism—everybody is glad to be here and alive—coupled with that kind of liveliness, not necessarily identical with vitality, which skilled performers create in their effort to attract attention. The exhibition abounds in finished performances, but very little in it goes deep. More than half the painters on hand show surrealist or neo-romantic affects—which is another way of being lively. Surprisingly enough, the sculpture section makes a better impression, on the whole, than the painting. Lipchitz's granite Return of the Child deserves to be called that spotlights, in an eye-opening, entertaining manner, dangers menacing democracy in every State.

A DRAMATIC BOOK

$2 at your book store

or order from

THE HELM PRESS

TOPEKA • KANSAS

Alcoholics ARE Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.

Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist

JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL

(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)

Book Dealers' Agent

REMINGTON PUTNAM CO.
Baltimore 1, Md.

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS

2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.

☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound

Name.....

Address.....

great, while Max Ernst shows himself to be an immeasurably better sculptor than painter—there is almost no organic relation between his abstract sculpture and his diabetic, prematurely worm-eaten pictures. Also present are a good Mondrian and a hopeful picture called Unfolding Stratum, by Herbert Bayer. Léger's oils are stronger than they have usually been of late; Léger always knows how to put a picture together, but he repeats his design to the point of stereotype—and his little touches of shading create volumes that are overinflated with respect to every other element.

Dance

B. H.
HAGGIN

OF THE two additional works of Balanchine which the Monte Carlo Russe has presented at New York's City Center "Mozartiana" is a little classic ballet which offers still another example of his fresh and individual use of traditional materials to fill out the traditional suite form, and which delights eye and mind with its orchestration of movement so well contrived for the Mozart-Tchaikovsky music, the lovely Berard set and costumes, the capacities and personalities of the dancers—with a subtly intricate opening solo for Lazovsky, some charmingly gay things for Danilova and Franklin to do at their first appearance, an adagio in grand style for Danilova as the climax, a delicious little cadenza for her in the finale. And Balanchine—who for each of his ballets had made out of the elements of the classic pas de deux something new, wonderful in the way those elements are transformed and linked in a continuous statement with meaning in the context of the ballet—now has used them to create for Danilova a "Pas de Deux" which stands by itself with the effect of a homage to the style and to her art in its execution. The first yearning phrases of a superb piece of Tchaikovsky ballet music bring her in on her points, led by Franklin, with an arm rising slowly above her head to create a regal pose and then to continue in the circlings that make her sustained movement across the stage breath-taking. And one is held spell-bound by the splendors that follow, in which there is maintained, in all the variation of pace and character, a continuity of impetus, movement, and emotion that builds up a single dance statement, grand and impassioned, and achieving in its few minutes an overwhelming intensity and impact.

The Monte Carlo management has celebrated the twenty-fifth year of Balanchine's career as a choreographer; but it might well have celebrated the first year of his association with the company. For in that year he has enriched its repertory with five beautiful works, one of them, "Dances Concertantes," outstanding in its originality and power; and not only in the perfect performances of these works but in the perfected performances of some older ones there is evidence of his work with the dancers, whom he has taught to execute classic movements with the precision, clarity, and grace that make them effective. Balanchine's own "Serenade" is an older piece in which order reveals again the beauty formerly obscured by confusion. Very much older is "Coppelia," which in its freshened state and with Danilova's enchanting performance is a delight. And the treatment is being applied with as good results to modern-style works: in the performance I saw of "Rodeo" everything seemed to have been set once more in right relation to everything else, presumably by Agnes de Mille herself—which made it a very effective and satisfying performance even without Franklin's brilliance in the lead; and Bliss was otherwise very good in the part.

But the job of rehabilitation is not yet completed. The management still offers works like "Red Poppy," "Snow Maiden," "Scheherazade"; it still offers performances like the ones of "Bluebird" and "Le Beau Danube" that I saw. Krassovska is a technically accomplished dancer with great personal sweetness; she is excellent in ingenue parts like the daughter in "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" and was charming in Danilova's role in "Gaité Parisienne"; but she hadn't the sharp, glittering brilliance that "Bluebird" requires and that could have stood up against the high-powered exhibitionism of Danielian. In "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," where his matchstick torso is concealed by the costume and he is restrained by the choreography (or possibly by the choreographer), he is a good dancer. But not in classic parts. And not in "Le Beau Danube."

In a note in the program the Monte Carlo management has declared itself "an organization free from any commercial influences, [viewing] our mission only as a service to the great public." That being so, I should like to point out one service which I think it ought to perform for that public. The audiences at the City Center have appeared to enjoy "Dances Concertantes" and "Mozartiana"; but they also have enjoyed "Red Poppy" and "Scheherazade" and "Frankie and Johnny"; and I think that where it is dealing with an uncritical public which enjoys good and bad equally the Monte Carlo management will best serve that public by giving it only good ballets to enjoy, and in this way cultivating in it a taste for the good which will develop into the good taste that will enable it to discriminate between good and bad on its own. So with performance. The audiences at the City Center have applauded the good performances, but also the bad; they have applauded the "Pas de Deux" of Danilova and Franklin, but also the "Bluebird" of Krassovska and Danielian; and indeed they have on occasion applauded bad more thunderously than good: in a "Pas de Deux Classique" I saw last fall there was Danilova making one movement after another that took one's breath away with its assured, unobtrusively achieved perfection and grace, there was Danielian hurling himself around with ostentatious violence, and there was the audience applauding Danilova moderately now and then after something obviously difficult, but roaring its answer to Danielian's every exhibitionistic appeal for applause, and doing the same thing at their individual curtain calls. And here again I think the management should give its audiences only good performances to enjoy, and in this way cultivate in them the taste and discrimination they now lack. Until it can secure Youskevitch again for classic roles it should impose on Danielian at least the external appearance of Youskevitch's quiet assurance and modesty; it should impose a similar restraint on him in "Le Beau Danube"; and if he cannot be restrained he should be replaced.

CONTRIBUTORS

J. KINGSLEY MARTIN is editor of the London New Statesman and Nation.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR is professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary.

B. SHIVA RAO, Indian correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, is now in New York.

P. ALSTON WARING is a Pennsylvania farmer and co-author of a book on the small farm called "Roots in the Earth."

Letters to the Editors

FORUM ON PEACE-TIME CONSCRIPTION

[The number of letters we have received from readers on the problem of peace-time conscription indicates widespread interest in the subject. We have selected a few for publication here and will follow with more next week.]

Too Cynical

Dear Sirs: Mr. Bolté's article in The Nation for March 21 is entitled Conscription Between Wars. If there is a prize for the most undiplomatic title of the year, Mr. Bolté gets it. But he subjects us to more than the "realistic" cynicism of a title. After justly demolishing the sentimental arguments of many of the proponents of conscription, he submits that it is not the answer to the requirements of a United Nations police force; rather such conscript forces are to be utilized for the purpose of fighting our present allies.

Perhaps conscription itself would not "show the world our lack of faith in international cooperation," but Mr. Bolté's article certainly does, for though he puts the rationale for conscription into the mouths of the "Combined Chiefs of Staff," he adopts that rationale as the basis for his argument.

Conscription is not to be a part of the new collectivism; it is to be an alternative to its failure. It is to provide an army for fighting England or Russia—or both. The commercial aggression, unilateral diplomacy, and economic depression which are to cause such a war are endowed by Mr. Bolté with an inevitability which presupposes World War III. If his article indicates the line of argument which is about to be taken by conscription's liberal advocates, I suggest that they withhold their fire at least until the ratification of a United Nations charter by both ourselves and our allies.

It is hardly diplomatic, even if it be "realistic," to inform your allies and proposed co-workers in the greatest international experiment yet essayed that you are preparing a mighty army for the sole purpose of fighting them. It is even less diplomatic to make such a statement in a manner which indicates skepticism concerning the international experiment and in a tone foreboding failure and inevitable war. Nor is it wise for the very apostles of internationalism to confess such little faith in the world organization of which they must be the champions in the yet far-from-won battle with isolationism.

We have bitterly reproached the last generation which succumbed to the cynical realism of the Lodges and the apostles of normalcy. Yet Mr. Bolté's "realism" is but the precursor of a new ultra-nationalism, militant and chauvinistic. If men of his stamp turn cynic, we shall not need another "little band of wilful men" to set us on the road to the next world war.

LINCOLN LAUTERSTEIN, Vice-Chairman,
American Veterans' Committee
New York, March 24

Too Optimistic

Dear Sirs: Whether or not the army contemplates keeping in peace time the number of regulars, guardsmen, and reserves Dr. Nollen names (your issue of February 24), it has made no such statement. The army and the navy have announced that they believe it will be in the national interest after this war to select each year all fit young men at whatever age from eighteen to twenty-one or twenty-two will least interfere with each individual's education and career, train them, and fit them to take part, if need be, in national defense. The number each year will be about 850,000. They will receive one year's training and will not be liable, as the true conscripts of other nations are, to overseas, garrison, strike, or any other duty save training. They will never be recalled for any other service unless within six years (according to H. R. 515, the May bill) Congress declares a national emergency. Instructors will be largely reservists, not regulars. The peace-time equipment of these 850,000 men, plus 600,000 regulars and guardsmen, if that be the correct figure, would clearly be a relatively small fraction of what our present forces of ten million require in combat.

Dr. Nollen overelaborates what our army and navy authorities propose for our future defense. He oversimplifies the complex problem of assuring that defense by saying that to win safety from attack through international cooperation we must render ourselves defenseless. But surely, to win safety from crime through the courts we would not demobilize the police forces! Dr. Nollen should reconsider his optimistic words. I too was an optimist in 1919, when, as a reporter, I covered the Paris "peace" conference. Surely we were strong then, and the world had learned its lesson—no more wars!

The proposal of peace-time universal military training is not out of harmony with the Dumbarton Oaks scheme, which provides for the use of military power to enforce peace and establishes a military branch of the United Nations. It is an important part of an important project to preserve by realistic measures the peace and security of the United States and of the world.

THOMAS M. JOHNSON
New York, March 3

Arms and the Peace

Dear Sirs: If the Big Three merely return to a camouflaged status quo, with the powers juggling for position for the next war, then I would say that disarmament of Germany and Japan does not mean a thing; in order to have allies in the next conflict either Russia or Britain will see to it, as the latter did last time, that one or both of them are rearmed contrary to all peace treaties.

If we do not use our influence and power now to eliminate this threat, reactionary intrigue in our own government and in the British Foreign Office will maintain such conditions; our peace-time army will not be an army of, by, and for the people but a force that may some day be rather inimical to their true interests. Until world conditions have undergone the test of practical experience I see no hurry to make any decision about our future army. We have a reserve of men trained for this war and an overwhelming navy and air force, and nobody for the next decade or so will be in any position to challenge us to armed combat. I rather feel that we should concentrate all our influence on a peaceful settlement of world affairs and the crushing by our influence of any Nazi-fascist tendency that may show its face anywhere.

HERBERT VAN KAAN
New York, March 21

Crossword Puzzle No. 110

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Second nature
- 6 Cessation (hyphen, 3-2)
- 9 Train
- 10 Machine-gun named after its inventor
- 11 Rob 'em in the old card game
- 12 Pat is given the bird and made an example of
- 16 Letters pronounced through the nose
- 19 They make things run smoothly
- 22 Rightness of changing a cruet diet
- 23 Sam and I in old Thailand
- 24 Man cannot make a worm, yet he creates these by the dozen!
- 25 Alight
- 26 Object of worship
- 27 No fool of a herbalist
- 29 This islet will come back to ye
- 30 Anything but stinking of money, by the sound of it
- 33 Fogg's partner in the Bardell vs. Pickwick case
- 35 Behead these gangways and they still sound the same
- 39 Maroons
- 41 Air raid signal that should put you on it
- 42 Altar (anag.) (two words, 3 and 2)
- 43 A letter from an apostle
- 44 In pigeon English, Greek
- 45 Terns in tears

DOWN

- 1 They hanged him on the gallows prepared for Mordecai
- 2 Cartons
- 3 Solomon built one for Jehovah
- 4 Petition for clothes?

- 5 Horse hair
- 6 Lied on (anag.)
- 7 "Where MacGregor sits, there is the head of the ----"
- 8 Their heavenly lays make us heirs of truth and pure delight
- 13 Here the secondary spelling is also superior
- 14 Three, if disorderly, might cause a riot
- 15 He trusted in God, but kept his powder dry
- 17 In a moat (anag.)
- 18 Short of certain limbs
- 20 Short of certain other limbs
- 21 Badge of the House of Lancaster (two words, 3 and 4)
- 28 A first-class smoker
- 31 Corset it might be a London character
- 32 Nurse
- 33 One of Nature's secrets
- 34 It exists only in the imagination
- 36 Live and — this
- 37 They cover the holes in your socks
- 39 A material and moral wreck
- 40 They may have a screw loose somewhere

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 109

ACROSS:—1 FACETIOUS; 6 LEWES; 9 WEEK-END; 10 SEVERAL; 11 RIO; 12 INCHES; 13 WENT; 15 SEA SCOUT; 16 FISTIC; 18 ONAGER; 20 OPENINGS; 23 EXES; 24 MARIAN; 25 PUG; 28 EXTRACT; 29 IN-TRUST; 30 SERGE; 31 DOTTERELS.

DOWN:—1 FEWER; 2 CREMONA; 3 THE BIRCHES; 4 OLD SCOUT; 5 SISTER; 6 LOVE; 7 WARMEST; 8 SOLSTICES; 14 MIGNONETTE; 15 SMOKELESS; 17 OPTIMIST; 19 ABETTER; 21 NEPTUNE; 22 WANTED; 26 GATES; 27 PATE.

A Citizens' Army?

Dear Sirs: Irving Lipkowitz bases his argument for a citizens' army (March 3) on assumptions which he does not prove. He assumes that either a citizen or a professional army is a post-war necessity in this country. He indicates that "the citizen army is a better bulwark against fascism and militarism than just 'no conscription'"; that such a training program will prevent the growth of a powerful professional military group; that the reservist citizen will be more eager to avoid another war and better prepared to do so; that those who oppose a conscript citizen army without plans for a volunteer army are in fact advocates of a professional army.

I can't take all this on faith as Mr. Lipkowitz asks me to. And isn't the phrase "citizens' army" a beautiful euphemism to avoid the unpleasant connotations of compulsory labor? More important, however, the central question remains untouched: Is a peace-time conscript army a military need?

VINCENT H. WHITNEY

Middletown, Conn., March 6

Conscription vs. Peace

Dear Sirs: Most of Dr. Nollen's argument was sound, but it failed to mention that in a very few years expenditures for a proposed "citizen army" would equal or exceed all other normal costs of the federal government. On his return from Yalta the President said that he looked for the lightning in some measure of the burden of armaments. Will it be effected by adding billions to the budget for conscription? Mr. Lipkowitz implies that "fully implemented enforcement machinery" to keep a "durable peace" means conscription; common sense tells me that the bigger the trained armies the more unmanageable the enforcement machinery will become, and the less likely to be successful.

"Our congenital distaste for military matters must be disciplined," says Mr. Lipkowitz. What nonsense! Must we be taught to seek out and enjoy bubonic plague? In order to have an international machinery to maintain peace, there is no more need to make everyone a soldier than there is to teach everyone the use of a night stick in order to maintain a municipal police force. The argument for peace-time conscription involves a determination to smash our hatred of war and things military and is an insidious threat to future world peace.

ASA M. HUGHES

Landsdale, Pa., March 3

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • APRIL 14, 1945

NUMBER 15

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

401

EDITORIALS

- Peace Weather: Barometer Rising
- The Georgia Rate Case
- Franco's Fixer

403
404
405

ARTICLES

- No Shortage of Hogs by I. F. Stone
- The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté
- 10 Years Ago in The Nation
- England and the Pacific War by Joe Fromm
- Fair Employment State by State by Will Maslow
- Italy's Children by Gene Rea
- Pan-Arabia Deserta by Hal Lehrman
- In the Wind

406
407
408
409
410
412
413
414

POLITICAL WAR

- Censors in the Saddle by Eric Sevareid
- The Argentines Speak Up
- Russian Realism

415
417
417

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall
- Writers of Brazil by William Berrien
- Briefer Comment
- Verse Chronicle by F. W. Dupee
- Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling
- Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch
- Films by James Agee
- Music by B. H. Haggin

418
419
419
421
422
424
425
426

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

427

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 111 by Jack Barrett

428

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Association, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

ONE OF THE MOST DANGEROUS MISTAKES THAT could possibly be made would be to expect a policy of moderation from the new Japanese government. It is headed, to be sure, by a man known as a "moderate" but the composition of the Cabinet as a whole shows that it has been built to meet a desperate emergency and to meet it with as much strength as the nation can muster. Russia's denunciation of the neutrality agreement, Japan's multiplying defeats on land and sea—culminating in the destruction of the great battleship Yamato—and the imminence of German collapse clearly necessitated a government of national unity including representatives of the army and navy, Elder Statesmen, big business, and members of the Imperial court. Even the sacred person of the Emperor is being employed more directly than ever before to rally the courage of the nation for a final effort to stave off total defeat. This does not mean that the "moderate" Suzuki may not try to find ways to appeal to the war weariness among the Allies that will follow the end of the struggle in Europe; peace moves will undoubtedly be made, as they have periodically been made by Hitler. And the presence in the government of industrialists and other "solid elements" with whom America found it possible to do business up to the moment of Pearl Harbor will be used as bait. But Americans have learned their lesson on many a green Pacific island, and they are not likely to be taken in by Japanese imperialists dressed up in business clothes.

✱

THE RESIGNATION OF PIERRE MENDES-FRANCE AS Minister of National Economy in France means a rightward shift for De Gaulle's government. For some time the conflict between the nationalization plans urged by Mendès-France and the conservative economic policies of René Pleven, Minister of Finance, has been the major issue in French politics. The Socialists have led the progressive fight. The Communists have tended to support De Gaulle's cautious moderation. But the French civilians after years of struggle and suffering within and alongside the Resistance have shown no signs of abandoning their hope for a new order, no inclination to go along with the right. So strong, in fact, has been the ground swell of popular protest that the Communists have recently reconsidered their line and joined with the Socialists in publishing a detailed program for the immediate nationalization of key industries and large banks—a direct challenge of Pleven's fiscal policies. The program provides for the security of small businesses. It proposes to compensate shareholders by paying them the average yield on their former shares during their lifetime and while their children are minors. Only the property of traitors will be confiscated. Mendès-France's statement, issued when he left the Ministry, was similarly strong and precise. It shows that the left opposition, while not wanting yet to create difficulties for De Gaulle, is rapidly crystallizing its attitude and its forces. Mendès-France himself may well emerge as one of its leaders; his stature has increased as a result of his firm stand and his impressive warning.

✱

OUR RECOGNITION OF ARGENTINA PLACES THE Farrell-Perón government in an excellent position to insist on its inclusion in the San Francisco conference. But if the State Department appeasers have not entirely lost their sense of reality they will understand that the presence of the leading South American fascist state at San Francisco would not only strike a moral blow against the prospects of a strong peace organization, but that it might become the immediate cause of basic differences among the major Allies. Russia does not want Argentina represented, rightly fearing that it would initiate a series of devious intrigues to include Franco's participation as well. Most of the delegations do not look forward to sitting down with representatives of either the present fascist Argentine or Spanish regimes. Those who are serious in wishing to create an organization for world peace should not be forced to suffer the indignity of working with the Buenos Aires administration, whose goal, as that of every fascist state, is and must be—war.

✱

'ADMIRAL KING'S PLEA THAT WE MAINTAIN A large post-war navy and keep the Pacific bases as a protection against aggression raises a number of interesting questions which he seems to have neglected to answer. In asking that we keep our Pacific bases, was he advocating abrogation of our pledge to free the Philippines in 1946? Was he suggesting that we take New Georgia and New Britain from Australia, Guadalcanal and the Gilbert Islands from Great Britain, and Dutch New Guinea from the Netherlands? Or was he referring merely to the islands seized from Japan? Did he mean to propose that every island be made into a fortress capable of resisting enemy attack, or that we merely add a few additional bases to those we had before the war? And against what enemy are these bases supposed to protect us? Are we going to permit Japan sufficient industrial power to rebuild its navy? Do we fear the Russian or Chinese navy? Or does Admiral King anticipate revival of British imperialism? And finally, how are we to reconcile this vast expansion of American sea power with the principles of collective security underlying the Dumbarton Oaks plan? Won't it look to other countries as if we were trying to carry water on both shoulders?

✱

THE SECOND ANNUAL HOLD-THE-LINE REPORT to the President wisely stresses the necessity of maintaining price and wage controls for some time after the war, lest we repeat the disastrous "boom-and-bust" period which followed immediately after World War I. The stabilization agencies, as their heads point out, must fight a war on two fronts: against "a runaway price rise" after VE-Day and also against "the deflationary tendencies which may appear in the transition period." But it will be impossible to maintain a stabilized economy unless a better job is done by the four signers of the report, by Chester Bowles as Administrator of OPA, by Marvin Jones as head of the War Food Administration, by William H. Davis as Director of the Office of Economic Stabilization, and by George W. Taylor as chairman of the National War Labor Board. Our Washington letter this week throws some light on what is happening in the field of price control, and a continuance of these methods will make it hard to hold the country in line. Laggard handling of labor appeals, unwillingness to eliminate substandard wages, discriminatory action against small and marginal producers in agriculture and industry, flabbiness in forcing the textile industry to turn out more low-price clothing, elimination of regulatory officials unsatisfactory to private lobbies—these must be corrected or ended if the line is to be held. A little less complacency about over-all index figures and a little more self-criticism regarding the weak spots in the program would also be helpful.

✱

AFTER THE WAR, NEARLY 1,000,000 NEGRO veterans, of whom 750,000 are from the South, will be eligible for loans and other benefits under the G. I. Bill of Rights. If properly administered, that is, if fairly administered, the G. I. Bill of Rights can go a long way toward correcting the injustice and discrimination which Negro soldiers have too frequently experienced in the army. While it is perhaps too late to abolish segregation in the services, it is not too late to see that the Negro veteran gets his full rights under this legislation. These rights are of such substantial character that they can radically transform the status of 1,000,000 Negroes and their dependents: they entitle veterans to vocational and other educational opportunities, to decent homes, to loans for farms (70 per cent of the 750,000 Negroes from the South now in the army are from farming areas), and to other benefits. It is to be hoped, therefore, that Brigadier General Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veteran Affairs and of Retraining and Reemployment, meant what he said when he assured the National Urban League recently that he would enforce a policy of "four freedoms" for Negro war veterans—"freedom from discrimination in the administration of the law, freedom from inequality in education, freedom from inequality in expenditures for health, hospitalization, and rehabilitation, and freedom from obstacles and prejudices which prevent equal work opportunity and equal pay." If such a policy is to be enforced, a large measure of centralized control must be established. For if control of administration is vested in local officials, these "four freedoms" are likely to become as insubstantial as a mouthful of air.

✱

COOPS NOT FIT FOR CHICKENS WERE ONCE considered adequate for sharecroppers—and may be again unless the liquidation of Farm Security Administration projects ordered by Congress is immediately stopped. Five hundred farm-labor families in southeastern Missouri face eviction from the FSA Delmo Homes project, which is to be sold at auction. Tenants earn an average of $2.50 a day and obviously cannot afford to buy their homes, which will probably go at bargain prices—to the planters. If that happens, the farm laborers will be forced back to the share-cropper serfdom which the federal housing program helped them escape. Decent housing has given them increased bargaining power and a measure of independence from the planters, which they are determined to keep. As one tenant said, "The landlord used to dig us out and make us work for 75 cents a day—or get out. I lived in a pigsty and was kicked around. They bounced us out in '39. I'm never agoin' back. I'd go East, North, West, but never back to the shacks." That is the feeling of all the tenants; they were among the 1,500 share-cropper families who were thrown out of their plantation shacks six years ago when the planters decided to save money by hiring day laborers. Under the leadership of the Southern Tenant Farmers' Union, the workers moved to the roads and staged a highway demonstration that aroused nation-wide support. As the result of a housing investigation, the FSA built 580 homes in this section at an approximate cost of $1,000 each; the houses rent for $6.50 a month. The planters have long hated the FSA communities and through the Farm Bureau and Representative Orville Zimmerman they finally persuaded Congress to pass a bill directing their liquidation. A tenants' delegation has just persuaded Senator Briggs of Missouri to sponsor an amendment to the 1946 Agricultural Appropriation Bill directing the FSA to sell homes to individual workers' families. Congressman Cannon says he will back the amendment, and FSA officials have agreed to delay liquidation proceedings pending Congress's decision. The effort to pass the amendment should be supported by liberals; unless it succeeds, rural federal-aided housing will prove to have been designed ultimately for the profit of private investors and landlords. Surely this was not the purpose for which the FSA, the USHA, and the present public war-housing agency were created.

✱

THE READER'S DIGEST, WHICH LIKES TO CALL itself non-partisan, has briefed, in its April issue, Friedrich A. Hayek's "The Road to Serfdom," which is described as "one of the most important books of our generation." A helpful note informs us that "newsstand supplies of the Reader's Digest are soon exhausted, but through the courtesy of the Book of the Month Club reprints have been made available"; and the second item in the Digest, a chaser, so to speak, for Hayek, is a condensation of an article by Ralph Robey in Newsweek. Its title is What Is Being Planned for You. It is introduced by the alarming question: "What becomes of the enterprise which has created a great nation when this program gets going?" And whereas Hayek's contribution is a mild-mannered polemic against planning in general, Robey's is a wild-eyed attack on what he calls the "ultimate program" of the Administration. There is one flaw in this beautifully synchronized attack on planning. The "ultimate program" may well appeal to the reader more than Hayek's polemic or Robey's rage. And that would be a good joke on Hayek, Robey, the Reader's Digest, and the Book of the Month Club. What we are now watching for is an announcement by the Digest that this non-partisan organ will print a condensation of a book which states the case for planning, say, "Full Employment in a Free Society," by William J. Beveridge—also considered "one of the most important books of our generation."

Peace Weather: Barometer Rising

THIS past week has provided the American people with a useful lesson in political dynamics. It began in an atmosphere of suspicion and gloom. Moscow's demand that the Warsaw government be given a seat at San Francisco, turned down in London and Washington; Moscow's demand for three seats in the future United Nations Assembly, acceded to by Churchill and Roosevelt at Yalta and then kept secret until it leaked into the press—these events set off a general barrage of criticism and pessimistic prediction. Goebbels himself could not have invented more ugly rumors of inter-Allied dissension than appeared in the Allied press. The postponement of the San Francisco conference was widely expected. It was strongly advocated by such diverse writers as Walter Lippmann and the editor of the Yorkshire Post. The left press in England went to even greater extremes of gloom. The London Tribune, for example, predicting failure at San Francisco, said grimly, "The shadow of the next war looms up even before the thunder of the present one has died away. Surely mankind has never faced a more terrible prospect."

But all this was last week. This week things have changed—at least in this country. Nobody now suggests putting off the conference. A general tone of optimism pervades the press. What has happened? Moscow still claims three votes in the Assembly, as far as anybody knows, and the Warsaw government is not reorganized. Not a single problem has been solved nor an impasse broken. But Russia has denounced its neutrality pact with Japan—and the sky has cleared. Already the prospect of agreement among the Big Three seems brighter: Stalin is a pretty good fellow again, and Russia a desirable ally instead of a looming menace. For the ordinary American finds it almost impossible to worry about the extent of Moscow's influence in Poland or the number of Russian votes in the Assembly when he suddenly sees a chance that the Pacific war may be ended many months sooner than appeared possible a week ago. The probability that Russia will help lick Japan is worth a dozen minor concessions in Europe to the man in the street and to his favorite newspaper: it is significant that even the rabid anti-Russian press has welcomed the Moscow decision without serious qualifications. Indeed, the New York Daily News goes so far as to offer Stalin Manchuria "and other parts of China, too," as long as he comes in and helps himself!

It is obvious, of course, that the almost excessive good cheer created by Russia's brilliantly timed announcement will not last indefinitely unless it is sustained by concrete accomplishments. But optimism and good-will are effective political agents and can do much to dispel differences that multiply in an atmosphere of suspicion. Today the San Francisco conference stands a far better chance of success than it did last week. And even the problems of Poland and the distribution of votes seem more likely to be settled. Last Friday Secretary Stettinius told a New York audience that he had reason to hope the job of reorganizing the Warsaw government would be finished in time to permit a Polish delegation to come to San Francisco. The almost incredible announcement by the Polish London government that the top men in their "shadow" government in Poland had "vanished" after going to keep an appointment with a high Soviet officer near Warsaw, revealed for the first time that talks were going on between the Russians and underground Polish leaders. Out of these talks may emerge the agreement Mr. Stettinius hinted at. Or it may be reached in Moscow by the committee appointed at Yalta. In any case, hope of a settlement has replaced the suspicion that greeted Russia's earlier demand for representation of the Warsaw government.

Even the Assembly vote jam may be broken. When the President announced the other day that the United States had decided not to ask for three votes to match Russia's, a rumor was circulated in the press to the effect that Russia might also voluntarily forswear the extra votes it had been promised. No substantiation appeared to exist; but the mere fact that this country had made a gesture of self-denial tended to create a better prospect.

Atmosphere is an intangible element in political affairs, but a potent one. Between Russia and the Western world a chronic atmosphere of distrust, dating back all the way to the October revolution, has been more responsible than any actual clash of interests for the misunderstandings that periodically rise up to threaten the Great Alliance. Many of Moscow's most arbitrary acts have stemmed directly from this distrust. It accounts too for the readiness in this country to expect the worst whenever a difference of opinion with Russia develops. It is a factor that can never for a moment be ignored in judging political relations with the Soviet Union. Good diplomacy implies a most intense effort on both sides to dispel this atmosphere for good. Moscow's decision to end its pact with Japan, announced at exactly the right moment, was a diplomatic move of incalculable value; it is up to everybody who understands the need of continued close relations with Russia to prevent its effect from evaporating in the critical days ahead of us.

The Georgia Rate Case

THE decision of the United States Supreme Court agreeing to hear the Georgia railway case is of major importance. The background of the suit brought by Governor Ellis Arnall of Georgia is fairly well known. The industrialization of the South and West has been stunted by a freight-rate structure which discriminates against those sections in favor of the North. From an economic point of view, the South and the West are "colonial" areas: that is, they are primarily the source of raw materials for the industrial North, which in turn supplies them with manufactured goods. Freight rates act as a kind of tariff in reverse to preserve this relationship. A brilliant report prepared by J. H. Alldredge for the Tennessee Valley Authority in 1937 showed that the nearer a product comes to the final stage of production the greater is the discrimination in rates against the Southern manufacturer. "For example," William H. Joubert told the Florida Academy of Sciences last year, "rates on raw cotton from the South to the North are the same, mile for mile. . . . On bleached cotton fabrics the South-to-North rate is 11 per cent higher than the rate wholly within Northern territory; and on oil cloth, a more highly processed cotton product, the disparity is 54 per cent."

This is more than a sectional issue. The establishment of a less unfair rate structure is of importance to the North as well as the South. The problem is not to take industries from the North and shift them to the South and West; that is the narrow, the shortsighted, the mercantilist view. The real problem is that, without industrialization, the buying power and living standards of millions in the South and West will continue to be too low for a full-employment economy. This was touched upon in Wallace's famous railroad speech at Dallas, and it is this which gives national significance to Governor Arnall's suit against the railroads serving Georgia. The Georgian's political boldness, his able argument before the Supreme Court, and the favorable decision he has won have given him new prominence in Washington, where he is already spoken of as a progressive Southern candidate for the Democratic nomination in 1948.

The Supreme Court split five to four in the Georgia decision; it is amusing to note that the split happened to be geographical. The five justices holding for Georgia were from the West and South (if Murphy of Michigan is included). The four dissenters were all Northern judges. The real issue, as so often happens in high-court cases, was touched on only inferentially. It is that the Interstate Commerce Commission has outlived its usefulness. Rates are made by the railroads themselves through the kind of rate-making bureaus long ago held to be in violation of the anti-trust laws. Review of these rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission may be obtained, but only by a process of lengthy and costly litigation. The ICC itself has undergone an evolution typical of administrative agencies; the forces to be regulated have gotten control of the agency set up to regulate them. The ICC is today more a boon to the railroads than a safeguard for shippers.

The question before the court was whether the state of Georgia could by-pass the ICC and appeal directly to the Supreme Court for relief under those clauses of the Constitution which give the court original jurisdiction over certain types of cases to which a state is a party. Justice Douglas, supported by Justices Black, Reed, Murphy, and Rutledge, said Georgia could do so. The Chief Justice, speaking for himself and Justices Roberts, Frankfurter, and Jackson, said it could not. In strict terms of precedent, the minority had the better of the legal argument. The suit is a very odd specimen from a conventional legal point of view, and the original complaint itself was somewhat blundering and naive. There are impressive reasons for fearing judicial interference with administrative agencies, and the "correct" remedy is certainly through the ICC and by anti-trust action. A case against the rate-making activities of the Western railroads was filed by the Department of Justice last summer in Nebraska. But it seems to us there are both adequate legal rationalizations and weighty considerations of constitutional statesmanship in the majority's favor. The younger members of the court do not intend to be stultified by strict legal decorum, and Georgia will be heard.

Franco's Fixer

WE ARE not honored, but deeply interested, to introduce to Nation readers Señor Manuel Aznar, the new Spanish minister to Washington. Franco has chosen him as the man best fitted to fool the Americans. A brief glance at Aznar's career will show that the choice is a perfect one. The only other man in Spain who might compete with him for such a delicate assignment is his own chief, Lequerica. But even though the Franco regime considers Washington the most important of diplomatic posts, it could not be expected that the Foreign Minister would leave Madrid now when he may momentarily be expecting the visit of his colleague Herr von Ribbentrop, disguised as an officer of the Luftwaffe, A. W. O. L.

Manuel Aznar was born in Echalar, Navarre, fifty-three years ago; he received his education at Duesto, the famous Jesuit college in the Basque country. Under the monarchy Duesto was the training school for some of the shrewdest politicians of the Spanish extreme right. From the thousands of sons of aristocratic and middle-class families who went to Duesto the Jesuits selected the cleverest, married them off to rich heiresses if they lacked money, helped to establish them as successful lawyers, and distributed them in the Parliament and Cabinet.

Though intelligent and audacious enough, young Aznar evidently struck his teachers as too unreliable to become one of the Duesto's protégés. He had, therefore, to rely upon his own resources. After he left college, he went off to Bilbao to make his way as a journalist. His first job was on the newspaper Euzkadi, a nationalist Basque daily, where he made such rapid progress that he soon became its editor. But the ambitious Aznar could not remain content for long in this provincial town, and when Madrid offered him an opportunity to practice journalism on a first-class, national scale, he jumped at it. Once in Madrid he promptly turned against his Basque friends and attacked the very policies he had so warmly advocated in Euzkadi.

He moved to El Sol, a new Madrid paper which made its first appearance in the last years of World War I. El Sol was a revolutionary departure in Spanish journalism, for it introduced a startling modern tone and gathered around it some of the most brilliant writers of Spanish intellectual circles. We are certain that in Washington Aznar will boast of having been a leading force in El Sol's campaigns in favor of the Allies, of the League of Nations, and of a democratic Spain.

Aznar was determined to become chief editor of El Sol, and even in these early days he revealed an indisputable talent for intrigue and double-crossing. He practiced the art of flattery in its subtlest and most insidious forms. He agreed with those who could be useful to him; he knifed his rivals with skill and unconcern. Undoubtedly Aznar has documented himself thoroughly on the foibles and interests of every influential man in the American capital. If he gets a chance he will surely discuss recent Spanish poetry with Archibald MacLeish and Latin America with Nelson Rockefeller, and he has probably tucked away in his diplomatic pouch some rare old Spanish stamps for President Roosevelt's collection.

His intrigues in Madrid were bound to make him thoroughly unpopular, and when one of his business ventures, a printing concern, went bankrupt, he found it advisable to leave for Cuba. There he became involved with a very strange woman, the Duchess of Alcala, and his liaison received so much publicity that he was forced to leave Cuba with her and establish himself in Mexico. But after a suitable lapse of time he returned to Havana in the hope that his facile pen might be useful to Machado. He placed himself unconditionally at the service of the Cuban dictator, from whom he received ample remuneration.

The Franco rebellion caught him in Madrid. Obviously the Spanish capital was not the safest place for a man who had betrayed all his liberal friends and had long since lost the respect of those who were organizing the defense of the capital. But in those days the Giral government was too deeply involved in the immediate task of limiting the area of the rebellion to exercise very close control over minor government appointments. Taking advantage of this situation, Aznar succeeded in selling the local Madrid authorities, who were not very well informed about world affairs, the idea that his international connections made him the ideal negotiator to smooth out differences created by the war between the Spanish government and certain foreign concerns with financial interests in Spain. He got the job and obtained his papers to leave Loyalist territory for France. But instead of returning with the reply of the foreign companies he dallied in France to see how things would shape up. When the big rebel drive against Madrid started and the Republic appeared doomed, Aznar started for Spain. But on the way he made a "mistake" in his route, and instead of returning to Madrid to help in the defense of the capital he landed in Burgos! Franco immediately clapped him in jail, but a short time later the rebel leader decided that, with most of the best Spanish writers on the side of the Republic, he could well utilize the flexible talents of Manuel Aznar. Aznar promptly became Franco's leading propagandist and is today the one truly able journalist of the fascist regime. He has written innumerable articles for Arriba and Alcázar, both Falangist papers, several of which have received the dubious honor of being reprinted in the German press.

Aznar was of course one of the first men in the Franco camp to perceive that Germany was losing this war, and at once he started a subtle campaign to win American support. That his activities have borne some fruit is indicated by the fact that Karl von Weigand of the Hearst press recently described him in glowing terms as "a great admirer of America."

In the interest of democratic self-preservation alone the United States should have barred the entry, under diplomatic cover, of this notorious Falangist agent; in the complicated social milieu of Washington a man of his daring and suppleness can, to say the least, play a disturbing role. Now that Aznar's arrival is imminent, we can only hope that the day may not be far off when a change of policy toward Spain will relieve the American people of the presence of such "friends" of the United States.

No Shortage of Hogs

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 6

WHATEVER the truth about the meat situation, this country suffers from no shortage of hogs, especially in the food and textile industries. Relief for liberated Europe, as I indicated in last week's letter, is not held up by the UNRRA's minor political troubles but by the difficulty of mobilizing these industries to feed and clothe our allies. Food and textiles escaped effective mobilization for war and essential civilian needs. It is unlikely that after V-E Day they can be mobilized effectively for relief to Europe. But whatever little we can do will help. Something can be accomplished if labor unions and other progressive organizations bring the essential facts to public notice and press Congress, the War Production Board, the War Food Administration, and the Office of Price Administration to act.

So far the WPB, the WFA, and the OPA have failed to provide even the home market during the war with adequate food and clothing at a fair price. All three are dominated by business men from the industries they are supposed to control. It would be untrue and unfair to enter a blanket indictment of all of them; many have shown considerable public spirit and willingness to rise above business considerations and personal interest. But the best of them have been much too weak in dealing with their old friends and associates. "They rape awful easy." Nor would it be true to say that there are not genuine grievances in these industries, and perhaps some few producers who cannot make both ends meet. But behind most of the squeals with which food and textile representatives have recently filled the halls of Congress is mere porcine resentment because somebody else is getting a little more swill.

I have before me as I write a release from the American Wool Council. The council objects to M-388, a belated and inadequate WPB order designed—ever so gently—to force the textile industry to produce a little more low-cost clothing. The council says M-388 is not an emergency measure at all but a "warmed-over" plan rejected in 1943. The council helpfully reveals for the first time that Richard N. Johnson, chief of the consumer-goods division of the WPB, prepared a plan in 1943 to ease the shortage of low-cost clothing. The plan was of course rejected. It would have cut into profits by channeling mill output into lower-cost fabrics and end-products into lower-price items. The Wool Council is exposing itself, not M-388. For if the textile crowd hadn't objected to the kind of supervision envisaged in the Johnson plan, the present emergency would not have arisen. The fact is that present textile problems were foreseen by Robert R. Guthrie of the WPB shortly after Pearl Harbor. Guthrie was then in charge of textiles, and he was fired by Donald M. Nelson for his courage. Some of the very dollar-a-year men to whom Guthrie boldly objected; though himself a business man, are still in the textile division, some fumbling, some sabotaging, the public interest.

The hearings before the reactionary Smith committee on food and textiles have been unintentionally illuminating. One bit of testimony graphically indicates the attitude of mind with which we have to deal. One textile manufacturer who makes quality fabrics was asked whether it was not true that "physically the looms in the plant could be used for the manufacture of low-priced clothing." "A loom," he answered, "whether it is in our mill or in anyone else's mill, will still weave cloth, but the structure of a business must be taken into consideration." It is the "structure" of the business rather than of human beings that is the first consideration. In the depression of the early '30's these manufacturers found it possible to turn out lower-price, lower-quality goods. They do not want to give up their lush war-time market for higher-price garments. Just how lush that market is may be seen from the fact that last year's textile earnings before taxes ran close to $400,000,000, as compared to an annual average of $28,000,000 from 1936 to 1939.

In addition to their abnormal war profits, both food and textiles last year enjoyed special "windfall" profits. Under the Bankhead amendment to protect "parity" prices on cotton, and under some very queer accounting methods, the mills last year averaged a profit of about three cents a pound on the cotton they used; in other words, they were allowed parity prices on cotton but bought it for three cents a pound less. The net windfall from this source, after all adjustments, is estimated at $60,000,000 during 1944. The profits of the meat packers last year were seven times as great as their annual average profits from 1936 to 1939. Of their $162,000,000 in profits last year, a large portion is due to a "windfall" like that in cotton. They were given a rollback subsidy on the basis of a price of $15 a hundred for hogs, but the actual market price averaged about $12.50. During the current clamor, because of seasonal tightness in the livestock market, they have been granted additional increases: a subsidy of an extra $1 per hundred pounds on beef, elimination of the discount of 75 cents a hundred pounds formerly granted the army on carload-lot purchases of pork products. The new increases will guarantee profits of about $150,000,000 a year even if the price of livestock remains at current levels. While the big packers were getting these increases, the small, non-processing slaughterers were cut back by the OPA. These independents had been given an 80-cents-a-hundred differential on beef; this was cut to 30 cents.

The top executives of the OPA seem to be engaged in a terrific battle to hold down the cost of living, but these recent increases and current undercover compromises on the textile pricing program lead one to suspect that the hand is quicker than the eye. The new meat increases were made without submitting them to lower-level officials in operating divisions and without any real cost reports from the packers. I suspect that this is not unconnected with the resignation of one of the ablest and most devoted public servants the New Deal brought to Washington—Richard Gilbert, chief economic adviser to the OPA. Gilbert, who formerly taught economics at Harvard and the Fletcher School, has been a key official in price regulation since the Defense Commission was established in May, 1940. He was the target of attack by William P. Jacobs, capital lobbyist for textile interests, and his resignation was requested by OPA Administrator Chester Bowles. Another able and hard-working New Dealer, Thomas I. Emerson, who was deputy administrator for enforcement, recently resigned in disgust and went to the Office of Economic Stabilization. These resignations are indicative.

"What actually is going on among textile manufacturers," James B. Carey of the C. I. O. told the Senate Banking and Currency Committee last year, "is exactly equivalent to a strike which, if engaged in by labor, would be loudly and properly condemned during war time. These manufacturers cut their output of the low-cost, less profitable items, demand higher price ceilings, finally get the higher ceilings, and still refuse to produce what is needed." It will take a lot of public pressure to hold them back from all-out production of higher-cost items after V-E Day. The situation in food is more serious and more sinister. As recently as last December War Food Administrator Marvin Jones told the White House there was no need for rationing. Jones did resist pressure to cut food-production goals for this year as sharply as the farm-and-food bloc wanted, but the consumer-conscious and well-informed C. I. O. Automobile Worker charges that much of the present food stringency "was planned by the War Food's production plans of two years ago." As I indicated last week, the big food interests want to end the war with bare shelves—and high prices.

Donald Montgomery, formerly of the Department of Agriculture, now the driving force of the C. I. O. Cost of Living Committee, last week sent a letter to Senator Elmer Thomas and Congressman Clinton Anderson, challenging Congress to investigate War Food Administration policy. Montgomery is prepared to prove that WFA policy "has been dictated more by a desire to protect the monetary value of food stocks . . . and the profits of food industries . . . than to protect the food needs of the people." The WFA has sought to distract popular resentment from itself by spreading the impression that food is short because of exports for relief. That was the effect of the action taken by Byrnes in naming the new food-export control committee under Leo T. Crowley. This was represented in Congress as a bold step to protect American supplies from being sent abroad. The truth is that pitifully little of our food has gone abroad except to our own armed forces, and that we can have plenty both for ourselves and for liberated Europe any time we muster the gumption to make the farm bloc and the food processors behave. Many will die in liberated Europe this winter of cold and hunger if we fail.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE disintegration of the German armies in the west continues apace. The Allies took 300,000 prisoners in the first fortnight of the massive clean-up operation east of the Rhine, 180,000 of these in the first six days of April. During the latter period the enemy lost about 25,000 in killed and wounded. This proportion of seven men surrendering for every man knocked physically out of action is a significant index of the scope of the German breakdown; it shows clearly that organized resistance on a large scale is rapidly drawing to an end, and that a period of small-scale, desperate resistance by uncoordinated units is about to set in.

For the dual purpose of doing honor to the Allied fighting team and of preventing the post-war rise of Nazi mythology about another "stab in the back," it cannot be emphasized too often that the Germans in the west have been defeated by superb generalship, superior fighting skill, and extraordinary logistic achievements. Our numerical superiority in the air, in artillery, and in ground troops has not been marked enough by itself to bring about the terrible German débâcle of the past two months between the Roer and the Weser. A half-million prisoners are taken in such a period and under such conditions only when the attacking generals have planned brilliantly, employ surprise, change pace and direction quickly, and have enough confidence in their troops and supply columns to order bold flanking movements, encirclements, and long advances. These attributes have been displayed on every Allied army front in the past weeks.

Some of the best recent footwork has shown up on the northern front since the Twenty-first Army Group has been freed from the onerous task of reducing the big Ruhr pocket, where the Germans still fight hard among the slag heaps and industrial ruins. British and Canadian columns have fanned out into Holland and the Westphalian plain—toward the German North Sea ports—with a disregard for the absolute security of their flanks not always typical of Marshal Montgomery. To my total lack of surprise, the British Seventh Armored Division, of which I once had the honor of being a member, has been leading the race to Bremen. As always in its long and distinguished history, these original Desert Rats are paced by the Eleventh Hussars, which I should guess is the best armored-car regiment in the world. Something of the quality of this division may be judged from the history of the Alamein break-through. That break-through came at the northern hinge of the front, next to the sea, at a time when the Seventh was just back of the line in the south, where General Montgomery had specifically ordered it "not to be destroyed." The division moved forty miles north on the day of the break-through, crossing laterally the forward movement of the entire Eighth Army, and next day was racing down the coast road toward Tobruk in advance of everyone. It led the way half across Africa; the Eleventh Hussars were first into Tobruk, Benghazi, Tripoli; and when the division was shifted to the First Army front to spearhead the surprise attack which crumbled the Germans before Tunis, the Hussars beat everyone to the City Hall. I suspect that the Hussars will get a reconnaissance patrol first into Berlin, if they have to go A. W. O. L. from their own army and join Patton's to do it.

This thrust toward Bremen may be intended to nip possible German schemes for a stand in northern Germany which would match the widely advertised stand in the south. Saturday's Allied bombing pattern shows a suggestive concentration in this northern area—rail junctions, airfields, and ordnance stores inside the quadrilateral bounded by Bremen, Kiel, Rostock, and Neustrelitz. Montgomery may well continue through or past Bremen to Hamburg and the lower Elbe, getting in position to swing on Berlin from the northwest. Judging from the heavy week-end counter-attacks east of Kassel, the enemy now fears Patton's direct advance on Leipzig most. It is difficult to find coherence in the present German defense plans, but they seem to call for a concentration of effort to prevent Patton from linking with the Russians about Dresden, which would prevent the troops holding the Oder from getting away to the south. Thus Montgomery may find the going easier than the Americans.

The continued toughness of German resistance still farther south, protecting Stuttgart and Nürnberg, provides additional evidence. The violent battle for Vienna is directly linked with the fighting in the west: if the Russians clear Vienna quickly, they could drive up the Danube valley toward a junction with Patch's Seventh Army in the Regensburg region, throwing another barrier across the German retreat to the "national redoubt." In both east and west, then, the fighting in the south is of greater long-term importance than that in the north.

Further supporting evidence of the importance of the south comes from Veritas, the excellent military writer for the Sunday Times of London, who quotes a Swiss description of the Nazis' preparations for defense in the Berchtesgaden region: "The fact that the small mountain lakes which abound in the district and the shafts of former salt mines . . . have been so cleverly utilized, that almost impassable mountain ridges have been incorporated into a system of fortifications, and that machine-gun nests, flak positions, and solid bunkers have been built in the passes, lends support to the belief that this romantic dream is meant to be taken seriously, and that German thoroughness has here once more been employed with a fantastic goal in view. . . . Gigantic depots of war materials, ammunition chambers, and repair workshops have been installed in the caves of the Königsee. . . . Factories have been built for producing war materials. . . . Subterranean airfields and hangars have been built . . . grain and potatoes have been accumulated."

As Veritas says, all this is military nonsense, which can delay but not compromise total Allied victory. The reason is strictly political: to create chaos and disorder in the wrecked towns of Germany, so as to make the Allied task as difficult as possible and to add to the Nazi mythology another chapter—"at least they were efficient; they gave us bread and houses." Hence the political reasons for forestalling a protracted German stand in the south are even more compelling than the military reasons.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

MORE THAN A WEEK has passed since Hitler's unilateral action on German rearmament was first announced to a panicky world. Much has occurred during this period. England, France, Austria, and Czechoslovakia have taken steps to strengthen their defenses against the menace of a rearmed Germany. Mussolini has increased his standing army until it is almost as large as that proposed by Hitler. The Soviet Union has announced that if war must come it is ready to meet the steel of the German invader. France and Italy have protested against the violation—of the Versailles treaty. . . . But apart from an encouraging evidence of unity of action, the powers appear as uncertain how best to meet Hitler's bold challenge as they were on the day of its announcement. . . . War, if it is to come within the next year, will be the result of a series of diplomatic blunders rather than the outcome of the deliberate will of any nation.—April 3, 1935.

THE EFFECT of the war scare on Washington has been to spur the formulation of a new doctrine of neutrality. Army and navy sentiment at present favors the complete abandonment of the freedom of the seas and the withdrawal of all protection of war-time trade under the American flag. This is isolationism carried to its logical finality.—April 3, 1935.

THE COURTS, the cops, and all the agencies of government are supposedly neutral during strike activities. But it is at best the neutrality of a Pilate of Judea. The police will stay out of the picture only if the armed guards and thugs of the company concerned can carry on the terror for themselves. By some most curious misapprehension "strike violence" in the public mind is associated with the acts of the workers. But even the most casual inquiry will show that in the vast majority of cases violence is begun by the employer and carried out by him to the bitter end.—HEYWOOD BROWN, April 3, 1935.

ALMOST UNNOTICED in the flurry of excitement over Europe, the Abyssinian crisis has drifted from bad to worse. With one eye on Germany and the other on Abyssinia, Mussolini has mobilized an army of nearly 600,000 men in addition to the two divisions recently dispatched to Africa. . . . Emperor Haile Selassie has moved 100,000 of his troops into a position to check the threatened Italian advance.—April 17, 1935.

NOT SINCE LAUSANNE has an international conference ended upon a note of general optimism such as was in evidence at Stresa. This was perhaps due more to surprise that any progress could be made than to specific achievements. . . . On the chief problem facing Europe at present—the discovery of a technique for enforcing collective security—the conference made no final decisions.—April 24, 1935.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH: William Faulkner, "Pylon"; F. Scott Fitzgerald, "Taps at Reveille"; Hugh S. Johnson, "The Blue Eagle from Egg to Earth"; Marianne Moore, "Selected Poems," with an introduction by T. S. Eliot.

England and the Pacific War

BY JOE FROMM

THE official announcement of British naval participation in the pre-invasion bombardment of the Ryukyu Islands is encouraging news, for a group of top-ranking officers in the American navy have been trying to exclude the British from the Pacific. It is an open secret in diplomatic circles that one of the United States delegates to the Quebec conference last September proposed that the Pacific campaign be almost wholly an American undertaking and that the British navy be confined to the Indian Ocean or at most be assigned a decidedly minor role in the Pacific. The American naval delegate was, happily, ruled out of order, and President Roosevelt assured Prime Minister Churchill that "we will continue side by side across the Pacific until Japan surrenders."

The fairly important part played by a task force of the British Pacific fleet in the assault on the Ryukyus suggests that the policy enunciated at Quebec has prevailed. But there is ample evidence that a substantial number of American officers still disapprove. Their spokesmen insist that the objections of this dissident group are based entirely on technical considerations. Hanson W. Baldwin, the New York Times military commentator, has argued, for example, that Pearl Harbor "already is overcrowded and would be faced with a major problem if it suddenly had to maintain another great naval task force composed of ships differing in gun calibers and characteristics from our own and manned by crews who speak a different type of naval language and have different customs, routines, and procedures." The success of the Ryukyu operation should effectively answer this argument, but the Associated Press dispatch reporting the bombardment made a cryptic statement that was somewhat disquieting. Bearing a Guam date line and obviously reflecting the views of naval officials there, the dispatch contained this sentence: "Disregarding the question whether British and American ships are technically able to operate side by side, British carriers are fully prepared to operate as a completely independent task force." Clearly the technical difficulty of joint operations is an argument that continues to influence naval planning in the Pacific.

However, the real explanation of the agitation for an exclusively American war in the Pacific can probably be found in the deep-seated Anglophobia that seems to be one of the less admirable traditions of the American navy. Hanson Baldwin himself, after emphasizing the technical difficulties of combined naval operations, concedes that the same people who shouted a short time ago that the British would never help us in the Pacific are now whispering, "The British will insist on coming in at the kill in the Pacific for prestige and political reasons." And less than a week after the British were compelled to beg for a larger role in the Pacific war, Lieutenant Commander C. Ray Robinson, former legal adviser to Admiral Halsey, made the categorical statement, "I'm certain that we will get nothing from the British except what we have been getting."

This anti-British attitude might, of course, seriously impair the teamwork of the two navies. It is certainly being exploited by the McCormick-Patterson-Hearst press and other American chauvinists to foment discord between the Allies and to serve their own imperialist ends. For months the McCormick-Patterson-Hearst papers have been screaming that the British are letting America hold the bag in the Pacific, that they refuse to bear their share of the burden in the war against Japan. A few weeks before the Quebec conference the Chicago Tribune said editorially: "The British, many of whose possessions we have reconquered from the Japs, have contributed so little to the fighting in the Pacific that it would be a mockery for their chief of state to sit in on a mid-Pacific war conference. Apparently they do not intend to become active in the Japanese war for some time." And it still followed this line after the disclosure that the British, far from stinting on their obligations, actually were demanding a greater share in the Pacific war.

To substantiate the argument that the United States is winning the war in the Pacific single-handed, the formerly isolationist press indulges in outright distortion of the facts. "The Japanese war is almost exclusively an American show," said the Tribune, whereas actually the Australians did a very substantial share of the fighting in the "island-hopping" campaign. In analyzing the New Guinea campaign Colonel McCormick did not once mention the Australian troops. Yet the Australians fought the battle of the Owen Stanley Mountains with the aid of a single American regiment, all land fighting at Milne Bay was done by Australians, and for every American who fought in the Buna-Gona battle there were three Australians. Furthermore, when American forces invaded Leyte, the task of cleaning out 90,000 Japanese left isolated in the islands to the east was handed over to the Australians. In view of the heroic joint fight waged by Australian and American forces in the Pacific, it seems almost indecent to exaggerate the achievements of either nation.

Having created the illusion that America is defeating Japan single-handed and that the British are unwilling to do their share of the fighting, the imperialists find it an easy step to the cry, "Will Britain continue to own and rule islands bought with American blood, vital to American defense?" This is not a parody of their words. It is an exact quotation from Hearst's Chicago Herald and American. It may not be honest journalism, but it is smart imperialism. Everything fits neatly into the imperialist scheme: keep the British out of the Pacific, then accuse them of bad faith for failing to do their share of the fighting, cry that American blood is being spilled to reconquer British possessions, and finally demand that America keep the islands as defense bases. This cunning campaign was advanced to its final stage when ex-Representative Melvin Maas demanded that the United States annex the Pacific islands now under Australian administration.

Admiral Ernest J. King, commander-in-chief of the United States fleet, himself contributed incalculable support to this gang of empire-seekers when he declared that the United States must keep the bases in the Pacific from which the Japanese have been ousted. In saying that we must do this to be safe from future aggression, King paralleled the line pursued by the McCormick-Hearst-Patterson press.

Of course, Britain's desire for a larger share in the Pacific war is inspired by more than an unselfish wish to share the cost of victory over Japan. Britain has an empire at stake in the Far East and realizes that it must play a major role in the Pacific war if it is to establish its imperialist claims. To those who are willing to examine the facts objectively it seems plain that the age of imperialism is passing, that the peoples of India, Burma, Malaya, French Indo-China, the Dutch and Japanese colonies, and all the other subject lands are emerging from the war with a new spirit of independence. But while the final political settlement in the East is of utmost importance, neither politics nor personal animosities nor intolerance should be permitted to delay the victory over Japan. The only relevant question is this: Will British fleet cooperation hasten the victory and reduce the cost in American lives? The answer obviously is in the affirmative.

The fact that a British task force has been permitted to take part in one action in the Pacific will not wipe out the navy's prejudice against the British or deprive our native imperialists of their chief source of ammunition. High policy calls for full British naval participation in the war against the Japanese, but high policy could be circumvented at a lower level. If this should happen, that is, if anti-British elements in the American navy were allowed to influence tactical planning or jeopardize relations between American and British naval units, our navy would inadvertently be playing into the hands of chauvinists who value American lives less than the profits of an American empire.

Fair Employment State by State

BY WILL MASLOW

SPURRED by the example of New York, a dozen Northern states are now seriously considering bills for state Fair Employment Practice Commissions. The chances for the enactment of strong, comprehensive measures seem excellent in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey; good in Rhode Island, Connecticut, Wisconsin, and Michigan. Not since the Civil War has there been so much local interest in preventing racial or religious discrimination in employment: forty-nine different bills have been introduced in twenty states this year.

The impetus for this legislation comes from no central source, although the C. I. O., the American Jewish Congress, and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People are circulating and pushing "model" bills. In six states—Kansas, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, California, New Jersey, and West Virginia—state FEPC bills were introduced by Negro members of the legislature. In almost every state they have been indorsed by Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, and Negro leaders, by state A. F. of L. and C. I. O. unions, and by influential civic organizations.

The absence of a central organizing source is revealed in the multiplicity of bills. In Massachusetts seven different bills have been introduced; in Pennsylvania, five; in Rhode Island, five; in Connecticut, New Jersey, and Ohio, three each. The resultant confusion has threatened to block action. In Massachusetts, however, the various sponsoring groups have withdrawn their competing measures and joined in supporting a new bill modeled upon the New York law. In Pennsylvania the most dramatic feature of the recent legislative hearing was the public withdrawal of three of the bills by their legislative sponsors in favor of the Brown bill.

Except in New York, all the bills started off inauspiciously. Only one governor, Dewey of New York, urged such legislation in his annual message. Governor Warren of California in his report to the legislature merely suggested the creation of a commission to investigate the necessity for an anti-discrimination law. Governor Lausche of Ohio asked for a non-salaried committee without coercive powers to develop an anti-discrimination program. The other governors were silent.

But after New York showed the way, interest in the bills revived among its neighbors, and hearings before legislative committees were held in nine states. A tremendous backing for these hearings developed, and anti-discrimination bills became top legislative business. Soon Governors Tobin of Massachusetts, Edge of New Jersey, and Martin of Pennsylvania were indorsing them.

Besides New York, Indiana has already enacted an anti-discrimination statute. But while the New York law has enforcement powers, the Indiana law limits the State Commissioner of Labor to the investigation and study of discrimination in employment and to recommending remedial legislation. Only $30,000 has been appropriated for the next two years for the Commissioner's investigations. The Indiana measure, with its emphasis upon persuasion, education, publicity, and other non-coercive techniques, follows closely the Taft bill (S. 459) now pending in the United States Senate.

Anti-discrimination bills fall into two general categories—those creating a state Fair Employment Practice Commission and those which confer additional powers upon an existing state agency. Most of the proposed commissions are to consist of five full-time salaried members, although some bills provide only for a full-time chairman, with other members paid on a per diem basis. Where no separate agency is created, the new duties are imposed upon the state Commissioner of Labor, the state Industrial Commissioner, the state Labor Relations Board, or the state Commissioner of Education.

With few exceptions the various bills forbid discrimination in employment and union membership because of race, color, creed, national origin, or ancestry. Some are applicable, in addition, to employment agencies and agencies of state government. Generally the bills prohibit not only unequal treatment in hire, discharge, promotion, wages, or any other condition of employment but also discriminatory help-wanted "ads" or employment application forms. Unions are forbidden to deny full membership rights or otherwise to discriminate against any member. Many state bills copy the New York law in forbidding any person to coerce an employer into violating the law or to aid in its violation.

The enforcement procedure, substantially the same in most of the bills, is based upon the National Labor Relations Act. Provision is made for the filing of charges, their investigation and screening, with a public hearing for those which seem valid but cannot be adjusted by informal methods. The state agency is empowered after such hearing to make findings of fact and to issue cease-and-desist orders whenever it finds a violation. Such orders may enjoin future violations and also direct affirmative relief, such as back pay for those discriminated against, reinstatement, or even hiring. These administrative orders are enforceable by the state courts, violation of whose decrees is made a contempt of court. Some bills also provide an alternative criminal penalty.

Most of the bills follow the New York law in exempting employers of five persons or fewer, and social, fraternal, charitable, educational, and religious associations; some exclude, in addition, small farmers.

Noteworthy is the emphasis placed in many of these bills on educational programs as a complement to prosecution. The New York law empowers the Commission Against Discrimination to create an advisory agency to prepare an educational program which may be recommended to the appropriate state agency. Many of the other bills direct the commission itself, in cooperation with appropriate state authorities, to adopt an educational program to teach racial tolerance. The Brown bill in Pennsylvania even empowers the state commission to accept private contributions of money for this purpose.

Segregation either in employment or in union membership is specifically forbidden in many of the bills. Thus the Conroy bill in Connecticut declares that "segregation shall be deemed to be discrimination." The California bill prohibits unions from providing "second-class or segregated membership," and the Illinois bill outlaws "auxiliary unions based solely upon race, color, religion, national origin, or ancestry." A similar provision was contained in the Kansas bill.

Advanced thinking is exhibited in the provisions for judicial review of the orders of the proposed state commissions. Most of the bills adopt the federal "substantial-evidence" rule—namely, that the findings of the regulatory commission as to the facts are to be conclusive with the reviewing courts if supported by substantial evidence. One variant is the administration-backed bill in New Jersey, which makes the findings conclusive unless "it clearly appears that there was no evidence . . . to support the same reasonably." The rival Howell bill in New Jersey goes even farther, making the findings of fact conclusive "in the absence of fraud." The Wrenn bill in Rhode Island makes the orders of the commission final unless the respondent appeals.

No state law can of course be effective without an adequate appropriation. In New York it is reported that $250,000 will be allocated to the new Commission Against Discrimination. The bills in other states are much less generous, providing appropriations of $100,000 in Illinois and Ohio, $50,000 in New Jersey, $25,000 in Rhode Island, and only $10,000 in Wisconsin.

In only one Southern state, Texas, has an anti-discrimination bill been introduced, and there the protection of the measure was in effect limited to persons of Mexican or Latin American origin. The employment provisions of the bill were struck out in committee, leaving only those sections forbidding discrimination against customers in places of public accommodation. Bills in the border states of Maryland, Kansas, and West Virginia have been killed.

In the state of Washington a bill was passed in the House and killed in the Senate. In California the bill was reported adversely in committee by a close vote, but a movement has developed to bring it out on the floor. Bills have been introduced in Colorado, New Mexico, and Minnesota, in addition to the states already named.

Organized opposition has been confined to chambers of commerce and employer associations. These bodies, while advocating the ideal of equality of opportunity, have urged a preliminary state-wide referendum, or that no action be taken until the New York law has been tried out, or that a legislative commission be created to study the problem, or that state action is unnecessary because of the imminence of federal legislation.

Proponents have steadfastly resisted all dilatory tactics. They have contended that federal legislation is by no means certain and in any event will be limited to matters affecting interstate commerce. They have also pointed to the example of the New York legislature, which after adopting the Ives-Quinn law, memorialized Congress to enact a federal law. Whenever it has been urged that prejudice could not be wiped out by legislation, anti-bias groups have retorted that they were attacking not prejudice, which is an attitude of mind, but discrimination, which affects pay envelopes. The advocates of State FEPC's are fighting hard, for most legislatures will recess shortly, not to reconvene until the next biennial session in January, 1947. They realize that the outlook for legislative intervention against discriminatory employment practices is better now than ever before, and they are urging swift, concerted action.

In Congress the Norton bill, reported favorably by the House Committee on Labor, is waiting for a special order of business from the Rules Committee which will bring the bill up for debate in the House. Senate hearings have been completed on the Chavez bill, sponsored by a bi-partisan group of seven Senators, with not one witness testifying in opposition.

Italy's Children

BY GENE REA

Naples, March 1

TOMORROW'S Europe will be built by the children of today. And the conditions under which children are now living in the devastated countries of this war-torn continent do not augur a too happy future. The war has done a thorough job of disrupting civilian life; the children have been its most tragic victims.

In Italy hundreds of thousands of children were caught in the backwash of war. You see them wandering about everywhere, on the roads and in the cities and the fields. The Italian government has attempted to register them, and the Allied Military Government, the Control Commission, and the Vatican have also tried to do something about them, but not much has been accomplished. Many children eluded the police, liking to go their own way rather than to be confined to an institution. Others joined bands of adults, often not of their own families, and traveled with them. Hundreds of youngsters were "adopted" by our soldiers as mascots and went to the front with them. As a result only about 50,000 children were rounded up by the church and the Italian government and placed in orphanages, though it is estimated that there are 300,000 whose parents were killed in the war or cannot be found.

Two boys recently wandered into Ponte Corvo, a town where formerly twelve thousand persons lived, now razed to the ground. They were perhaps eight and ten years old, mere skeletons and shivering in their rags. A nun who saw them took them to the Institute of Child Care and started an inquiry to find their people. No one knew them, and they remembered nothing of their home. The doctor who examined them said they had probably been wandering for months. Their minds were a blank. There are literally tens of thousands of such cases in Italy today.

Even the orphanages are so short of supplies that the children more often than not have no shoes to wear, few clothes, and hardly decent sleeping quarters. One orphanage in the Rome area now taking care of sixty-nine children uses beds made of burlap bags stuffed with straw from the fields. Blankets are patched pieces of old cloth. For breakfast the children have warm water flavored with a small quantity of milk or tea and a very thin slice of bread brought to them by the nuns or Red Cross sisters. They remain in bed until ten and then are given some elementary school lessons. Lunch is frequently skipped, and dinner consists of a mixed soup and another thin slice of bread. Then the children are put to bed again.

Orphanages in the Abruzzi area, in the Neapolitan campagna, and in other outlying districts are worse off than those with easier access to the main terminals. But though physical conditions are bad, the children intrusted to the care of nuns or the Red Cross benefit from some kind of discipline and have a feeling of home.

The school system has not been functioning for four years.

Children who should have started their education at six or seven years haven't seen a book at ten. If they are not orphans, their parents are destitute; and the children have become beggars, thieves, shoe-shine boys, or procurers. Girls as well as boys start smoking when they are about seven or eight years old.

Late one evening a social worker noticed three ten-year-old girls, made up with lipstick and rouge, brazenly asking soldiers for cigarettes along Rome's Via Vittorio Veneto. She spoke to one and tried to find out whether she had any parents and what she was doing on the streets at such a late hour. The girl puffed smoke into the woman's face, told her to mind her own business, and asked her if she wanted a date with an American soldier. Her companions laughed, and the woman had to walk on.

Of all Italian cities Naples has seen the greatest rise in juvenile delinquency. When the Allies began using it as their main operating base, the children started a crime wave that has still to be checked. They have become the most skilful pickpockets in the world. Hundreds of cases are reported daily to the police, and thousands of others go unreported. They brush against you, apparently with their hands in their pockets, ask for a cigarette of a caramella, and then disappear. When you look for your wallet, it is gone. At street corners where trucks and other vehicles must stop for traffic, one or two of them will attract the attention of the driver, while the others ransack the truck. Tires have been taken from cars while the occupants sat nonchalantly in their seats.

When law and order are once more established in Italy, this crime wave can probably be controlled, but law and order will not be able to rebuild the starved bodies of these youngsters or eradicate the germs in their blood streams. Malaria, tuberculosis, and typhus are spreading havoc in their weakened bodies, despite the heroic efforts of the Allied medical corps, aided by the Vatican and the Italian government, whose health measures are unfortunately entirely inadequate. In the Liri Valley, which has a population of about half a million, malaria used to be almost unknown; 75 per cent of the people are now suffering from it. A blood test of two thousand children showed malaria in 99 per cent. An emergency distribution of atabrine tablets by the Allies lowered the number of deaths but could not reduce the incidence of the infection.

The highest death rate for children under one year of age throughout Italy was recorded in Naples. Allied official figures differ from those of the Italians. The Allies give the rate as 45 per cent; the Italians as 65 per cent. The main causes of death were malnutrition, tuberculosis, and pneumonia.

With transportation virtually at a standstill, the smaller communities can get almost no medical supplies, whatever the emergency. Few of them have hospitals. When hospitals exist, most of the equipment is gone and there is no heat. In Rome, which is comparatively untouched by the war, there are hospitals where, when a patient dies, another patient is put in the same bed five minutes later, without the sheets being changed or the bed disinfected.

Doctors have been advised to care for the children first because the future of the nation depends on them. But there is a terrible dearth of doctors in Italy, as in every war-devastated country of Europe. Some communes are lucky to have a doctor living thirty or forty miles away. There may be only one doctor for ten or twenty thousand people, spread over a wide area. As a result, children and adults go without proper examinations and medical care.

In the Liri Valley and northward, where the war raged in all its fury, human beings live like animals. In the fall children go through the fields trying to dig up a few vegetable roots that have been left in the soil. Or they pick up the chestnuts and walnuts and bring them home to live on during the winter months. In the spring and summer they work in the fields from dawn to sundown. Many of them, less cautious than their elders, are blown to bits by unexploded mines.

Attempts have been made to reopen the schools. But a trip through Italy shows that only a small percentage of them are able to function, and that in these only a handful of children attend classes. The schools have no heat, few books, and inefficient teachers. The children lack shoes and clothes and have been made dull and listless by malnutrition and disease. Their impoverished parents are unable to buy the necessary school materials. Moreover, youngsters who were ten or eleven years old when the war started have "grown out" of being school children. They consider themselves young men and women. Those who are ten or eleven now are reluctant to start learning the same lessons as children four years younger. Many who are mere children in years are in reality men and women, with the full responsibilities of adults. They seek their own food and shelter and are often the main support of aged or destitute parents.

It will take more than a generation to rebuild Italy. It will take decades to reduce the death rate to normal and to wipe out the contagious diseases. If Italy must depend on itself alone to rehabilitate its people, several generations will be lost. The children of Italy look to the outside world for help—to America especially. The world cannot allow the children of Italy, Greece, Yugoslavia, France, Belgium, the Low Countries, and all Central Europe to become a lost generation. We have spent billions of dollars on destruction; we must spend other billions on rehabilitation. If we allow the children of Europe to grow up in the conditions now prevailing, their sufferings will breed hatred and war.

Pan-Arabia Deserta

BY HAL LEHRMAN

Cairo, March 24

MUSSA EL ALAMI, delegate from Palestine, just stroked his mustache and listened to the guttural Arabic oratory as the microphones halted here and there around the green-baize table. When the ceremonial signing began, nobody handed him a pen. They had tucked his business away in a little protocol behind the twenty-two articles of the covenant of the Pan-Arab League. But that protocol was the hottest page of the document, and Mussa was the real star of the show. For last Thursday, when the ink had dried on the signatures of Egypt, Iraq, Trans-Jordan, Saudi Arabia, and Lebanon, under the brilliant candelabra of Cairo's Zaafaran Palace, Palestine stood acclaimed as juridically independent in the eyes of thirty million Arabs. Palestine might still be termed a mandate on the dusty ledgers of Geneva, but here it was an Arab state amid Arab equals. Henceforth the delegate of Arab Palestine would sit in the inner councils of the new-born union and speak with full authority for the Holy Land, all of it.

That is the real meaning of the protocol. Discarding legalistic wording, it is a bold stroke in a document which is generally hedging. The next move is up to the other powers, London and Washington particularly. Allah has spoken.

It is significant that among the delegates who made speeches about the majesty of Arab unity, Nuri Said, the former Premier of Iraq, was nowhere to be seen. Long before even the preliminary pan-Arab talks in Alexandria last fall, Nuri Said had gone into the desert barnstorming for a vast Arab union in which "Greater Syria" would speak with a single voice for Arab Palestine, Trans-Jordan, Syria, and the Lebanon. This had been the Syria as it existed under the Ottomans, Nuri contended; it should be united again and allied in strength with the Hashimite throne of Bagdad.

Benignly approved in Commons by Anthony Eden, the idea of unity gained ground. But there were obstacles. First the tiny Christian Lebanon, fearful of disappearing in a Moslem sea, threatened to walk out of the preliminary talks last October. A clause in the Alexandria protocols thereupon specifically guaranteed the Lebanon's territorial integrity. Much more important, in distant central Arabia sat mighty Ibn Saud. The Hashimites, whom he had driven with his own hand out of the Hedjaz, still reigned in Iraq and Trans-Jordan. Certainly he was not going to abet the aggrandizement of an enemy house. Not until three months after everybody else had done so, and after many solemn assurances, did Saudi Arabia and its satellite Yemen accept the Alexandria protocols. Out of these protocols, after a long series of meetings, drafts, and redrafts, came this week's pan-Arab constitution. It does not provide for anything so substantial as a Greater Syria. To be sure, the idea is not dead; in fact, rumors say that Nuri Said will head the next Iraqi Cabinet. But for the moment the urge for unity, real as it undoubtedly is, is not great enough to overcome the inter-Arab rivalries—religious, political, and dynastic—that stand in the way.

Various high personages confessed to me that the key to the document was a compromise. Ambitions and fears alike had to be quenched until a minimum accord could be reached. In its political structure the pact is as weak a vehicle for militant action as can be imagined. It can be modified by a two-thirds' vote, but any member who doesn't like the change can depart forthwith. Action against aggression must have unanimous approval. War between members is forbidden, and an arbitral decision must be accepted, but search high and low and you will not find a whisper of sanctions, their definition or their enforcement.

Neither does the pan-Arab constitution establish the principle of a common foreign policy or even of a common front against imperialism. The covenant carefully states that although a separate pact may be concluded among the members, no pact, present or future, with an outside power can bind the other members. It is quiet recognition that Saudi Arabia is flirting with the Americans; that Egypt, Iraq, and Trans-Jordan are trying to get rid of their obligations to one foreign power and the Lebanon and Syria to another. Each will do its own dickering.

Nevertheless, the Pan-Arab League can hardly be dismissed with a shrug. Its economic and social potentials are undoubtedly big. Our Anglo-American Middle East Supply Center did an excellent job out here inspirationally as well as tangibly. Collaboration among previously uncooperative governments under the guidance of the League Commission now has a model and an organism.

Students and critics of imperialism might well look into the reasons for Britain's apparent insouciance in the face of a growing menace. Of course one's research is limited, since the amiable higher authorities here have the final word and scissors on the subject. But if it is permissible to conjecture—hard facts are perhaps beyond reach because they are concealed in the inner thoughts of persons far away—there emerge certain basic hypotheses.

The first theory is that the powers are not encouraging the Pan-Arab League at all but are working frantically under cover to stymie it. That does not jibe with all the evidence at hand to the contrary. Others say the whole deal is a plot to sabotage Zionism by making it impossible to reach any solution in Palestine except one favorable to the Arabs. That may be, but it would seem to be risking an enormous amount of pain for a minor pleasure. The third school—and here we begin to approach something resembling sound politics—suggests that Britain is making the most of a trend which it would be more dangerous to obstruct than to encourage. According to this reasoning, the Foreign Office has long since decided that the good old days of divide and rule are past. Opposition to Arab union would stimulate it more than mild support. So we will unite and rule, or at least try to, making the best of a poor bargain. The corollary to this is that a strong pan-Arab bloc would discipline itself, pushing recalcitrant member states into line without the need for thankless British intervention.

But there is still another hypothesis, one favored by the cynical set. It goes much farther than the last, which it dismisses as wishy-washy and very un-Whitehall. It argues that Britain is heart and soul behind Arab unity, desperately behind it—in a table-stakes game to save its position in the Middle East between Russia and the United States. The Arab world disunited might be easily picked off piece by piece by the Soviets or bought out in a similar fashion by the Americans. The latter fate, it is true, holds no special terrors for the local Arab magnates now in power, but the other possibility would be a catastrophe for them. And neither prospect looks attractive to Britain.

In the Wind

AN AMG MAN IN AACHEN, questioning civilians about their political beliefs, was assured that they were unanimously anti-Nazi and always had been. "That's strange," he said. "I thought the Nazis had quite a bit of popular support." "Nonsense!" replied the German spokesman. "That's just pluto-democratic Jewish propaganda."

THE MARYLAND HOUSE OF DELEGATES has passed a bill making it illegal to use obscene language over the telephone or to use the telephone for the purpose of making immoral engagements. The bill doesn't say how it is to be enforced.

WANT AD IN the Minneapolis Tribune of March 22: "Do you want to contribute to the health and happiness of those who eat downtown? If so, apply for a job in the dishwashing room at Richard's Treat."

A DETROIT REAL-ESTATE FIRM, Horner Warren and Company, ran the following advertisement in Detroit newspapers of March 23: "There's a war on. The last war in your lifetime. Last opportunity to pick up good income property at a price to double your money in the coming post-war boom. Get all the facts and figures from Mr. Bedford."

IN AN EDITORIAL whining about the OPA, the Marshalltown, Iowa, Times-Republican of March 27 summed up its argument thus: "One wonders where the salvaged tin to win the war is coming from if the point system makes the purchase of canned goods almost prohibitive."

THE LEGISLATURE OF SASKATCHEWAN has advanced to the second reading a bill amending the Vital Statistics Act to end the practice of putting the word "illegitimate" on the birth certificates of children born out of wedlock.

THE HOLLYWOOD REPORTER of March 13 announces that plans have been approved for a post-war theater in Palm Springs, California, which will contain five hundred rocking chairs with head rests. What, no hot towels?

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Censors in the Saddle

BY ERIC SEVAREID

AMONG the miserable legacies this war will leave in many parts of the world is a system of censorship which has become such an intricate, cunning mechanism, such a deeply ingrained habit of the official mind that free journalists are now confronted with the most exhausting obstacle course the profession has known in decades.

At the moment Kent Cooper, Harold Stassen, Archibald MacLeish, and others are trying to persuade the world's statesmen to build into the future international edifice a corner stone labeled "guaranty of a free press and free communication of news between nations." I do not believe I am unduly impressed with the importance of my own profession if I say that unless this stone is placed in the foundations, the whole structure may crumble. In the last two or three years I have seen, at close range, overweening censorship become the direct cause of serious breakdowns in people's trust in their leaders and in trust between nations. In the brief space here available let me take you on a short tour of the international obstacle course. I will leave out actual army censorship, despite the fantastically wide interpretations of "military security" made by so many uniformed censors and despite the many sycophantic public-relations officers surrounding individual generals who make it so hard for honest reporters—obliged to live with them and procure food, lodging, and transport from them—to tell a realistic story of the generals, their outfits, and the fighting itself.

At the time Madame Chiang Kai-shek was mesmerizing the American Congress and public I went to China at the behest, in part, of some important gentlemen in Washington who said, "For heaven's sake try to tell the public the true story of China at war. Unless we can get the truth out, bit by bit, there's bound to come a great shock to the public; they will feel bitter; they will feel they have been lied to, and that will make it much harder to help organize China for the coming war on its soil."

I stopped off in New Delhi on the way. British and American military censors would pass no copy describing the amazing social life that went on in this headquarters town—"because we would be criticized." Full reporting of India's political problem was out of the question. To try it meant distressing personal quarrels with petulant civil officials who fumed and bridled over every line of one's copy. I found they took their politics very personally in India. One Brigadier Jehu, the press chief, since sacked by Mountbatten, saw that no invitations to press conferences or cocktail parties went out to pro-Nehru correspondents. American military offices turned over to the British all American dispatches which dealt with British or Indian affairs in any degree. The American public has lost all interest in the affairs of India—which is what officialdom was aiming for—partly because nobody has been able to tell the whole truth about India.

I knew from my experience in London that the people of the British Isles had always had a generous, full account of America's part in the war. In India, however, it was deliberately played down. American victories became "Allied" victories in the headlines, and events such as a Harlem race riot received top billing. Reuter's enjoyed a virtual monopoly as the news service for India, and the situation was so bad that Elmer Davis, I am told, finally had to protest to Halifax. I'm talking only about British India, mind you, not about Britain. The London censorship has always been as fair and free as any in the world. And in all fairness, I must add that the purely military censorship in India, since Mountbatten's arrival, is vastly improved.

Then I discovered that the hand of the New Delhi censor was on my shoulder even after leaving India. By arrangement with the American military in Chungking any copy by any American reporter which dealt with far-off India had to be given to British officers in Chungking for approval. If you went back to New Delhi and wrote about China, your stuff had to be passed by the Chinese commissioner there.

I hardly need tell you that the Chinese censorship in Chungking is quite ruthless. Most of our people, including Ambassador Gauss and General Stilwell, were desperately anxious to have the truth of their heartbreaking problems told the public at home. But not even they could beat the system. A surprise to me, however, was the list of "censorship topics" concocted by Colonel Mason Wright, the P. R. O., and Lieutenant Colonel "Young Joe" Stilwell, and presented to all war correspondents upon arrival in Chungking. It included "anything tending to embarrass us in the sight of our allies"—a standard monstrosity in many war theaters—and, so help me, "anything critical of War Department policy." In so many words.

I returned to Washington feeling that there at least I could get my articles passed. I stopped in Cairo and discovered the neat little system of interlocking agreements between governments working without a hitch. Whether you wrote about Egypt or Yugoslavia or Greece or Syria, your material would be passed around to all the interested officials for everyone to get in his whack with the blue pencil. Naturally the full story about the "mutiny" of left-wing Greek soldiers in Egypt did not get out. The detailed story of British plans for Greece was not related, day by day, step by step, during that period; so of course the world was confused and bewildered when the lid blew off in Athens last fall. General Wilson, despite Kent Cooper's protest, refused for a long time to let reporters visit Yugoslavia; so of course the world was surprised at the disappearance of Mihailovich and the emergence of Tito as the dominant figure.

In Washington I presented for censorship a long, carefully documented account of China at war, written, I thought, with full sympathy for a nation I much admired. The War Department refused to pass it. I spent two weeks pulling wires, among Senators, officers, and State Department people. For despite Mr. Hull's previous protestations that his department imposed no political censorship, it had, while I was in the East, specifically requested the Pentagon people to deliver up to it any dispatches by returning war correspondents which dealt with China. I went to Mike McDermott, the department press chief, and said, "Look, some day there is likely to be a big military setback in China, a blow-up, and if that happens, the War Department is going to let you down and in its own interest reveal the true war picture in China." He thought I was right, but nothing resulted. Many of the Far Eastern Division's staff agreed that the article should be printed, in the public interest. Dr. Stanley Hornbeck, who had not seen China for many years, was against letting out the truth. So was Joseph Ballantine, who put the second stop on my piece. Eventually I had the promise of an Assistant Secretary of War that he would urge Stimson to pass the story, the promise of two influential friends that they would intervene with Stettinius. So I sailed for the Mediterranean again, confident that the story would be passed. It was—so mutilated by the censors it was unfit for print.

You know what happened in China later: the sudden serious loss of our eastern air bases to the Japanese army; the Stilwell affair, which with unnecessary crudeness smashed public illusions about China, turning uncritical affection into exaggerated contempt—exactly what we had tried to prevent. (I don't mean my article alone would have prevented this, but I think it would have helped.)

The list of censorship atrocities on the grand scale is long and is getting longer. The murder of Lord Moyne in Cairo was a political murder. Yet the Cairo censors refused to let correspondents reproduce the courtroom speeches of the two defendants, dismissing them as "mere political bombast," of no interest to the world. If Cairo is the bad spot it so obviously is, no one can put all the blame on the British.

Last summer, the American commander there, General Giles, called in the correspondents. His comments went about like this: "My military censors are going to examine everything you write about this theater, whether it concerns politics or anything else. There will be nothing critical of this theater sent out of here by you gentlemen. If any of you thinks he may be inclined to write anything critical, he may as well leave now. And don't go complaining to the War Department. I don't intend to have any interference in my theater." One or two of the stunned reporters tried to send private cables to their home offices explaining their position. The cables were stopped. They tried to explain it in air-mail letters. The letters were sequestered.

Readers of The Nation know what happened in Greece last fall: how the British government fought down the flood tide of protest in England—and America—by the now standardized twin processes of restricting the freedom of reporters on the spot to visit the "wrong" people and at the same time issuing as news carefully selected items from official sources. Much earlier, in August, Churchill ordered the B. B. C. Overseas Service to eliminate "any credit of any kind" to the E. L. A. S. or the E. A. M. The London liberal press, to its eternal credit, exposed the whole bag of tricks.

Eventually the truth gets out, but its late arrival always produces these shocks to the public conscience, these terrible strains to the frail web of international cooperation. There are more dangers now on the horizon. The Allies are going to occupy Germany. What they do in their respective spheres will indicate to the world whether they have in fact agreed on a policy for Germany; whether they intend actually to clean out the fascists or just to sweep them under the rug as they almost got away with doing in Italy. It will furnish a host of vital portents for future peace or future war. Yet at this writing the Allies have not, separately or collectively, given public assurance that there will be no political censorship on Allied correspondents during the occupation period. The American officials are themselves wrangling over the question, though, in all morality, there should not be a moment's doubt about it.

Perhaps the greatest threat to international harmony at present comes from Russian-occupied Poland. Surely, the peace structure can never be stable unless there is full confidence between Russia and the Western democracies. We have made a fair start. We are taking the Russians at their word. But no democratic people will rest content with that. They want proof—proof from eyewitnesses they trust—that the words of Yalta on free elections for Poland, the integrity of Poland, mean to the Russians precisely what they mean to the rest of us. Up to the present there has been no indication that the Russians intend to allow free journalists to work in Poland. Indeed, the public is shocked to learn that the question of free inquiry and free reporting in transitional Poland was not even discussed at Yalta.

No matter how elaborate the international

A Guest from Spain

Drawing by Rivero Gil

PEACE: Do you think you are one of the Big Ones? Or do you want to eat at all the tables?

structure, distrust will eat away its foundations unless every member of the timid new family of nations rests easy in the knowledge that he knows exactly what the others are doing, at home and in the lands they dominate. Ignorance breeds prejudice and distrust. From distrust comes fear, and from fear, in the modern world, nothing can come save war.

The Argentines Speak Up

ALTHOUGH the Argentine regime's maneuvers may fool some officials abroad, the Argentine people refuse to be taken in. Pueblo Argentino, published by a group of distinguished Argentine exiles in Montevideo, carries an important document in its March 10 issue. It is the text of a public statement signed by two thousand members of the Unión Cívica Radical (U. C. R.), which was Argentina's most powerful political party before political parties were dissolved. The statement runs in part as follows:

We do not wish that the silence imposed on us by the suppression of freedom of speech and of association be interpreted as acquiescence in actions and situations that contradict the letter and spirit of republican institutions. . . . According to its leaders, the revolution of June 4, 1943, was to have as one of its major objectives the restoration of constitutional liberties. . . . More than a year later public opinion views with growing alarm the inauguration of a political system foreign to the national spirit, the destruction of individual guaranties, and the dominant influence of a minority whose ideologies are contrary to the democratic sentiment of the Argentine people. As members of the U. C. R. we consider it our duty to express our determination to promote the true functioning of the constitution, for whose restoration all Argentines are eager—all Argentines who wish right to prevail over force in their country and who know that this cannot be accomplished so long as a special class rules the common destiny. With patriotic fervor we dedicate ourselves as citizens to the task of recovering the sovereignty of the people and government by law. . . .

The U. C. R. was made up of moderately liberal elements and always favored a middle-of-the-road course. Many of the men who signed this statement hold or have held important government posts. Although their declaration may appear over-cautious, it must be remembered that it represents the point of view of neither the left nor the liberals but rather of enlightened conservatives. It is particularly interesting for that reason, and also because the regime has previously claimed U. C. R. support and would like to be able to do so now when Argentina is seeking to enter the fold of the United Nations.

Organized Latin American labor has expressed strong objections to the presence of Argentina at the San Francisco meeting. Criticizing the policy of appeasement toward the Farrell-Perón government adopted at the last moment by the Inter-American Conference at Mexico City, the president of the Latin American Federation of Labor (C. T. A. L.), Vicente Lombardo Toledano, has declared that "Latin American labor deeply deplores the invitation which the conference decided to send to the fascist Argentine government. This offer will tend not only to incorporate the fascist Argentine regime into the pan-American bloc but to allow its entry into the United Nations." The Argentina resolution, the Mexican labor leader continued, "made a most painful impression on Latin American labor. . . . It is a grave violation of the Atlantic Charter, the United Nations declaration, the decisions of Teheran and Yalta, and even of the bulk of the resolutions approved at the Inter-American Conference itself. It is in direct contradiction to the foreign policy of the great majority of American countries, especially to the foreign policy pursued by Mexico and the United States."

Russian Realism

A RECENT broadcast by the Kossuth radio, reported to the OWI by FCC monitors, offered land to Hungarian soldiers leaving the Szalasi forces to join the Hungarian National Army. The broadcast announced: "Hungarian soldiers in Szalasi's armies, any further struggle on your part is hopeless. Do you want land? If you do, you can have it. By turning against Szalasi and his German masters you can share in the benefits of the land reform. If you leave the traitor Szalasi and hide in villages or come over to the territory of liberated Hungary, you will receive a fifteen-yoke estate (approximately twenty acres). If you come over to the Red Army arms in hand, in order to fight against the Germans in the ranks of the new Hungarian National Army, you will receive a twenty-five-yoke estate."

This kind of Russian political warfare is based on the realistic assumption that a peasant will not forget who it was that gave him land. On March 17, two months after the armistice was signed, the provisional Hungarian government announced a sweeping land reform. Every vestige of Hungary's feudal land system is to be eliminated. All estates of more than about 140 acres are to be expropriated and distributed in 20-to-35-acre parcels, first to the armed forces and the landless peasants. All land belonging to "traitors, Szalasi followers, Nazis, other fascist leaders, members of the Volksbund, war criminals, and enemies of the people" is to be confiscated.

The Herald Tribune of April 3 reports a Russian radio broadcast of a statement by the Soviet-appointed mayor of the German town of Landsberg on the Warthe. A former member of the German labor movement who had been arrested twice by the Nazis for his political views, the new mayor, Paul Schulz by name, urged all Germans to "follow our example and liberate yourselves from Hitler." He described the aid given by the Russians in rehabilitating the captured town. Under Soviet direction, he said, the water-works had been repaired and factories reopened to supply the 25,000 inhabitants. "Fifteen bakeries are working for the benefit of the population. New household and bread-ration cards have been issued. The labor office, the housing office, and an office for the care of refugees are busy promoting reconstruction work. Streets have been cleared up. A hospital, two maternity wards, and a children's home have been established." The military commandant of the town, Schulz emphasized, was helping the population in every way.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

Washington, April 2

THESE ARE NOTES by another way. The contrast between perpendicular, "longitudinal" New York and widespread Washington is constant. It was greatly intensified by the experience of being plunged from March into May within four hours. Washington has had a run-away season. The cherry blossoms in the Tidal Basin fell a week ago, and government people are already wilting a bit at the prospect of a summer six months long. A case for once of too early and too much. But for the moment city and countryside are enveloped in an untarnished radiance of new green infused with the white of dogwood, the pink white of flowering crab, the lilac of lilac, and the Mexican magenta of the Judas tree. Indeed, the white light, the tropical but as yet unheavy heat, the flowers, and even the showers increase the superficial resemblances between Washington and Mexico City.

I think Washington must always seem a little foreign anyway, even to us natives, if only because it is so specialized: it is government made manifest and all pervading in massive tangible stone. And whatever the Republicans say, as a people we are not yet conscious, from moment to moment, of government.

Somewhere behind the screen of pastel smokes is an unfinished war and an unconstructed peace. But it is very hard to keep one's mind on such things in the face of nature's parti-colored propaganda, which is based on the pathetic fallacy in reverse.

There is capitol architecture—and capital language. Conversations in this town are bewilderingly profuse in capital letters strung together. I wouldn't be surprised if a seasoned government employee could get through a whole evening without once reverting to the lower case. If you don't know the difference between a CAF-3 and a P-8 (I may have them wrong) you have yet to learn the ABC's—which probably stand for some Agency having to do with Civilians. There's jargon too, of course. The other day a person reporting for a new job was told that she was entitled to a semi-executive desk.

It's just as well to be reminded now and again, however, that bureaucracy is not peculiar to government. Business and industry and education have known it a long time. Nor is the term synonymous with inefficiency. Yet I expect the feeling is still widespread that the only people who work for government are those who can't make their way, that is, money, alone. I recall the scorn with which an old-timer in the West referred to the head of a state institution. "Why," she said, "he's nothing but a public servant."

On the basis of a few days' experience of seeing and trying to see some of the new people in Congress, I must conclude that this category of public servants has plenty to do. A conscientious member of Congress who is on five committees cannot be said to be idling away his time and our money, though he would be more efficient if he had more help, expert help, of the sort he can't possibly afford. A staff member of Time, Inc., gets a much better break.

I don't mean to imply that what they say about Congress isn't true. A body of 435 people elected by that many communities on the basis of appeals as diverse as a flair for oratory, noiseless machine support, and a genuine political program is bound to include a large number of time wasters, exhibitionists, barbarians, reactionaries, and buffoons. It's easy to be cynical about representative government—until one considers the alternative. In the proper perspective, the annoying day-by-day inefficiency of Congress seems far preferable to the awful "efficiency" of dictatorship.

A bill has been introduced to make the proceedings of the Senate and House available for broadcasting. One's first reaction is to be bored in advance—but the people of the Tennessee Valley, for instance, would not be bored by the debate on a bill to hamstring TVA. It's quite possible that the level of House and Senate debate might be raised if it were subject to the constant scrutiny of public opinion. I hadn't known that in New Zealand one may listen to one's legislature from 2:30 to 11 each day of the sessions and that it's a very popular "program."

One of the tests of a successful trip to Washington is the number of unverifiable rumors one brings back. My repertory is rather slim, I'm afraid, but some of them seem worth noting. The McCormicks and the Pews and others of that "socially conscious" stripe are said to be renting villas in the environs of San Francisco and planning to entertain lavishly when the international set arrives. . . . It is reported that every important newspaperman in Washington has been asked—and has refused—to handle publicity, at a large salary, for the big new Republican National Committee. . . . The Marine Corps is conceded to have the most efficient press agents. There are also, the resentful comment goes, soldiers and sailors in the South Pacific. The stories of Okinawa would indicate that they too now have landed and have the situation in hand.

P. S.: But the New York Times of April 3 sports a photograph captioned: Okinawa: The Marines Have Landed.

So much for gossip. I can testify personally, on the other hand, that there is a fine crop of chives on the Capitol grounds.

A LETTER FROM LINCOLN KIRSTEIN adds further information on Jean Bruller (Vercors), who seems to have become a habitué of this column.

"I was shocked," writes Mr. Kirstein, "by how much I differ with you on Vercors," and then he continues:

In 1940 Bruller was with his regiment in the Vercors district (between Isere and Durance). When he was demobilized after the armistice of June 22 he went to his native town in Brie province, and worked as a carpenter and cabinet-maker. He started to write in 1940-41, composing a couple of pages an evening, with difficulty.

In 1941 Jacques Decour and the writer Politzer founded the clandestine review Pensee Libre—they were both subsequently shot. They asked the writer Pierre Delesclure to find them a collaborator. (I mean aid. How these words get worn out!) Delesclure was a friend of Bruller's, and an admirer of the work he had seen him do, and hence recommended him. Bruller wrote "The Silence of the Sea" on order for them. The proofs of the Pensee Libre were seized by the Gestapo. The review was silenced; so Bruller published the book himself in small format and from it sprang the Editions de Minuit. He is now in Paris, but is about to return to his village in Brie. He is, I think, a serious writer and has to be read in French.

Writers of Brazil

BRAZILIAN LITERATURE. By Erico Veríssimo. The Macmillan Company. $2.

ERICO VERÍSSIMO disarms his critics at the outset by describing his book as a "very sketchy history of Brazilian literature, and undoubtedly a defective one." Such is the sincerity of the chapters which follow that one is bound to see in these words something more substantial than the coy gesture of a writer who lacks the experience of a literary historian. We have here the case of the most popular living novelist of a country describing informally the development of letters and thought in his native land. Mr. Veríssimo accomplishes his task in an engaging, unruffled manner, without making exaggerated claims for the significance of Brazilian literature and yet presenting its growth in such a way as to dispose the reader toward examining some of the landmarks for himself. Since this has evidently been his primary purpose in preparing the twelve lectures which now appear in book form, one can only regret that he did not spend more time on those essential figures and works which give Brazilian literature its peculiar character, and less on the seemingly endless enumeration of books and authors which cannot possibly mean anything to the reader who has only a conventional sentence or two to identify them. Too often one suspects the author's concern to be that he should not leave out the name of any colleague who might later challenge the objectivity of his taste or his lack of sportsmanship within the profession. Mr. Veríssimo's confession, "And here I close this chapter with the vague sensation that I have just finished copying a telephone directory . . ." reflects fairly well what must be the feeling of the uninitiated reader concerning the book as a whole.

American readers are indebted to Mr. Veríssimo for having taken sufficient pains to learn English so well that the idiomatic and racy quality of his style makes of his present book a veritable tour de force. And yet his pleasure in handling expertly an instrument relatively new to him is genuine and contagious, without the slightest trace of ostentatious virtuosity. One might ask of the author an equal concern for the selection and organization of his material, so that certain pivotal figures might come through more sharply. This is especially true of men with a definite interest for American readers, such as Nabuco, Oliveira Lima, and Ruy Barbosa. An excess of extraneous detail in the closing chapters makes difficult the projection of men like Gilberto Freyre, Mário de Andrade, and Manuel Bandeira on a scale commensurate with their importance in determining the emergence of a literature of social significance in a language increasingly expressive of the complexity of present-day Brazil. Few will disagree with Mr. Veríssimo's belief that "the thirties brought to Brazilian literature its coming of age." This fact makes it doubly disappointing that his treatment of the period reveals a certain hesitancy to come to grips with the inner implications of the very literature of which he is a representative part.

Mr. Veríssimo's book is welcome as an unpretentious but thoroughly readable first guide in a field having few introductory studies available in English. Whatever its shortcomings as a history of Brazilian literature, it cannot fail to make friends for Brazil through the introduction it gives one to the author himself, despite the fact that he does not once mention his own achievements as a creative writer. To interpret for a foreign audience the literature of one's countrymen, without false modesty and yet without any trace of pompous salesmanship, requires a mature talent and a communicative spirit. As his novels might lead one to expect, Mr. Veríssimo meets this challenge in an effortless and convincing manner.

WILLIAM BERRIEN

BRIEFER COMMENT

"Report on the Russians"

LAST SUMMER W. L. White accompanied Eric Johnston to Russia, and he has described the six weeks' trip in his "Report on the Russians" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50). He saw, understood, and recorded a great deal. He did not speak the language and knew little about Russia. But this handicap has never prevented foreign travelers from reporting on Russia after fleeting visits, and few came equipped with White's keen eye and excellent pen.

Mr. White went to Russia admiring free enterprise and hating suppression of freedom. He found plenty of the latter, and it deeply repelled him. His observations on this score are amazingly shrewd and correct for a foreigner. They could have been even more impressive had he not lost his sense of proportion and dwelt on the negative.

He visited factories and found some of them dirty. In this Mr. White saw indisputable proof of the failure of the non-competitive system. Later he finds "clean, well-lighted factories," but he does not alter his previous conclusions. He goes to Leningrad and devotes a couple of short, cold paragraphs to an epic of courage that had stirred the world. Though he finds the Russian way of solving the racial problem excellent as compared to our own, Mr. White disposes of it in a few lines. In 309 pages there is only one casual remark about Soviet children, but many pages and an extremely rich vocabulary are devoted to describing badly cut clothes, sallow complexions, poor window displays, and the vitamin-lacking diet. This is a most distasteful way of judging any nation in the fourth year of a horrible war on its own soil.

SPRING BOOKS

NEXT WEEK'S 48-page Spring Book Number will bring Nation readers rich and varied commentary on literature and the arts, at home and abroad.

MARGARET MARSHALL, in Notes by the Way, will discuss, among other things, the current confusion between "folk" and folks.

RANDALL JARRELL will contribute another of his distinguished war poems, entitled, "Siege-fried." . . . In an essay, "The Face in the Mountain," James Grossman makes a new approach to literary likenesses.

"THE FRENCH REVOLUTION" by J. M. Thompson will be reviewed by Albert Guérard. Keith Hutchison will analyze Alvin H. Hansen's important new book on an important subject, "America's Role in the World Economy."

IN AN INTERESTING analysis F. W. Dupee will discuss and compare "The Masque of Reason" by Robert Frost and "The Winter Sea" by Allen Tate. . . . Diana Trilling's Fiction in Review will deal with William Maxwell's "The Folded Leaf" and other new novels.

BRIEFER COMMENTS by Joseph Wood Krutch, Louise Bogan, Carey McWilliams, and others, and The Nation's regular columns on the arts by B. H. Haggin, James Agee, and Clement Greenberg.

NEXT WEEK

in

THE Nation

Mr. White reports truthfully what he sees. He does not tell any lies except when he quotes stories, like that of the Moscow "panic," from unreliable sources. It is not lack of truth which distorts Mr. White's report but lack of balance and of sympathy.

He shows more warmth toward the end of his trip. Is it because, as he says, the farther away from Moscow the less dictatorial regimentation there is? Isn't it rather because as Mr. White saw more of the Russians he not only let his eyes wander and his pen register but also allowed his mind to reopen and his heart to speak, as he has so ably done in his previous books? Had he left his prejudices behind and done this from the beginning, White's might have been the truthful report on war-time Russia which we so badly need. Even so, with all its shortcomings and prejudices, Mr. White's report is a fuller, truer, and less one-sided picture of Russia than the rapturous accounts of Soviet apologists who refuse to see the slightest spot on the lily-white Soviet escutcheon.

MARKOOSHA FISCHER

Unconquerable Corner

SOON AFTER THE ALLIES took southern Italy in 1943, two Yugoslavs wearing bits of German and Italian uniforms sailed across the Adriatic to Bari. They had been ordered by Marshal Tito to place a number of wounded partisans under the care of the Allies at Bari, and if possible to return with a little coal and some food. To their surprise and consternation the two Yugoslavs were whisked from office to office until they found themselves at General Eisenhower's headquarters in Algiers. Marshal Tito had not ordered such an extensive journey, and his disciplinary technique included the firing squad. They were worried.

Things worked out all right, however, because the two Yugoslavs fell in with Major Louis Huot, the American officer who later wrote "Guns for Tito" (Fischer, $2.75). He whisked them back to Bari and within two days had wangled for them a thousand tons of coal, food, and medical supplies. Shortly afterward he had a steady stream of ships smuggling war materials across the German-patrolled Adriatic to Tito's partisans.

The first trip across was made by Major Huot in a borrowed British speed boat disguised as a fishing smack; it sailed directly into the gunfire of the Yugoslavs, who did

HOW SECURE IS WORLD SECURITY?

The Hazards — The Requisites

Read what these people have to say on vital issues

VIJAYA LAKSHMI PANDIT (sister of Nehru)

ROBERT BALDWIN
LOUIS BROMFIELD
PEARL BUCK
Hon. EMANUEL CELLER
Hon. JOHN M. COFFEE
JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

SYUD HOSSAIN
H. T. MUZUMDAR
K. SHRIDHARAN
ANUP SINGH
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD
LIN YUTANG

in

VOICE OF INDIA

Special United Nations Number

Published by

NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR INDIA'S FREEDOM
1129 Vermont Avenue • Washington 5, D. C.
A Monthly • 20 cents for single copy not realize that it was friendly. Later Major Huot was escorted through German-occupied territory to Tito's headquarters in the mountains of the interior. He came out believing Tito to be a great man, and marveling at the toughness of his warriors, both male and female. His account of the opening of the supply line to Yugoslavia is a brief, exciting foretaste of the great stories which some day will come out of the unconquerable corner of Europe.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

VERSE CHRONICLE

Imagists and Ex-Imagists

IT IS very irritating to reviewers that poets insist on publishing their books as individuals instead of according to some convenient pattern of schools or age groups. As it is, the reviewer has to think up his own pattern for any collection of new books of verse, dividing the poets into, say, lovers of turbines and lovers of begonias, or those who have heard of the war and those who have not. This week's chronicle will deal with three poets who, although they once shared vaguely similar methods, are mainly alike in that they have recently published books of poetry.

The poetry of William Carlos Williams is no longer as exciting as it was once. His "Della Primavera Trasportata al Morale," composed around 1930, is equally charged with humorous gusto and lyrical delicacy, and remains for me his best poem. Since then his work has resolved itself into a monotony of springtime ecstasies, suburban glimpses, and sketchy anecdotes, with here and there a brief quaver of true song. "The Wedge" (Cummington Press, $3.50) is typical. Here the shorter poems are the best, several of them being, for Williams, unusually moody:

We cannot go to the country for the country will bring us
no peace
What can the small violets tell us that grow on furry stems in the long grass among lance-shaped leaves?

It is largely the war which has brought on this melancholy, and the melancholy comes off better in the short poems. If I understand it, the fairly long Burning the Christmas Greens is an exercise in symbolism: we grow tired of peace and so resort periodically to war just as, after Christmas is over, we are weary of all the good-will and hasten to burn the wreaths and boughs. Now apart from the possible triviality of this view of war, the poem is weak because the symbol and the thing symbolized are not adequately related. In his attachment to imagist discipline ("No ideas but in things") Williams concentrates so much on describing the thing (the fire of greens) that the idea is left to smuggle its way into the poem by virtue of hints and asides. Furthermore, and again as a matter of principle, Williams strips his language quite bare of the literary resonance, the power of allusiveness, which might assist in the fusion of thought and symbol.

Why Williams, always sensitive and a craftsman, does not succeed better in his more ambitious pieces is not entirely

Books of Lasting Interest

Emil Ludwig OF LIFE AND LOVE

• Men as Friends • Partners and Behaviors • Liberty and Liberty — are a few of the many important subjects discussed in this vivid panorama of life's most personal problems. $3.00

Franz Werfel BETWEEN HEAVEN AND EARTH

"A book that most of us on the home front ought to have to read and a book that our men and women on the fighting fronts ought to have the opportunity, the satisfaction and comfort of reading."

—The Chicago Tribune $3.00

Benedetto Croce POLITICS AND MORALS

One of the most influential men in Italian political life discusses the major problems of contemporary society. Presents for the Future of Tomorrow by one of our most distinguished representatives. $3.00

Jacques Maritain THE DREAM OF DESCARTES

France's outstanding contemporary thinker explodes the myth of the Cartesian influence in literature and philosophy. "A significant contribution to the study of French philosophy and human insight."

—N. Y. Herald Tribune $3.00

Dagobert D. Runes, Editor TWENTIETH CENTURY PHILOSOPHY

The great contemporary philosophers contribute their individual views on the significant events of the century. Included among them are John Dewey, Bertrand Russell, George Santayana, Paul F. Brand, et al. $3.00

PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY, Publishers
15 E. 40th St., Dept. N, New York 16, N. Y.

Please send me _____ copies of _____ at $_____ per copy. Enclosed are $_____

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

clear. Perhaps the temperament and method are both too acutely limited. The philosophy by which he tries to reconcile nature and industrial civilization, the flower and the factory, and so to domesticate poetry in the present world, is not as deep as it is wide: it is the hearty and uncomplicated naturalism of the camera. And it reflects itself in a rather hard-and-fast technique. Cleanth Brooks has said of the imagists in general that their method consisted largely in "pointing at objects" because they worked at that level of modernism where the prime issue was the poeticality or non-poeticality of certain phenomena. Excepting the short poems, which are increasingly free of this obsession, Brooks's remark still applies to Williams. Not only does he continue to set up a tyranny of objects under which ideas must lead a rather furtive existence, but he still prizes the arbitrary juxtapositions of the doctrinaire modernist:

Like a cylindrical tank fresh silvered upended on the sidewalk to advertise some plumber's shop, a profusion of pink roses bending ragged in the rain—speaks to me of all gentleness and its enduring.

But Williams has survived far better as an imagist than have many of the poets who once shared his faith, for example, Kenneth Rexroth and H. D. In my mind H. D.* is fatally associated with a high-school teacher who used to mystify me by chanting "Whirl up your pointed pines" as if it were the Confiteor; though doubtless it is not as silly a poem as it then appeared. Silent in England for many years, H. D. has lately brought out a volume, "The Walls Do Not Fall" (Oxford, $2), which the publishers describe as "rooted in the very midst of . . . the Blitz." It is earnest poetry, with as many ideas now as images. H. D. has discovered ancient Egypt as a source of metaphors and peace as Yeats once discovered Byzantium:

here am I, Amen-Ra,
Amen, Aries, the Ram;
time, time for you to begin a new spiral,
see—I toss you into the star-whirlpool . . .

And she has also, perhaps through the Beveridge Plan, discovered her lack of social purpose:

we are these people,
wistful, ironical, wilful,
who have no part in
new-world reconstruction,
in the confederacy of labor,
the practical issues of art and the cataloguing of utilities . . .

Kenneth Rexroth is too young to have been an imagist pur sang, but if I am right he was once associated with Williams in a roughly kindred movement called "objectivist." Like H. D. he has found the pressure of ideas too strong for the old technique. The title poem of his book, "The Phoenix and the Tortoise" (New Directions, $2.50), is a lengthy philosophical discourse, more doggerel than poetry, into which he has distilled a great deal of thought and reading.

Marx. Kropotkin. Adams. Acton
Spengler. Toynbee. Tarn building empires

From a few coins found in the cellar . . .
History . . . the price we pay for man's
First disobedience . . . John of Patmos,
The philosopher of history.

Rexroth's is an exuberant personality, but the poem will not do. It is like those long, single-spaced, unparagraphed letters on yellow scratch paper which one sometimes gets from an excitable acquaintance on vacation with a lot of deep books. A little restraint, please. Rexroth's shorter poems are better, though still disintegrated by self-indulgence and self-consciousness; their lush landscapes and passionate scenes are in debt to the prose of D. H. Lawrence. Rexroth's translations from ancient epigrammatists are excellent.

F. W. DUPEE

FICTION IN REVIEW

ONE need not be a particularly accomplished Jamesian to recognize the dominant influence in Rosamond Lehmann's "The Ballard and the Source" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2.75). Miss Lehmann's new novel is a psychological mystery of the type that Henry James delighted in, and from the precocious children who see and hear such a large part of the story, through the careful architecture of the narrative and its emphasis on psychological motive, to its atmosphere of well-bred horror "The Ballard and the Source" reveals its distinguished ancestry. Even the names of the characters suggest the connection: there is not only the girl Maisie, as an obvious instance, but also such names as Mrs. Jardine and Mr. Charles Herbert, which ring an unmistakable note of familiarity. On the other hand, there is a factitious quality to Miss Lehmann's mystery, a growing sense of mystification for its own sake or the sake only of making a good dramatic yarn, which unfortunately reminds us less of Henry James than of a superior "Rebecca."

But it is as much a part of the subtlety and delicate complication of "The Ballard and the Source" as of its mystification that it is very difficult to summarize. To say that Miss Lehmann is telling the story of a beautiful Edwardian lady the affirmation of whose will against the conventions of her society destroys her daughter's life and works its disastrous effects into the generation of her grandchildren is to make but a crude approximation of even the outline of the book; for the circles of circumstance generated by Mrs. Jardine's conduct in very young-womanhood suggest an endless widening, like the circles started by a pebble on the smooth surface of a lake. In addition, any synopsis of "The Ballard and the Source" must be inadequate to the richly modulated character of Mrs. Jardine; and it is this character—its moral color and substance—with which Miss Lehmann is chiefly and best concerned. Even at the end of the novel, when all the clues to Mrs. Jardine are in and the consequences of her behavior have been shown in their full melodrama, we are warned against a simple judgment on so much complexity. Like the child Rebecca Landon, Rosamond Lehmann's author-person, the reader is left with the heavy burden of Mrs. Jardine's ambivalent morality; even in Mrs. Jardine's lies we have been taught to see a certain truth.

Among present-day novels, that is, "The Ballad and the Source" is unusually ambitious on the moral-psychological level. Miss Lehmann, running against the current of our time, refuses to be satisfied with absolute notions of right and wrong. She also avoids the great cliché of recent fiction, the substitution of psychopathology for moral and psychological understanding—and this quite despite the psychopathological nature of the novel's climax.

In method, too, "The Ballad and the Source" is ambitious in a way that is uncommon in contemporary fiction. Miss Lehmann divides her novel into several parts, in each of which the character and history of Mrs. Jardine are presented in a fresh light; and the development of the story is handled in long narrative dialogues between Rebecca and some other person in a position to know what happened, often Mrs. Jardine herself. By the use of such devices she rejects both the internality which is so popular with present-day novelists and the straightaway factuality of traditional fiction, in favor of the artificiality, if you will, of the "constructed" tale.

And yet when one has taken into account the moral and technical imagination of Miss Lehmann's novel, and also its high literacy, one wonders why the book as a whole swings so much less than its intended weight—and I suppose it is because moral imagination is not enough; it must always be supported with moral passion. I think that what finally exposes "The Ballad and the Source" to the accusation of factitiousness is the impression Miss Lehmann conveys of caring more about the outcome of a story than about the outcome of life itself. Whatever the high degree of consciousness with which Henry James went about the business of constructing his tales, this was an error of which he was of course incapable. The obsessive identification he made between art and life—his conviction, indeed, that art was life—saved James from such an act of inverse condescension. It also made him inimitable even by a writer who, like Miss Lehmann, brings to her study of him such considerable gifts of insight and taste.

DIANA TRILLING

MOTION PICTURES

The Amazing Adventures of A FIGHTING FOOL ABOUT WOMEN

The very private life of a great lover,
soldier, fighter, hero . . . a man among men with a way . . . and what a way
. . . with women!

G. C. F. presents "COLONEL BLIMP" IN TECHNICOLOR

Starring

ANTON DEBORAH
WALBROOK • KERR
ROGER LIVESEY

Written, Directed and Produced by

Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger

Released Through United Artists

NOW! Doors Open 8:30 A.M.

Brandt's GOTHAM B'way at
47th St.

OPERA

N.Y. CITY CENTER OPERA COMPANY

SPRING SEASON APRIL 12-29 Laszlo Halasz Artistic and Musical Dir.

THE FLYING DUTCHMAN • LA TRAVIATA • LA BOHEME • GYPSY
BARON • MANON LESCAUT • CAVALLERIA • PAGLIACCI • FAUST

SEAT NOW— Matinees and Evenings: Entire Orchestra, $2.40; 1st Balcony, $2.40, $1.80; 2nd Balcony, $1.20, 90¢; Tax Included.

N. Y. CITY CENTER, 131 WEST FIFTY-FIFTH STREET
MAYOR LA GUARDIA, President

STAGE PLAYS

KATHARINE
CORNELL

BRIAN
AHERNE

THE BARRETT'S OF WIMPOLE STREET

By RUDOLF BESIER

BARRYMORE THEATRE, 47th Street w. of Broadway. CI 6-0800.

Evenings, 8:30—$1.20 to $4.20, tax included. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday, 2:30.

"The Season's most beautiful theatrical adventure."—George Jean Nathan.
Eddie DOWLING and Louis J. SINGER present

LAURETTE TAYLOR and EDDIE DOWLING in THE GLASS MENAGERIE

A New Play by TENNESSEE WILLIAMS

with JULIE HAYDON and ANTHONY ROSS

PLAYHOUSE, W. 48th Street. Evns. 8:40; Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:40

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT

Lyrics by

Music by

& DOROTHY FIELDS

DOROTHY FIELDS

SIGMUND ROMBERG

CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 59th Street. Matinee Wed. & Sat.

20 Century-Fox presents

Ernst Lubitsch's A ROYAL SCANDAL

On Stage — In Person!

HAZEL SCOTT
JACKIE MILES
DICK BROWN

SPECIAL! THE HARTMANS

Now
Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language, MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ♦ ♦ 29 LANGUAGES Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

The Jewish World Problem Solved!

by JOSEPH ERDAILY

Twain-Harte, Calif. and bookstores—50¢ "A DARING PIECE AND A PROVOCATIVE ONE!"—Reader's Digest Editors

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

- ☐ 1 Year $5      ☐ 2 Years $8
☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed    ☐ Bill me

Servicemen's Rate
$3.00 a Year

Canada $1 a year extra

Foreign $1 a year extra

Pan American Union requires no extra postage

Name.....

Address.....

4-14-45

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

IT IS not often that a first play—indeed, it is not often that any play—gets such a reception as "The Glass Menagerie" (Playhouse Theater) got from audience and from press alike. After the final curtain had descended, the unfamiliar cry of "Author! Author!" rang through the auditorium, and next morning the reviewers staged what is commonly called a dance in the streets. Undoubtedly some of this enthusiasm was for the acting and the production, especially for the performance of Laurette Taylor, who got everything that was to be had from the character of the pitiful and terrible old woman who is the central figure. But undoubtedly the enthusiasm was also and in almost equal measure for the playwright, a young man named Tennessee Williams previously known chiefly to prize committees and to the editors of avant-garde magazines.

In his first Broadway play Mr. Williams has chosen to set forth a powerful and arresting, if somewhat abruptly truncated, situation in an elaborate and highly fanciful manner. The action begins with a pretentious and inflated speech delivered in front of a blank wall by Eddie Dowling, who is several times in the course of the play to step out of his role to act as a usually unnecessary "narrator." Then the lights behind the wall go on and we see into the dismal interior of a slum flat in St. Louis presided over by an ex-Southern belle long ago deserted by her irresponsible husband and now striving desperately to arrange some sort of future for her crippled, neurotic daughter and her restless son, about whose neck the two female millstones are hanging. In her dreams this mother, now shabby and old and fat, still relives the days when she led the cotillion at the Governor's Ball and entertained seventeen callers at one time. All her vocabulary, all her standards, all her plans are in the terms of that dead past, "Gentlemen callers," "widows well provided for," and "young men of character and promise" are the figures of the mythology from which she cannot escape. She is vulgar, nagging, and unreasonable. But she is also desperate, pathetic, and gallantly hopeless in a fight against overwhelming odds—altogether, at least as Miss Taylor plays her, unforgettable as well as almost unbearable. She finally induces her son to entice a "gentleman caller" from the warehouse where he works; the gentleman caller charms the sickly daughter, and then, at the end of his first and only visit, announces his approaching marriage to someone else. The son leaves the house forever to join the merchant marine. His mother runs out after him to denounce his desertion and to show that she nevertheless is strong enough to go on with the fight. Then the lights go out, and the narrator steps again to the front of the stage. That, he announces, is the end of all the author has to tell. The imagination of the audience must supply for itself the rest of the story.

I have already said that the central character is unforgettable, and I must add my opinion that the fact is due at least as much to the writing as it is to the acting. Moreover, nothing which I am about to say should be taken as denying the fact that "The Glass Menagerie" is a remarkable play and its author a man of extraordinary talent. But there is no use failing to mention that his weaknesses are as patent as his gifts, or that very good writing and very bad writing have seldom been as conspicuous in the script of one play. It has a hard, substantial core of shrewd observation and deft, economical characterization. But this hard core is enveloped in a fuzzy haze of pretentious, sentimental, pseudo-poetic verbiage which I can compare only to the gauze screens of various degrees of filmy opacity which are annoyingly raised and lowered during the course of the physical action in order to suggest memory, the pathos of distance, and I know not what else. How a man capable of writing as firm as is some of that in this play can on other occasions abandon himself to such descriptive passages as that in which a young man is described—in Oscar Wilde's worst style—as "like white china" is a mystery. Moreover, the incongruity is almost as conspicuous between personages as it is between passages. The insubstantial, unconvincing wisp of a Little Nell whom Julie Haydon is compelled to interpret simply does not belong in the same world as the one her mother so solidly inhabits.

The limitations of a good writer are sometimes best passed over in silence. One accepts them, and one can do nothing else. But when defects are of a corrigible sort, when they seem the result of a sort of self-indulgence which is likely to grow and grow if encouraged or even tolerated, then they ought to be reprehended in some downright manner. And the defects of Mr. Williams's manner are defects of that sort. Probably he admires most in himself what is least admirable there. At the moment no doubt many agree with him. But they will not continue to do so for long. He is one of those writers who had best heed the advice: whenever you have written a line you like especially well, strike it out.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

THE ENCHANTED COTTAGE is the famous old Pinero valentine—brought up to date and from England to New England—about a homely spinster and a disfigured veteran who, because they are in love, look beautiful to each other until people who are not involved in their illusion rudely shatter—I believe one should say—their frail dream world. When I saw Richard Barthelmess and May McAvoy play it, in the early fourteenth century, I was so transfixed by it that for some weeks afterward, behind locked doors, I alternated my imitations of Mr. Barthelmess's work, with his cane and his wrung shoulder, with sculptural replicas of Miss McAvoy's hooked nose and protruding teeth. I can recommend the new Robert Young-Dorothy McGuire version to susceptible adolescents of any age, but I doubt that I can give it—or could now give the old one—a fair review, for everything about it embarrasses me too painfully for clear thought: its solemnly whimsical good intentions, its slushy philosophy and still slushier dramaturgy, the little kernels of truth which it turns into so much molasses-dipped popcorn, and the impressive variety of whimpers, snorts, eyedabs, and frantically salvaged sobs which it tickled, pleaded, pressed, shanghaied, kicked, clubbed, and above all blackmailed out of me. I have no objection to tears when they are honest ones honestly extracted—quite the contrary; and very possibly some of these were of that sort, but if so I will never know. I had too constantly to be preoccupied with the feeling that my spiritual pockets were being picked by people with sad sweet smiles who, worse still, believed in both the smiles and the thieving.

As well as I could see, however, through fears generated chiefly by helpless assailants, the movie was done quite well for the delicately vulgar sort of thing it is, especially by Robert Young and Dorothy McGuire. I can hardly imagine, for that matter, being seriously offended by Mr. Young; whatever he does, he is honest and sympathetic beyond offensiveness. Although I am happy to have to respect Miss McGuire's sensitiveness and proficiency, I can't help feeling sorry to see her use such coarse, all but village-idiot bids for pity-please as the worst she uses to communicate the heroine in her humbler phase. It is possible to get any amount of popular acclaim as an artist, in the kingdom of the blind, by relaxing to a level of acting once admired in character roles in little-theater productions; but it is deplorable and very dangerous as well, and Miss McGuire surely knows, can do, and wants, better.

I have always felt that one of the most profound and moving of relationships is that which can develop between a teacher and pupil, provided that both are alive; so I think less well of "The Corn Is Green"—which does that once over lightly, with exotic and proletarian trimmings—than I might have if I had come to it unprejudiced. I did come to it unprejudiced in another sense, for I never saw Ethel Barrymore play it. Trustworthy people tell me that she would have left me with my tongue hanging out, and by my own experience of Miss Barrymore I can find no reason to doubt it. Bette Davis left me with my tongue in my head, and I hope I can make it a civil one. I like and respect Miss Davis as a most unusually sincere and hard-working actress, and I have seen her play extremely well; but I did not find much in this performance to bring one beyond liking, respect, and, I am afraid, a kind of sympathy which no healthily functioning artist needs. It seems to me she is quite limited, which may be no sin but is a pity, and that she is limiting herself beyond her rights by becoming more and more set, official, and first-ladyish in mannerism and spirit, which is perhaps a sin as well as a pity. In any case, very little about her performance seemed to me to come to life, in spite of a lot of experienced striving which often kept in touch with life as if through a thick sheet of glass. To be sure, the role is not a deeply perceived or well-written one, and the whole play seems stolid and weak. I have a feeling that Miss Davis must have a great deal of trouble finding films which seem appropriate, feasible, and worth doing, and I wish that I,

Of Course, the Entire Intelligent World Knows that Hitler is Nuts, but Here, for the First Time, is Scientific Evidence of His Insanity

Mental Deficiency and Paranoia

Hitler's Mind and Similar Minds

By B. Liber, M. D., Psychiatrist, Director of a Mental Hygiene Clinic in N. Y. C., author of "Your Mental Health."

Just what's wrong with Hitler? We ordinary people have watched and heard him for years, with the result that we know he's a screwy as a barrel of eels, but few of us know just what it is that Hitler is afflicted with. Science knows what's wrong with his brain and nervous system, and Dr. Liber, one of our foremost psychiatrists, tells what scientific medicine knows about Hitler's mind.

In this large booklet (5 1/2 x 8 1/2 inches in size; 15,000 words), Dr. Liber piles up evidence in such a convincing way as to force the conclusion that Hitler is suffering from a serious mental disease. Being a real scientist, Dr. Liber avoids basing his opinions on superficial hearsay. Dr. Liber goes into Hitler's family history, his childhood, and down to his career as the world's greatest anti-social criminal. Dr. Liber analyzes Hitler's utterances to support this case. Hitler's speeches, writings and actions are studied scientifically for clues to his mental state.

Dr. Liber presents his case in plain, simple English. The few technical terms used in this booklet are explained. This study of Hitler is intended for the man in the street. If you'll read Dr. Liber's clear and candid pages you'll grasp every idea and opinion he wants to express. This booklet costs only 25c per copy, prepaid. Send orders to:

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS
Box H-32 Girard, Kansas

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Courses in MAGAZINE WRITING

fiction • non-fiction

The Magazine Institute, a private school owned and operated by successful writers and editors, offers practical, up-to-date training in story and article writing. You work in your own home. Every assignment you send in is returned with detailed criticism.

EXPERT INSTRUCTION. An experienced writer or editor takes you in hand, answering all your questions, helping you find the type of work for which you are naturally suited. Before long you are writing in your own home fiction stories, essays, short sketches, whatever you are best fitted to do. Send coupon today for free catalog which tells about opportunities in magazine writing.

The Magazine Institute, Inc., Dept. 94-C, Rockefeller Center, New York 20, N. Y.

Please send catalog, without obligation, to:

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

(Confidential. No salesman will call.)

or anyone else, could be of use to her in that. For very few people in her position in films mean, or could do, so well. But I doubt that anything could help much unless she were willing to discard much that goes with the position—unless, indeed, she realized the absolute necessity of doing so.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

ON THE maps, provided by critics and teachers, on which I had to depend in my youthful exploration of the world of music Berlioz was marked off as a desert: I first read about the Fantastic Symphony, for example, in the New York Times review of Mengelberg's first concert with the National Symphony in 1921, in which Richard Aldrich deplored the waste of effort on a hopelessly arid and banal work. The truth about Berlioz—as about a number of other musical matters—was something I had to discover through my own experience of the music; and one experience—a performance of "Harold in Italy" by Toscanini with the New York Philharmonic around 1930—had the effect of revelation: I found myself following Berlioz's mind in the finale with new understanding and delight; and I was now ready to appreciate fully the marvels in "Romeo and Juliet" and—I find now—the earlier movements of "Harold in Italy."

Those marvels are the product of a great melodic gift, a subtle harmonic sense, a magician's ear for the orchestra, which operate in completely individual ways in the service of an individual mind and imagination. The Berlioz melody is an exfoliating progression, with unexpected turns and exquisite inflections which pivot on, and are enriched by, equally unexpected and exquisite moves in the underlying harmony, and with further enrichment by the instrumental colors. You can hear all this in the second movement of "Harold"—in the developing series of statements by the strings, each moving unpredictably to its conclusion in a sustained note that is echoed by a magical note of the horn and wonderful murmurings of the other winds. And in the third movement, where, after preliminary pastoral pipings, the English horn begins a serenade with two simple phrases which leave you unprepared for the ravishing subtleties of melodic turn of phrase and harmonic and instrumental coloring that follow. As for the finale, there the Berlioz mind runs riot in an extreme dynamic and rhythmic activation of the material—by sharp contrasts of loud and soft and sudden crescendos and decrescendos in the brilliant sonorities; by antiphonal tossing of them between choirs of the orchestra; and above all by abrupt shifts in their rhythmic impetus through irregularities of accent, grouping, and so on.

Victor's new recording of Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony and William Primrose as viola soloist (Set 989; $5.50) has enabled me to document my dissatisfaction with the performance when I heard it in Carnegie Hall last November. The work did not have the effect I remembered and expected; and I was aware of one thing that lessened its effectiveness: its sections fell apart into detached episodes, instead of cohering in a unified utterance. And I can see now that the performance is the product of a man with an ear for sonority but no feeling for pace—either for the single tempo that will give a passage of music its right character and meaning, or for the several tempos that will give the sections of a piece of music coherence.

If it had been Koussevitzky's performance of the finale that I had heard in 1930 I doubt that the effect would have been revelation; for at his slow pace the music hasn't the lightness and élan it should have, but is stodgy and heavy. In the third movement Berlioz gives a metronome number for the Allegro assai of the introductory section, and another metronome number for the Allegretto of the serenade to implement his direction that the dotted quarter-note of the Allegretto shall equal the dotted half-note of the Allegro assai—or in other words that one measure of the Allegretto shall take the time of two measures of the Allegro assai. But Koussevitzky slows down the Allegretto, altering its relation to the Allegro assai, and changing what Berlioz intended as a fairly animated serenade into a rather lugubrious lament. Later in the movement there is a repetition of the Allegro assai leading again to the Allegretto; and this time Berlioz further integrates the two by continuing the sharply rhythmized accompaniment-figure of the Allegro assai into the half-as-fast Allegretto as a background for the serenade. Clearly the accompaniment-figure must continue unaltered in speed and character, and Berlioz's directions for the two tempos must be obeyed literally; but Koussevitzky again slows down the Allegretto, and with it the accompaniment-figure of the Allegro assai. And there is another example of this involving two movements: when the viola solo of the introduction of the first movement recurs in the course of the second movement it should move at the same pace—as it does if one takes Berlioz's tempos for the movements; but with Koussevitzky's altered tempos it comes out enormously slower in the second movement.

The sound of the performance in Carnegie Hall was phenomenally beautiful; but the recording was made in Symphony Hall, which is over-brilliant even when filled; and though the press-release about the recording said a curtain had been hung to eliminate the echoing of the empty hall, the brilliance of the fast and loud passages comes off the records blurred and noisy from reverberation such as I do not recall in any previous Boston Symphony recording (some of the noise, however, is caused by Koussevitzky's disregard of some of the pp's that Berlioz opposes to the ff's). But the slow and quiet portions of the work are beautifully reproduced. In my review copy there are a few buzzes and two sides with wavering pitch (in addition to a few notes which Primrose does not hit accurately).

With its defects of performance and recording the set will not give you all the beauty that is in the work; but it will give you enough to make it a set you should not fail to acquire. Given the sound of the serenade or the finale, you may be able to imagine it in its correct tempo.

CONTRIBUTORS

JOE FROMM served in the American Field Service in Africa and Italy. He is now a free-lance writer.

GENE REA, a war correspondent in Italy for Overseas Press, was born in Naples, the eighteenth of twenty-four children, but educated in this country.

HAL LEHRMAN, The Nation's correspondent in the Mediterranean area, was formerly head of the OWI office in Istanbul.

ERIC SEVAREID is a war correspondent for the Columbia Broadcasting System.

WILLIAM BERRIEN is professor of Romance languages and literatures at Harvard University.

MARKOOSHA FISCHER, a native of Russia, became an American citizen in 1939. She is the author of "My Lives in Russia."

Letters to the Editors

FORUM ON PEACE-TIME CONSCRIPTION

[Other letters on this subject were printed last week.]

Conscription vs. Democracy

Dear Sirs: Compulsory military training, as a permanent policy, is indefensible. We must of course maintain a fairly large army for the occupation of enemy territory for some years after the war, but this cannot be done by short-term trainees. We must also have a vigorous navy and air force to help implement the Dumbarton Oaks agreements. The thing we do not need is the only thing that compulsory military training could give us—a permanent mass army.

Even if the outline of a third world war were already visible, what good would compulsory military training do us at this point? What good would it have done at the time of Pearl Harbor to have a trained army of ten million unless we also had the arms? There will always be time to give men a year of training before their weapons are ready—unless we are to fight with obsolete weapons or maintain war production almost at present levels. Both are unthinkable. What we shall need is a relatively small, alert, well-paid force of expert planners, researchers, and technicians, to provide a foundation and framework for the quick building of a great citizen army if we ever need one.

But, it is argued, compulsory military training is good in itself—it provides valuable experience for those who undergo it. Ask anyone now in the armed forces whether he has been taught anything except one specific job aimed at one specific goal—winning this particular war. Do we want the army, after all, to teach men anything else? Can it, under a system of compulsory military training, permanently improve health more than a well-planned civilian program? Can it provide better training for a technical civilian job than a civilian technical school? Can it educate men for democratic citizenship better than a civilian system of education? Even to ask these questions is absurd.

And what will army life teach our peace-time conscripts? It will teach them to obey orders—with a minimum of exertion and intelligence; to use leisure time—in the most unrewarding ways; it will teach some of them how to avoid suffering in body or conscience—while casting aside the moral restraints that civilian life imposes; and it will try to teach them not to think for themselves, not to be free individuals in a democratic community.

In war these evils are part of the price that we must and can afford to pay. In peace time they offer no return.

ELLSWORTH BARNARD

Alfred, N. Y., March 5

Conscription vs. Cooperation

Dear Sirs: I especially liked Dr. Nollen's emphasis of the fact that to get full results from cooperation one must give full support to it, a thing we could not do if we were to establish compulsory military training. It would be as if a man were to sit praising the police and the courts, while he kept his hand on the gun in his pocket, ready to shoot the first person who molested him.

G. STUART LOCKE

Newtonville, Mass., February 27

Calling Mr. Bolte

Dear Sirs: I should like to take issue with Charles Bolté's argument for conscription on two counts. He writes: "It would be folly . . . to overlook the possibility that . . . we might export unemployment, causing world-wide economic chaos, always an incentive to war; or that either England or Russia might . . . seek to strengthen Germany against the other, which would inevitably draw us in when the conflict came. . . ." In that case should American liberals support war?

We support the present war because we consider Hitler and his slavery a worse alternative. I, for one, still believe that we are fighting for a better world. If I did not, I would oppose the war. But I do not care to promise my support, however insignificant, or to urge preparation for future wars which may be fought for imperialism or power politics. Certainly I cannot understand the point of view of a liberal who urges us to start preparing immediately to fight for the interests of the American airline companies.

My second objection is a question to Mr. Bolté. If the American people start immediately after the peace to rearm, shall we not invite England and Russia to enter into an armaments race against us? I can see no other reason to arm except to be ready to take on tremendous opponents. It is obvious this would foster distrust among the Allies and very likely interfere with our united efforts to enforce peace. But worse—I know of no instance in history where an armaments race did not result in war.

EDITH UDELL

New York, March 21

Dear Sirs: Mr. Bolté accepts the principle that the United States is the most probable aggressor against the welfare of the human race—and for strictly business motives. His arguments will surely persuade most liberals that now, as always before, "realism" and "pessimism" are synonyms in the militarist's vocabulary. Are we so sunk in this pessimism, so certain of disaster, that rather than prepare for peace through general disarmament we will spend billions in setting the stage for war? Anyone who genuinely embraced Bolté's fatalism should follow its logic and commit suicide.

ALTON R. HODGKINS

New Orleans, La., March 27

Dear Sirs: Mr. Bolté's article favoring peace-time conscription contains so many true and acute observations that one is the more astonished at the weak and even absurd character of his chief argument.

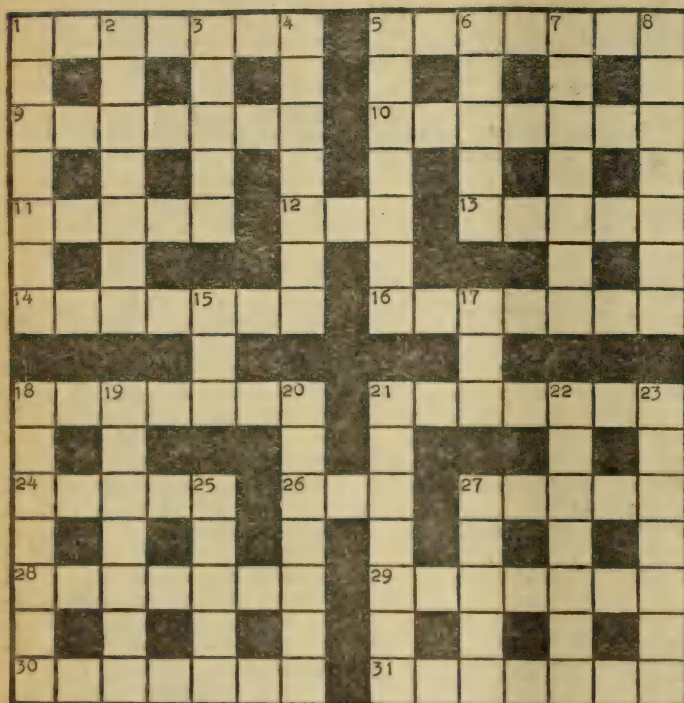

He says we must have trained conscript reserves in practically unlimited number because "our relatively small professional army might be decimated in the first week of any future war." Just exactly what would become of these reserves with the whole standing force wiped out in one week? Then there is the choice bit about putting every American boy in the future through the army because one of Mr. Bolté's correspondents assures him that "any G. I. will tell you that to really hate the army you have to be in it a while." The army will presumably be out with new slogans soon: "We guarantee to make you hate the army—but hard"; or "For the love of peace, enlist!"

A. J. MUSTE,

Fellowship of Reconciliation
New York, March 29

Crossword Puzzle No. 111

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Shylock's beautiful daughter
- 5 Conspirator
- 9 Author of "A Message to Garcia"
- 10 College graduate
- 11 Wide-awake solvers don't do this
- 12 Yale
- 13 A matter, sub rosa, that is painfully touching
- 14 Delicate degrees of difference
- 16 Mournful ballads
- 18 Better known to you, perhaps, as tusseh-silk
- 21 Undoubtedly the shortest month for bill payers
- 24 Provide in a crate
- 26 A dwarf
- 27 This place sounds something like!
- 28 Obliteration
- 29 Get to know again
- 30 The one "who done it" perhaps
- 31 "----- with coy submission, modest pride, And sweet, reluctant, amorous delay" (Paradise Lost)

DOWN

- 1 When this Samuel's mother called him a puppy, he inquired if she knew what a puppy's mother was called
- 2 A term used in this list of clues (two words, 3 and 4)
- 3 Living likeness
- 4 Place of abode
- 5 A four-legged animal with feathers
- 6 Continue somewhere late

- 7 Periodical wind of the Indian Ocean
- 8 Insurrections
- 15 Bird cry
- 17 "Nature's sole mistake"
- 18 Marked cards
- 19 Sparta's turned to petty despots, it seems
- 20 It would take a lot of faith to move this one
- 21 He once spoke disrespectfully of the Equator
- 22 A brassard
- 23 Pined
- 25 "The blood more stirs To ----- a lion than to start a hare!" (Henry IV)
- 27 Rescue—even if L is knocked out of it

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 110

ACROSS:—1 HABIT; 6 LET-UP; 9 EDUCATE; 10 MAXIM; 11 OMBRE; 12 PATERN; 14 NASALS; 19 OILERS; 22 RECTITUDE; 23 SIAM; 24 GODS; 25 LAND; 26 IDOL; 27 SAGE; 29 FYOT; 30 SCENTLESS; 33 DODSON; 35 AISLES; 38 STRANDS; 41 ALBERT; 42 TRA LA; 43 EPISTLE; 44 HOMER; 45 RENTS.

DOWN:—1 HAMAN; 2 BOXES; 3 TEMPLE; 4 SUIT; 5 MANE; 6 LEONID; 7 TABLE; 8 POETS; 13 ASCENDENT; 14 TRIO; 15 ROUNDHEAD; 17 ANIMATO; 18 ARMLESS; 20 LEGLESS; 21 RED ROSE; 28 ETNA; 31 COSTER; 32 SISTER; 33 DEATH; 34 DREAM; 36 LEARN; 37 SPATS; 39 RUIN; 40 NUTS.

"Another Law"

Dear Sirs: While I completely agree with Dr. Nollen's article so far as it goes, I believe it should clarify what is meant in the final paragraph by the "important moral implications" of the problem. Indeed, I find that word "moral" inadequate to characterize the change of center which must come into human hearts if the United Nations Conference in San Francisco is to lay the foundations of a new and better life for all the world. The only way to bring forth new life is to plant a seed that has life in it. That is an act of faith, not "primarily political and economic," but religious.

Some weeks ago Reinhold Niebuhr considered, in an address in this neighborhood, the awful possibility that despite our desire for a better world for all nations we may nevertheless fail to set up such a world for the reason intimated by St. Paul when he said, "I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind." This other law, which is the self in man, is not a law in the sense that obedience to it is required, but is an innate leaning with the power of compulsion. If we bring that nature to the peace conference, who would expect it to achieve a peace? Or a cooperative world? Mr. Niebuhr has a searching eye for human motives; there is reason to fear he could be right.

RUTH GEORGE

Claremont, Cal., March 4

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

62c a line (six words)

Minimum 3 lines

$6.16 an inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions.

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., N. Y. 7, N. Y.

BArcley 7-1066

THE Nation

NOV 8

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • APRIL 21, 1945

NUMBER 16

End of an Era

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

THE shock of the President's death, the profound dismay, as powerfully felt in Moscow and Paris and Mexico City as in Washington, spring from something even deeper than love and respect for a great leader. The people have lost a leader, but they have lost something more. With the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt an era has ended; and the people of the world are moved by apprehension as well as sorrow.

This feeling has little to do with the personality or purposes of the new President; little to do with the great tasks of finishing a war and making a peace. It has everything to do with the role Mr. Roosevelt has played, the degree to which he came to symbolize, for a whole struggling generation, their hope of security and freedom, of release from intolerable oppression.

We may tell ourselves, as hundreds of leading citizens are daily telling us in print and over the air, that we must face with something of Mr. Roosevelt's own courage the battles that lie ahead; we may explain to ourselves the excellent resources of compensation and recuperation to be found in the democratic system of government. But these reminders are hardly necessary. For neither the American people nor the people of other lands will yield to despair. They will do their duty, and our government will adjust itself to its loss. Without doubt every official in Washington, from Mr. Truman down, has summoned all his powers to meet the challenge the death of his chief has flung down. This rallying of forces may be taken for granted. But even courage and a sense of responsibility will not be enough to exorcise the deep uneasiness that has lent a tone of desperation to the great outpouring of emotion we have witnessed. When people lose a friend they grieve; when they lose a cherished symbol their world is shaken.

It is necessary to recognize and examine this fact. President Roosevelt's hold on the imagination of people everywhere is a phenomenon whose immense political importance will be even more apparent now than while he lived. We shall realize now to what degree he was identified in the minds of men and women in other countries with the disinterested power of America, its reckless vitality, its commitment to the cause of freedom and international recuperation. All these qualities with which a suffering world has hopefully endowed this country were embodied in the person of our dead President. To countless millions, he was America.

Drawing by Charles Liedl. Courtesy PM.

We shall realize, too, how completely he had come to represent in our own minds similar elements in the nation's domestic make-up. The ordinary people of the United States had, to an extraordinary degree, accepted the President's acts as a measure of the country's advancement and consigned to his hands their interests and hopes. They did not trust the Democratic Party or the Administration as a whole; they trusted Roosevelt. Even when he seemed to compromise or retreat they were content to wait until he found it expedient to swing back to his own basic line. To millions of Americans, he was the New Deal, all it gave or promised them personally.

The political consequences of this sense of identification between the leader who has gone and the people who followed him will be felt in every part of our society. Men fighting in the mountains of northern Italy, workers on assembly lines in Detroit or Los Angeles will be inclined to new ways of thinking and acting because he is dead. Heads of states will orient their policies differently. Business men will make new plans.

When I say an era has ended I do not imply that the Administration under the leadership of Harry S. Truman will move to wipe out the social gains of the past twelve years or falter in the prosecution of the war and the preparation for peace. That nothing drastic will happen is indicated by the first acts of the new President. It may even turn out that certain important measures planned and initiated by Mr. Roosevelt will be carried through more easily by Mr. Truman. The very fact that he is a neutral figure and a conciliatory sort of man may tend to dissolve the tensions that had developed around the towering person of his predecessor. The Administration will do all it can, I believe, to mitigate the anxiety of the people, here and abroad, by maintaining at least for the immediate future the program and governmental set-up established under Mr. Roosevelt.

But a basic change has occurred just the same, and it would be dishonest to deny it. The balance of political forces has shifted to the right. Anti-Roosevelt newspapers announce this with decorous satisfaction even in the midst of their eulogies of the late President. The shift will probably be an unobtrusive one; men will be brought to greater power whom the President also used; other men will resign not because they are thrust out but because they will no longer feel the underlying democratic drift that sustained so many progressive office-holders in spite of disappointments and setbacks. The "right-of-center, feet-on-the-ground liberalism" of Harry S. Truman will gradually be translated into practical political language.

If the substance of the New Deal is to be salvaged and if this country is to adopt the measures necessary to prevent post-war collapse and unemployment and the political consequences that would follow them, a new and much more solid alignment of progressive forces is called for. Even under the influence of Mr. Roosevelt these forces had to create all the pressure they could muster to offset the pressure from the right. Now they are on their own, with a harder job to do. They will succeed only if they realize their exact situation and make plans to meet it.

That situation has been partly shaped by the profound identification referred to above between the people—especially the people with conscious progressive leanings—and the leader they have lost. Throughout the last twelve years the progressive political movement in this country has slowly crystallized around Mr. Roosevelt. It has not developed—or had a chance to develop—an independent program or national leadership. The most effective, politically conscious sections of organized labor owe their very birth and growth to the New Deal. Roosevelt has been their leader and their permanent candidate; he has been the image of their hopes. In the President and the New Deal lay the strength of the whole progressive movement—and its weakness. In the degree to which American progressivism has been dependent on the President, it must experience a readjustment of values, a process of reintegration, before it can face adequately the new demands which will be made upon it. The progressive forces in America will have to grow up now and grow up fast. Events will not wait upon a slow process of maturing.

Luckily some progress toward independence has been measured in the last year. The forces marshaled in the C. I. O.-Political Action Committee have shown already their capacity for discipline and militant action. That they drew much of their vitality from their union with the President cannot be denied: it was the P. A. C. fighting for Franklin D. Roosevelt that generated power. But the workers who provide the mass base for the committee are a cohesive group that can develop its own program and find its own candidates. At present it is strongly opposed to the idea of a third party. That attitude was inevitable during the Roosevelt era; whether it can be maintained in the future depends upon a variety of factors. Chief among them will be its success in the 1946 elections. The Congressional fight next year will provide the first major test of the capacity, not only of the P. A. C. but of American progressives of all sorts, to meet the challenge of independent political action.

Leaders must be found. Many will undoubtedly come out of the labor movement; Sidney Hillman himself is fast achieving stature as a national figure. Others will come out of the ranks of the government. The future of such men as Mr. Wallace and Mr. Ickes is uncertain; sooner or later they may be available. And one person who has been cut off from active political leadership is now, tragically, released for a new role: Eleanor Roosevelt, the best New Dealer of them all, should certainly be pressed into service. We know her well enough to feel certain that neither grief nor desire for rest and retirement will for long isolate her from the fight to which she has contributed so much energy and valor and wisdom.

The death of Mr. Roosevelt may mean the coming of age of the progressive political forces in America. If it means that, then slowly the dismay of the people, here and throughout the world, will be replaced by a new sense of power and confidence.

America and the Coalition

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

THE deep anxiety with which the world learned of the death of President Roosevelt proves how delicate and complicated is considered the task of organizing the peace. It was the most eloquent recognition that, complete as the military victory of the United Nations is certain to be, the political problems multiplying ahead of us are both difficult and decisive. Most important of them all is the problem of maintaining unity among the victors in the years to come.

We must not forget that the war will end with fascism defeated in the field but still alive and waiting to benefit by any disagreement among the Allies. The problem is too large to be solved by the punishment of a few thousand war criminals or by spectacular trials of fascists and collaborators. The only guaranty against the success of the Nazi plan for surviving military defeat lies in Allied unity. That is why it was necessary to support the decisions made at Yalta; Yalta cemented the coalition, and the continuance of cooperation among Russia, Britain, and the United States is the essential condition of peace. We may hope that the coalition will be strengthened, enlarged, made more democratic—but it must be maintained. That President Roosevelt understood. He understood what everyone with a sense of political responsibility would have understood if controversies over Russia had not distorted their political thinking—the absolute necessity of working closely with the Soviet Union.

The realistic approach manifested in Mr. Churchill's now famous speech on the day Germany attacked Russia won overwhelming approval. President Roosevelt carried forward Mr. Churchill's realism. He saw beyond the hour when Germany would collapse, a beaten nation, and was convinced of the need, not only for emergency collaboration, but for permanent collaboration. The Russians realized this very clearly. I do not mean that they rubbed their hands over the concessions they could win from the President, but that they were relieved at last of the heavy burden of mistrust they had borne for two and a half decades. At the head of the strongest nation in the world was a man who believed that the future of his country was dependent upon the future of the coalition.

The coalition is at a stage when mutual confidence among the three national leaders is of primary importance to the forging of a completely articulated policy and to the content of a pact of unity. Just at this critical stage one of the three has disappeared—the one who stood at the center, the one best qualified to exercise a conciliatory influence at a moment of crisis. The President of the United States spoke for a country less directly involved in controversial European issues than the other two chief members of the coalition. He could play the role of an intermediary between the divergent interests of the Russian non-capitalist state and the British Tory government. He was a master of the art of finding a workable compromise between opposing political tendencies.

Now that he is no longer with us, even greater vigilance must be exercised to prevent irreparable setbacks during the testing period of the coalition—that is, in the first year or two after the war. That there was no constructive alternative to the course followed by Roosevelt is proved by the fact that the first important step in foreign affairs taken by his successor was to ask Stalin to send Molotov to San Francisco. The promptness with which Moscow agreed indicates, on the other hand, that the Soviet Union is unwilling to risk being held responsible for any weakening of the coalition or for possible damage to the conference.

It should not be forgotten that terrible injury might be caused to the structure of peace without an open break between the major Allies. Indeed, a break is almost inconceivable. But it would be enough if one of the members of the coalition should retreat into any kind of isolation or separatism and, instead of building its policy on mutual confidence, should build it exclusively on its own strength. If that should happen, an era of unilateral faits accomplis would inevitably follow.

Vigilance on the part of the progressive forces must be greater than ever because, as could have been expected, reaction is everywhere on the offensive and will not hesitate to take full advantage of the disappearance of one of the chief architects of the coalition. If any new proof were needed that the fight ahead will be a hard one, we have the statement of the Catholic archbishops and bishops of the United States on San Francisco, pronouncing "democracy and Marxism incompatible" and filled from beginning to end with an irreconcilably anti-Russian spirit. This document manages to combine legitimate criticism of the weaknesses of Dumbarton Oaks with an underlying attack on the whole idea of collaboration. Like so many political pronouncements of the church, it is liberalism firmly rooted in reaction. It must be taken as a threat; the first openly aggressive move against the Allied security plan and the work of President Roosevelt.

Support Bretton Woods

EVERY organization which wishes to see a stable peace achieved must throw every ounce of its energies into the fight to obtain Congressional approval of the Bretton Woods monetary agreements. If we cannot win the Bretton Woods battle in Congress, it is unlikely that we can muster the strength necessary to obtain a two-thirds' vote in the Senate for the new international peace organization. And even if the plans made at Dumbarton Oaks and San Francisco are approved, a new world security organization cannot be built without the Bretton Woods agreements. We cannot have world political stability if the nations of the earth feel free to, even compelled to, indulge in competitive currency depreciation. Nations engaged in cutthroat monetary competition cannot be expected to remain friendly. The Bretton Woods agreements, as Assistant Secretary of State Dean Acheson said in his extraordinarily able presentation of the issues before the House Banking and Currency Committee recently, represent "a sort of economic disarmament." Their basis, Acheson well declared, "is the conception of an expanding economy and collective security through common action."

An odd coalition of big New York bankers, high-tariff advocates, silverites, and isolationists are opposing the Bretton Woods agreements, as are those who are covertly sympathetic to Nazi revival after the war. With the exception of the silverites, who may yet be won over, these opponents fear an expanding full-employment economy after the war. W. Randolph Burgess, president of the American Bankers Association, indicated as much in his testimony against the proposed international monetary-stabilization fund. It was pointed out to him that the United States and the British Commonwealth between them would have a majority of the votes on the Fund, and he was asked by Mrs. Woodhouse of Connecticut whether this Anglo-American majority would not be a sufficient guaranty of conservative management. Burgess said he wasn't sure about Britain. "She is very much dependent on her trade with other countries who will buy from her," he said, "so it will be to her interest, immediately after the war, to have an expanding world trade, so that I am not sure she will be on the side of going carefully."

"The Bretton Woods agreements," Secretary Morgenthau explained to the committee in a lucid and graphic opening statement, "deal with two problems. One is the problem of providing capital to repair the devastation of war and for development purposes. The other is the problem of establishing a system of fair monetary practices that will promote trade instead of hindering it." The Bank is so super-conservative in its set-up that even the big New York bankers can hardly oppose it openly, though they prefer the old Bank for International Settlements, which they and their opposite numbers abroad could more easily control. The Wall Street crowd, the tail which wags the dog of the American Bankers Association, say they are for the Bank but not the Fund. They would have currency-stabilization loans made by the Bank itself.

This is an odd and a dangerous position. We stand to gain most from the Fund. At Bretton Woods the right to membership in the Bank was made conditional on participation in the Fund. The Bank, in a sense, was the sugar-coating for the Fund. This is because the Fund is more than a source of currency-stabilization, short-term loans. It is the heart of a multilateral agreement to maintain stable currencies. As Edward E. Brown, the thoughtful and progressive chairman of the board of the First National Bank of Chicago, explained to the committee, the Fund would "end the nuisance of multiple currencies . . . do away with competitive exchange depreciation . . . prevent the use of currency manipulation and depreciation for predatory political and economic purposes." To scrap the Fund is to scrap the agreements that go with it.

The big New York bankers like Winthrop Aldrich of Chase National, who are fighting Bretton Woods, stand to lose by it in a political sense. They would no longer be able to dictate reactionary and deflationary policies to borrowing countries. They and their opposite numbers could no longer use flights of capital to blackjack progressive governments, as was done to the Popular Front in France. But for American workers, farmers, business men, and the rank and file of bankers Bretton Woods offers a means of stabilizing and expanding world economy and world markets. Wall Street's dog-in-the-manger attitude must not be allowed to block the greatest single step we could take to a secure world.

The Shape of Things

ELEANOR ROOSEVELT'S GREATNESS WAS NEVER more apparent than in the tragic hours immediately after she heard the news of the President's death. "I am more sorry for the people of the country and the world than I am for us," was her first response; it revealed an inner nobility of spirit; a quick sure insight into the full meaning of tragedy that lifted her above the sudden shock of personal loss. When she cabled her four sons, "He did his job to the end as he would want you to do," it was as if she anticipated the renewed resolve that must have come into the heart of every soldier, sailor, and airman when the news reached him. And when she said to the new President, "Tell us what we can do to help," she spoke for millions of grief-stricken American citizens who wished to insure by some personal commitment that Franklin Delano Roosevelt's work would go on. During the twelve years she was in the White House, Mrs. Roosevelt came to be the spokesman and the conscience of the common people of America. Her courage, her wisdom, and above all her unflinching devotion to the cause of the neglected and the oppressed are needed for the months ahead. There is more than a little sense in the suggestion of one columnist that Mrs. Roosevelt be appointed in some special capacity to our delegation at San Francisco.

★

THE NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE PAUSED briefly the morning after President Roosevelt died and closed down on the day of his funeral. More impressive than these formal marks of respect was the real tribute of the specutors. On that Friday morning, after a short period of hesitation, the orders flooded in, and the Exchange enjoyed its most active day since March 9. The real inspiration for this bout of buying was indicated by marked concentration on the public-utilities stocks. Issues like Consolidated Edison, which seldom move more than a quarter point in a day, jumped more than a full point. "The market," the New York Sun's always frank commentator noted, "must have felt that somehow the public-utility companies at last had found a friend at Washington, or that at least under the new Administration the driving power that had created TVA would be lacking." We hope that the expectations on which this indecent demonstration was based will be disappointed. Ordinary citizens, noting this open acknowledgment that the utilities have lost an enemy, will be confirmed in their conviction that they have lost a friend.

★

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S FIRST ADDRESS TO THE Congress, the nation, and the world was exactly what everyone expected it to be—a pledge to carry the war to complete victory, to build an enduring peace based on law and justice, and to continue the struggle to improve the lot of the common people at home and abroad. It will give no comfort to the enemy. The President made it clear that he will continue the policies of Roosevelt, and he bespoke the support of all Americans. It was the rather ordinary eloquent speech of a plain "God-fearing" man; it was also direct and sincere. It showed a genuine humility, a sense of the great responsibilities of his position, and a recognition of the magnitude and difficulty of the tasks ahead—they will take "time and tolerance and an abiding faith in people." His speech also had an air of unassuming confidence both in his own capacities and in the support and help at his disposal.

★

ALTHOUGH THE NEW SOFT COAL CONTRACT contains only a small part of the miners' original demands, it represents another major victory for John L. Lewis. The pay boost in itself is substantial. Miners working a fifty-four-hour week on the day shift will receive $63.50 as compared with $57.06 under the old contract. In addition, a differential is established in favor of miners working on the second and third shifts, and the principle of portal-to-portal pay has been strengthened by provision for full pay for an hour underground travel time. In view of the hazardous and uncertain nature of mine employment, it is difficult to take exception to any of these concessions, even though they do increase the costs of coal production slightly. We can only wish that the mine operators had not played into Lewis's hands by their peremptory rejection of the compromise plan offered by Secretary Perkins a fortnight ago, thus precipitating a series of unauthorized strikes which caused a serious loss in coal production. The final settlement differed only in slight detail from Miss Perkins's plan. But by delaying the settlement while blast furnaces were closing down for want of coal, the operators forfeited the right to such public support as they had in the dealings with Lewis. As a result, the miners are likely to find wider acceptance of their contention that only a ruthless bargainer could fully serve their interests.

THE SHOCKING CONDITION OF MANY OF THE American war prisoners liberated from Nazi hospitals and prison camps has awakened the public, as perhaps nothing else could, to the necessity for a firm policy toward the individuals responsible for these and other crimes against humanity. Americans who have husbands, sons, and brothers in the German camps now share the personal anguish and indignation which tens of millions of Russians, Poles, French, Czechs, and other Europeans feel toward the men who have tortured and slain their loved ones. Yet apart from an announcement by the United Nations War Crimes Commission that it was compiling a list of war criminals, no coordinated program has been worked out for bringing the responsible men before the bar of justice. There is still no procedure for the apprehension and punishment of these individuals, and no central authority to give orders that such a procedure be set in motion. Although Under Secretary Grew has said that he believes the Axis criminals should be punished for crimes against their fellow-nationals as well as against citizens of the United Nations, this view has never been indorsed by either the State Department or the British Foreign Office. Neither the United States nor Britain has set up machinery for bringing Axis criminals to court. No policy has been worked out for dealing with the members of the Gestapo, although their job has been essentially criminal in nature. Since the War Crimes Commission has shown that it is utterly incapable of dealing with the problem, the American government should support the Czech proposal that the matter be brought before the San Francisco conference. It is idle to plan for permanent security while the men responsible for this war and its wholesale atrocities are permitted full freedom to prepare new outrages against humanity.

✱

FRANZ VON PAPEN IS THE FIRST NAZI RAT of any size or pedigree to be picked off a life raft since Hitler's ship went into its death plunge. He apparently considered it convenient to be in the Ruhr when the Americans surrounded it rather than remain in Berlin and run the risk of capture by the Russians or move south with his colleagues for the Wagnerian payoff. Franz does not like payoffs and up to now has been fairly agile in avoiding them. A Prussian by birth and training, he was German military attaché in Washington during World War I and was organizer of sabotage in war factories. During the Weimar Republic he appreciated the growing strength of National Socialism, and in 1932, when he had become Chancellor of the Reich, he removed by force the legally constituted Social Democratic government of Prussia. A few months later he was instrumental in bringing Hitler to power. A congenital double-crosser, he barely escaped the blood purge of June, 1934. Hindenburg's generals coming to the rescue in the nick of time. Von Papen won his way back into his Führer's good graces by using his post as Ambassador to Vienna to prepare Austria for the Nazi banquet. His later attempts in Ankara were less successful, if equally assiduous. Herr Franz von Papen is a shifty customer. No doubt at this moment he is seeking to advise us on what to do with Germany and offering us his skilled services. He will probably pose something of a problem to the War Crimes Commission. For, in the words of Ernst Jaeckh, he is merely "the soul and brains of the Nazi conspiracy that pushed Hitler into the Chancellery." Just a top Nazi, that's all. No single act of murder or torture traceable to him. Just one of the perverted geniuses most responsible for the plague that has laid waste a world.

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

End of an Era by Freda Kirchwey	429
America and the Coalition by J. Alvarez Del Vayo	430
Support Bretton Woods	431
The Shape of Things	432

ARTICLES

Roosevelt as Strategist by Charles G. Bolié	434
Not Since Lincoln by Harold J. Laski	435
Farewell to F. D. R. by I. F. Stone	436
75 Years Ago in The Nation	437
Portrait of Truman by Margaret Marshall	438
The Foundations of Democracy by Jacques Maritain	440
In the Wind	442

POLITICAL WAR

Fascism Wins a Round by Allen Haden	443
Notes from the Argentine Underground	444
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	444

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Siegfried by Randall Jarrell	447
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	447
The Revolution of '89 by Albert Guérard	452
Full Employment and World Trade by Keith Hutchison	452
Briefer Comment	454
Verse Chronicle: Frost and Tate by F. W. Dupee	464
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	466
Art by Clement Greenberg	469
Films by James Agee	469
Music by B. H. Haggin	470

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 112 by Jack Barrett	472
---	-----

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

Roosevelt as Strategist

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

SIR THOMAS BEECHAM, with his unerring instinct for the fitness of things, played Siegfried's Funeral March at four o'clock last Saturday as the services began in the East Room of the White House. At that singularly affecting moment of the civilized world's deep sorrow, nothing could have been more appropriate than the dark, brooding threnody for the dead, dearly beloved military hero. It seemed to be of little consequence that the composer was a German, favorite of the man whose downfall had been chiefly engineered by the very one thus remembered.

For this thousand-sided man was preeminently a military leader, and it seems certain that history will credit him with being the chief architect of victory in this great war. As it was the greatest, most far-flung, and most complex of all wars, so was his achievement the greater—the establishment and maintenance of a mammoth coalition which on a dozen fronts, on land and sea and in the air, has brought nearly to defeat the two most dangerous enemies ever faced by the Republic.

It is bitterly ironic that he should have died almost in the moment of victory; yet his work had been done so carefully and surely that his death cannot alter the shape or the manner of that victory. In this as in other respects he differs from past leaders of coalitions, whose deaths signaled the splitting asunder of the coalitions and a weakening of the united determination to achieve or to secure the victory. Here it may be that much of the difference was due to his unique status as a democratic leader, whose power rested upon, and was never stronger than, the joint power of all the people, on whose reservoirs of energy and productiveness and talent he drew.

Often criticized as a believer in one-man government, he was of course in military matters the outstanding exemplar of the ability to achieve maximum results through the co-ordination of personalities, branches of the service, and national members of the Grand Alliance. In a moment of impending national crisis he brought Republicans into his Cabinet to head the two vital departments of national defense. He strove constantly for, and in large degree achieved, an end of inter-service rivalry and the establishment of teamwork among American soldiers, sailors, marines, and airmen, without which the amphibious operations of Europe and the Pacific would have been impossible. Finally, through his own concentration on the main job of defeating the enemy, his insistence on consultation among the chief Allied war leaders, and his continual efforts to broaden the area of cooperation among the United Nations, he more than anyone else established the coalition which is winning the victory and which can now go on to win the peace.

In terms of military strategy he always maintained the objective—in sporting terms, he kept his eye on the ball—which was and remains the destruction of our enemies' power to wage war. He observed the principle of the concentration of effort, and in keeping with this fundamental principle made the first great American strategic decision of the war, which was to defeat Germany first and then turn in full strength on Japan. This decision, failing which we very probably would never have been able to win the war, also recognized the sound rule of reinforcing strength rather than weakness—that is, of applying maximum effort where results are most likely rather than throwing good money after bad. His earlier and heroic struggle for lend-lease had already enabled us to put our production on the firing-line, killing Germans through British and Russian hands; now this decision led to the stepped-up bombing of Germany, to the North African invasion—of which he was primarily the author—to the expulsion of Italy from the war, to the Normandy landings, and to the impending destruction of Germany.

Although the decision was to defeat Germany first, the miracles of war production, of shipbuilding, and of training millions of first-class fighting men which were carried forward under his direction—and with himself ultimately responsible for any failure, never forget—made it possible for America to carry the Pacific war right to the grounds of the Emperor's palace. Alone among world leaders he had to conduct two major wars on opposite sides of the world at the same time: the measure of Allied success in those two wars is in large part the measure of his greatness as war leader, strategist, and commander-in-chief.

He leaves us with decisive victory assured, the European war in its last gasps, the Pacific war entering what seems to be its final phases. His team is well settled and pulling together: Marshall, King, and Arnold making ultimate decisions in Washington, Eisenhower in Europe carrying forward on a teamwork basis modeled on that of his chief, Nimitz and MacArthur in the Pacific preparing to take the army and navy into Japan, the Combined (British-American) Chiefs of Staff consulting and planning in unison, the machinery established for consultation between them and the Red Army chiefs on the eastern front, the Soviet Union preparing to enter the Asiatic settlement once the German phase is closed. His monument will be the successful culmination of global war with the machinery he devised; and beyond, the establishment of global peace with the reconversion of that machinery.

He lived to see the near-completion of one of his great designs—the destruction of Hitlerite Germany. The "thousand years" of the Third Reich are very nearly run out; by the day of his burial Germany was almost severed, with American troops approaching Dresden and a junction with Russian troops. In a strange and militarily irrational kind of paralysis, the main cohesive body of German troops in the Reich was facing the Russians on the Oder, holding them at bay before Berlin while the Americans swept up to their rear. There was nothing left to fight for in Berlin, now a dead city stripped of its last administrative function; the escape corridor southward to the "national redoubt" was narrowing daily, coming under an increasing hail of fire from almost unmolested Allied aircraft. As in all the recent irrational behavior of the German High Command, the answer must be sought primarily in politics; it is perhaps a combination of two factors—German fear of what the Russians will do once they break deeply into the Reich, German hopes that the Western Allies will accuse the Russians of malingering, causing a last-minute split between them. Another possible explanation is that a decision was taken at Yalta or subsequently for the Russians to tie the Germans down at the Oder but not attack until the Americans had swung the escape door shut in their rear.

Whatever the reason, it now seems sure that the mass of Germans on the Oder will not escape. Their remnants may get away, to the mountains of the south or more likely to the new stronghold in the north, across the base of Denmark and along the North Sea and Baltic coasts. Here, as in Norway, western Holland, northern Italy (now under heavy Allied pressure), and the French Atlantic ports (of which the approaches to Bordeaux are at last also under heavy pressure), isolated and uncoordinated groups of Germans will probably fight on long after Eisenhower and Stalin have proclaimed that organized resistance has come to an end.

Far more costly and protracted fighting lies ahead in the Far East, but here too the great design of coordinated advances westward and northwestward through the Pacific against the anvil of a still-resisting China is nearing its completion. The Philippines are nearly cleared; from bases there American planes have cut the Japanese lifeline to Malaya and the East Indies, which carried oil, rubber, and tin to the home islands. Fighters from Iwo Jima—this was the necessity for its casualties—are escorting Superfortresses from the Marianas in ever-heavier explosive and incendiary attacks on the centers of Japan's war production. Our troops are on Okinawa to stay; although many more of them will die before it is secured, this means the virtual end of Japanese sea-borne traffic to the south, the impending aerial investment of the vital North China ports, and a stepping-up of air attacks on Japan itself prior to the decisive landings there.

We came a long way toward victory with this man; most of the way. For this, and for other reasons, we need not fear for his immortality.

Not Since Lincoln

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, April 14

THE sudden death of President Roosevelt has stunned and grieved our people more than that of any great public figure in my memory. We knew of course that he had been subject to an immense strain; we could see from the pictures of the Yalta conference that he had aged very much, and there was a kind of gray shadow over that vivid and friendly face. But when we read his address to Congress on his return it seemed as though his marvelous constitution, which had stood up so well to tests so grim, would once more assert its own power of recovery. We did not conceive that the greatest friend this country has ever known already stood by the gates of eternity.

From King and Queen and the Prime Minister down to the ordinary man and woman the President's death seems a personal loss as in the case of no other foreign statesman since men and women in the cotton towns of Lancashire wept openly at the death of Mr. Lincoln. The official sorrow at his death was marked by the adjournment of the House of Commons on the motion of the Prime Minister; that is a tribute never before paid in its long history to any other head of a state. It was marked too, as I have only once or twice before seen it so marked, by the flags at half mast on every building which carries a flagpole. The B. B. C. arranged for a moving talk on him by Professor Brogan and for a service of remembrance of singular impressiveness, in which extracts from the President's speeches were read and the Battle Hymn of the Republic sounded out before the Last Post.

Though we stand so near to overwhelming victory in the supreme crisis of our history, we feel that Mr. Roosevelt's death deprives the triumph of a vital part of our right to happiness over it. People have found that F. D. R.—the most usual of all references to him—had become an intimate part of their daily lives. They had looked forward very eagerly to seeing him in London this summer. They wanted to give him their thanks in thunderous cheers; they wanted him to see that if our head be bloody it has never been bowed. They wanted to welcome him not merely as President of the United States but as a great citizen of the world, as one who had brought wisdom and courage and magnanimity to the service of freedom.

Typical of the spirit everywhere is the decision of the local Labor Party here in Essex that today's meeting shall begin with a tribute to Mr. Roosevelt, followed by a moment's silence. One man said to me that Roosevelt died for mankind as truly as if he had been a soldier on the battlefield. Another said that if I was sad for Mrs. Roosevelt, at least she knew that the whole world felt him already to be a part of its inheritance. Another spoke of the need to commemorate in some large and permanent way the noble friendship he has given to us. I like a phrase in one comment—that we must show America he is a part of our tradition as well as theirs; and I was struck by the way in which his satisfaction with the behavior of our people during the war was taken not as a general tribute to a body of citizens but as something which built a personal relation between the President and each man and woman in this island. And I thought too that there was something not unworthy at this moment in the remark of a postman to me: "Now that we have lost him," he said, "we must try to find him."

It is not merely that everyone wished he could have lived to see the final triumph. Even more it is the realization that his insight and experience would have been so priceless in the complex problems that peace will bring. For everyone knew his disinterestedness. Everyone knew that when he spoke of peace he meant peace. Everyone knew that he was a great American because his views and his hopes put America in the context of the world. I have met many since the news came who realize how difficult it will be to replace him. It is notable that no one doubts the will of America to see that President Truman begins his task in Franklin Roosevelt's spirit, for the great principles of Franklin Roosevelt's faith. Not since 1865 have we felt more close to America, more eager for mutual understanding. We pledge ourselves before him—our dead, too—that the work he wrought so nobly shall not have been in vain.

Farewell to F. D. R.

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, April 14

MR. ROOSEVELT'S body was brought back to Washington today for the last time. The crowds began to gather early in Lafayette Park opposite the White House, as they did all along the line of the procession from Union Station. I got down to the park early and stood with many others waiting. Some small boys climbed into a tree for a better view. The gray tip of the Washington Monument showed above the White House. The trees were in full green; tulips bloomed on the lawn. Outside on the sidewalk there were soldiers in helmets every few feet, and we could hear the harsh tones of command as the guard of honor lined up on the White House lawn. Florists' trucks pulled up at the door, and huge wreaths were taken inside. Cameras were set up on the front porch, and camera men were perched on high ladders on the sidewalks and among us in the park. Birds sang, but the crowd was quiet.

In the park I recognized a group of girls from the C. I. O. offices in nearby Jackson Place, Walter Lippmann, and an Army and Navy Club bellboy with a sensitive Negro face. There were soldiers and sailors, Waves and Wacs. There were many Negroes, some of them quite obviously housemaids. There were well-dressed women and men in shirt sleeves. I noticed a small middle-aged priest, several grave and owlish Chinese, many service men with their wives or sweethearts, a tired man in overalls and blue-denim work cap. A tall gangling Negro boy in jitterbug jacket and pork-pie hat towered above the crowd in front of me. A man who seemed to be a hobo, unshaven and dirty, jarred the silence with a loud laugh at something a child behind him had said. There were close-mouthed New England faces, Jewish faces, Midwestern faces; workers and business men and housewives, all curiously alike in their patience and in the dumb stolidity that is often sorrow's aspect.

A truck sped by on Pennsylvania Avenue. On the roof of the truck two navy men operated a movie camera, taking pictures of the crowd. Far above us, twenty-four Flying Fortresses roared across the skies in proud formation. One remembered the President's 50,000-plane speech, and choked. Motorcycle police heralded the procession's approach. The marching men, the solemn bands, the armored cars, the regiment of Negro soldiers, the uniformed women's detachments, the trucks filled with soldiers, and the black limousines carrying officials and the President's family went by slowly. They seemed part of an unreal pageant by comparison with the one glimpse of what we had come to see—the coffin covered with a flag. Many faces in the crowd puckered as it went past. In that one quick look thousands of us said our goodbys to a great and good man, and to an era.

I was at the PM office in New York Thursday when it happened. There was a commotion in the newsroom. A copyboy ran out of the wire-room with a piece of United Press copy in his hand. That first flash, "The President died this afternoon," seemed incredible; like something in a nightmare, far down under the horror was the comfortable feeling that you would wake to find it was all a dream. The Romans must have felt this way when word came that Caesar Augustus was dead. Later, when work was done, I went to a meeting of liberals in an apartment on Washington Square. It was a gloomy gathering, much too gloomy to honor so buoyant a spirit as Mr. Roosevelt's. Some felt that with his passing the Big Three would split up, that hope of a new world organization was dim. One of those present reported, apropos, that an automobile-company official in Detroit had told a delegation of visiting French newspapermen, "Next we fight the Soviet Union." Some thought the Nazis would be encouraged to hold out, that the war had been lengthened by the President's passing. Everyone seemed to feel that trouble, serious trouble, lay ahead.

I don't want to sound like Pollyanna, but I can remember so many crepe-hanging sessions of this kind since 1932. The Roosevelt era, for folk who scare easily, was a series of scares. Just before he took office, when the bonus marchers were driven out of Washington, revolution seemed to be around the corner. There was the banking crisis. The NRA was suspected of being the beginning of fascism; one of my friends in New York cautiously erased his name from the volumes of Marx and Lenin he owned; he felt the men with the bludgeons might be in his apartment any day. The Supreme Court knocked one piece of reform legislation after another on the head, and Mr. Roosevelt, when he set out to fight back, showed a deplorable disrespect for the constitutional amenities. There were the Chicago massacre and the Little Steel strike. There was Hitler. France fell when our armed forces were in good shape for a war with Nicaragua. The Japs sank most of the fleet at Pearl Harbor. It was a lush era for Cassandras.

Somehow we pulled through before, and somehow we'll pull through again. In part it was luck. In part it was Mr.

Roosevelt's leadership. In part it was the quality of the country and its people. I don't know about the rest of the four freedoms, but one thing Mr. Roosevelt gave the United States in one crisis after another, and that was freedom from fear. Perhaps his most important contribution was the example, the superlative example, of his personal courage. Perhaps some of us will feel less gloomy if we remember it. Perhaps some of us will be more effective politically if we also learn from Mr. Roosevelt's robust realism, his ability to keep his eye on the main issue and not worry too much about the minor details.

I found the mood of the intellectuals and New Dealers in Washington this week-end quite different from that in New York. There has been much swapping of information and sidelights, and there is a good deal of confidence in the new President. No one, least of all Mr. Truman, an impressively modest man, expects him fully to fill Mr. Roosevelt's shoes. But the general feeling among those who know Mr. Truman is that he will surprise the skeptical. I can only record my own impression for whatever it is worth. I talked with Mr. Truman several years ago and liked him immediately and instinctively. The Presidency is a terrific job, and it remains to be seen how he will stand up under its pressure. But he is a good man, an honest man, a devoted man. Our country could be far more poorly served. Mr. Truman is a hard worker, decisive, a good executive. He works well with people. He is at once humble about his own knowledge and capacities, as a wise man should be, and quietly confident about his ability to learn and to rise to the occasion.

I hate to confess it, but I think Mr. Roosevelt was astute and farsighted in picking Mr. Truman rather than Mr. Wallace as his successor. At this particular moment in our history, Mr. Truman can do a better job. Mr. Wallace's accession might have split the country wide open, not because of Mr. Wallace but because of the feeling against him on the right. Mr. Truman has the good-will of both sides and is in a position to capitalize on the sobering influence of Mr. Roosevelt's passing. The heaviest task of the President lies in the field of foreign relations, and the biggest obstacle to its accomplishment is in the Senate. It is fortunate that Mr. Truman's greatest and most obvious political assets are his relations with the Senate. He is a friendly person, and was well liked on both sides of the aisle. Isolationists like Wheeler and La Follette are among his friends, and he may be able to exert an influence with them that circumstances and the momentum of past events denied to Mr. Roosevelt. The chances of a two-thirds' vote in the Senate for the new peace organization are improved by the shift in the Presidency. I say this with no disrespect to our great departed leader.

I think Mr. Truman will carry on Mr. Roosevelt's work. He had been very effective in support of Mr. Roosevelt in the Senate. I can authoritatively report that the famous B2H2 resolution originated in Mr. Truman's office. Three of the sponsors, Senators Ball, Burton, and Hatch, were members of the Truman committee. Mr. Truman's closest personal friends in the Senate were Kilgore of West Virginia and Wallgren of Washington, both sturdy progressives and good New Dealers. There will be changes in the Cabinet, perhaps some for the better. On domestic policy Mr. Truman's record is an excellent one, and labor has nothing to fear from him. The shock of Mr. Roosevelt's death has created an atmosphere in which the new President may be able to unite the nation more closely than ever and carry it forward to that stable peace Mr. Roosevelt so deeply desired.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE WORK OF WEDNESDAY WEEK, by which Texas was admitted and the proclamation of the Fifteenth Amendment secured on the same day, may serve as a sufficient apology for Congressional inaction during the past seven days.—April 7, 1870.

LITERARY NOTES: Messrs. Fields, Osgood and Company began, with No. 15 of their illustrated Every Saturday, the new story by Mr. Dickens called, not after his usual fashion, "The Mystery of Edwin Drood." . . . It will be good news to everybody who has "wept at the grave of Adam" in company with Mr. Mark Twain, and has laughed everywhere else with that light-minded young man, to hear that he is going to edit a department of the Galaxy—or rather that he is going to write a department of the Galaxy. We do not hear that he is to have any assistants or contributors, though that he should is perhaps to be desired.—April 7, 1870.

THE WEEK HAS BEEN REMARKABLE for a great number of rejoicings over the adoption of the Fifteenth Amendment by the colored people and their white friends and champions. The Anti-Slavery Association has celebrated the event by disbanding, after thirty-seven years of existence. . . . Their forces will now be transferred to other fields of reform. The woman's suffrage movement will probably receive the greater portion of them, and they will, no doubt, be divided pretty evenly between the three camps in which the friends of that cause are now found. . . . Roughly, they may be described as the Revolution Society, of which Susan B. Anthony is the head; and the Cleveland or National Association, of which Henry Ward Beecher is the head; and an association of which Mr. Theodore Tilton is the head, and which is the result of an abortive attempt on the part of that gentleman to unite the other two.—April 14, 1870.

ON WEDNESDAY WEEK the Massachusetts House defeated, by 133 nays to 68 yeas, a proposed amendment of the state constitution extending the suffrage to women.—April 28, 1870.

THE PRODIGIOUS RATE at which the passenger traffic between this country and Europe is increasing, and which seems to afford employment to as many steamers as capitalists choose to run, is doubtless mainly due to the growth of wealth and population. It, however, also indicates, beyond question, increasing restlessness on the part of all that portion of the American population which is not tied to one spot all the year round by stern necessity. . . . In nine cases out of ten, when people go to Europe, it is "for the sake of the girls." . . . The American travelers of whom most is seen and heard are of small advantage to Europe, and Europe is of small advantage to them.—April 28, 1870.

Portrait of Truman

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

HARRY S. TRUMAN is an average man who at the age of thirty-eight stepped on the escalator of an American political machine because he needed a job and has been carried to the very top floor—the Presidency of the United States. No one, probably, is more surprised than he is unless it is his friends, who were already rubbing their eyes at the fact that he was Vice-President.

Roosevelt and Wallace have been spokesmen for the Common Man, who is the average man dressed up in his rhetorical Sunday best. President Truman is the average man. He is Tom-Dick-and-Harry Truman; and he would not object to that designation, for his respect and regard for the common run of people, including himself, is probably greater than that of many who speak in their name and wish to do them good.

When people talk about Truman—or rather when they talked about him, for a Truman myth, no doubt, is already in the making—they tend toward negatives. He is not brilliant—he definitely has a ceiling, as one person put it. He is not a man of vision. He is not an innovator.

I would add, on the basis of a short interview, that compared with a Roosevelt or a Churchill he has no temperament, no afflatus, and for all his amiability, no charm. He is not a worldly or a cultivated man.

On the other hand, he is, according to all accounts, personally honest, sincere, conscientious, a hard worker with a practical intelligence. He likes people, gets along with everybody, and is extremely loyal to his friends. He reads a good deal, enjoys music, and plays the piano for his own pleasure. In appearance he is plain, neat, undistinguished, agile. His smile, which is constant, seemed to me a bit automatic.

I was told more than once that he is aware of his own limitations, that he has the sense and the humility to pick competent assistants and can delegate authority. He showed himself a good administrator as chairman of the Senate Committee to Investigate the Defense Program, which did an excellent and pretty comprehensive job on very little money, and which, despite the politically explosive area of its investigations and the mixed party affiliations of its members, never turned up a minority report.

Everybody knows that Truman got his political start, and became a Senator the first time, by means of the support of the Pendergast machine. Everybody will tend, from now on, to play down, brush off, ignore that connection. Everybody, that is, except Truman himself. He will be the last to deny that he is a machine politician, or to be ashamed of it. His relations with the Pendergast machine and his attitude toward it furnish the key not only to his career but to his character and type, which is, I think, a type we shall have a great deal to do with in the next half-century. All over the world the statesman is being displaced by the practical politician—an inevitable development in what is to be, culturally as well as politically, the century of the average man.

In 1921 Harry Truman, who was then in his late thirties, had not yet established himself. In fact, he had just failed in the haberdashery business in which he had invested his savings on his return from World War I—before the war he had spent ten years running the family farm. One of his buddies had been the nephew of Tom Pendergast, and through this connection and other friends Truman got his first political office. In 1922 he was elected county judge in Jackson County, which was controlled by the Pendergast machine.

Jackson County judges are really county commissioners whose job it is to let contracts for and supervise the construction of highways and other public facilities. Millions of dollars of public money pass through their hands. In 1924 "Judge" Truman was defeated, but in 1926 he was elected as presiding judge and reelected in 1930. As a county judge Truman established a reputation for personal honesty which still stands. He built up a statewide acquaintance as well. A Baptist by religion, he was also a "high" Mason and an active Legionnaire. He belonged to the County Judges Association, which is said to be a powerful organization in Missouri. Anyway, by inclination Truman is, and always has been, "a member of the club."

In 1934 he wanted a better job. The accounts diverge as to how the better job turned out to be that of United States Senator. The most dramatic is a tall tale in spirit if not in fact. It relates that he went to Pendergast and asked for a post that paid $25,000 in fees. "You're not a big enough man for that job," said Pendergast. "The best I can do now, Harry, is a United States Senatorship." Only a $15,000 job. More credible is the story that he wanted to be nominated for Congress in a newly created district but that Pendergast was already committed to another candidate; that some weeks later Pendergast's nephew and the Democratic state chairman urged him to file for Senator, and that Pendergast threw the machine's support to him after a strong movement in his favor had already set in. The third account, which is the most convincing but the least picturesque, does not necessarily rule out the second: he was nominated because Pendergast was determined to defeat Champ Clark's candidate and needed a respectable name on his own slate.

Drawing by Charles Lied
Courtesy JPM

President Truman

Truman won the nomination by a plurality of some 40,000. It was demonstrated later that the "graveyard registration" in his district in 1934 was so large that his own plurality was probably made up of ghosts. But he had the job.

In 1940, when he came up for renomination and reelection, his defeat was freely predicted. The Pendergast machine was broken and disgraced. Out of "personal loyalty" Truman had not disowned Pendergast. On the contrary he said, "I accepted his support when he was on top. And I'm not going to kick him when he's down." By the same token he has remained vindictive against Pendergast's prosecutor, Milligan. Truman had two opponents in the 1940 primary, both of whom claimed credit for wrecking the Pendergast machine. They divided the credit and the vote—and Truman won.

Truman is personally honest. But he was not bothered by the scandalous methods by which the machine elected him in 1934. In an article in Common Sense last fall Grace and Morris Milgram recorded his frank answers to their direct questions about his relations with the machine.

There was nothing wrong with my relations with the Pendergast machine. . . . Every Democratic politician including myself went to Tom Pendergast for support. He is a fine gentleman. . . . He was always helping people, even people who did nothing for him. . . . You could trust him. His word was his bond.

Those things [the graveyard registration] were due to over-zealousness by Tom's boys. They were too anxious to make a good showing for the boss. . . . Tom didn't know anything about it—he was never involved in that sort of thing. Those fake registrations weren't needed to enable the machine to win.

The idea that one is not "involved in that sort of thing" unless one actually writes in phony names implies a concept of personal honesty that must shock the moralist. It is assumed by most politicians, and though few people would be so frank as to express the views given above, they are accepted in practice in large sectors of American life. That is an even more important—and dreary—fact than Truman's acceptance of it.

Mr. Truman went on to say that "you've got to have leadership in politics, and a boss is only a leader"—which should give the political theorist a turn.

Harry S. Truman is neither a moralist nor a political theorist. He is a practical man from Missouri who takes the world as he finds it.

In the Senate Truman was a loyal Administration supporter, as was to be expected, and his horizons widened if only because of his adaptability, which sometimes performs the functions of imagination. He went on making friends, remained the member of an even larger club. Because he was so perfect a liaison man he was expected, as Vice-President, to play a highly important role in securing adoption of legislation implementing the peace, and he considered that his main job. We may assume that as President he will carry it through. He will do his best, moreover, to make the peace conform to the Roosevelt specifications if only out of "personal loyalty." There seems to me no question, by the way, that he has a much better chance of achieving that aim than Wallace would have had; and that consideration may well have played a part in Roosevelt's easy relinquishment of Wallace as a running-mate in the last election.

On domestic policy too I think Truman will follow Roosevelt's lead—until he gets to a point where specifications are missing and his deeply felt obligation to his predecessor cannot be defined. His limited imagination, his "practical" methods, and his short-run way of thinking will then come into play. He is likely to think of employment for returning veterans, for instance, not in terms of political or social theory but in terms of taking care of the boys. He suggested to me, rather complacently, that since we would be at least four years behind, replacements would keep us busy. In general, where a Wallace or a Roosevelt would put forth a bold and comprehensive program, achieve part of it against opposition, and in the process push back the boundaries of public opinion to take in new social objectives, Truman is likely to ask for no more than he can get without creating enemies. It is possible, of course, that in a given instance what Truman will ask for will be quite as much as a Roosevelt or a Wallace would achieve. But he will break no new paths, push back no boundaries; and he will tend to equate public opinion with party opinion, both Republican and Democratic.

Truman, in a word, will stick to the center of gravity, and his techniques will be more those of machine politics, especially compromise. Truman's life began with a compromise, if we may believe the story that the S. in his name stands for nothing because the choice lay between Sherman and Shippe and in order not to offend either pressure group his parents agreed to make it simply S. He believes in compromise; to him "government is politics," politics is mediation.

This lends vital importance to what seems to be a fact—that Truman represents no vested interest, unless machine politics as a way of government can be called that. He has shown no reluctance to attack big business. He believes in preparedness, but he also believes in civilian control. He has gone along with Roosevelt's labor policies and is trusted by the Railway Brotherhoods, the A. F. of L., and the C. I. O.—in that order.

The eventual danger lies in his complete lack of ideology. In Roosevelt's thinking labor had a status which did not depend on the actual political strength it could show. With Truman, I think, labor will be just one group among others, and it will have to earn its way politically. He is neither anti- nor pro-labor. Given the present distribution of political and economic power in this country, that means that labor will have to fight hard for everything it gets and be extremely vigilant about keeping what it has. Noblesse oblige, which labor could count on with Roosevelt, is no more.

On some issues, of course, Truman can be pushed just so far and no farther. On the Negro question, for instance, he is a loyal liberal Southerner, which means that he advocates equality of opportunity and education but considers social equality out of the question, now or ever. But here again, he is at least frank about it. The Milgrams quote a speech he made at the National Colored Democratic Association in 1940. "Before I go farther," he said, "I wish to make it clear that I am not appealing for social equality for the Negro. The Negro himself knows better than that, and the highest types of Negro leaders say frankly they prefer the society of their own people."

Some people saw signs of the martinet in Truman's handling of Senator Murray's bill for a Missouri Valley Authority. Some said it was a typical Truman compromise, and one person suggested that the compromise was part of Truman's liaison work in behalf of the coming peace treaty.

President Truman thinks of himself, I should say, as a "sensible" liberal. He will find left New Dealers less congenial personally than regular party men, but if the right expects any spectacular overturn of the New Deal it will probably be disappointed. He once said that he would be just another constitutional Vice-President. I'm inclined to think he will be just another constitutional President.

The Foundations of Democracy

BY JACQUES MARITAIN

SOME months ago The Nation published an article by Sidney Hook* which dealt with an issue crucial for democracy and the world tomorrow. Discussing a recent essay by T. S. Eliot, Mr. Hook reached by means of questionable theoretical arguments a practical solution which for quite different reasons seems to me to be on the right track. Even if we are in general in qualified agreement on the solution, there are important particulars in which we disagree. These I shall try to elucidate.

I did not read the essay by T. S. Eliot to which Mr. Hook refers. Yet if the way in which he understands the import of the statements contained in it is correct, I am afraid I would also disagree with T. S. Eliot, at least as regards the manner in which theoretical views that both of us hold to be true should be applied to our present historical situation. This is a rather paradoxical situation, which may be explained by the fact that conclusions depend not only on the major premises but on the minor as well. Since I have endeavored for many years and in many books to discuss the matters involved, I shall take the liberty of summing up my position here.

1. In the "sacral" era of the Middle Ages a great attempt was made to build the life of the earthly community and civilization on the foundation of the unity of theological faith and religious creed. This attempt succeeded for a certain number of centuries but failed in the course of time, after the Reformation and the Renaissance; and a return to the medieval sacral pattern is by no means conceivable. In proportion as the civil community has become more perfectly distinguished from the spiritual realm of the church—a process which was in itself but a development of the Gospel distinction between the things that are Caesar's and the things that are God's—the civil community has become grounded on a common good and a common task which are of an earthly, "temporal," or "secular" order, and in which citizens belonging to diverse spiritual groups or "families" equally share. Religious division among men is in itself a misfortune. But it is a fact that we must willy-nilly recognize.

2. In modern times an attempt was made to ground the life of civilization and the earthly community on the foundation of mere reason—reason separated from religion and from the Gospel. This attempt fostered immense hopes in the last two centuries, and rapidly failed. Pure reason appeared more incapable than faith of insuring the spiritual unity of mankind, and the dream of a "scientific" creed uniting men in peace, and in common convictions about the aims and basic principles of human life and society, vanished in contemporary catastrophes. In proportion as the tragic events of the last decades have given the lie to the bourgeois rationalism of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, we have been confronted with the fact that religion and metaphysics are an essential part of human culture, primary and indispensable incentives in the very life of society.

3. As concerns, therefore, the society of tomorrow and the revitalized democracy we are hoping for, the only solution is of the pluralistic type. Men belonging to most different philosophical or religious creeds and families could and should cooperate in the common task and for the common welfare of the earthly community, provided they similarly assent to the basic tenets of a society of free men.

For a society of free men implies basic tenets which are at the core of its very existence and which it has the duty of defending and promoting. One of the errors of bourgeois optimism was to believe that in a free society "truth," and decisions befitting human dignity and freedom, would automatically emerge from the conflicts of forces and opinions; the error lay in conceiving of free society as a mere neutral boxing-ring for all kinds of ideas in mutual competition. Thus democratic society, in its concrete behavior, had no concept of itself, and freedom lay open, disarmed and paralyzed, to the undertakings of those who hated it, and who tried by all means to foster in men a vicious desire to become free from freedom.

If it is to conquer totalitarian trends and fulfil the hope of the peoples of the world, the democracy of tomorrow will have its own concept of man and society, and its own philosophy, its own faith, enabling it to educate people for freedom and to defend itself against those who would use democratic liberties to destroy freedom and human rights. No society can live without a basic common inspiration and a basic common faith.

* The Dilemma of T. S. Eliot, in The Nation for January 20.

But the all-important point to be noted here is that this faith and inspiration, this philosophy and the concept of itself which democracy needs, all these do not belong in themselves to the order of religious creed and eternal life but to the temporal or secular order of earthly life, of culture and civilization. Even more, they are matters of practical rather than theoretical or dogmatic agreement; I mean they deal with practical conclusions that the human mind, rightly or wrongly, can try to justify from quite different philosophical outlooks, probably because they depend basically on simple, "natural" apperceptions, of which the human heart becomes capable with the progress of moral conscience. Thus it is that men possessing quite different, even opposite, metaphysical or religious outlooks—materialists, idealists, agnostics, Christians and Jews, Moslems and Buddhists—can converge, not by virtue of any identity of doctrine, but by virtue of an analogical similitude in practical principles, toward the same practical conclusions, and can share in the same practical democratic philosophy, provided that they similarly revere, perhaps for quite diverse reasons, truth and intelligence, human dignity, freedom, brotherly love, and the absolute value of moral good. As Mr. Hook puts it, "the underlying premises, whether theological, metaphysical, or naturalistic, from which different groups justify their common democratic beliefs and practices must not be subject to integration"—let us say to socially or politically enforced integration. "It is enough, so to speak, that human beings live in accordance with democratic laws"—and, let us add, share in the common—human, earthly, temporal—democratic faith and inspiration. "It is foolish intolerance to make only one justification of laws legal."

Here, if we want to be thorough in our thought and do not fear words, we should point out that where faith is, divine or human, there are also heretics who threaten the unity of the community, either religious or civil. In the sacred society the heretic was the breaker of religious unity. In a lay society of free men the heretic is the breaker of "the common democratic beliefs and practices," the totalitarian, the one who denies freedom—his neighbor's freedom—and the dignity of the human person and the moral power of law. We do not wish him to be burned or expelled from the city or outlawed or put in a concentration camp. But the democratic community should defend itself against him, be he materialist, idealist, agnostic, Christian or Jew, Moslem or Buddhist, by keeping him out of its leadership, through the power of a strong and informed public opinion, and even by handing him over to justice when his activity endangers the security of the state—and over and above all by strengthening everywhere a philosophy of life, intellectual convictions, and constructive work which would make his influence powerless.

On the other hand, a serious task of intellectual reexamination should be undertaken regarding the essentials of democratic philosophy. And it would be especially desirable to develop the understanding of the pluralistic principle and the technique of pluralistic cooperation. It seems to me that the free traditions and the historical set-up of this country would provide special opportunities for such a development.

4. The above-mentioned considerations explain why, writing on French affairs, I often emphasized my hope that the new French democracy would spring from the cooperation between Socialists and Christians. In such a democracy, however, would the "worldwide common faith" implied find in scientific method its highest source of authority? Would "intelligent social planning" be enough to insure the integration of culture? In the democratic culture of the future—if it has a future—will it be "the teacher dedicated to the scientific spirit," "and not the priest," "who will bear the chief responsibility for nurturing, strengthening, and enriching a common faith"?

Here are the main points on which I should like to express disagreement with Mr. Hook's views. I am afraid he has been inspired in these passages by that rationalistic bias whose illusory character I pointed out above (number 2).

The very expression "common faith" which Mr. Hook uses should make us realize that democratic inspiration cannot find in scientific method its highest source of authority. This "faith" is "of a secular not supernatural character"; yet even a secular faith implies the commitment of the whole man and his innermost spiritual energies, and draws its strength, therefore, from beliefs which go far beyond scientific method. In other words, the justification of the practical conclusions which make such a "common faith" common to all is in each one an integral part of this very faith. As for social planning, even intelligent, I am afraid a culture organized by social planning alone would offer little chance for the creative powers of human personality or for the enthusiasm and happiness of the people.

The scientific spirit is of invaluable help for culture in so far as it develops in human minds, in a general way, respect and love for truth and the habits of intellectual accuracy. (This is why, let us observe parenthetically, the scientific spirit of the thirteenth-century Schoolmen played so basic a part in the rise of Western culture.) Yet neither culture nor democracy lives on science alone. Science, especially modern science, deals with the means, especially with the material means, of human life. Wisdom, which deals with the ends, is also—and above all—necessary. And the fact remains that democratic faith—implying as it does faith in justice, in freedom, in brotherly love, in the dignity of the human person, in his rights as well as in his responsibilities, in that quality of just laws which makes them binding in conscience, in the deep-rooted aspirations which call for political and social emancipation of the people—cannot be justified, nurtured, strengthened, and enriched without philosophical or religious convictions—"whether theological, metaphysical, or naturalistic"—which deal with the very substance and meaning of human life. Here appears the truth of T. S. Eliot's emphasis on the organic character of culture, as well as the injustice of reproaching him with suggesting proposals which, if enforced, would result in some kind of "ecclesiastical fascism." For we can be sure it is not to the compulsory power of any ecclesiastical agency but rather to the persuasive power of truth that he makes the effort toward the integration of culture appendant. The effort toward integration must not only be brought about on the level of personality and private life; it is essential to culture itself and the life of the community as a whole: an integration which does not depend on legal enforcement but on spiritual and freely accepted inspiration.

As a result, it is but normal that in a democratic culture and society the diverse philosophical or religious schools of thought which in their practical conclusions agree with regard to democratic tenets, and which claim to justify them, come into free competition. Let each school assert its belief with fulness and integrity! But let no one try to impose it by force upon the others! The reciprocal tension which ensues will enrich rather than harm the common task.

5. As for myself, who believe that the idea of man propounded by the metaphysics of Aristotle and Thomas Aquinas is the rational foundation of democratic philosophy, and that the Gospel inspiration is its true living soul, I am confident that in the free competition of which I just spoke the Christian leaven would play an ever-growing part. In any case the responsibility for nurturing, strengthening, and enriching a common democratic faith would belong no less to the priest, dedicated to the preaching of the Gospel, than to the teacher, dedicated to the scientific spirit, if both of them come to a clear awareness of the needs of our times and rid themselves of parasitical prejudices inherited from the past. If you are looking for the chief responsibility, I would say that as a matter of fact it would probably be that of a leadership made up of Christian laymen and the most enlightened elements of the working classes.

Finally, if I affirm that without genuine and vital reconciliation between democratic inspiration and evangelical inspiration our hopes for the democratic culture of the future will be frustrated, I do not appeal to police force to obtain such reconciliation; I only state what I hold to be true. It would be foolish intolerance to label as intolerance any affirmation of truth which is not watered down with doubt, even if it does not please some of our democratic fellow-citizens. I insist as forcefully as T. S. Eliot that the Christian leaven is necessary to the life and integration of our culture. From the religious point of view I would wish all men to believe in the integrity of Christian truth. From the social-temporal point of view, I would be satisfied if the Christian energies at work in the community draw on the fulness of supernatural faith in a number of men and retain at least their moral impetus in those in whom these energies still exist, perhaps unawares, but have been more or less secularized.

It is true, moreover, that supernatural faith does not provide us with any particular social or political system. In such matters supernatural faith must be complemented by sound practical philosophy, historical information, and social and political experience. Yet supernatural faith, if it is truly lived—in other words, if Christians know “of what spirit they are”—provides them with basic inspiration and vital truths which permeate their social and political systems and work for human dignity, against any kind of totalitarian oppression.

Allow me to add that to consider the religious faith of a poet like T. S. Eliot as “the object of a deliberate will-to-believe enjoying an uneasy triumph over the scruples of intelligence” is perhaps the only way in which an unbeliever can explain to himself such a strange phenomenon, but is in itself perfectly irrelevant. It is no more relevant to pretend that the neo-Thomists regard as “disorder” “the spirit of inquiry and innovation”—I don’t mean skepticism—and “the advance of liberty of thought and behavior,” if this liberty is inspired by a love for what is true and good.

I should like to conclude by saying that I have been particularly happy to find myself this once in agreement, even qualified, with Sidney Hook, except for the points to which I have just referred, which are of no little importance. Such an agreement on practical conclusions between philosophers whose basic theoretical outlooks are widely separated is, to my mind, an illustration of the pluralistic cooperation of which I spoke.

In the Wind

A FRIEND brings political gossip from Georgia: that if Justice William O. Douglas is made chairman of the RFC, Francis Biddle will replace him on the Supreme Court and Governor Ellis Arnall will be asked to succeed Biddle as Attorney General; the gossipers point out that there is no Southerner in the Cabinet now and that Arnall is easily confirmable. His liberal friends, however, are advising against it. Eugene Talmadge plans to run for Governor next year, and in Arnall’s absence the only likely opponent for him would be the reactionary ex-Governor Eurith D. Rivers.

VIRGINIA is being plastered with small stickers bearing a silhouette map of the state on which are superimposed the words, “Repeal Poll Tax.”

A PAMPHLET entitled “Communism Today, or Red Fascism,” by Raymond T. Feely, S.J., has on its cover the hammer and sickle turned the wrong way. It looks suspiciously like what the Communists would call a leftist deviation.

AN ADVERTISEMENT in the Washington Post of April 7 lists six Christian Science reading-rooms in which you can learn how to release your latent abilities by realizing the delusory nature of material circumstances. Only if you’re colored you’ll have to learn in a special room.

ON APRIL 1 a Nazi propaganda broadcast said, “The National Socialist Party is no more.” The Montreal Star, reporting the broadcast on April 2, gave it this headline: “Socialists’ Out, Says Nazi Radio.”

FROM JOHANNESBURG comes this sad tale of the meat situation in South Africa. A man waited patiently in line at a butcher shop, and reached the counter just in time to see the last piece of meat go to somebody else. The same thing happened again the next day. In a rage, the man went to a gunsmith and roared, “I want some bullets!” “What for?” asked the gunsmith. “I’m going to shoot the food controller.” “Oh, you too. Get in line.”

AMERICA, a highly conservative Catholic weekly, published on April 14 an article entitled FEPC—a Challenge to Democracy, by Richard J. Roche, recommending in the strongest terms a permanent FEPC.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Fascism Wins a Round

BY ALLEN HADEN

BY THE recognition of Argentina on April 9 the State Department sold out democracy in this hemisphere.

Against the unanimous opinion of every newspaperman who has actual knowledge of Argentina and its present government, against the opinion of subordinate foreign-service officials, against the opinion of half the American embassy staff in Buenos Aires, recognition was granted to the government of General Edelmiro Farrell within a week of the Argentine Supreme Court's implicit condemnation of the Farrell government as illegal.

Three issues are pointed up by this recognition of Farrell. The first is the rather academic one of recognition policy, important chiefly because it includes the question of relations with fascist states. The second is the department's practice of deliberately misleading American newspapermen about its policy. The third, and most important, is how much political acumen has been displayed by Stettinius's "team."

Let us take up these questions in their order. Recognition of Farrell is recognition of a Nazi-fascist government—or at least so said President Roosevelt on September 29, 1944. The Argentine situation, the President said, presented "the extraordinary paradox of the growth of Nazi-fascist influence and increasing application of Nazi-fascist methods in a country of this hemisphere" just when they were being licked elsewhere in the world. He went on: "The paradox is accentuated by the fact, of which we are all aware, that the vast majority of the people of Argentina have remained steadfast in their faith in their own free, democratic traditions."

A greater paradox than the growth of Argentine fascism is found in the fact that while eleven million American men and women are in uniform fighting for our national life against Nazis and fascists, our State Department creates the opportunity to recognize a clearly Nazi-fascist government at our back door. The men excoriated by the President in September still hold power in Argentina, but now that a new "team" is handling the reins, the promises of these men are taken at their face value and the State Department recognizes their government, as a preliminary, presumably, to Argentina's joining the United Nations.

This action also violates the definition of the recognition policy of the United States given by Assistant Secretary of State Nelson A. Rockefeller. Mr. Rockefeller explained to newspapermen in Mexico City that we would withhold recognition from "any government which threatens the peace of the hemisphere." Has the runaway militarism of the Farrell government of which we formerly heard so much suddenly abated, or is it being conveniently overlooked? Were we misled previously, or are we being gulled now?

The department's press release of April 9 makes it appear that the United States government is trying to hide behind the other American governments. It speaks of members of the Pan-American Union deciding "unanimously, after deliberation, that the measures taken by Argentina were in accordance with the criteria of the resolution on Argentina" adopted at the Mexico City conference. Those criteria were formulated in Resolution LIX, paragraph 5: "The conference hopes that the Argentine nation will implement a policy of cooperative action with the other American nations so as to identify herself with the common policy which these nations are following, and so orient her own policy that she may achieve her incorporation into the United Nations as a signatory of the joint declaration entered into by them."

The important word here is "implement." A State Department official has pointed out that the implementing has consisted in declaring war on the Axis, securing Japanese diplomats (which should have been done long ago), confining crew members of the Graf Spee (after the important officers had been allowed to escape), supplementing the black list by seizing Axis firms (and putting outstanding pro-Nazis in charge of them). "Implementing" a policy is not saying you will do something; it is doing it. Argentina already has a bad record on that score, for it subscribed to the resolutions of Rio de Janeiro in January, 1942, and never implemented them. To accept the assurances of the Farrell government without waiting to see what continuous action is taken is at best absurdly ingenuous and complacent. As a footnote, one might add that some thirty agents used by American and British intelligence to watch the Nazis in Argentina are still in jail.

That American newspapermen have been consistently misled can scarcely be denied. They suspected that the appointment of Nelson A. Rockefeller as Assistant Secretary heralded appeasement of Argentina. They suspected also that the methods of James Clement Dunn, engineer of Spanish appeasement from 1936 to 1939 and now raised to Assistant Secretary, would find a wider field of action. But they were reassured privately that nothing of the sort would happen. At Mexico City they were told, privately again, that the word "implement" in the resolution on Argentina meant that General Farrell's government would have to perform before it would be recognized. And so, along with others, this writer went out on a limb and reported that the resolution, though politely worded, contained a hard core of non-appeasement. American newspapermen were invited to crawl out on that limb so it could be cut off behind them, for it was their relentless opposition which had previously prevented appeasement. They were deliberately hoodwinked.

As to the third and most important question, if we mean to defend democracy as an ideological concept and a political and social way of life, recognizing Farrell is indefensible. If we prefer to be coldly pragmatic and plead expediency, it is simply stupid. In all their statements and actions the Farrell government and the Nationalists supporting it have been anti-democratic and anti-Allies. By its very nature the regime is anti-American. Nor shall we, by recognition, gain its good-will, for it will not forget that it has been forced to eat crow. On the other hand, by recognizing Farrell we have alienated all Argentines who opposed him and his fascism, which means the majority of the Argentine people. Leaders of all the popular parties—Radical, Conservative, Socialist, Communist—have taken their stand against the military. All these parties cooperate in publishing the underground resistance newspapers—Himno Nacional and a dozen others. Pueblo Argentino, published in Montevideo under the brilliant editorship of Rodolfo Ghioldi, a Communist, is supported by contributions from all classes of Argentines.

It almost looks as if the State Department's new "team" hastened to recognize the Farrell government to prevent its fall. When the Supreme Court last week invalidated three government decrees, thus implicitly denying the legality of the government itself, it was not speaking only for itself but for a large body of public opinion. The recognition so carefully planned ever since Secretary Hull was forced by illness to leave the State Department, and built up to its climax on April 9 through the long zigmarole of Pan-American Union meetings and the Mexico City conference, will now consolidate the power of General Farrell and his Nazi-fascists.

The Argentine recognition poses an ideological and moral question—the question whether we are pro-democratic or pro-fascist in the United States and the State Department. It is significant that when Paul Ward of the Baltimore Sun asked what fascism was, a high State Department spokesman, after pondering six hours, replied that it was "the kind of philosophy in Germany and Italy under Hitler and Mussolini." Another reorganization seems to be in order: we need men in the State Department's top positions who know fascists when they see them.

Note from the Argentine Underground

[We have received the following statement written by certain prominent members of the Argentine underground whose names, for obvious reasons, cannot be published.]

RECOGNITION of the Farrell regime is not an isolated incident in United States-Argentine relations. The United States, however, was not acting alone but with all the nations of the continent when it was agreed, in Mexico, to initiate the policy of appeasement that has now reached its culmination. The entire system of American cooperation and the whole juridical and philosophical structure elaborated at Chapultepec are crumbling before the first concrete situation by which they have been tested.

By the acceptance of the farce of fascist Argentina's sudden conversion, all measures for hemispheric defense against Nazi penetration are invalidated, the unity of the war effort is destroyed, the democratic principles recommended as a foundation for the hemisphere's political structure are negated, and the ideas for economic and social progress proclaimed at the conference are rendered impotent.

The transcendent meaning of recognition is that it inaugurates an anti-democratic and reactionary policy that will tend to bolster reactionary elements and to discourage popular forces everywhere. It indicates a trend toward the creation of a reactionary American bloc that will be opposed to the liberal and socialist aims of post-war Europe. Moreover so far as Argentina is concerned, the move was unnecessary, because the position of the Farrell-Perón government on the eve of the Mexico conference was extremely weak, and the democratic opposition was rapidly gaining strength.

Because of the State Department's policy the United States will lose the moral leadership which it was beginning to acquire in Latin America and which was the only practical and acceptable substitute for dollar diplomacy. This break in the inter-American system will cause its collapse, and the various peoples of the continent will again be forced to rely on their own separate strength.

But even this betrayal by the United States will not cause the Argentine people to lose faith. They will find something to replace what has been taken from them; they will not fall a prey to desperation and nihilism. When they consider the catastrophe produced by recognition of their fascist regime they will turn toward the solution offered by the active anti-fascist forces in the world.

If the United States persists in its present policy of supporting fascist dictatorships in Latin America, and if the Soviet Union remains firm in its opposition to the Farrell-Perón regime, the outcome cannot be doubtful. For the Russians are skilful at playing the cards the United States has played so ineptly. In fact, they have already acted, preparatory to the San Francisco conference, and are opposing Argentina's presence there. If Russia succeeds in this, all moderate elements of the democratic movement—even those which from a certain point of view have been anti-Russian—will be forced into the orbit of Soviet diplomacy. And the Russian action will have repercussions not only in Argentina but among all democratic groups in South America. Thus Roosevelt's whole Good Neighbor policy, which was part of an effort to preserve what could be preserved in the American capitalist system, will have failed because of the ineptness of Washington diplomats.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ON MARCH 28 the man whom the AMG had installed as Mayor of Aachen, a German named Franz Oppenhof, was shot and killed. Three stragglers from the Wehrmacht had appeared at his house and demanded civilian clothes and passes which would let them get through the lines and go home. The Mayor told them he must hand them over to the American authorities. But instead of doing so at once—instead of calling an American guard—this schizophrenic German dickered with the three soldiers for several hours. Finally one of them shot him. He was not murdered to punish him for his lack of patriotism but because he had refused to help a deserter.

Three days later was April 1, which in Germany as here is traditionally April Fools' Day, a day for hoaxes and practical jokes. Under ordinary circumstances people would have thought it was an April Fools' joke when at 7 p. m. on April 1, over wave-length 1339, a radio station announced itself for the first time as "Station Werewolf," with the additional title, "Station of the German Freedom Movement." The more curious would have looked in the dictionary to see what the werewolf of German sagas really was. They would have found it defined as "a man transformed for a time or periodically into a wolf; a man by day and a wolf by night; a person afflicted with lycanthropy." And they would have found that lycanthropy was "a form of insanity in which a person imagines himself to be a wolf." Fortified with this information, most people would have been convinced that "Station Werewolf" was trying to be funny.

But the broadcast was not a joke. It was, in all probability, the swan song of Dr. Goebbels. Once again, before he departed this life, the classic author of Hollywood B- and C-film fantasies showed what he was capable of and what the world was losing. The broadcast began with an announcement to the effect that only after their defeat would the German people really begin to fight. It seems that the right occasion had not previously arisen, but now the struggle would be on:

Beware, you Britons, Americans, and Jews! Beware, you Bolsheviks, you OGPU butchers! The Werewolf will know how to reply to every crime against the honor and life of the German people. Woe to the enemies who want to torture and oppress the German people! But thrice woe to Germans who put themselves at the enemy's disposal! Over them hangs the sword of national revenge.

Next came the statement that the "Werewolf movement" had developed spontaneously in the occupied parts of Germany and did not need a Nazi Party, a German government, or a German Reich:

In this fateful hour countless men, women, and boys in the enemy-occupied regions have rallied to a movement of resistance using the name Werewolf. They have made an inflexible resolve, confirmed by a solemn oath, never to yield to the enemy, to resist him at all times.

Thirdly, listeners were told that even Station Werewolf, which would issue "instructions" at 7 p. m. each day, was broadcasting from territory held by the enemy—as is inexorably expected of all "underground" radio stations in B and C films. For though the location of radio transmitters can be determined by a physical-mathematical calculation in a few minutes, with unfailing accuracy—and as a result there have been no secret stations in this war—movie producers and consumers alike cling to the idea of the secret station on enemy soil as a requisite of modern conspiratorial romance. Well, Goebbels gave us that too in his swan song.

On the next day the Werewolf radio began to issue its instructions to Werewolf members. It was of course somewhat inconvenient that the enemy could listen in and take the necessary counter-measures. But a true movie mind, producer or consumer, does not allow its flights of fancy to be halted by such small embarrassments. On the second day of its existence the Werewolf radio broadcast orders to "kill the American Jew, Bernard Baruch, who wants to come to occupied Germany." Mr. Baruch is marked for death on seven counts:

He drove America into the First World War. He helped to forge the disgraceful fetters fastened on Germany at Versailles. He incited Britain to this second war and helped Churchill to office. Then once again he incited America to make war on Germany, and now he wants to come to Germany. We are waiting for him. From the moment he sets foot on German soil the shadow of the Werewolves must follow him, and one day the Werewolves will strike.

This was a very definite command. On the third day the instructions were more general. The occupation authorities must have blanched when they heard these simple but portentous directions:

Attention, Werewolves! The following message is important. Steal weapons and ammunition. Every weapon of the enemy's must be taken from him. Wrap the weapons up and hide them.

On the fourth day the instructions were tied in with the announcement of a victory. For that reason they were of an especially exciting nature. The order was given to kill the "United States Murder Commission in Coblenz," and this order was based on a discovery made in the course of a great Werewolf triumph:

During a raid which our comrades made yesterday on a convoy of American civilians the secretary of the United States Liquidation Commission, which is to be set up in occupied Germany, was captured. This commission is to organize the extermination of all Germans. Before we liquidated the secretary, he said that the "Murder Commission" was to hold its sessions in Coblenz. Werewolves of Coblenz, take heed! This Murder Commission must not be allowed a quiet moment. Hunt them down! Strike them down!

Let us not speak scornfully of the dying swan, Dr. Goebbels. With his vulgar and incredibly silly movie imagination he has had great influence on the world public; his success should give him a claim on the Oscar of all Oscars. Even in dying he shows that his childish nonsense is admirably suited to his enormous audience—at this moment people are wondering anxiously what in God's name the Werewolves will do next, what will happen when the Nazis "go underground."

Courage, people in the Great World Movie Theater! Let us keep our reason! It seems certain that the Nazis intend to fight to the end in the last corner into which they are driven, whether it be in the Bavarian "redoubt" or elsewhere. But when that fight is finished, let's stop talking about "Werewolves" and other forms of underground resistance. In all history, as in this war so far, there has never been a serious, dangerous, active underground in an occupied country unless there was an army outside on the offensive against the occupying power. There has been, and there will always be, isolated action by desperadoes. But in any country that is effectively occupied 99.9 per cent of the population are submissive. The Allies will need to be on their guard against werewolves and other underground German monsters only when somewhere in the world a state or a group of states sets an army in motion to drive them out of Germany. Only then will a corresponding movement develop underground in Germany.

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

REFERENCE

CHINA among the Powers

By DAVID N. ROWE. "Straightforward."—THE NEW YORKER. "Timely."—HARTFORD COURANT.
 "Required reading."—BALTIMORE SUN. $2.00

FICTION

DASHA

By E. M. ALMEDINGEN—As her earlier novel, Frossia, was a book of cold, hunger, and survival, this new novel, with many of the same people, is a book of laughter, sunshine, and hope in Russia just before the war. $2.50

POETRY

A WORLD WITHIN A WAR

HERBERT READ'S choice of all the poems he wishes to preserve since 1934 treat of the war and its impact upon a mind and sensibility that had taken the impress of an earlier war. $2.00

FICTION

THE Cradle Will Fall

STEPHEN SELEY'S first novel is a discerning story of childhood, centered on the reaction of a sensitive young boy to the death of his mother. $2.00

CURRENT EVENTS

REPORT ON THE RUSSIANS

W. L. WHITE'S superb report on Russia. "An honest, highly personal account of how the Russians (whom he liked) and the Soviet system (which he disliked) looked to a seasoned newsman."—TIME $2.50

BOOKS and the ARTS

SIEGFRIED

In the turret's great glass dome, the apparition, death,
Framed in the glass of the gunsight, a fighter's blinking wing,
Flares softly, a vacant fire. If the flak's inked blurs—
Distributed, statistical—the bombs' lost patterning
Are death, they are death under glass, a chance
For someone yesterday, someone tomorrow; and the fire
That streams from the fighter which is there, not there,
Does not warm you, has not burned them, though they die.
Under the leather and fur and wire, in the gunner's skull,
It is a dream: and he, the watcher, guiltily
Watches the him, the actor, who is innocent.
It happens as it does because it does.
It is unnecessary to understand; if you are still,
In this year of our warfare, indispensable
In general, and in particular dispensable
As a cartridge, a life—it is only to enter
So many knots in a window, so many feet;
To switch on for an instant the steel that understands.
Do as they said; as they said, there is always a reason—
Though neither for you nor for the fatal
Knower of wind, speed, pressure: the unvalued facts.
(In Nature there is neither right nor left nor wrong.)

So the bombs fell: through clouds to the island,
The dragon of maps; and the island's fighters
Rose from its ruins, through blind smoke, to the flights—
And fluttered smashed from the machinery of death.
Yet inside the infallible invulnerable
Machines, the skin of steel, glass, cartridges,
Duties, responsibility, and—surely—deaths,
There was only you: the ignorant life
That grew its weariness and loneliness and wishes
Into your whole wish: "Let it be the way it was.
Let me not matter, let nothing I do matter
To anybody, anybody. Let me be what I was."

And you are home, for good now, almost as you wished;
If you matter, it is as little, almost, as you wished.
If it has changed, still, you have had your wish
And are lucky, as you figured luck—are, really, lucky.
If it is different, if you are different,
It is not from the lives or the cities;
The world's war, just or unjust—the world's peace, war or peace;

But from a separate war: the shell with your name
In the bursting turret, the crystals of your blood
On the splints' wrapped steel, the hours wearing
The quiet body back to its base, its missions done;
And the slow flesh failing, the terrible flesh
Sloughed off at last—and waking, your leg gone,
To the dream, the old, old dream: it happens,
It happens as it does, it does, it does—
But not because of you, write the knives of the surgeon,

The gauze of the theater, the bearded and aging face
In the magic glass; if you wake and understand
There is always the nurse, the leg, the drug—
If you understand, there is sleep, there is sleep . . .
Reading of victories and sales and nations
Under the changed maps, in the sunlit papers;
Stumbling to the toilet on one clever leg
Of leather, wire, and willow; staring
Past the lawn and the trees to nothing, to the eyes
You looked away from as they looked away: the world outside
You are released to, rehabilitated
(What will you do now? I don't know);
It is these, it is these. If, standing irresolute
By the whitewashed courthouse, in the leafy street,
You look at the people who look back at you, at home,
And it is different, different—you have understood
Your world at last: you have tasted your own blood.

RANDALL JARRELL

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THE TERMS FOLK AND FOLKLORE are being assigned meanings so broad that they are rapidly becoming useless as terms. The confusion is such that anyone who attempts to discuss the subject must soon discover that he has a bear by the tail. I shall persist, nevertheless, not because I hope to say any final word but because I should like to raise a few questions and suggest some limitations on the application of the terms that would make them useful again.

Folk, in its anthropological sense, has a fairly specific and rather narrow meaning. It denotes a homogeneous group with a long common tradition and experience. The expression of such a group is unself-conscious, anonymous, and necessarily primitive, though it may be highly skilled, elaborate, and rich in form.

Strictly speaking, there has never been a folk in this country except the Indians and the Negroes. It might be said that Negroes, by reason of slavery and the repression that has been their lot since emancipation, have had the main characteristics of a folk thrust upon them. At any rate, the spirituals, the work songs, and the early and best jazz seem to me to fulfil the definition of folk art.

In some instances—in Pennsylvania, say—a sufficiently large fragment of a European folk settled in one region to constitute a transplantation which survived for a time. In the Southern mountains isolation was a preserving element so far as folk art, if not the folk itself, was concerned. In general, however, conditions in America have been of a sort to break up continuities and traditions, families and groups. Of homogeneity there has been practically none, and even those groups which might conceivably have been called folk when they arrived in America were involved, more or less quickly, in the process of becoming folks.

Fragments of folk art which were scattered throughout the country did survive, and became the models for songs and stories and myths which were anonymous, oral, and primitive. Later came similar expressions which had known authors, were written down, and were in a sense sophisticated. But the fact that they were invented by people who were no longer members of a folk, if they ever had been, but folks of an infinite variety of origins and even of degrees of literacy and culture gave to these expressions qualities very different from those of genuine folk material. To illustrate: a folk believed its folk-tales. The people who told or listened to tall tales did not believe them, and the underplay of non-belief and the conscious pleasure in the free exercise of the imagination—these are among the essential qualities of the tall tale.

It would be useless, I suppose, to try to shrink the word folklore back to its anthropological meaning. We shall probably, on the contrary, finally have to invent a new word for what once went by the name of folklore. But I shall continue to feel that most of what passes for folklore in this country should be called "folkslore"—especially when I pick up a book like B. A. Botkin's large and in many ways rich collection, "A Treasury of American Folklore."

I admire Mr. Botkin's zeal, but his discrimination seems to me less than adequate. For he not only includes genuine folklore and a great deal of what I should call folkslore; he also seems to think that the term folklore covers every kind of expression short of formal literature; and when he includes quotations from "My Thirty Years Out of the Senate" by Major Jack Downing—the pseudonym of a journalist named Seba Smith—even that limitation disappears. I do not see how the speech of a Congressman in the House of Representatives can be called folklore by any amount of stretching—if it can, the Congressional Record takes on a new significance; and when Mr. Botkin gives space in a book labeled folklore to such self-conscious, machine-made, and even commercial material as Knock Knock, Little Moron jokes, and an advertisement in a magazine of the Nueces River Valley Paradise, he demonstrates ad absurdum, it seems to me, the present meaninglessness of the label.

I must admit, however, that misuse of the word folk has gone so far by now that it probably cannot be stopped. I feel particularly quixotic when I note the regularity with which people refer to "Oklahoma!" as a folk opera. Mr. Krutch called it that only a couple of weeks ago in The Nation. I thought "Oklahoma!" was a highly romanticized, sophisticated, musical-comedy version of—and comment upon—life in the West around 1900, with words and music by two Broadway song writers. I enjoyed it as that. According to one of the writers, they deliberately "tossed out all the folk songs in the original," meaning "Green Grow the Lilacs" by Lynn Riggs. And in fact most of the elements which gave Mr. Riggs's play a claim to be called folk have been eliminated. The sinister character of the villain is an exception. Some of the songs in "Green Grow the Lilacs" were folk-songs by my definition, and obviously of European origin. Some were adaptations of such songs. Some were cowboy songs and frontier ballads. As Mr. Riggs points out, the play might have been called "An Old Song," for it is in itself, as he designed it, a simple tale in darks and lights

"which might have been the substance of an ancient song." That can hardly be said of "Oklahoma!"

Even the original play, however, is in my obstinate view a play about folks rather than a play about a folk, let alone a folk-play. (But then a folk-play, of course, has come to mean a play about folk, not a play created by a folk, which was surely its original meaning.)

I happen to have a special bias, it may be a special knowledge, in this instance. I grew up in the West and spent summers on a ranch. The people I knew there, including cowboys, were folks, not folk. My grandfather, who attended the gold rush, was folks. So was my father, who changed his name when he went West—a practice so common that it gave rise to the song "What Was Your Name in the States?" which is not a folk-song—and was at various times a cow hand, a bartender in a wild saloon, and a county sheriff. The Jewish trader who used to come to the ranch to buy pelts was not folk either.

I am all for searching out and preserving the traditions and skills and continuities in the arts which have persisted in this country despite the great forces which have militated against their existence, and our awareness of it. I am in favor, in a word, of instilling a sense of the past—but primarily as an instrument for making the present and the future more rich and manageable. A sense of the past that is merely antiquarian and nostalgic has no creative function; and the use of the word folk tends to emphasize these aspects.

I don't mean to say that a great deal of "folkslore" is not interesting or charming in its own right. But its intrinsic merit is often overrated because it is old or because it is the expression of an untutored imagination. Some of it is very tiresome, for the untutored imagination can be just as dull or pompous or humorless as any other.

Popular oral expression, old and new, is important and significant. But the flavor of it is not improved for me when it is called folklore. And the word folk applied to such material trails an odor of pretentiousness which is not only displeasing in itself but also very much out of keeping with the material it purports to describe.

In justice to Mr. Botkin, it must be said that he too feels uneasy about the term folklore. In another connection he coined the word folk-say, which seems to me a better designation, if only because it can be read "folks say," for most of the material in his book.

The desire to be, to have been, a folk is very deep—it comes out of a desire for stability and continuity which is healthy enough. The attempt to conjure up a folk where there is none is not necessarily harmless, especially in a world in which, historically, the folk is an anachronism.

I said at the beginning that I had no hope of saying any final word—and at this point I feel more than ever that I have a bear by the tail. But perhaps I have at least demonstrated the need for clarification and for a minimum of definition.

I HAD A LETTER from a reader in Europe a few weeks ago which gave me a feeling, at the very least, of confidence. It came from the Seventh Army front. The writer said that Notes by the Way were among the most refresh-

Books of interest to Nation readers

The Young Jefferson By Claude G. Bowers

"This young private Jefferson is worth recalling . . . Mr. Bowers has recreated him more convincingly, perhaps, than any other biographer." — Henry Steele Commager, N. Y. Herald Tribune $3.75

Story of a Secret State By Jan Karski

"One of the most powerful documents of the war . . . it portrays the indomitable spirit of the one nation that has never produced a Quisling." — Gerald W. Johnson, N. Y. Herald Tribune $3.00

Looking for a Bluebird By Joseph Wechsberg

"Completely delightful stories . . . just as cuckoo as you'd expect them to be, which is a very satisfying thing indeed . . . A very special flavor." — Joseph Henry Jackson, San Francisco Chronicle $2.50

Swing Low By Edwin Peebles

"Characters that are warm and kindly and sometimes even happy . . . The realest and most pitiful portrait that has come out of the South in a long time." — New Yorker $2.50

The Small Back Room By Nigel Balchin

"A novel of the small people who rise to greatness whether there's a war on or not . . . Balchin is a literary discovery of this war." — Chicago Sun $2.50

Tell Sparta By A. C. Sedgwick

"Some of the finest war reporting put between covers . . . This is first-hand stuff; this book is alive." — Lewis Gannett, N. Y. Herald Tribune $2.50

Written in Sand By Josephine Young Case

"This epic march ranks with the most thrilling adventures of military history . . . No hero could appear to be more contemporary, nor could any story be more timely than this. There is a prophetic quality to Mrs. Case's novelette." — New York Sun $2.00

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY · PUBLISHERS

At all bookstores.

BOOKS FROM Random House

Lifetime Library

Here, in a form worthy of the distinguished texts, is the best thought of antiquity, the Middle Ages and today. The Lifetime Library makes available to the general reader rare works that would ordinarily cost $30 to $50... and brings them together in handsome, compact format, in definitive, inexpensive editions arranged and edited by the greatest authorities in each field.

JUST PUBLISHED

BASIC WRITINGS OF ST. THOMAS AQUINAS

Edited and with an introduction by ANTON C. PEGIS

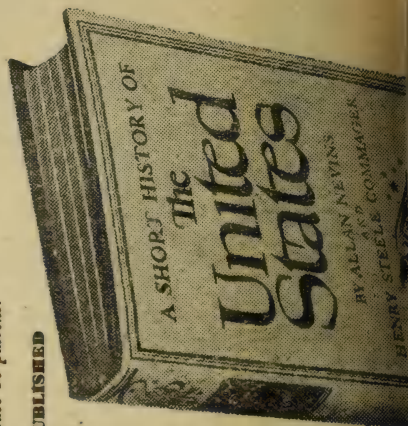

➔ A definitive edition of the best revised translation. With an introduction, numerous annotations and a detailed index. Two handsome volumes, beautifully printed and bound. 2300 pages, $7.50.

Modern Library

Don't blame your bookseller if he does not have all of your favorite Modern Library titles in stock all of the time. He is doing the best he can under difficult conditions. The fact is, more and more of the Modern Library books are going overseas, via the Army and the Navy, and are finding their way to every corner of the world. We are doing everything we can to keep booksellers supplied. Please be patient!

JUST PUBLISHED

THE WISDOM OF ISRAEL

Edited by LEWIS BROWNE

➔ A companion volume to The Wisdom of China and India. A magnificent anthology of the great writings of the past 5000 years that are the rich heritage of the Hebrew people and of the world. Over 1000 pages, with Notes, Glossary and Index. $3.95

ALREADY PUBLISHED

THE WISDOM OF CHINA AND INDIA

Edited by LIN YUTANG

➔ A wonderful 1104-page treasury of the wit, the beauty and the wisdom of ageless Asia. "A monumental anthology... a book of the ages, for the ages."—Pbiladelpbia Record. Beautifully printed and bound. $3.95

IN STOCK AT PRESENT

THE BASIC WORKS OF ARISTOTLE
Edited by Richard McKeon, $5.00
THE DIALOGUES OF PLATO
Translated by Benjamin Jowett. 2 volumes, $6.00
THE GREEK HISTORIANS
Edited by F. B. Godolphin. 2 volumes, $6.00
COMPLETE WORKS OF EUGENE O'NEILL
In three handsome volumes, boxed, $7.50

➔ A concise and compact history of our country which is both authoritative and eminently readable. Written by two professors of history at Columbia University, it is a complete chronicle of American history. Originally published at $3.00 by Little Brown as AMERICA: The Story of a Free People, and then as a POCKET HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES by Pocket Books, it has now been revised to include a special chapter which brings it up to date. 528 pages, indexed, 95¢.

SOME NEW PRINTINGS NOW READY

- 7. THE WISDOM OF CONFUCIUS, Lin Yutang
- 125. DORIAN GRAY, Oscar Wilde
- 126. RED STAR OVER CHINA, Edgar Snow
- 148. GRAPES OF WRATH, John Steinbeck
- 221. NATIVE SON, Richard Wright
- 169. TURN OF THE SCREW, Henry James
- 97. LEAVES OF GRASS, Walt Whitman
- 153. THE REPUBLIC, Plato
- 234. LIFE & WRITINGS OF THOMAS JEFFERSON
- 132. POETRY & PROSE OF JOHN MILTON

144. GREAT DETECTIVE STORIES
211. COLLECTED SHORT STORIES, Ring Lardner
30. MODERN IRISH PLAYS
223. FOUR PLAYS, Lillian Hellman

- 88. FLOWERING JUDAS, Katherine Anne Porter
- 19. FAREWELL TO ARMS, Hemingway
- 31. DRACULA, Bram Stoker
- 34. VICTORY, Joseph Conrad
- 39. AUTOBIOGRAPHY, Benjamin Franklin
- 54. SEVEN GOTHIC TALES, Isaac Dinesen
- 57. SHORT BIBLE, Goodspeed & Smith
- 59. SWANN'S WAY, Marcel Proust
- 60. PHILOSOPHY OF SPINOZA
- 184. OLD WIVES' TALE, Arnold Bennett
- 161. CANTERBURY TALES, Chaucer

GIANTS
$1.45
G3 LES MISERABLES, Victor Hugo
G22 ON WAR, Karl Von Clausewitz
G62 WORKS OF PUSHKIN

ON SALE AT ALL BOOKSTORES IN AMERICA

ing of the letters he received each week, and he ended by saying, "We fondly embrace you here in this exceedingly noisy leaning tower on the western front." A week later The Nation received a letter from the home front asking how long I was to be allowed to waste its precious space. I shall try to proceed on the assumption that both customers are right. Anyway, as Palinurus has it, confidence does not become me.

BY THE WAY, "The Satin Slipper" by Paul Claudel, which Frank Jones described in his article on The Theater in Paris some weeks ago, has just been published here in a translation by the Reverend Father John O'Connor, with the collaboration of the author (Sheed and Ward, $3).

The Revolution of '89

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. By J. M. Thompson. Oxford University Press. $5.

IT IS no small achievement to write the perfect textbook on a tangled and controversial subject. J. M. Thompson's "French Revolution" deserves that superlative praise. Its six hundred pages are packed with definite and relevant information. Slips are remarkably few and of trifling importance. Maret, for instance, was not a "future Marshal," although he was a future duke. Mr. Thompson thinks that bourgeoisie was an intermediate step between noblesse and roture; but bourgeois were roturiers. Mainmorte, in 1789, no longer referred to serfdom but to inalienable church property. Some of the facts are seldom found in one-volume histories. The glossary in the "practical preface" is very practical indeed, and the table of organization of the revolutionary government would have been a godsend to the statesmen of the time.

It is refreshing to come across a book free from the perverse bias found in such virulent libels as Madelin's or Gaxotte's. Mr. Thompson does not even mention the latest of these anti-revolutionary theses, advanced by Bernard Fay and Nesta H. Webster: that the Revolution was caused by secret societies in the pay of perfidious Albion. All aspects of the Revolution are presented—political, social, economic, religious. The ideological side is the weakest. The author is by temperament fair and even generous. The worst failures of the Revolution—the civil constitution of the clergy, the assignates or territorial bonds, the Jacobin terror—were not, in his opinion, the result of outrageous stupidity or wickedness. The men were well-meaning; the measures were not absurd. They failed; but our own experts are hardly qualified to cast the first stone.

The style is pleasant, with spare and delightful touches of British humor. Once in a while this Britishness is something of a handicap. The average American student will not be enlightened when he is told that "la Cour des Aides" was "attached to what we should call Somerset House."

Mr. Thompson is not quite so free from bias as he believes. He has the curious fondness of the don for corrupt politicians like Danton—just to show that he is superior to donnish prejudices. He has a corresponding and no less donnish aversion to virtue; Lafayette was a prig, Madame Roland was "at heart a courtesan"; and inevitably he abominates the Incorruptible, Robespierre. Not a safe path to understanding. Albert Mathiez, whose book covers exactly the same ground in about the same number of pages, would here provide a much-needed corrective.

We called the work an excellent textbook: frankly, the praise implies reservations. This is not history on the more ambitious scale. There is nothing about the causes of the Revolution, remote or proximate. The immediate events, selected because they belong to the tradition of historical writing, are presented in an even, colorless light. The absence of passion is actually a fault, for the Revolution was passionate, and a scholar who does not feel its glow is a blind man discoursing about colors. The Revolution is indeed an epic, for myths and abstractions—the People, the Nation, the Church, Terror, Liberty, Glory—assumed reality and became protagonists, like the gods in Homer. Michelet remains the supreme historian of that period, because he felt intensely. Hugo's "Ninety Three," corrected by France's "The Gods Are Athirst," would help us understand the great upheaval better than this accurate and very intelligent Baedeker. Finally, a textbook, perfect for the reference shelf, is not intended for the common reader. Mr. Thompson writes well, but his purpose is to marshal innumerable details; the patience of the general public would soon expire. Mr. Thompson did not give us the epic, the romance, or the philosophy of the Revolution. He proposed to himself a hard and definite task; and he did the job exceedingly well.

ALBERT GUERARD

Full Employment and World Trade

AMERICA'S ROLE IN THE WORLD ECONOMY. By Alvin H. Hansen. W. W. Norton and Co. $2.50.

THE United States hopes to export more after the war because it is so rich; it has not figured out how to consume surplus production at home. Britain must export more because it is poor; it has no other way of paying for imported goods, without which it can hardly survive. And quite a number of other countries, Canada for one, are interested in getting larger slices of the international trade pie. Is it enough, under these circumstances, for the various countries to agree on rules against pushing or unfair obstruction of the table? Or would it be more realistic to cooperate in an effort to obtain a bigger pie?

In his guide to post-war world economics Dr. Hansen does not neglect good international manners. His main objective, however, is to urge the need of an expanded pie and to suggest a recipe for baking it. The first essential, he believes, is for nations to look to their own domestic policies. As he says: "The world as a whole failed miserably to make the economy function in a satisfactory manner in the two decades between the two world wars. For this the great industrial nations that control the bulk of the world's resources are mainly to blame. By failing to make adequate use of their own resources in the interests of their own people, economic distress spread to the countries less adequately endowed with natural resources. Out of this failure sprang the breakdown of the world economy and indeed of international political security."

No one is writing more thoughtful, challenging, vivid, editorial journalism today!

Max Lerner

From the unique editorial pages of PM come these selected comments on the main issues of our period, written with a sense of urgency and a lively awareness of the world we live in. Whether his topic is suggested by a subway ride or a world event like Teheran, Mr. Lerner's keen, perceptive comment gives us a fresh survey of the passing scene and contributes to our understanding of the times.

$3.00

PUBLIC JOURNAL

THE VIKING PRESS

NEW YORK, N. Y.

Of good and evil—a story in waltz-time.

Ben Melman's

Around a disappearing island, a beer garden, a petty tyrant, a homesick prisoner, and a miracle—a veritable classic among miracles—Ben Melman has woven his latest, most warm-hearted novel. Only his blending of pathos and humor could produce such a tale of human sympathy—making us laugh at terror and ridicule cruelty. With 15 full-color illustrations.

$3.00

THE BLUE DANUBE

A particular responsibility attaches to this country because of the tremendous impact of its economy on that of the rest of the world. In the great depression the value of imports fell off even more sharply than national income, with devastating results for the countries supplying the United States with goods and services. These countries in turn, unable to earn dollars, were forced drastically to cut their purchases from America. In the modern world, as long as foreign exchanges are uncontrolled, depressions spread like prairie fires. Consequently, unless America finds ways of stabilizing its economy, other countries will attempt to insulate theirs from its influence. Involuntary insulation is likely to prove unpalatable even to voluntary isolationists.

On present calculations there appears to be a great gap between the volume of goods America hopes to sell and the volume it is prepared to buy from abroad. If this gap is to be filled by foreign loans, it will be necessary, Dr. Hansen says, to maintain a stable flow of credit and not, as after 1930, cut it off just when the borrower's needs are greatest. But in any case, if loans are not to become de facto gifts, they must eventually be repaid in the form of goods and services, for in the long run there is nothing else that can be "used for money" in international trade. That is one reason why if America hopes to export on a large scale it will have to reduce its tariffs and cease to put other obstacles in the way of imports. But the maintenance of a high and stable level of employment is even more important. Without that, resistance to lower tariffs will be terrific, and even if this is overcome, America's capacity to absorb foreign goods and services will be insufficient to match the hoped-for volume of exports.

Believing, then, that international prosperity, like charity, begins at home, Dr. Hansen supports the proposal of the Australian delegation at the Philadelphia International Labor Office Conference for an agreement between governments each to maintain full employment in its own domestic economy. Beyond this, he sees the need for a number of world economic institutions, with the Economic and Social Council projected at Dumbarton Oaks providing leadership and coordination. A large part of his book is devoted to a discussion of such institutions, some of which, like the ILO, are already established, some, like the International Monetary Fund and International Bank, in the painful process of birth. Still others, an International Commodity Corporation, for example, are little more than a twinkle in Dr. Hansen's eye.

The most thorough analysis in the book is that of the Bretton Woods agreement. Dr. Hansen describes clearly the functions and operating methods of the proposed International Monetary Fund and International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and gives a detailed reply to many of the criticisms they have encountered. Two general points he develops very forcefully: first, that most of the risks critics have cited are risks which the United States will encounter in a more exaggerated form if the Bretton Woods plan is turned down; second, that the idea of some bankers that American credit can be used as a whip to compel other countries "to put their houses in order"—in other words, to balance budgets and return to the gold standard—is hopelessly unrealistic. Britain, certainly, has made it clear that it is not prepared to buy stable exchange rates at the cost of mass unemployment. Many Britons, in fact, fear that the provisions of the Monetary Fund may prove too rigid, and it is a pity that Dr. Hansen has not dealt more specifically with their criticisms.

One of America's chief handicaps in formulating foreign trade policies which correspond with its long-term interests is badly informed public opinion. The average business man, unless directly involved in export trade, is only interested if he is threatened with foreign competition. The man in the street is apt to be indifferent; he finds the theory of foreign exchanges and trade balances hard to understand and harder still to connect with his own economic problems. Consequently, there is a great need for authoritative books of this kind, especially designed for laymen. Dr. Hansen has avoided the error of writing down to the general public, but he has sought and achieved a clarity which, all too often, is lacking in popular works by economists. I hope his book will be widely read and carefully studied, especially on Capitol Hill.

KEITH HUTCHISON

BRIEFER COMMENT

Words and Pictures

AT FIRST GLANCE the numerous illustrations—48 plates in color and 125 illustrations in black and white—may seem to be the main attraction of "The Romance of English Literature" (Hastings House, $5). Very fine these pictures certainly are; and only a sample, it is to be hoped, of the kind of book illustration we shall get after the war. For why should the highly developed modern techniques of color reproduction be lavished on advertising alone, and not used, as here, to bring the pick of library and museum before a reader's hungry eyes? The dry, stinging "cuts" of the ordinary kind, in textbook or elsewhere, are here superseded with magnificent lavishness. And the black-and-white reproductions are nearly as rich in their effect as those in color; they range through manuscript holographs, engravings, sketches and caricatures, and prints of all kinds, including the theatrical. To many a reader the "speaking" likeness of John Donne—from a miniature in the British Royal Collection—will alone be worth the price of the book.

The letterpress surrounding the pictures is worth some attention; it, too, is not of an ordinary kind. Each of the seven essays included has either the virtue of firm and brilliant learning or of insight of the best modern kind—sharp, but neither arbitrary nor eccentric. It is an extremely healthy and hopeful sign that these critical pieces, produced during a war, certainly with some slight underlying aim of propaganda, are so free from slant or bias. So that we can overlook Elizabeth Bowen's neglect of Joyce in her discussion of English novelists—something a little different, of course, from novelists writing in English—and not judge Lord David Cecil too harshly for his total misapprehension of the two different kinds of nature and talent possessed by Eliot and Auden respectively. On the other hand, Sir Herbert Grierson, writing on the English Bible from Bede to Basic English, does not neglect that book's influence on either English politics or English literature. Graham Greene

CAN YOU ANSWER these 4 questions?

● DO YOU KNOW THE REAL BASIS OF THE FIGHT BETWEEN JESSE JONES AND HENRY WALLACE?

Aladdin's Lamp shows the great paradox of a Hamiltonian economy operating within a Jeffersonian frame. The history of the Hamilton-Jefferson conflict over the national debt; Jackson's battle against banker Biddle; Lincoln's greenbacks and Wall Street's triumph over Bryan; these facts are the background for the struggle in Washington between Hamiltonians like Jones and Jeffersonians like Wallace.

● DO YOU KNOW DEMOCRACY'S ANSWER TO COMMUNISM AND FASCISM?

Aladdin's Lamp is a book about the Left-Right Conflict and the Third Resolvent Factor. It tells how the Gestapo enforced Nazi finance; how the Soviet Prombank just misses being revolutionary; how Democracy can fulfill its destiny with a new resolvent to end artificial scarcity.

● IS "FULL EMPLOYMENT" POSSIBLE? DESIRABLE? NECESSARY?

Munson answers, No; because power production steadily reduces the size of the labor-force needed to satisfy real demand. As technology advances, employment inevitably recedes. Full enjoyment, not full employment should be our concern.

● CAN A "WORLD BANK" BRING ABOUT INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION?

Bretton Woods is supposed to represent a compromise between the view of British (Keynes) and American (White) economists. Actually, both schools build on the same fundamental error, the theory that production automatically finances consumption with no deficiency of money. Both neglect the rates of flow of prices and of incomes. Munson shows how to close the price-income gap by making credit-money serve the needs of the consumers.

THIS BOOK probes the assumptions usually taken for granted in most economic discussions. It demonstrates that we cannot cure the world's ills by applying more and more of the old panaceas. Many of the questions that remained in your mind after you had read and studied the orthodox economists, will become crystal clear when you have read this book. As a consequence other subsidiary questions, such as race prejudice, the "inevitability" of wars, the relation between political and economic statesmanship assume their true perspective.

By Gorham Munson

Frontispiece in color, four diagrams,
420 pages • Index
At all bookstores $3.75

LAWRENCE • RILKE • SHOLOKOFF • STEINBECK • NIETZSCHE • ADAMS • DEWEY

• WRITERS AND THINKERS IN WAR AND PEACE •

NO VOICE IS WHOLLY LOST by Harry Slochower

• Brilliantly defines and illuminates the problem and promise of the contemporary artist and thinker living in a war culture. The reader takes part in an exciting intellectual adventure aiming to find a coherent pattern among our confusing diversities. $3.75

HEMINGWAY • HUXLEY • MALRAUX • MANN • SANTAYANA • SPENGLER

CREATIVE AGE PRESS • 11 E. 44th ST. • NEW YORK 17

strikes many flashes from the British dramatists. E. L. Woodward sorts out a typical attitude of British historians ("The moral approach"), but insists that the attitude has its merits. Elizabeth Bowen does a particularly good job on Fielding and Richardson; and Kate O'Brien gives a delightful account of the important but neglected field of English diaries and journals. Kenneth Matthews writes one of the best of the essays, on the subject of British philosophers, summing up thus: "The native characteristics of British philosophy are these: common sense, dislike of complication, a strong preference for the concrete over the abstract, and a certain awkward honesty of method in which an occasional pearl of poetry is imbedded." Lord David Cecil does his best with the dazzling subject of English poetry.

And then we can go back for another bout with the pictures. How wonderful it will be if there is more of this kind of inspired illustrated books in that still ambiguous "post-war world."

LOUISE BOGAN

The Moral Intuition

IN "ARE MEN EQUAL?" (Putnam, $2.50) Professor Henry Alonzo Myers of Cornell very wisely turns to literature rather than to science for confirmation of human equality. Science, he insists, is neutral on the subject; the evolutionary appeal to "natural" inequality—survival, success, and the like—is question-begging, and altogether anarchic in its full practical implication, since life is riddled with contingency and no common standard can be agreed upon. Moreover, "are not human values part of nature?" In the American tradition, in Jefferson, Emerson, Lincoln, Whitman, Melville, Hawthorne, Mark Twain, he finds a sentiment, an intuition, a divination of equality. It is not merely prudential, as Hobbes maintained morality and law to be; rather, "it is confirmed . . . by love and comradeship . . . by a tragic sense of the common fate of man . . . whenever men share joys and sorrows," in short, "whenever one man sees another as he sees himself."

This, of course, as Professor Myers admits, is in effect the Kantian imperative, Bentham's utilitarianism, the golden rule—the sovereign moral intuition of the race. But if, as Professor Myers believes, equality and justice are correlative concepts, then it is not equality he is insisting upon so much as equity; for he explicitly repudiates communism. Justice may be an equalitarian notion, but it is predicated on the fact of moral inequality. The truth is that equality and inequality alike are debatable concepts because both must answer the question: equal, or unequal, in respect to what? "Equality," says Professor Myers, "means equal rights . . . equality before law." He underates the extent to which every legal system is a set of rules that safeguard the victors from the vanquished.

Professor Myers's book is unfortunately weakened by his addiction to the conventional vocabulary and assumptions of liberal thought. He is troubled, for example, by the libertarian critics of democracy who doubt that equality, which they associate with collectivism, is compatible with liberty; he fails to see that every type of society, good or bad, generates its own kind of freedom. In any case, because absolute equality is a chimera, what he calls "the proposition . . . of equal private rights" is always either a euphemism or a half-truth; perhaps he would agree that it is the unattainable limit that defines one aspect of the democratic ideal. Men, after all, are civilized to the extent that they are motivated by the idea of perfection. To preserve that idea, to inculcate it, together with the salutary sense of inequality it entails, is the mark of a humane culture.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ

Gide's "Hamlet"

BY NO MEANS the least interesting part of "Hamlet: Edition Bilingue. Traduction Nouvelle d'André Gide" (Pantheon Books. Limited Edition, $4.50) is the brief preface in which the translator defines his aims and describes impressionistically the effect produced upon him by the original text. "Indiscutablement, se dégage de tout ce lyrique fatras une fumée capiteuse qui porte à la tête, aux sens, au cœur, et nous plonge en un état de transe poétique où n'intervient plus que très faiblement la raison." The problem of the translator is to be neither merely accurate nor merely lyric but to lose neither the literal sense nor the poetic effect, and the task is supremely difficult when the equivalents must be found in "une langue intransigeante, aux strictes exigences grammaticales et syntaxiques, une langue aussi claire, précise, et prosaïque (pour ne point dire anti-poétique) que la nôtre." To read alternately passages of Shakespeare and passages of Gide's rendering is to conceive a vast respect for the care and artistry of the latter, but to be left nevertheless with the conviction that, upon anyone whose native tongue is English, the chief effect is a fresh sense of the enormously rich complexity of "Hamlet." When you get "Rien; que montrer comment un roi circule au long des tripes d'un mendigot" for "Nothing, but to show you how a king may go a progress through the guts of a beggar," it is easy to put a finger on one of the things lost—namely, the suggestion of "a royal progress" concealed in the simple word "progress." It is equally clear that something is lost in substituting for "Like quills upon the fretful porpentine" "comme les dards du porc-épic en furie." But here it is hard to say what the loss is.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

An Opportunity Missed

PIECING TOGETHER Walter White's hurried and rather haphazardly organized impressions of the condition of our Negro soldiers in England, Italy, and North Africa contained in "The Rising Wind" (Doubleday, Doran, $2), it is apparent that segregation has been basically responsible for the difficulties and tensions which have arisen. By and large, the top command in Europe has tried to be fair, issuing clear-cut directives that all soldiers wearing the uniform of the army must be accorded equality of treatment and showing a laudable willingness to correct particular injustices. Unfortunately these directives have been frequently emasculated or actually ignored by officers of intermediate rank, who are more inclined to prejudice than the soldiers they command. Had these orders been literally obeyed, however, they would not have corrected the consequences of rigid segregation—only the hospitals, Mr.

The
most dramatic novel
of the year

EARTH AND HIGH HEAVEN

by Gwethalyn Graham

A fine love story, full-bodied, contradictory, shadowed and distressed, and given uncommon emotional subtlety by the war... intensely real and not soon to be forgotten.

—Bernard DeVoto, N. Y. Herald Tribune

FICTION WINNER 1944
ANISFIELD-WOLF AWARD
for the best novel on race relations published in 1944

640,00 COPIES IN PRINT including Literary Guild

"... the most comprehensive report
on Japan's temporary empire in Asia
yet to appear
... deserves to be widely read."

—Christian Science Monitor

UNTIL THEY EAT STONES

by Russell Brines

"No other current book about Japan, not even Under-Secretary of State Grew's penetrating study... has set forth more clearly the Japanese mentality nor given a better explanation of how the men of Nippon got the way they are."—N. Y. Times Book Review

$3.00

George Wharton Pepper looks back across the years PHILADELPHIA LAWYER

George Wharton Pepper's autobiography spans the American scene from the Civil War to World War II. "Whether the reader is conservative, liberal or radical, he will find great pleasure in Mr. Pepper's book."—Philadelphia Inquirer

6th Printing • Illustrated • $3.75

Mary O'Hara's THUNDERHEAD

All the beauty and heart-catching drama of My Friend Flicka are here again in this immortal story of a boy and a horse. $2.75

And if you haven't read

MY FRIEND FLICKA

isn't it time you did? • $2.50

STORY PRESS BOOK

TIME TO BE YOUNG

Great Stories of the Growing Years

edited by Whit Burnett

Editor of The Seas of God and This Is My Best

"... an unusually well-chosen, balanced selection of grave and gay, spring-like material... There are well-known names, Faulkner, Proust, Saroyan, Steinbeck, Hemingway, and others less well known."—Book-of-the-Month Club News. $3.00

A STORY PRESS BOOK

FIRST WHISPER of "The Wind in the Willows" by Kenneth Grahame

Edited with an introduction by Elspeth Grahame

This story of how the beloved classic came to be written is also a flavorful and nostalgic record of its author. "... it is a book not to be missed by any lover of children's literature—or of children."

—N. Y. Herald Tribune Book Review

Illustrated • 2nd Printing • $1.50

At all bookstores

Philadelphia • J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY • New York

strikes many flashes from the British dramatists. E. L. Woodward sorts out a typical attitude of British historians ("The moral approach"), but insists that the attitude has its merits. Elizabeth Bowen does a particularly good job on Fielding and Richardson; and Kate O'Brien gives a delightful account of the important but neglected field of English diaries and journals. Kenneth Matthews writes one of the best of the essays, on the subject of British philosophers, summing up thus: "The native characteristics of British philosophy are these: common sense, dislike of complication, a strong preference for the concrete over the abstract, and a certain awkward honesty of method in which an occasional pearl of poetry is imbedded." Lord David Cecil does his best with the dazzling subject of English poetry.

And then we can go back for another bout with the pictures. How wonderful it will be if there is more of this kind of inspired illustrated books in that still ambiguous "post-war world."

LOUISE BOGAN

The Moral Intuition

IN "ARE MEN EQUAL?" (Putnam, $2.50) Professor Henry Alonzo Myers of Cornell very wisely turns to literature rather than to science for confirmation of human equality. Science, he insists, is neutral on the subject; the evolutionary appeal to "natural" inequality—survival, success, and the like—is question-begging, and altogether anarchic in its full practical implication, since life is riddled with contingency and no common standard can be agreed upon. Moreover, "are not human values part of nature?" In the American tradition, in Jefferson, Emerson, Lincoln, Whitman, Melville, Hawthorne, Mark Twain, he finds a sentiment, an intuition, a divination of equality. It is not merely prudential, as Hobbes maintained morality and law to be; rather, "it is confirmed . . . by love and comradeship . . . by a tragic sense of the common fate of man . . . whenever men share joys and sorrows," in short, "whenever one man sees another as he sees himself."

This, of course, as Professor Myers admits, is in effect the Kantian imperative, Bentham's utilitarianism, the golden rule—the sovereign moral intuition of the race. But if, as Professor Myers believes, equality and justice are correlative concepts, then it is not equality he is insisting upon so much as equity; for he explicitly repudiates communism. Justice may be an equalitarian notion, but it is predicated on the fact of moral inequality. The truth is that equality and inequality alike are debatable concepts because both must answer the question: equal, or unequal, in respect to what? "Equality," says Professor Myers, "means equal rights . . . equality before law." He underates the extent to which every legal system is a set of rules that safeguard the victors from the vanquished.

Professor Myers's book is unfortunately weakened by his addiction to the conventional vocabulary and assumptions of liberal thought. He is troubled, for example, by the libertarian critics of democracy who doubt that equality, which they associate with collectivism, is compatible with liberty; he fails to see that every type of society, good or bad, generates its own kind of freedom. In any case, because absolute equality is a chimera, what he calls "the proposition . . . of equal private rights" is always either a euphemism or a half-truth; perhaps he would agree that it is the unattainable limit that defines one aspect of the democratic ideal. Men, after all, are civilized to the extent that they are motivated by the idea of perfection. To preserve that idea, to inculcate it, together with the salutary sense of inequality it entails, is the mark of a humane culture.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ

Gide's "Hamlet"

BY NO MEANS the least interesting part of "Hamlet: Edition Bilingue. Traduction Nouvelle d'André Gide" (Pantheon Books. Limited Edition, $4.50) is the brief preface in which the translator defines his aims and describes impressionistically the effect produced upon him by the original text. "Indiscutablement, se dégage de tout ce lyrique fatras une fumée capiteuse qui porte à la tête, aux sens, au cœur, et nous plonge en un état de transe poétique où n'intervient plus que très faiblement la raison." The problem of the translator is to be neither merely accurate nor merely lyric but to lose neither the literal sense nor the poetic effect, and the task is supremely difficult when the equivalents must be found in "une langue intransigente, aux strictes exigences grammaticales et syntaxiques, une langue aussi claire, précise, et prosaïque (pour ne point dire anti-poétique) que la nôtre." To read alternately passages of Shakespeare and passages of Gide's rendering is to conceive a vast respect for the care and artistry of the latter, but to be left nevertheless with the conviction that, upon anyone whose native tongue is English, the chief effect is a fresh sense of the enormously rich complexity of "Hamlet." When you get "Rien; que montrer comment un roi circule au long des tripes d'un mendigot" for "Nothing, but to show you how a king may go a progress through the guts of a beggar," it is easy to put a finger on one of the things lost—namely, the suggestion of "a royal progress" concealed in the simple word "progress." It is equally clear that something is lost in substituting for "Like quills upon the fretful porpentine" "comme les dards du porc-épic en furie." But here it is hard to say what the loss is.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

An Opportunity Missed

PIECING TOGETHER Walter White's hurried and rather haphazardly organized impressions of the condition of our Negro soldiers in England, Italy, and North Africa contained in "The Rising Wind" (Doubleday, Doran, $2), it is apparent that segregation has been basically responsible for the difficulties and tensions which have arisen. By and large, the top command in Europe has tried to be fair, issuing clear-cut directives that all soldiers wearing the uniform of the army must be accorded equality of treatment and showing a laudable willingness to correct particular injustices. Unfortunately these directives have been frequently emasculated or actually ignored by officers of intermediate rank, who are more inclined to prejudice than the soldiers they command. Had these orders been literally obeyed, however, they would not have corrected the consequences of rigid segregation—only the hospitals, Mr.

The
most dramatic novel
of the year

EARTH AND HIGH HEAVEN

by Gwethalyn Graham

"A fine love story, full-bodied, contradictory, shadowed and distressed, and given uncommon emotional subtlety by the war... intensely real and not soon to be forgotten."

—Bernard DeVoto, N. Y. Herald Tribune

FICTION WINNER 1944
ANISFIELD-WOLF AWARD
for the best novel on race
relations published in 1944

640,000 COPIES IN PRINT including Literary Guild $2.50

George Wharton Pepper looks back across the years

PHILADELPHIA LAWYER

George Wharton Pepper's autobiography spans the American scene from the Civil War to World War II. "Whether the reader is conservative, liberal or radical, he will find great pleasure in Mr. Pepper's book."—Philadelphia Inquirer

6th Printing • Illustrated • $3.75

Mary O'Hara's THUNDERHEAD

All the beauty and heart-catching drama of My Friend Flicka are here again in this immortal story of a boy and a horse. $2.75

And if you haven't read

MY FRIEND FLICKA

isn't it time you did? • $2.50

STORY PRESS BOOKS

"... the most comprehensive report
on Japan's temporary empire in Asia
yet to appear
... deserves to be widely read."

—Christian Science Monitor

UNTIL THEY EAT STONES

by Russell Brines

"No other current book about Japan, not even Under-Secretary of State Grew's penetrating study... has set forth more clearly the Japanese mentality nor given a better explanation of how the men of Nippon got the way they are."—N. Y.

Times Book Review $3.00

TIME TO BE YOUNG

Great Stories of the Growing Years

edited by Whit Burnett

Editor of The Seas of God and This Is My Best

"... an unusually well-chosen, balanced selection of grave and gay, spring-like material... There are well-known names, Faulkner, Proust, Saroyan, Steinbeck, Hemingway, and others less well known."—Book-of-the-Month Club News. $3.00

A STORY PRESS BOOK

FIRST WHISPER of "The Wind in the Willows" by Kenneth Grahame

Edited with an introduction by Elspeth Grahame

This story of how the beloved classic came to be written is also a flavorsome and nostalgic record of its author. "... it is a book not to be missed by any lover of children's literature—or of children."

—N. Y. Herald Tribune Book Review

Illustrated • 2nd Printing • $1.50

At all bookstores

Philadelphia • J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY • New York

A Price for Peace

The New Europe and World Markets

By ANTONÍN BASCH

An important, timely study of Europe's economy by a man thoroughly familiar with the problems involved. Dr. Basch traces the economic events in Europe that fostered the Second World War, analyzes totalitarian economy as practiced by the Germans in their own and conquered countries and stresses the necessity for maintaining and promoting Europe's welfare through concerted international assistance, expanding world trade and economic cooperation on a broad basis. This is a book for everyone concerned with the stabilization of Europe and a permanent peace. Foreword by James T. Shotwell. To be published May 2 $2.50

Economic Stability in the Postwar World

The Conditions of Prosperity After the Transition from War to Peace

LEAGUE OF NATIONS PUBLICATION

1945. II. A. 2

The second report issued by the Delegation on Economic Depressions appointed by the Council of the League of Nations in 1938 to present measures that might be employed to prevent or mitigate economic depressions. This volume deals with the long range problems created by economic fluctuations in peacetime. $3.00

Plainville, U.S.A.

By JAMES WEST

A lively analysis of everyday life in a typical "backward" American community by an anthropologist who uses a pseudonym to preserve the anonymity of his real-life subjects. Based on his year in a small town in the middle of the United States, the book is packed with detailed material about living habits, social customs, formal and informal educational systems, and behavior problems. $2.75

The Science of Man in the World Crisis

A collaboration of twenty-two experts. Edited by Ralph Linton, Professor of Anthropology, Columbia University. $4.00

Amerigo Vesputti: Pilot Major

By Frederick J. Pohl $3.00

Costa Rican Life

By John and Mavis Biesanz $3.00

Crime and the Human Mind

By David Abrahamsen, M. D. $3.00

COLUMBIA

On sale at BOOKS all bookstores

White notes, were free of it. The army, by its attitude of "non-intervention" toward the racial status quo, has not only missed an exceptional opportunity to indoctrinate 10,000,000 American citizens with democratic ideas, but has in effect catered to the prejudices of the racially bigoted. It is this failure to seize a magnificent opportunity for mass education rather than the injustices suffered by Negro troops that constitutes the real tragedy. For this failure has made it possible for a bigoted minority within the services to lower our prestige as a democratic nation in the eyes of most Europeans and to undermine the morale of some 700,000 Negro troops. The Negro soldiers whom Mr. White met overseas were uniformly bitter. "An ominous brooding," he writes, "an intent silence, hung like a pall over them." Although he does not make the point, it is quite apparent from Mr. White's timely report that in the army as elsewhere it is not the majority but a minority of the majority who keep prejudiced attitudes alive. How long are we to continue appeasing this minority? CAREY MC WILLIAMS

Looking-Glass Land

THE NEUROTIC PROFESSOR of mathematics at Christ Church College, Oxford, the Reverend Charles L. Dodgson, whom Matthew Arnold called "that clergyman," was also Lewis Carroll, wanderer through the mad world of wonderland. Florence Becker Lennon in "Victoria Through the Looking-Glass" (Simon and Schuster, $3.50) dissects this split personality with a mixture of critical approaches. Obviously Alice's adventures beg for Freudian analysis, with their rabbits and locked doors and passageways; and it is equally obvious to the sociological critic that the whole Victorian Age is reflected in Carroll's looking-glass. Mrs. Lennon skirts the pitfalls of either extreme and balances her work with remarkable delicacy.

Despite a fantastic bibliography, which runs the gamut of the declining West from Plato to Max Eastman, the book is well documented with a mountain of letters, diaries, illustrations, and reminiscences, and is at the same time interesting and very much alive.

Lewis Carroll is a fascinating man. His miraculous escape from the prison of Victorian England, and of his own maladjustments, into the looking-glass land of childhood remains one of literature's greatest accomplishments. Amid the plethora of not always justified literary "renaissances," it is refreshing to find a book that avoids the sensational, content with intelligent critical biography. Lewis Carroll will never have a "renaissance" if only for the simple reason that he does not need one. JOHN. SENIOR

Land, Food, and Peace

AS THE TITLE SUGGESTS, Karl Brandt's "The Reconstruction of World Agriculture" (Norton, $4) covers a great deal of territory. The term "reconstruction" is used to include post-war food relief, the rehabilitation of agriculture in war-torn countries, and post-war adjustments in agriculture around the world.

Barring widespread crop failure in important producing areas, the author believes sufficient food can be made available to meet relief requirements, interpreted in terms of

The personal testament of one of America's foremost liberals

MARSHALL FIELD'S

Freedom IS MORE THAN A WORD

AMERICA can well be proud of this book. It has aroused more advance enthusiasm than any book we have published in years.

It is, in part, the story of one of the most exciting chapters in modern journalism . . . the story of Marshall Field's newspapers—of PM, the newspaperman's ideal of journalistic freedom, of the Chicago Sun and its titanic battle with the powerful Chicago Tribune, and the whole story of his now famous battle with the Associated Press. It is also the story of a man who believes that the essentials of freedom are: groceries, peace, access to facts, and a healthy skepticism of traditional ways of doing things. He believes this so profoundly that he has committed himself and his great fortune to fight for them.

Written with modesty, sincerity, and clarity, these pages are a primer in democracy for American citizens . . . a dynamic preview of the great adventure that is the people in action. $2.50

Second large printing before publication!

UNIVERSITY OF
CHICAGO PRESS
5750 Ellis Ave., Chicago 37, Ill.

HARPER BOOKS ■■■■

ON TODAY'S PROBLEMS

TIME FOR PLANNING

A Social-Economic Theory and Program
for the 20th Century

by Lewis L. Lorwin

Formerly Economic Consultant,
National Resources Planning Board

Foreword by M. C. Hedges, Director of Research, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. How essential forethought on urgent public issues can proceed with assurance of personal freedom, why concern for planning is the only alternative to social confusion and economic depression—the other timely issues are cogently discussed by a long-time authority and exponent of planned approaches to social improvement. $3.00

PRACTICAL APPLICATIONS OF DEMOCRACY

by George B. de Huszar

Formerly of the European and Asiatic Area Study, University of Chicago

Foreword by Edward C. Lindeman, New York School for Social Work. DAVID E. LILIENTHAL, Chairman, T.V.A., says: "Everyone should read it who is not content merely to chatter about democracy but who wants to learn the practice of democracy as an art of living." $2.00

HOME OWNERSHIP: IS IT SOUND?

by John P. Dean

Department of Sociology, Queens College, New York

Foreword by Robert S. Lynd, Professor of Sociology, Columbia University. The only analysis of the home buying and selling situation today. "The cold light of analysis on one of today's most vast, sanctimonious and humanly costly 'rackets'."

—ROBERT S. LYND, author of Middletown. $2.50

I SPEAK FOR JOE DOAKES

For Cooperation at Home and Among Nations

by Roy F. Bergengren

Managing Director, Credit Union National Association

A simple and impassioned statement of the common man's case for the cooperative organization as a basis for democratic action both at home and in international affairs. $2.00

SMALL BUSINESS AND VENTURE CAPITAL

by Rudolph L. Weissman

Staff of the Federal Securities and Exchange Commission

Foreword by Ernest G. Draper, Member, Federal Reserve Board. A penetrating and stimulating analysis of small business and its needs. $2.00 pre-war diets, without undue sacrifice in the countries supplying the food. This is not to say that all diets will meet desirable nutritional standards—they didn't before the war. Neither is it to say that political and administrative bungling may not result in some people going hungry.

The book's central thesis with respect to post-war agricultural rehabilitation in Europe is that the prompt recovery of agriculture is dependent upon the prompt rehabilitation of European industry and the revival of world trade. This in turn is held to be dependent upon the export of capital from capital-surplus countries such as the United States, progressive reduction of tariff barriers throughout the world, stable currencies, and freedom from the fear of another war. Restriction of foreign trade and the flow of investment capital, the author believes, can result only in a smaller total quantity of goods and services for distribution among the peoples of the world and widespread unemployment and stagnation in those countries where the physical plant, both agricultural and industrial, has suffered most from the war. Economic stagnation, it is pointed out, provides a fertile ground for revolution and the growth of dictatorships, which in turn lead to war.

The book contains a great deal of information on the course of agricultural production and trade during World War I, the inter-war period, and World War II. It provides a broad view of the intricate relationships in world agriculture, with which relatively few Americans are familiar. The author deals realistically with the many hurdles that will have to be taken if his proposed solution to the problem of developing a stable and prosperous agriculture in the post-war world is accepted. In fact, his analysis of the difficulties to be overcome makes them bulk so large that this reviewer is left with the feeling that the solutions offered, particularly in connection with the proposed reduction of tariff barriers, are likely to prove inadequate. From the standpoint of treatment of the main issues, one could wish at times that the author had resisted the temptation to investigate at length so many side alleys; nevertheless, the side alleys do provide a great deal of information on related problems.

F. F. HILL

Nationality and Nationalism

IN HIS LETTERS TO HIS FRIENDS Voltaire, as a rule, added as postscript, "Ecrasez l'infame," meaning the Catholic church. Had he lived two centuries later he would have probably meant nationalism instead. However, Voltaire would certainly have used the term, not in its English sense as an equivalent for national sentiment, but for national aggressiveness. If Frederick Hertz's "Nationality in History and Politics" (Oxford, $6.50) had no other merit than to prove that "wild nationalism" is not a mere exaggeration of "mild nationalism" or that the difference between Gladstone and Hitler is not only one of degree, this alone would make it worth reading. His analysis of the two aspects of nationality, the positive side striving for national freedom, and the negative striving for superiority and domination, is most illuminating. Scarcely anyone is more competent to determine the correlation between national consciousness and some of its supposed components, such as race, language, religion,

All books available from your bookstore and from

HARPER & BROTHERS
49 EAST 33rd STREET • NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

COMING APRIL 23rd

A WARNING TO THE NATION

THE PLOT AGAINST THE PEACE

Another bombshell by the authors of *SABOTAGE!

MICHAEL SAYERS and ALBERT E. KAHN

HERE IS the shocking, documented proof that Germany is planning a Third World War now, at this very moment... but planning to make her victory sure next time. Remember, she almost won twice!

As you read this page, the German General Staff (the militarists, industrialists, and Junkers) are hard at work creating the successors to the Nazis... building the foundations of the invincible Fourth Reich... preparing to emerge, twenty years from now, with new political slogans, new symbols, and a Fifth Column in every country in the world.

Here is the startling story of the international intrigue to bring about a soft peace—to make the German phoenix rise again.

Here are the key men in Germany's plot against the peace—men who are already at work trying to overthrow the provisional governments of liberated countries; and assassinating, as at Aachen, where they cannot overthrow by threat.

Here are the powerful Americans in league with the enemy, and their counterparts in Britain, Latin America, and throughout the world.

Like Sabotage, this book names names, dates, places! It pulls no punches, gives no quarter. THE PLOT AGAINST THE PEACE is a fearless exposé of the trap set for us by our enemies on both sides of the battle lines... a fighting book for a free world that must fight to keep the peace it wins.

$2.75

At all bookstores

THE DIAL PRESS

461 Fourth Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

Continuing One of the Great Autobiographies of Our Time

The Middle Span

Persons and Places, Vol. II

By

GEORGE SANTAYANA

With the same sensitivity, penetration and beauty of style that distinguished the first volume of "Persons and Places" George Santayana here carries his account of his life from 1889 up to the close of his professional career at Harvard.

England, Germany, Spain, Harvard, Boston society—these are the backgrounds of this perceptive panorama of a rich and varied quarter of a century. It sheds new light on notable men and women of the time, especially in those pages dealing with Santayana's Harvard years, and every chapter is infused with wisdom, ironic humor, and vivid portrayals of personalities and places.

$2.50

at all bookstores

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, NEW YORK

territory, state, and moral background, than Mr. Hertz, whose previous book, "Race and Civilization" (1928), is a classic on this subject. His argument that while "violent nationalism" was due to the achievements of our civilization, its value must not be exaggerated is as interesting as his analysis of political thought and its relation to national ideology. It appears that Shaftesbury criticized national vanity and egotism, that Rousseau, though he favored national institutions and traditions, was completely opposed to the essence of modern nationalism, the workshop of prestige and power. Even Fichte, who is regarded as an early pioneer of Nazism, defended the French Revolution and combated the ideas of present pan-Germanism, Hegel was no nationalist, and Nietzsche rejected as foolish the cult of the state and nationality. Like parvenus in general, Nazism claims an ancestry which refuses to justify its progeny.

National consciousness "may be peaceable or pugnacious, progressive or reactionary, tolerant or fanatic" according to the various forms it assumes in the course of history. We unfortunate contemporaries are the victims of the second variety, which has degenerated into the most devastating epidemic. Each age, nation, class, party, or philosophy has contributed to the causes of this pernicious disease. The author may be right in saying that "the first step to a practical cure consists in discarding imaginary causes," just as modern medicine could not develop as long as people believed in evil demons.

Dr. Hertz promises to deal with his conclusions and practical suggestions in further studies which are shortly to be published. For delegates to the San Francisco conference this volume as well as its sequel should be required reading, for it will help them to recognize the warlike rapsallion which likes to be mistaken for nationality, the creator of precious cultural values.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

A Boy's Life

DENTON WELCH'S "Maiden Voyage" (L. B. Fischer, $2.75), describing an English boy during a rebellious term at public school and a visit to his father in China, is a tonic example of writing about adolescence that has neither insincerity of thought nor sentimentality of style. The young man's—and the author's—ruthless artist's curiosity is the most impressive and original element in the book and is effectively conveyed by a simple, somewhat blunt prose which cuts a clean path through the temptations of fine writing and excessive subjectivity, giving as much emphasis to the observed scene as to the boy's inner comment. It is not saccharine innocence that constitutes his charm, and hence the book's unity, but a combination of sensibility with intelligence active upon an amazing number of levels. In "Maiden Voyage" one realizes again and again, through a superior recording and interpretative medium, that the world is a terrifying place—and not merely the world of 1945—and that in spite of the supposed bulwarks of progress and modern education a great deal of the boy's horror remains in the finest people always. The grown-up, respectable persons are perhaps the most frightening part of Mr. Welch's world—there is a pleasant exception in the nameless sketch of the headmaster of Repton, clearly Arch-

Ozarks — As American as corn on the cob and as warm as a sunny Spring day — an intensely personal record of three years in the Ozark wilderness. A book to rest and satisfy the heart and mind. Coming April 16th $2.75

STRAW IN THE SUN

by CHARLIE MAY SIMON

Youth — Written with warmth and understanding by a fresh young talent — the moving story of Laurie, child of a broken marriage, who grew up abroad during the restless years bridging two World Wars. Coming May 7th $3.00

DRINK TO THE HUNTED

by ELLEN MARSH

Controversy — Hot controversy and wide debate are bound to arise over this new interpretation of Paine — for Woodward takes issue with other recent biographies and paints a new and entirely different picture of this great man. Illustrated Coming June 22nd $3.50

TOM PAINE: AMERICA'S GODFATHER

by W. E. WOODWARD

Powerful — The drama of a passionate woman who hated fascism — and found her most dynamic weapon in fighting it. A brilliant novel of unusual literary distinction, cast in an absorbing and original technique. Coming June 11th $2.50

THE INQUEST

by ROBERT NEUMANN

Medics — The magnificent and inspirational story of American doctors in action in World War II — dramatically told by the 15 top medical men in our Army and Navy, and edited by Dr. Morris Fishbein.

Coming May 31th $5.00

DOCTORS AT WAR

Edited by DR. MORRIS FISHBEIN

Illustrated

Hard-Boiled — Introducing Eric Stanton, hard-bitten hero, whose slick racket is complicated by dames and loused up by murder! Latimer-Cain fans will eat this up. Coming May 7th $2.00

(Watch for the movie — directed by Otto Preminger)

FALLEN ANGEL

by MARTY HOLLAND

Award — Winner of a major Avery Hopwood fiction award, this is the poignant story of a sensitive boy's struggle for emotional freedom — written with ruthless honesty and a sympathetic understanding of the hopes and frustrations of youth. Coming June 15th $2.75

A SWEEP OF DUSK

by WILLIAM KEHOE

By
THE MEN...

For
THE MEN
IN SERVICE

Now
FOR THEIR FRIENDS AND FAMILIES

Presenting
YANK's best in fact, fiction and picture from every battle front and camp —

- ★ COMBAT STORIES
- ★ HUMOR AND CARTOONS
- ★ LETTERS FROM "MAIL CALL"
- ★ ACTION PHOTOGRAPHS AND ART
- ★ HIGHLIGHTS FROM "WHAT'S YOUR PROBLEM?"
- ★ SOLDIER VERSE

At all Bookstores
E. P. DUTTON & CO.
300 FOURTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

bishop Temple—and from a technical point of view they are brilliant achievements. It is above all interesting that when the young man is confronted with such forces, throughout his battles and adventures, the very intelligence and sensibility that make him vulnerable enable him to escape in the end: he shows always an insatiable and disarming singleness of purpose. This quality—gift or conviction—is so compelling that the reader not only becomes strongly partisan but is eager to pursue the course of such a life; as the hero embarks at last for the return voyage to England, how we should like to accompany him!

ISABELLA W. ATHEY

"PHILADELPHIA HOLY EXPERIMENT" (Doubleday, Doran, $3.75) is another one of Struthers Burt's Baedekers;

the last one was about Wyoming. Mr. Burt's prose is compounded of miscellaneous erudition and witticisms and manages to carry the burden of a loosely strung together history of Philadelphia. His cowboys and Indians were much more interesting.

"THIS BOOK is a personal testament written out of a lifetime by a man who believes that agriculture is the keystone of our economic system." That is from Louis Bromfield's preface to his latest offering, "Pleasant Valley" (Harper, $3). From these sketches of himself in action, Mr. Bromfield seems to be very much like a character from one of his own novels, and probably is—which is an indictment. His opinions on economics will not be discussed at San Francisco.

For Every American's Bookshelf...

SEA LANGUAGE COMES ASHORE

By Joanna Carver Colcord

The famous social worker author, known best for her books on community welfare, goes nautically philological in her newest title, Sea Language Comes Ashore. Widely hailed by the critics, it's a sally collection of over a thousand seaman's words now commonly used in shore folk speech.

CARL SANDBURG: "I add this book to others of hers that I know have permanent value."

CARL VAN DOREN: "Fascinating, remarkable book."

C. B. PALMER, N. Y. Times Book Review, calls it "this fabulously interesting work on speech which traces the lusty effect of salt-water transfusions on the landman's language. . . . It covers in an affectionate way what one might nowadays call the amphibious phase of speech."

Just published

$2.25

WARSHIPS of the WORLD

Edited by Roger Kafka and Roy L. Pepperburg

"Magnificent book!" says Quincy Howe. "The book the average American citizen needs for a clear picture of the war at sea," says Navy News. Every alert reader, editor, educator needs this great naval encyclopedia to follow intelligently the most complex naval war in history. Authoritative data on 7,000 fighting ships of 52 world navies. . . . 900 capsule biographies of warships in action in World War II, from official sources. . . . lavishly illustrated with photographs and accurate drawings. "An eye-opener for the land-bound," says the Field Artillery Journal.

1,051 Pages

900 Illustrations

$15.00

At better bookstores or direct
CORNELL MARITIME PRESS
241 West 23rd Street, Dept. N, New York 11

An outstanding contribution to the solution of present problems, is

WORLD CULTURE

By PRYNS HOPKINS

(Author of From Gods to Dictators—A Psychology of Religions, and other works, Editor of Freedom)

Just off the press, WORLD CULTURE is a comprehensive discussion of the contributions of various regions of the earth to postwar values. Attractively bound—paper, 70c, cloth $1.00

Distributed by

FREEDOM

(The liberal quarterly)

1375 S. Oak Knoll Avenue

Dept. SN

Pasadena 5, California

Frost and Tate

FORTUNATE in the fine adequacy of his rural symbolism and native style, Robert Frost has always seemed the most self-sufficient of living poets. But now on his seventieth birthday he has published a poem, "A Masque of Reason" (Holt, $2), which is not only unique among his writings but is also in obvious debt to other poets. In this dialogue in heaven between Job, Job's wife, and God on the subject of divine justice, the heaven is an artificial paradise reminiscent of Yeats's Byzantium. More oddly still, God has a "prefabricated" throne, liable to sudden and embarrassing collapses as in some modernistic fantasy of Auden's.

But Yeats and Auden here fuse—if they fuse at all—into a whimsicality typical of no one but Frost himself. The trouble with such humor in Frost is that it is too often not a laugh but a smirk—the reflex of an incorrigible complacency. Least apparent in those beautiful poems in which he is the observer, at once realistic and visionary, of New England objects and occupations, it is apt to become overwhelming at those times when he is explicitly the philosopher. And "A Masque of Reason," with its unearthly setting and despite all its rustic banter and horseplay, is pure speculation. On Judgment Day God appears to Job and his wife; but it is God, not they, who is judged, and that in the light of a skepticism which seems to infect God Himself.

God . . . . . Job and I together

Found out the discipline man needed most
Was to learn his submission to unreason;
And that for man's own sake as well as mine,
So he won't find it hard to take his orders
From his inferiors in intelligence
In peace and war—especially in war.

Job So he won't find it hard to take his war.

God You have the idea. There's not much I can tell you.

The skepticism is all right with this reviewer; but it gives rise in the poem to extravagances of whimsy which suggest that Frost is after all a little wary of the consequences of his doubt and wants to whittle it down to the size of a joke. So he has God say to Job, "I promote you to a saint"; and Job's wife asks whether God "would take a prayer that

FOOD

EDUCATION

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Three major books which clarify three major problems engaging the attention of thinking Americans:

How shall we—and the world—be fed?

How shall our children be educated for democracy?

How shall we order our relations with changing peoples in a changed world?

LITTLE, BROWN BOSTON

These books are on sale at all bookstores

The FARMER and the REST of US*

by Arthur Moore

An entertaining and enlightening presentation of the real facts involved in the huge job of raising food for our own and other peoples. Written by the editor of a leading corn country newspaper, it makes real sense of the food problem for city people. $2.50

TEACHER in AMERICA*

by Jacques Barzun

"... a rare combination of autobiography, full learning, special wit, practical wisdom, and warm sympathy, skillfully welded together into a mature expression of a teacher's faith."—Saturday Review

"... witty, brilliant, and superlatively reasonable."—N. Y. Times. $3.00

SOLUTION in ASIA*

by Owen Lattimore

"... brilliantly illuminates the main questions of our time in Asia."—EDGAR SNOW

"... if you want a short cut to basic knowledge of the Far East, read it."—WILLIAM L. SHIRER. $2.00

*ATLANTIC MONTHLY PRESS BOOKS

Superb and Superior Entertainment

THE GREEN YEARS

By Dr. A. J. Cronin

$2.50

TAKE THREE TENSES:
A Fugue in Time

By Rumer Godden

$2.00

Howard Fast says THE CROSS AND THE ARROW by Albert Maltz is:

"a superb work of art... at once a tale of high adventure and a testimony for mankind." $2.75 started off Lord God of Hostesses"; and God remarks of Satan that "He thinks he's smart." The poem ends, suitably, with Job's wife inviting God, Satan, and Job to pose for a snapshot.

Allen Tate is a poet who seldom achieves Frost's perfection of style, but he has other qualities. He is too intelligent and cosmopolitan to find in his region, the South, the absolute satisfaction that Frost discovers in his attachment to New England. Indeed, he remains unreconciled to pretty much everything: our literature, our civilization, our wars; and in his new book, "The Winter Sea" (Cummington Press, $5), he struggles, as few other poets are really struggling, to express in verse his civilized horror of the war. If, then, Tate lacks Frost's repose, he also lacks his complacency. If his work is a perpetual experiment, a poetry labored out of intractable material by the naked will, it is invariably interesting. Through his honest attempts to write always with great seriousness and complexity, he is forever illustrating the importance as well as the problems of such writing. And it is Tate, not Frost, who influences the younger poets.

We see him at his ambitious worst in the first of his new series of Christmas sonnets. The poem is terribly obscure in some of its details, but the general drift is clear: it is a sardonic statement of the difficulty of attaining Christian faith in a world of science and war. Here is the sestet:

Suppose I take an arrogant bomber, stroke
By stroke, up to the frazzled sun to hear
Sun-ghostlings whisper: Yes, the capital yoke—
Remove it and there's not a ghost to fear
This crucial day, whose decapitate joke
Languidly winds into the inner ear.

Of these lines, only the last seems to me to have any finality in its movement, its pattern of word sounds, or its imagery. There is nothing in the poem to prepare us for the mysterious "sun-ghostlings" with their important message. I fail to see the justice of "stroke by stroke" in connection with the ascent of a bomber. Both "stroke" and "yoke" appear, indeed, to be dragged in so that the poet may have his "decapitate joke" and his rhyme too. As so often in Tate, the distinction arising from the use of Latinate adjectives ("arrogant," "capital," "decapitate," "crucial") is here overworked. And finally the puns involved in the words "crucial," "capital," and "decapitate" (for the crucified Christ, who is the hero of the poem, is of course one of Frazer's hanged gods) seem to me merely pedantic.

Yet the second of the Christmas sonnets is as skilful as the first was bungling. It begins with a picture, both satirical and touching, of old, middle-class Christmases:

How pleasantly the holly wreaths did hang
And how stuffed Santa did his reindeer clang
Above the golden oaken mantel, years ago!

and proceeds very simply to its effective conclusion:

Then hang this picture for a calendar,
As sheep for goat, and pray most fixedly
For the cold martial progress of your star,
With thoughts of commerce and society,
Well-milked Chinese, Negroes who cannot sing,
The Huns gelded and feeding in a ring.

There are other good strokes of political satire in "The Winter Sea." Too often, however, they are incidental to the stress and strain resulting from Tate's efforts to adapt to his uses the ode, the eclogue, the spiritual, and other recalcitrant forms.

F. W. DUPEE

FICTION IN REVIEW

DESPITE the fact that William Maxwell's "The Folded Leaf" (Harper, $2.50) is unusually easy and gratifying to read, it is a difficult book to write about. For it carves out such a seemingly minor literary task for itself—to tell the story of the friendship of two boys through high school and college—that one hesitates to burden it with the kind of "importance" to which the author is notably indifferent. And yet it not only goes about its work with a precise skill which is rare in current fiction but also manages to evoke very much larger meanings than appear on the surface. The source of this suggestiveness is, of course, its style. Style is latent content, and there is an uncommonly rich latent content beneath the modest explicit content of Mr. Maxwell's novel.

The prose of most current fiction is either excessively, and falsely, simple or prodigal without discipline, and in either category the only dimension added by style is likely to be the dimension of the author's ego. But "The Folded Leaf," written with genuine simplicity, allows the author to stand in the most useful possible relationship to his material. In full control of his characters and situations but not merged with them, he is free to comment on their fates in his own person, so that we have the advantage of his intellect as well as of his creativity; in the degree that he keeps his personality clear of his people, he achieves a true distinction of personality. Thus a scene of a high-school-fraternity initiation not only is reported for all its worth as narrative but also gives Mr. Maxwell the opportunity for a very pleasant essay on the anthropological occasion. Or often Mr. Maxwell will point out, lightly but sharply, the pattern of circumstance in which his characters have been caught. Obviously this commentative function is a very proper function of an author. All the great novelists of the past assumed it eagerly. But very few present-day writers have enough distance from their fictional material to permit it.

"The Folded Leaf" is divided into many small chapters, each of them concerned with a moment of significance in the lives of its characters, and Mr. Maxwell is at his best when these moments are physically seen. The initiation ceremony which I have mentioned is perhaps outstanding in the book, but there are any number of lesser scenes—in Spud and Lymie's college rooming-house, for instance, or at Spud's boxing work-outs, or at a college spring riot—which have an almost fragrant authenticity. Mr. Maxwell has a remarkable, if quiet, gift for observation; his record of Middle Western American life in the '20's adds up to a more important social document than he was perhaps conscious of. But in the last third of the novel, when, because the story must be brought to a climax and conclusion, Mr. Maxwell concerns himself with purely emotional developments, he becomes spare and even unconvincing. It is of course the scenario of "The Folded Leaf" to bring Spud and Lymie to manhood at the end of the volume, but to assume, in a novel, that people are mature and competent simply because they have reached a point where maturity is asked of them is to contrive for fictional characters an outcome constantly denied people in reality. The resolution of "The Folded Leaf" is not only shadowy but fortuitous. I completely doubt the independence which Lymie is supposed to have found so suddenly, and I look to the future of Spud with an uneasiness which his author gives us no evidence that he shares.

It is perhaps unfair to measure Stephen Seley's "The Cradle Will Fall" (Harcourt, Brace, $2), a first novel, against Mr. Maxwell's practiced writing, but Mr. Seley's novel is also a story of American boyhood in the '20's and, like Mr. Maxwell, the author of "The Cradle Will Fall" is modest in his literary intention. But here all similarity ends, for from title to conception to prose "The Cradle Will Fall" is a novel that puts no distance at all between author and subject. Mr. Seley is everywhere in his story, and as a consequence his story has little life of its own.

Not the least significant result of Mr. Seley's self-indulgent method is the fact that the chief emotion it generates is the emotion of pity. While "The Cradle Will Fall" is able to hint that its central character deserves better than this limited response, it denies him the dignity to demand it. Its rather primitive psychoanalytical delving—in contrast to Mr. Maxwell's psychological attitude, which is simply to picture the behavior and let us draw our own conclusions—preconditions the reader's own fantasies and guarantees in advance an identification between reader and central character on the same level as between author and central character.

It is also interesting to contrast Mr. Seley's novel with Mr. Maxwell's as a social document. I should say that Mr. Seley is at a good deal more pains than the author of "The Folded Leaf" to recapture the iconography of his time: there is more of the business of what songs were sung, what cars were driven, what values were booming, and so forth. But social documentation of this kind inevitably loses both point and savor when it is used only to suggest a possible context and not actually to create character.

DIANA TRILLING

CONTRIBUTORS

HAROLD J. LASKI, professor of political science at the London School of Economics, is a leading member of the left wing of the British Labor Party.

JACQUES MARITAIN, liberal Catholic philosopher, is professor at the Institute of Medieval Studies at Toronto and visiting professor at Columbia and Princeton universities. His most recent book is "The Dream of Descartes."

RANDALL JARRELL, now in the air corps, was formerly an instructor in English at the University of Texas. He is the author of "Blood for a Stranger," a book of poems; a second book, "Little Friend, Little Friend," will be published by Dial in June.

ALBERT GUERARD is professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University. Among his books are "Literature and Society" and "Napoleon III."

*Jarrell
&
Ruehart*

"First new writer of 1945 for whom it is worth while to send up a Roman candle."

SATURDAY REVIEW
- OF LITERATURE

LOWER THAN ANGELS

The new novel
by WALTER KARIG

► "Everyone with a memory of gaslight, with an appetite for robust humor, and the spectacle of the changing American scene will eagerly respond to Karig's kindling vitalization of the spiritual, human and material odysseys traversed by Marvin Lang . . . This is one of the liveliest and most absorbing products of the season."—Philadelphia Record

► "People who read for the intimate and intangible profit of discovering and embracing the finest, will seek out this story of one man who is every man, and cherish it for the splendid novel it is."—Chicago Sun

$2.75 at all bookstores

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

HANS HOFMANN is in all probability the most important art teacher of our time. Not only has his school sent out good painters; the insights into modern art of the man himself have gone deeper than those of any other contemporary. He has, at least in my opinion, grasped the issues at stake better than did Roger Fry and better than Mondrian, Kandinsky, Lhote, Ozenfant, and all the others who have tried to "explicate" the recent revolution in painting. Hofmann has not yet published his views, but they have already directly and indirectly influenced many, including this writer—who owes more to the initial illumination received from Hofmann's lectures than to any other source. (Whether this redounds to Hofmann's credit or not I leave to others to decide.) Hofmann practices what he teaches, and his second one-man show of painting in this country—his first was held only last year—is now running at 67 Gallery (through April 21). It would be unfair of me to pretend to critical detachment with regard to it. I find the same quality in Hofmann's painting that I find in his words—both are completely relevant. His painting is all painting; none of it is publicity, mode, or literature. It deals with the crucial problems of contemporary painting on its highest level in the most radical and uncompromising way, asserting that painting exists first of all in its medium and must there resolve itself before going on to do anything else. Perhaps Hofmann surrenders himself too unreservedly to the medium—that is, to spontaneity—and lets color dictate too much: his pictures sometimes fly apart because they are organized almost exclusively on the basis of color relations. Perhaps he insists too little on the resistances of his own temperament—in every artist there must be something that fights against being set down in art and yet whose setting-down constitutes part of the triumph of art. Be that as it may, the works of the teacher do not betray his teachings. Hofmann has become a force to be reckoned with in the practice as well as in the interpretation of modern art.

I may have seemed high-handed in my disposal two weeks back of Mondrian's theories. The irritation caused by any sort of dogmatic prescription in art was most likely responsible. Mondrian attempted to elevate as the goal of the total historical development of art what is after all only a time-circumscribed style. That style may be—I myself believe it is—the direction in which high art now tends and will continue to tend in the foreseeable future. But in art a historical tendency cannot be presented as an end in itself. Anything can be art now or in the future—if it works—and there are no hierarchies of styles except on the basis of past performances. And these are powerless to govern the future. What may have been the high style of one period becomes the kitsch of another. All this is elementary; yet it needs to be repeated in Mondrian's case. These reservations made, one can proceed to value Mondrian's theories—which are logical deductions from the results of his own practice and from the evidence of the world around him as to the aesthetic and social implications of abstract art—for the brilliant insights they are. With Marx, he anticipated the disappearance of works of art—pictures, sculpture—when the material décor of life and life itself had become beautiful. With Marx, he saw the true end of human striving as complete deliverance from the oppression of nature, both inside and outside the human being. With Marx, he saw that man has to denaturalize himself and the things he deals with in order to realize his own true nature. He saw that what is wrong at present is that man only partly denaturalizes his own nature and his environment, and through this partial denaturalization—that is, capitalism, the suburbs of Chicago, radio, movies, vicarious experience, popular taste—attains precisely the opposite of what he really wants. Mondrian's art was not "inhuman"; it did not aim at "perfection"; it aimed at nothing beyond itself. But it was guided by an ideal, as all human action in or out of art should be.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

FRED ALLEN's picture "It's in the Bag" is the story of a flea impresario named Floogle (Mr. Allen) who inherits a fortune and in the process of getting hold of it runs into Jack Benny, Minerva Pius, Robert Benchley, Jerry Colonna, Binnie Barnes, William Bendix, John Carradine, and others,

Books by Mail

In spite of wartime shortages we do our best to mail promptly and accurately to your order books reviewed and advertised in The Nation and elsewhere . . . anywhere the mail goes! No mailing charges. No c. o. d.'s.

DOWNTOWN BOOK BAZAAR
212 Broadway New York 7, N. Y.
(corner Fulton Street)

The Jewish World Problem Solved!

by JOSEPH EDRALY

Twain-Harte, Calif. — bookstores—50c
"A DARING PIECE AND A PROVOCATIVE ONE!"—Reader's Digest Editors

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for mailing. Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

Are You Tired of the Shibboleths about Dumbarton Oaks and Yalta

Read

LOUIS FISCHER'S THE PARTITIONING OF PEACE

A straightforward statement of the critical position Progressives must take in the April issue of

Common Sense

Also

Donald Montgomery
Profits Threaten Price Control

Paul Hagen
Germany—The Wrong Solution

Katherine Rodell
Our Big Neighbor Policy

C. Wright Mills
The Conscription of America

COMMON SENSE,

10 E. 49th Street, N. Y. 17, N. Y.

Please send me 10 months of Common Sense for Two Dollars.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....Zone No.....

State.....

often very amusingly, sometimes not, knocking off enough sparks of satire in the process to destroy and fulfil a much worse civilization than this one if their molecular energy were organized into their ultimate, collective, bomblike meaning.

"The Unseen," a story about a government and some rather provocative children who live next a portentous deserted house, is done with quite a bit of intelligence and sophistication (it was produced by John Houseman and directed by Lewis Allen), but unlike Allen's "The Uninvited" it only generates sporadic wincing qualms of excitement without ordering them into anything constant and cumulative.

"Molly and Me" is the sort of story you might run across in its fifth buckram binding, illustrated, along the General Fiction shelves of a provincial public library: ex-theatrical housekeeper sweetens up rich old griper; London; turn of the century. It is a tame, old-fashioned, charming, worthless picture, very prettily done, with an admirably intense performance by Doris Lloyd, a likable one by Monty Woolley, and a perfectly beautiful one by Gracie Fields. I think Miss Fields is about as nice a woman over forty as I have ever seen; I have certainly never seen anyone in movies to approach her in that age bracket. I recommend her highly to anyone who has ceased to believe it is possible to grow decently into middle age.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE documentary war film "Fury in the Pacific" left me feeling again that such a film should be presented with the real sound of the incidents if this is available, or otherwise with no sound at all. It seems to me an affront to the men shown in the film to have their experiences accompanied by the phony musical paroxysms of a "modern" musical score written by someone a safe thousand miles or more from the battle. But apparently there can be no film without music.

And in broadcasting there can be no music without talk—and not just talk but the talk of ignoramuses pretending to knowledge. Even when the audience is the supposedly literate one for which the Book-of-the-Month Club sponsors broadcasts of chamber music performed by the Budapest Quartet it cannot simply be told what work it is going to hear and then be allowed to hear the work; it must first listen to a slinging around of pretentious statements about the background and derivation and style of the work that are sheer nonsense and falsehood—the statement, for example, that the melodies of Mozart's Quartet K. 428 approximate those of Schumann and Brahms; or that there is in Beethoven's Opus 95 a chromaticism that is almost Wagnerian.

The Book-of-the-Month Club's broadcasts also have suffered from one of the consequences of American commercialization of radio—the rigidity of its time-divisions and program-scheduling. In England the B. B. C. can build a program and then give it whatever time it needs; in America when a Beethoven quartet did not fit into the half-hour that N. B. C. had assigned to the series, a few years ago, a movement or two was sliced out. And one of the Book-of-the-Month Club's hour-long broadcasts has offered the Ravel Quartet and only two movements of a Beethoven Opus 18; another a Brahms quartet and only the slow movement of Beethoven's Opus 132.

The truth of Edwin Denby's observation that in classic ballet the ballerina sets the tone for the entire performance and the entire company may be observed in what the young dancers of the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe are doing in response to Danilova, and on the other hand in the effect that Toumanova has on the dancers and performances of Ballet Theater. Toumanova herself continues to produce nightmarish caricatures of the beautiful classic dancing she used to do: in the first performance of "Swan Lake" her movements were again overdeliberately distended and exaggerated in a steely demonstration of technical prowess. She was, I take it, proving that she can lift her leg higher than anybody else; and one thing to say about that is that we are convinced, and now please will she stop proving it and just dance her part in "Swan Lake." Another thing to say is that nobody should want to lift her leg that high—which brings me to the effect on the company: not only did the slowness of Toumanova's gigantesque movement communicate itself to the entire performance, but in "Graduation Ball" there was the dismaying sight of Alonso, in her classic pas de deux, also exaggerating the height of her leg-gestures and distending her other movements as she had not done last fall; and I thought there was a little of this exaggeration by Hightower in the "Bluebird" variation and in the first performance of Balanchine's "Waltz Academy."

The violently whipped-up movements of other dancers in that first performance of "Waltz Academy" seemed at first like further evidence of Toumanova's influence; but later they appeared to be rather a result of the dancers' insecurity in relation to the music, caused by the ballet companies' practice of starting their engagements with a largely new orchestra that hasn't been sufficiently rehearsed in advance with the dancers. For at the second performance a couple of days later, where the dancing was securely fitted to the music, it was relaxed again, and the piece came out fresh, clear, and lovely—not only one of the most beautiful works in Ballet Theater's repertory but the classic work that is most beautifully performed.

It is the non-classic ballets that Ballet Theater does well; or rather the non-classic ballets which are watched over by their choreographers: Tudor's "Pillar of Fire," "Lilac Garden," "Romeo and Juliet" (in which Nora Kaye's Juliet grows constantly more beautiful), Robbins's "Fancy Free," Agnes de Mille's "Tally-Ho," Massine's "Three-Cornered Hat" (with Massine's own performance still one of the great things in ballet). "Graduation Ball" not only has lost what Riabouchinska and Lichine contributed to the performances (though Janet Reed and Harold Lang are charming), but with Lichine not around some of the points are being underlined too heavily and considerable new business has been introduced that does the piece no good.

Of the new works I have seen thus far only Nijinska's "Harvest Time," which is silly except when it is putting Toumanova through the acrobatics of her present style; and then it is awful.

I have found the February-March Balanchine number of Dance Index exciting to read and to look at. It contains Agnes de Mille's vivid description of some of the things in "The Prodigal Son," and a richly illuminating discussion by Edwin Denby of Balanchine's development away from such "modernism" to his present classicism, in which, says Denby, the novelty is that it "moves you by the act of dancing and not, as the fashion was from 1910 to 1940, by opposing to that act obstacles of various kinds of mimicry—pictorial, psychological, musical, or social." These articles are documented by the photographs of some of the works; and there are also some valuable observations on dancing and ballet by Balanchine himself, made originally in the classroom and theater.

Letters to the Editors

Religion and Politics

Dear Sirs: The Archbishop of New York has condemned the request of 1,600 Protestant ministers that no religious authority be allowed to participate in the settlement of territorial and political problems resulting from the war. The Archbishop obviously wants the Pope to be the biggest of the Big Three, Four, or Five. He is entitled to cherish this desire, but he has no right to transform a political into a religious issue. The Pope and other heads of religious organizations are certainly justified in asserting moral and religious principles and in judging international problems in the light of such principles, but they have no right to participate in international conferences to decide political and not religious questions. The point under discussion is the right of a religious authority to overstep religious limits and to act as a political power.

The Archbishop has reminded the 1,600 Protestant ministers of their duty not to "insult" the Catholic faith; but they never did so, unless disagreeing with the Archbishop on a political issue can be so construed. According to the Archbishop, these ministers did a disservice to national unity by forgetting that twenty-five million American Catholics are doing their part in winning the war. If the Catholics number twenty-five million, non-Catholics number more than a hundred million. Must the latter accept the political demands of the Catholics without discussion? And if they fail in this duty, will the twenty-five million refuse to do their part in winning the war? According to the Archbishop, there are two classes of American citizens—twenty-five million Catholics who have the right to command and one hundred million non-Catholics who have the duty to obey whenever the Pope is concerned.

From all appearances even the Vatican's charitable activities serve its political ambitions. The Vatican daily, the Osservatore Romano, in discussing Soviet press attacks upon Vatican policies states: "One could have hoped after the numerous convincing testimonies of the many solicitudes and constant charities designed to attenuate the horrors of war and to soften incalculable sufferings offered by the Holy See . . . that at least certain methods of explicit anti-religious hatred would be abandoned." It is as if a defendant were to demand acquittal in a case of forgery by showing the judge a receipt for a charitable donation. Does the Osservatore Romano not realize that as soon as people grasp the political ambitions behind the Vatican's charitable activities, those activities will no longer arouse gratitude but suspicion and contempt?

GAETANO SALVEMINI

Cambridge, Mass., March 8

Dr. Lin and Mr. Snow

Dear Sirs: In his answer to Edgar Snow's review of "Vigil of a Nation" Lin Yutang stresses the importance of documentation. Almost all spokesmen for the Chungking government studiously avoid discussing facts; they prefer to argue the so-called Kuomintang-Communist Party issue in terms of theories, probabilities, and personal predilections. If we proceeded from facts, however, we would ask what life is like for people in the Chungking government areas and in the Border Region, and then ask, why?

All reporters from the Border Region areas, including myself, agree that under Communist, good Kuomintang, or non-party leadership the people there are participants in a vital process of democracy and are creating for themselves a more satisfying life. What we have seen there is more important and pertinent in discussing China than the documents and theories so often used in an attempt to blackout the facts.

Dr. Lin uses Mao Tse-tung's "The New Democracy" and Chang Hao's

"Chinese Party Tactics and Party Lines" as important documentary material. He labels Chang Hao's book "a complete 'Tanaka Memorial.'" Now this is a smear. He also criticizes the Communists because their activities are "in accordance with a set plan." Would he think better of them if they acted without a plan? He mentions "The New Democracy" as though he were unearthing a damning document. But this material is as well known to students of the China situation as is the Atlantic Charter. The Communists have never attempted to hide their analyses of the situation. Their views are printed in newspapers and documents, are often translated into English, and are circulated in China and abroad.

Dr. Lin's statement that "their primary loyalty [is] to Moscow" is again an attempt to smear. Is it true? Yes—and no. Yes, in the sense that we American Christians affirm our loyalty to a foreigner, Jesus. No, because anyone can understand that no American and no Chinese could be a Russian even if he wanted to.

MAUD RUSSELL

Passaic, N. J., March 27

Dear Sirs: The march of victorious armies seems to have given Edgar Snow a superiority complex. He may mouth words about "authentic Chinese patterns," but anyone familiar with his writings knows that he bases his judgments on other values. Dr. Lin Yutang frankly says that he believes a state of war exists between Yen-an and Chungking, and he appraises an opponent by the opponent's own standards and values. If Frederick Schuman was right

TO ORDER ANY BOOK

described or advertised in this issue

USE THIS COUPON! (Books sent postage free anywhere in U.S.)

To: Your local bookseller or, Doubleday, Doran Book Shops,
Mail Order Department, 9 Rockefeller Plaza, New York 20, N.Y.

Please send me the following books for which I enclose $.....;
(PRINT TITLES OF BOOKS WANTED)

.....

Name .....

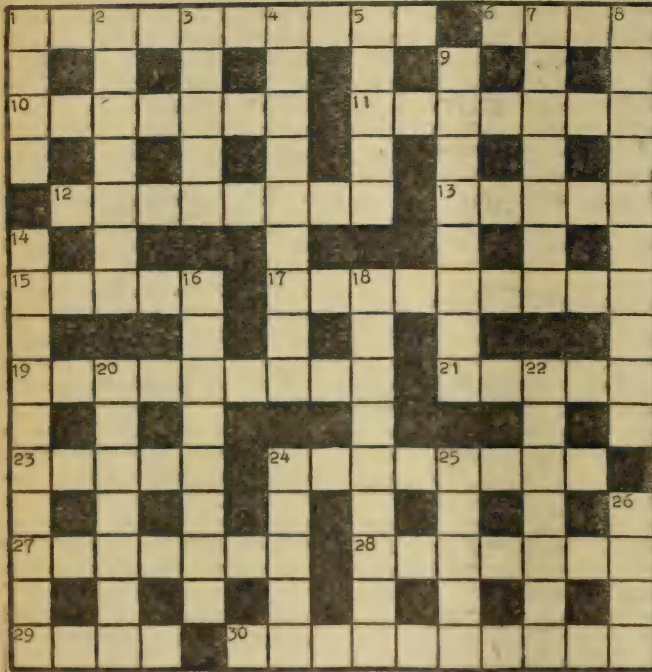

Address .....

City..... Zone No..... State.....

(IF ANY)

Crossword Puzzle No. 112

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Able person requires slight change; handsome result guaranteed
- 6 Decapitated hornets are venomous
- 10 Interminable
- 11 An offspring of Spanish royalty
- 12 Sir Walter naturally comes first with his people
- 18 Taking it easy, perhaps
- 15 A graphic line
- 17 Relating to an uncle
- 19 Man on diet (anag.)
- 21 Reject with disdain
- 23 Victim in a French bath murder case
- 24 Cows like this plant, but it doesn't like them
- 27 Universal love. (Should be cautious about it!)
- 28 State in which the red man can still be found
- 29 Plenty of work for the hammer
- 30 Errand possibly accompanied by a show of arms

DOWN

- 1 French legend of a piper
- 2 Is this what the photographer uses when a print has been over-enlarged?
- 3 Trove is hidden here
- 4 Ass and ant about to be ill

- 5 Edinburgh's river ("A poor thing, but mine own")
- 7 "I record only the sunny hours"
- 8 Amazing the way some firms are arranging vacations today
- 9 Torments
- 14 Sparing, but makes one comical
- 16 Even he found the 1943 income-tax form beyond him!
- 18 Sap with fur tail
- 20 Sarcastic
- 22 A Sunday word for "screech"
- 24 "Who can be wise, amazed, temperate and furious, ----- and neutral, in a moment?" (Macbeth)
- 25 In the circumstances, I'd let her go (hidden)
- 26 Ticket of leave

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 111

ACROSS:—1 JESSICA; 5 SCHEMER; 9 HUBBARD; 10 ALUMNUS; 11 SNORE; 12 ELI; 13 THORN; 14 NUANCES; 16 LAMENTS; 18 TUSSORE; 21 JANUARY; 24 CATER; 26 ELF; 27 SIMLA; 28 BRASURE; 29 RELEARN; 30 SUSPECT; 31 YIELDED.

DOWN:—1 JOHNSON; 2 SUR ROSA; 3 IMAGE; 4 ADDRESS; 5 SPANIEL; 6 HAUNT; 7 MONSOON; 8 RISINGS; 15 COO; 17 MAN; 18 TICKETS; 19 SATRAP; 20 EVEREST; 21 JEFFREY; 22 ARMBAND; 23 YEARNED; 25 ROUSE; 27 SALVE.

in the use of Marxian historical technique in appraising Europe "on the eve," then Dr. Lin Yutang may not be wrong in using the same technique in judging contemporary China. He is trying to give us another view of alleged facts. He asks for more honesty and less concealment of material. Mr. Snow wants us to see facts only as he sees them. For him there are not only no other facts but no other side to the picture.

According to Mr. Snow, only those who assume the intellectual integrity of Stalinism have intellectual health. Apparently, as Ralph Bates has said, slavery as a necessary implementation to a better social order is no longer a question of morality but of expediency.

REUBEN S. FLACKS

Chicago, Ill., April 6

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

CLASSIFIED

ADVERTISING RATES

62c a line (six words)

Minimum 3 lines

$6.16 an inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions.

THE Nation

20 Vesey St., N. Y. 7, N. Y.

BARCLAY 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • APRIL 28, 1945

NUMBER 17

Hour of Decision

*If ye break faith with us who died
We shall not sleep.*

THE World Security Conference meets as the last fierce efforts of German resistance are being battered into the ground, as the ultimate obscenity of Nazism is being revealed in the hideous and pitiful records of the concentration camps, and as the peoples of Europe and the liberating armies are contemplating in stunned horror, the physical accomplishments of modern war. And when the guns cease, the specter of famine will spring from fields sown with mines and walk through the desolation that was Europe.

Ahead are the stern tasks of retribution, of deciding in technical detail the fate of Germany, of rehabilitating, feeding, rebuilding Europe. All of these tasks raise economic, political, educational problems which it may take a generation to solve. And beyond V-E Day are the completion of the war with Japan and the gigantic problems of the Far East. But greater than all these problems and more portentous for the peoples of the world is that to be faced by the delegates at San Francisco: how to establish a world organization that will secure peace and create the conditions under which the peoples of the world can struggle ahead toward a free and decent life. If San Francisco fails, then millions of brave men will have died in vain.

In this issue of The Nation two outstanding authorities on international affairs present their conceptions of the meaning of San Francisco. Both reject the contention of the perfectionists that world peace can rest only on a just and democratic world federation. Both would agree with Reinhold Niebuhr, in The Nation of April 7, that "Dumbarton Oaks envisages not a world authority but a world alliance of states, and that the authority of the great powers is to be the core of world order." Beyond that basic position, however, there is a sharp divergence of interpretation. Frederick L. Schuman insists that it is a delusion, and a dangerous delusion at that, to imagine that the new United Nations organization can have attributes other than those of a Grand Alliance. It is "muddle-minded liberals" and "subtle obstructionists" who urge the introduction of principles of justice and democracy, who insist upon the redress of the balance of powers between large and small states, who claim that the Assembly should be given a more important function. Percy E. Corbett, on the other hand, insists that it is a mistake to make this black-and-white distinction between a federation and a power alliance. The new organization is not rigid; the claims of community press against the "realistic" canons of power politics. It can safely be said, for instance, that the strength and functioning efficiency of the organization will depend upon the degree to which some of the real grievances raised by the smaller states are met. The central tasks of San Francisco relate to the modification of the original Dumbarton Oaks charter to meet the larger requirements of justice and flexibility.

Now with this latter position we are in essential agreement. San Francisco must obviously be more than a rubber stamp on the original four-power agreement. The Dumbarton Oaks charter itself, while lacking in the declared moral purposes of the Covenant of the old League, nevertheless proposes a rudimentary constitutional framework within which the rights of nations, small as well as great, are guaranteed against abuse. And even now—perhaps chiefly now—larger concepts of justice can be introduced which originally were neglected. It is becoming increasingly clear that basic unity among the major powers is affected by the rights and the status of smaller powers. At the time this is being written, for example, the whole world is anxiously awaiting the results of the conference in Washington between Mr. Stettinius, Mr. Molotov, and Mr. Eden over the question of the reorganization of the Polish government in terms of the Yalta agreement. Leaving aside the mischievous attacks of professional Russophobes, there is a grave concern in the heart of the average American that the independence of Poland and the political rights of all democratic groups in Poland be respected.

What is strangely enough overlooked by the "realists" is that behind the governments represented at San Francisco are societies of free men and women who have already contributed enormously of blood and treasure to crush states dedicated to the worship of power. There is no indication that the peoples of the world will long be content with a world organization, whether it is called a league or an alliance or simply the United Nations, unless it increasingly responds to the demands of justice. The Atlantic Charter and the Four Freedoms declaration offer no blueprint for an organization to support world peace; but they do express basic principles which fortunately most free men believe can and must find realization in human society. Some died believing they were fighting to build such a society. Not all of them were "muddle-minded liberals" or "subtle obstructionists."

We watch San Francisco, then, with deep concern and with profound hope. We are sorry that Franklin Delano Roosevelt will not be there to see the first steps taken in the accomplishment of "the long and arduous task." He stands beside the countless other brave men with whom we dare not break faith.

The Shape of Things

THE LOWEST CIRCLES OF THE NAZI HELL ARE being exposed in the camps of death and living death where organized sadism and systematic degradation have been practiced on such a scale that the human mind, in self-defense, calls it inhuman. The most hopeful of reformers may be expected to doubt that it is possible to reclaim a people conditioned, during twelve years, to behavior of which the logical end result is to be found in the stacks of bones, the rotting flesh, and the terrible stench of Buchenwald. And the problem is made infinitely more difficult by the fact that the Nazis have systematically eliminated anyone who in their opinion might have been useful to the Allies. Only last July all former functionaries, however minor, of the left-wing parties were rounded up, and we may be sure that they have perished in these last desperate weeks of the Nazi regime. The demand for punishment of those who tolerated this evil as well as of those who perpetrated it will rise high at San Francisco. But we should do well to remember in this moment of shock and despair what the dispatches from Germany have seldom mentioned—that the first layers of bones and many later ones were made up of the remains of anti-fascist Germans. By 1938 their corpses had been piling up for six years, yet the gentlemen of Munich tolerated this evil and made a pact with the perpetrators. Long after that the "best people" condoned the Nazi regime. We are sorry, in this connection, that the editor of the Chicago Tribune and others of his stripe were missing from the group of editors and Congressmen who went last week-end to view the remains not only of the Nazi terror but of the policy of appeasement. The German people are responsible and their punishment began when the inhabitants of Weimar were forced to look at the Nazi horrors. But the rest of us have a responsibility too. We must implement it by reclaiming as well as punishing the German people. In any case, that is our only choice unless we are prepared to resort to Nazi methods—which would mark the final and awful triumph of the Nazi idea.

★

REGARDLESS OF BITTER-END NAZI RESISTANCE, the material basis of Germany's war effort has been virtually wiped out by recent Allied successes. No amount of fanaticism can replace the coal lost in the Ruhr, the Saar, and Silesia; no suicide stands can make up for the lack of the iron ore formerly obtained from Silesia, Yugoslavia, and the Ruhr, and no exhortations by Goebbels, or even Hitler himself, can produce gasoline for tanks and planes with all natural oil resources lost and 75 per cent of the synthetic refineries in Allied hands. According to official estimates, Germany's steel-producing capacity has already been reduced 92 per cent, its output of hard coal has been cut 99 per cent, and its gasoline production has been slashed to 4 per cent of normal capacity. In addition, the Reich has lost at least 40 per cent of its jet-aircraft plants, 45 per cent of its regular airplane factories, and 55 per cent of its tank-production capacity. Even these figures exaggerate the Reich's ability to continue war production. Its war industry was decentralized in order to escape the full effects of bombing. As a result the assembly plants for planes and tanks were located in different parts of the Reich from the plants turning out engines and parts. With railway communications at a virtual standstill even in those parts of the country still under Hitler's control, it is probably quite impossible for such assembly plants as are left to obtain the parts necessary to produce any substantial amount of the equipment required for prolonged resistance in Hitler's northern or southern fortresses.

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

Hour of Decision	473
The Shape of Things	474
Talking for a Third World War	476
An Apple Has Only Two Halves	477

ARTICLES

Notes Before 'Frisco by I. F. Stone	478
Might and Right at San Francisco by Frederick L. Schuman	479
The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolte	481
What the Conference Can Do by Percy E. Corbett	482
Will Franco Fall? by Sidney Wise	484
In the Wind	485

POLITICAL WAR

Dr. Goebbels Talks to Himself by Joseph Bornstein	486
The New French Press by Etienne Gallois	487

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Hayek: Digested and Redigested by Keith Hutchison	489
Carl Becker by Joseph Wood Krutch	490
Briefer Comment	492
Films by James Agee	497
Music by B. H. Haggin	498

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 113 by Jack Barrett	500
--	-----

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

THE CAPTURE OF BOLOGNA, CENTER OF THE line to which the Germans had held grimly through the winter, and key to the northern Italian plains, is of great political as well as military significance. Here the Allies are making their first close contact with the workers of the industrial north. Tougher and less exuberant than those of the south, they have a long tradition of political and industrial organization and a well-developed radical philosophy. Inside the city a large and disciplined body of Partisans, controlled by the local Committee of National Liberation, has for months awaited the signal to go into action. On the night of April 20, as troops of the Fifth and Eighth Armies closed in, their orders were received by short-wave. The promptness with which they were obeyed probably did much to save the city, reported to be in good working order, from destruction. In the 3½ hours that elapsed between the flight of the last Germans and the entry of the first Allied units, they took charge of the city and disposed of 200 Italian Fascists, thereby avenging 400 Partisans killed in the last six months, including Giuseppe Bentivoglio, veteran Socialist leader shot in the hour of liberation. By the time Allied civil affairs officers appeared on the scene, the Committee of National Liberation had met and elected as Mayor Giuseppe Dozza, a Communist. Milton Bracker, reporting to the New York Times, writes that the Communists and Socialists are the predominant parties in the city with the Actionists third. Opposition to monarchy appears widespread and vocal; hatred of Mussolini's Fascist "republicans" is intense. Correspondents noted that the welcome given to the Allies was comparatively subdued and suggested that this was a sign of a growing sense of Italian responsibility for the fate of Italy. Certainly it was not due to any regret for the city's former masters, but it may have been partly inspired by an understandable tendency on the part of the people to withhold their cheers until the political meaning of liberation was clearer.

✱

AMBASSADOR HURLEY'S RECENT TRIP TO MOSCOW has particular significance in view of the Soviet Union's increasing interest in the Far Eastern war. During the years of the German invasion Moscow paid comparatively little attention to the Far East. Its relations with China, however, have been seriously strained by the shift to the right in Chungking's policies since the fall of Hankow in 1938. The once substantial flow of Soviet supplies through Sinkiang has been cut to a minute dribble, partly because of Russia's own requirements and partly because of Moscow's doubts regarding the use to which these supplies were being put. Although the whole affair was played down in both countries, the coup d'état which Chungking instigated in Sinkiang in 1942-1943 against the Soviet advisers greatly accentuated the friction between the two countries. C. L. Sulzberger of the New York Times in a recent dispatch from Moscow quoted an article by V. Avarin in War and the Working Class of April 21 which expressed "sharp anxiety as to the political prospects in China." Avarin claimed that the Japanese were using "thousands and tens of thousands of yesterday's Kuomintang people" including sixty-seven generals and large bodies of troops as a "weapon against the truly national Partisan movement" of Yen-an. "The democratic public," he went on to say, "received with great anxiety the news that the negotiations between the Chinese Communist Party and Chungking has produced no results." It is unlikely that the Soviet Union will look with favor on the prospect of shedding Russian blood to drive the Japanese out of Manchuria, only to turn the area over to an unfriendly Chungking regime. Thus Moscow's interests in the internal Chinese situation coincide with those of the United States. Both countries are basically concerned with obtaining a strong, unified, democratic regime in China, capable of serving as a bulwark both against future Japanese aggression and against the spread of totalitarian ideas in Asia. A Far Eastern agreement, laying the basis for American, Russian, British, and Chinese cooperation in the Pacific, should help materially toward attaining these objectives.

✱

SOME OF OUR BEST FRIENDS ARE FASCISTS. TAKE Franco. We always knew his heart was in the right place. Now that he has broken with Japan, refused entry to German planes, invited Spanish Republicans to return (none have accepted), and lifted the censorship on outgoing news, what more can liberals ask? They can and do ask a general amnesty for all political prisoners, a lifting of the internal censorship, the arrest of Nazi war criminals, the restoration of civil and political liberties, and the holding of free elections guaranteed by the presence of foreign observers. They demand that the State Department break with Franco, whose shaky regime it now supports. Of course, the fact that Franco is a very Catholic fascist makes this a bit difficult. He and his buddy across the border, Salazar, are two of the most God-fearing fascists with whom we maintain friendly relations. Together with their fellow-dictators in Brazil and Argentina they form a Catholic fascist bloc in Europe and in America which hopes to continue its activities within the framework of the world security organization. It is not inconceivable that they may yet be given the opportunity to do so—with State Department help. Severance of relations with Spain would be a mortal blow to the Fascist Four. This step would also permit the Spanish people to achieve their own liberation. Can it be that we still fear a republic in Spain more than we fear fascism? The State Department misrepresents the American people if it answers yes.

✱

CARLOS PRESTES'S RELEASE AFTER NINE YEARS of imprisonment in Brazil is not a measure of Vargas's democratic sentiments but the weakening of his fascist state. Popular pressure has forced the most astute of South American dictators to declare an amnesty for all political prisoners. They number approximately 3,000; 800 were in Rio de Janeiro's jail, and several thousand were in the island prisons of Fernando de Noronha and Ilha Grande. Carlos Prestes, whose name has become a symbol of the fight for freedom, is a Communist who led the opposition to Vargas and was imprisoned in 1936 just before the dictatorship finally entrenched itself by abolishing all constitutional liberties. His release will immensely accelerate the struggle for democracy inside Brazil and furnish it with a valuable leader. But one outstanding democratic leader may be lost—Arthur Ewart, the gallant German anti-fascist, once a member of the Reichstag, who was jailed at the same time as Prestes. Several years ago it was reported that the tortures to which he was subjected in Vargas's jails had driven him insane. Now he has been released—in what condition and in whose custody we do not know. Vargas wants us to forget the case of Arthur Ewart and of his other victims. He wants us to forget that he deported Prestes's pregnant wife to Nazi Germany, where her child was born in a concentration camp. These are facts we hope our representatives will remember when they sit down to plan for world security with Vargas's delegates.

★

THE AUTHORITIES AT SAN QUENTIN PRISON IN California have worked out a streamlined solution for the race problem in America—if it could only be applied on a mass scale. Some time ago the authorities came to the sensible conclusion that prejudice did not necessarily need to be respected inside prison walls. Having convinced themselves of the soundness of this novel proposition, they proceeded to order the white inmates to eat in the mess hall in which Negro prisoners are served, thereby upsetting a time-honored San Quentin tradition ("interfering with the mores," in sociological parlance). The white prisoners, with amusing arrogance, refused to comply with the order. The answer of the authorities was to order 1,110 convicts kept in solitary confinement on one meal a day until they could master their Mississippian indignation. After twelve hours of confinement, these haughty advocates of white supremacy, without exception, decided that they could actually eat a meal in the presence of Negroes. And no subsequent disorders have been reported. The technique having proved so effective, it is unfortunate that it cannot be applied on a nationwide scale—for about twelve hours. While Bilbo and Rankin might conceivably be somewhat more intransigent than the 1,110 white prisoners in San Quentin, still it seems reasonable to assume that their desire for mere food—not to mention good Southern cooking—would soon overcome their reluctance to eat with Negroes. In any case, the authorities at San Quentin are entitled to a large measure of commendation for having braved the outraged sensibilities of a thousand criminals. If the example is followed by other institutions, we may actually succeed in outlawing segregation in every prison in America.

★

ERNIE PYLE HATED WAR AND FEARED DEATH.

He might have by-passed both and lived out his days quite honorably in a safe sector. Instead he insisted on going again and again to the front lines of World War II. According to an anonymous obituary in the New York Times, which deserved a by-line, Pyle grew up with a fear of not being liked. Perhaps this explains his courage; it would seem that the fear itself had been transmuted into an obligation to take part in the common experience of his kind, though it was an experience he hated and feared. In fulfilling an obligation imposed only by himself he became a known soldier; but millions of unknown G. I.'s are commemorated in his unwilling yet voluntary dedication, his grouching yet dogged service, and his casual death on an island in the South Pacific.

ONE WAY TO LOSE FAITH IN DEMOCRACY IS TO study the faces in a cigarette line in this peak year of war effort. There's one close to the office which by three o'clock any afternoon runs clear around four sides of a block. We've been told that if you wait for two hours you are almost sure to get two packages of cigarettes. Perhaps what made us particularly ill the last time we saw it was that we had spent the evening before with an American flyer just back from the Pacific. He had flown over Tokyo in a B 29 a few weeks ago. He had been on Iwo and he described the faces of the wounded men who were taken off the beach out to the hospital ships. They were not like the civilian faces in that line.

Talking for a Third World War

THE sharp verbal clash between Secretary Wallace and Senator Wiley at the Senate hearings on the renewal of the Trade Agreements Act epitomizes the cleavage of party opinion on this vital issue. Senator Wiley was engaged in the hoary Republican pastime of shedding crocodile tears over the American workers who would be thrown out of work by the influx of cheap foreign goods. Asked to comment, Mr. Wallace said: "Senator, I hate to hear you talking like that; you are just talking for a third world war." Red with anger, the Senator retorted that that was "a hell of an answer."

Some people may feel that Mr. Wallace's reply was a little too sweeping, but the wide publicity given to the clash indicates that it was just the kind of answer needed to challenge the conventional protectionist myths which Senator Wiley was mouthing. For years economists have patiently tried to explain that the country could not lose through an increase in foreign trade: that trade means trade, a swapping of something that you can make cheaply for something that other countries can make cheaply. For every job lost in a low-wage protected industry, one or more new jobs would be created in our high-wage export industries.

But the explanation of the economists seems never to have sunk in very deeply. Vested interests, by judicious expenditures in the right places, have been able to perpetuate the myth that the tariff somehow "protected" the American standard of living, and have kept many people believing that a reduction in the tariff would result in increased unemployment. Mr. Wallace's accusation that the perpetrators of these myths are talking for World War III cuts to the heart of the issue in a way that the economists' reply has failed to do. It is true, as the economists have pointed out, that an increase in foreign trade will raise, not lower, living standards, and will make possible an expansion, rather than a reduction, in employment. But the economic benefits, though substantial, are unimportant when weighed in the scales with the political benefits.

The essential point, as brought out so dramatically by the Secretary of Commerce, is that an effective political organization for maintaining the peace must be based on the fact of world economic interdependence. This presupposes a substantial increase in world trade. Economic nationalism is fundamentally divisive in character. If allowed to persist, it will destroy whatever structure of political cooperation may be set up at San Francisco. Assistant Secretary of State Clayton developed this point when he pointed out that unless steps are taken to permit other countries to meet their obligations to this country through an expansion of American imports, "we'll set up irritations and bitterness" among other countries. And Secretary of State Stettinius affirmed the same truth when he declared that the new tariff proposals were vital to "give the rest of the world a symbol and a tangible proof that we mean what we say about joining with other nations in working out a more prosperous and secure world."

In many ways it is unfortunate that the San Francisco conference should be held while Congress is still squabbling as to whether it will indorse Bretton Woods and a renewal of the Trade Agreements Act. Defeat of either would deal a body blow to the conference, and Administration supporters are frankly worried over the prospects for both. But the very uncertainty about the fate of the proposals creates an opportunity. Nothing would do more at this point to create a favorable atmosphere at San Francisco than prompt and decisive action by Congress indorsing Bretton Woods and extending the reciprocal-trade act.

An Apple Has Only Two Halves

THE National Planning Association has long played a small but useful and growing role in the formation of American public opinion and in the clarification of complex economic problems. It has been extraordinarily successful in bringing together representatives of labor and agriculture and progressive business men, and in achieving agreement on basic issues. It has been doing an outstanding job in focusing attention on the problem of full employment after the war. Its latest staff report, "National Budgets for Full Employment," will help government officials, business men, farm leaders, and trade unionists to grasp at least the magnitude of the task involved in full employment.

The Full Employment bill now before Congress utilizes the mechanism of a national economic budget, a budget that covers all the income and outgo of the entire economy instead of merely that of the federal government. The purpose of that budget is to disclose the "gap" which either government or private spending must fill between prospective expenditures and the amount required for full employment.

The National Planning Association study sets up three sample budgets of this kind, one relying on government to fill this gap, a second on private expenditures, a third on increased consumer purchases. It is when these budgetary figures are examined and compared with the past that one begins to realize what a stupendous task is involved in the achievement of full employment. The total national output required, according to the NPA, is $170 billion annually in 1941 prices, or about the amount the nation produced last year in terms of 1944 prices. To reach this total, the NPA assumes expenditures of $13 billion for producer's plant and equipment (capital goods), or $5 billion more than the average of the '20's; $6 billion for residential construction, or about $1.5 billion more than the average of the '20's; $1 billion for net increase in inventories; and $2 billion for net export balance, or about $1 billion more than in the '20's. The study assumes expenditures of $25.4 billion a year by government and of $122.6 billion by consumers—or just about twice the amount spent by consumers in 1939. And after all these optimistic assumptions, there still remains a gap of $8.5 billion to be filled by additional expenditures!

Could this be filled by public works? "Not for long," the NPA experts declare, "without redefining the term public works," without "a drastic readjustment of our concepts of appropriate government activities in peace time." Government would have to go into several fields hitherto the exclusive preserve of private ownership to expand expenditures that much. Could private industry take up that slack by adding $8.5 billion to its investment in capital goods? Its $13 billion annual investment in such goods is already enormous. Its magnitude may be judged by the fact that the total government investment in war plants since the defense program began is only $16 billion. What other possibility is there for filling this gap?

"There is one possibility," the NPA report says, "that could have a major effect. This is the possibility of a change in the distribution of the nation's income. It is a common observation that a man saves a larger proportion of his income as the income rises; conversely, that people toward the lower end of the income scale save less or do not find it possible to save at all. If ways could be found to adjust the lower brackets upward without increasing prices, the effect would be to increase individuals' expenditures and thus relieve government or business or both of some of their burden in making up the total required for full employment."

But to "adjust the lower brackets upward without increasing prices" requires a willingness on the part of industry to accept a lower rate of profit. For there is no way to cut an apple into three halves. The total apple would indeed be larger under full employment and the total volume of profit might well be greater, but the ratio of profit, the percentage taken from the national income by the top income groups, must necessarily be smaller if those at the bottom are to have a greater share. In this greater share for those at the bottom lies the key to full employment. H. Christian Sonne, an unusually thoughtful and progressive business man, who is chairman of the NPA, indicated as much when he said, "It is the use, the distribution—not primarily the size—of the national output and income that counts. Within a considerable range it is the relationships that govern, not the magnitudes." The only place where consuming power can be significantly increased is in the lower income groups, and they can have more only if those at the top have a little less. Full employment offers the upper groups a rich recompense in return: greater security, social, economic, and political. Capital may earn a lower rate of return, but the risk will be less.

Notes Before 'Frisco

BY I. F. STONE

En Route to San Francisco, April 20

THE first essential of world peace is full employment in the United States. This cannot be repeated too often. Our own country represents about half the world market, and if we are prosperous the rest of the world will be prosperous too. Only in such a context can the agreements reached at Bretton Woods operate successfully. Only in such a context will other nations give up the weapons of economic self-defense and economic warfare—currency depreciation, quotas, barter agreements, licensing of exports and imports—which breed ill-feeling among nations. It has been said that if we wish to sell abroad we must be prepared to buy abroad. Only in a prosperous America can one hope for the political and economic climate which would permit any significant tariff reductions. The strong opposition in Congress to the Doughton bill for extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act indicates how far we are as a people from grasping the responsibilities and necessities of our creditor position. In a fully employed America the tariff problem would lose much of its urgency.

Several recent studies indicate that the volume of our imports bears surprisingly little relation to the height of our tariff walls or to the price of foreign products. Calvin B. Hoover in his "Post-War Goals and Economic Reconstruction" reports that "the changes in volume of trade in commodities on which duties were raised during the Hoover Administration were not so strikingly different from the changes in the volume of imports of other commodities upon which duties were not raised." The factor that determines our volume of trade, Dr. Hoover finds, "is the volume of our own industrial production. If we have prosperity, then we have high imports and exports. If we have depression the opposite is true."

All this is far better understood abroad than at home. Washington embassies have shown unusual interest in the full-employment bill now before Congress. (It is worth noting that the new President when he was still a Senator signed promptly the Military Affairs Committee report indorsing the bill.) Some foreign governments, notably the Australian, are known to have begun diplomatic conversations on the full-employment problem with a view to some joint action or declaration at the world trade conference recently announced by Secretary Stettinius.

Full and stable employment in the United States necessarily means a lower rate of profit on capital. Some would like to evade this unpalatable fact and to dodge a terribly difficult problem by an intensified drive for foreign markets. Foreign markets, though important, cannot provide full employment. To place primary emphasis on foreign trade is also to intensify inevitable ill-feeling as American and British traders compete in Latin America and elsewhere. This would be imperialism in its classic form. For imperialism is the search abroad for that higher rate of profit which can no longer be obtained at home. I need hardly add that failure to achieve full employment would also provide the right emotional climate for imperialist adventures: disillusioned veterans, renewed isolationism, xenophobia, fascist movements. In such an atmosphere whatever is achieved at San Francisco would become worthless.

The second essential of a stable world peace is agreement among the Big Three on post-war treatment of Germany and Japan—not just agreement on generalities, but accord in the working out of detailed day-by-day decisions. The trust or mistrust bred in the process will determine the future relations of the great powers and decide the efficiency of the security organization to be set up at San Francisco. Here the political difficulties involved are enormous.

We must never forget that Hitlerism had a double root and can only be extirpated by double action. It was rooted not only in the German national pattern but also in the weaknesses of world capitalism. All the factors which enabled Hitler to reverse Lenin's famous slogan, which enabled the Nazis to turn civil war into imperialist war, are still present. The recurrent cyclical crises, the dead-end atmosphere of much upper-class thinking, the fear of change, the Communist bogey, the anti-Semitism characteristic of societies in decay are still with us. The two staples of Nazi propaganda—the "bulwark against Bolshevism" line for nice people, Jew-baiting for the others—will still be marketable after the war if there is considerable unemployment.

There is reason to believe that the "bulwark against Bolshevism" idea is already playing a part in British and American thinking in regard to Germany, as it also will in regard to Japan. Anti-Soviet fears and prejudices, though private, are prominent in the thinking of the State Department bureaucracy. James Clement Dunn and Julius Holmes are certainly among those to whom this applies. The tendency to favor a "soft peace" for Germany is also fed by cartel and commercial considerations, here as in Britain. The leak of the so-called "Morgenthau plan" in distorted form was a deliberate job by the State Department crowd to which I refer, and it was contrived in a way most likely to kill the plan.

Mr. Hull himself, contrary to the general impression, was not for a soft peace, but for a year or more before his retirement he had little to do with the actual workings of the State Department. So long as Mr. Roosevelt was alive, the "hard peace" idea had the ascendancy, but since his death a change is already perceptible in inter-departmental discussions. The State Department opposition to drastic action against Germany has stiffened. It is possible that the department may take a stronger position on German war criminals and perhaps also against the Japanese Emperor as a means of covering up a softer policy toward both countries. No one yet knows what Mr. Truman's attitude toward the German and Japanese problems will be, but I suspect it will prove at least as stern as Mr. Roosevelt's.

It must be kept in mind that the Big Three did not have sense enough to stick together against the Nazi menace before the war. The U. S. S. R. and this country both waited to be attacked before entering the war. Joint occupation of the Reich may make it easier, not harder, for the Germans to play one side off against the other. Robert Murphy, who will be General Eisenhower's political adviser in the German occupation, is as dangerous as he is shrewd. Murphy is another of those whose thinking about Germany is colored by the desire for a "bulwark against Bolshevism." The grim fact is that the dominant forces in British and American society impel us to the reconstitution after the war of pretty much the same kind of Germany and Japan we are spending blood and billions to crush. Only large measures of socialism and a vigorous upper-class purge could remove the aggressive forces and the imperialist urges of Germany and Japan, establish mutual confidence among the Big Three, and make a third world war unlikely. These, too, are decisions which will determine the worth of what is done at San Francisco.

A less immediate and longer-range problem which will decide the stability of the peace is the treatment of the colonial peoples. Here lies the possibility of conflicts more serious even than another falling out among the European peoples. However "correct" the attitude of the Soviet Union, however conservative and conciliatory the policies of the Communist parties, the example of racial equality in the Soviet Union will be a constant reproach and irritant to colonialism, as Soviet full employment will be to capitalism. In this field, too, progressive forces in the West must press for reform if the unity of the Big Three is to be maintained.

Little has been said in the West of the spectacle provided by the farce of "India" at San Francisco and of "India" in the Assembly of the proposed new world organization. The delegation is made up entirely of British stooges, and it is Britain which will cast India's vote in the Assembly. We may be sure that the full implications of the sight will not be lost on the colonial peoples. "The trouble is," said a British representative to an American in a relaxed moment at the bar during the Bretton Woods conference, "we're too good to each other's niggers." He was referring, of course, to American interest in India and British interest in our treatment of Negroes; the remark is rich in overtones. In the handling of the colonial problem, we must either invoke prejudice and race hatred, fascist style, or move forward to the admission of the colonial and colored peoples into full equality and partnership. A few millions of European whites cannot forever dominate hundreds of millions of brown and yellow people. This is another of the fundamental questions which must be faced and answered if the San Francisco peace organization is to last.

Might and Right at San Francisco

BY FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

WHEN the birds and animals emerged from the pool of tears, "all dripping, wet, cross, and uncomfortable," Lewis Carroll tells us, they had a consultation about how to get dry again. The Dodo suggested a Caucus-race. The resulting bewilderment suggests the state of mind in which many Americans contemplate the San Francisco conference. Even after the Klieg lights and microphones have been turned off, most observers and some participants will be quite uncertain whether the conference was a success or a failure.

The Dodo, it will be recalled, "marked out a race course in a sort of circle ('the exact shape doesn't matter,' it said), and then all the party were placed along the course, here and there, and began running when they liked, and left off when they liked, so that it was not easy to know when the race was over. However, when they had been running half an hour or so, the Dodo suddenly called out, 'The race is over!' and they all crowded round it, panting, and asking, 'But who has won?' This question the Dodo could not answer without a great deal of thought, and it stood for a long time with one finger pressed upon its forehead (the position in which you usually see Shakespeare, in the pictures of him), while the rest waited in silence. At last the Dodo said, 'Everybody has won, and all must have prizes.' " In Wonderland, Alice supplied the prizes and everybody was happy. At San Francisco, matters will be less simple.

The difficulty of judging the conference will vanish if it breaks up in dissension; or if a charter is concocted and then rejected by Washington, Moscow, or London; or if the charter, in a form acceptable to all, makes unmistakable provision for the replacement of anarchy by government in the community of nations. But none of these contingencies, sad or glad, is even remotely probable. The assembled delegates may, and doubtless will, run hither and thither like the creatures in the Caucus-race. Their home publics, however, expect from them some comforting assurance of enduring global peace involving not the slightest sacrifice of national sovereignty. They must therefore do what they can to persuade their publics that they have achieved the miracle of eating one's cake and having it too.

This objective, stemming from what Arnold J. Toynbee would call a "schism in the soul" of all contemporary patriots and peace-seekers, accounts for the labored official explanations of recent months. The conference, we are assured, is not a peace conference but a conference to insure peace. It will set up a league which will not really be a league. Neither will it be a super-government, nor indeed any government at all, and yet somehow it will govern. Such confusions will soon be worse confounded. Yet none of the major delegations can afford to go home in a huff. Neither can they accept any plan for limiting "the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states," on which, under the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, the new structure is to be reared. The outcome will be another halfway house between world government and world anarchy. John Doe and Joe Doakes, along with the Cabots and the Lowells (to say nothing of the Lodges), will have very little idea whether the result should be a source of enthusiasm or despair.

This curious situation, which will grow "curiouser and curiouser," reflects the universal dilemma of our time. It also echoes the contrite conviction of Americans that the United States should have joined the Wilsonian League in 1920. But now as always order, law, and justice are impossible in any community without government. Government in a community of states is possible either through the conquest of all states by one or through the partial surrender of local sovereignty to central authorities empowered to legislate for individuals. The first possibility is precluded by the unavailability of any Julius Caesar or Genghis Khan in today's world. (Cf. forthcoming obituaries of Hirohito and A. Hitler.) The second possibility is likewise precluded by the rejection of federalism as the basis of the new order. (Cf. the Atlantic Charter, the Mackinac Island declaration, the Moscow conference communiqué, the Connally resolution, and the Republican and Democratic platforms of 1944.) Both possibilities of effective world government are, for the present, as dead as the Dodo. There is no other possibility.

What will emerge will be a new League. It will have nothing in common with a global imperium or federation. Its organs will be without legislative power. Its members will seek to keep the peace through the collective coercion by all sovereignties of any sovereignty daring to take the sword. This arrangement, which has never worked, was correctly described by James Madison as a formula for war, by George Mason as a mixture of "fire and water," and by Alexander Hamilton as "one of the maddest projects ever devised." But a century and a half later earnest souls continue to insist, contrary to all reason, that peace can be had in this fashion. They persist, absurdly, in calling the proposed charter a "constitution" and in demanding provisions to "review" treaties, to insure "justice," to protect the four freedoms, and to do a thousand other things which can never be done by an association of sovereignties but only by a government. The futility of these fantasies will be seen clearly at San Francisco only by Commander Stassen. But his pleas, or more probably his silent regrets, will not change the result.

How, then, is the work of the conference to be evaluated? The first requirement of clarity is to face facts and to discard current illusions and all the tortuous preoccupations of lawyers, liberals, and League fans with blueprints and clock-work. The paramount fact is that the only decisive centers of power in the world of tomorrow will be in America, Britain, and the U. S. S. R. The organization of peace is a problem of power politics. Power politics is not a wicked game of foreign diplomats. It is the only kind of politics possible in a world of sovereignties. It can be abolished only by feudalism, which the United Nations have repudiated. It can never be abolished by a League of Nations, nor can a League per se possibly keep the peace, indispensable as it will be to promote other purposes. In the kind of world which the United Nations have already decided they want, peace can be kept only by a Grand Alliance of America, Britain, and Russia.

Given such an alliance, or a reasonable and workable facsimile thereof, it will not matter in the least how many smaller states join or fail to join, for peace will be secure. Without such an alliance, it will likewise not matter what other states do or refuse to do, for world peace will be lost. The Covenant which Wilson brought home from Paris was less important than the Anglo-French-American alliance he had signed. Had the latter been accepted, the rejection of the former would have been unfortunate but not fatal. A League without a firm alliance at its core is futile and feckless as a means to peace in a world of sovereignties. No amount of verbiage or wishful thinking will change these stubborn realities. If they are forgotten or evaded at San Francisco, the ultimate result will be failure.

The most persistent delusion threatening tragedy at the Golden Gate is the notion that the coming world order will be "democratic" and capable of keeping peace only if the small states have an equal voice with the great powers. In reality it is a negation of democracy to give the United States and Guatemala, Great Britain and Luxembourg, the Soviet Union and Norway an equal voice. Democracy means that people are to be counted as equal. To count states as equal is to count people as unequal. It is also to take control of the destinies of the world out of the hands of the great powers, which alone have power to keep the peace, and put it into the hands of an irresponsible oligarchy of the impotent. Peace for the next generation depends exclusively on Anglo-American-Soviet solidarity. On this also depend the rights and indeed the very existence of small states. If the Big Three fall apart, the small and the weak will all inevitably be trampled down anew in the combat of the giants.

These considerations provide a yardstick for judgment. The conference will fail if Washington, London, and Moscow become embroiled in a meaningless dispute over who should have three or six or twenty votes in the Assembly. It will likewise end in futility if the Assembly is given equal power with the Council—for equal power here will mean no power; or if the United States refuses to sign an alliance; or if the existing alliances among Britain, the U. S. S. R., France, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia are subject to control by the League; or if the American Senate proposes amendments or reservations to the charter. The conference will have achieved its major goal only if it devises an instrument whereby America, Britain, and the U. S. S. R. can act together, swiftly and effectively, against peace-breakers. Great power entails great responsibility. It is susceptible of great abuse. But weak power or no power means anarchy and more war in the days ahead. An alliance is not a government. It offers no guaranty of justice. It does offer a possibility, now the only possibility, of order and peace. There will be neither in the world of tomorrow, and therefore no possibility of moving toward law and justice, without an enduring concert of power among Washington, London, and Moscow.

This fact was wisely recognized in Senator Vandenberg's proposal of January 12 and has long been insisted upon by the Soviet Union. Republican or Communist indorsement does not make the proposal wrong or right. It is right only because politics is the art of the possible, and nothing else is possible. To reject it will be to play into the hands of the anarchists. Their ranks embrace all professional Anglophobes, Soviet-haters, and "nationalists"—and all who shed tears for the Baltic states and Poland and insist that democracy and Marxism are irreconcilable. If so, there can be no peace. And if more war comes because of the refusal of anarchists, appeasers, and perfectionists to face realities, let no one suppose that such a war will promote justice or law or the rights of small nations or the security of America or the survival of capitalism or even the interests of the Roman church.

Success at San Francisco will require an unflinching facing of realities and an end of the current mysticism of muddled-minded liberals, subtle obstructionists, and sponsors of war between Muscovy and the Atlantic powers. It will require that a Grand Alliance be made the core of the new League. The task of Americans in furthering victory in the battle for peace, and in rendering a verdict on the campaign which lies ahead, is a task to which they will prove equal only if they give concrete meaning to the words of their lost leader: "We must continue to be united with our allies in a powerful world organization which is ready and able to keep the peace, if necessary by force. . . . It is useless to win a war unless it stays won. . . . We are not fighting for, and we shall not attain, a Utopia. We have set ourselves a long and arduous task. That task calls for the judgment of a seasoned and mature people. . . . We can gain no lasting peace if we approach it with suspicion and mistrust. . . . We must wage the coming battle for peace and civilization in association with the United Nations with whom we have stood and fought."

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE German drama is drawing to its end amid the horror of decayed bodies and evidences of unrelieved brutality. The great military actions are nearly done, and in these moments which seem in a way almost anticlimactic many Americans are finding their minds most filled with startling intimations that the Germans are perhaps not very nice people. Many of us never quite believed these things when the news of them came from Russia or Poland or Czechoslovakia; but in the last ten days a tremendous hardening of the American feeling toward Germany and the peace has taken place with the reading of the reports from Buchenwald and other camps. It is good to hear that General Eisenhower has invited some Congressmen and editors to view these monuments. It is even more appropriate that those curiously incurious Germans who lived so near during the terrible years are being taken on guided tours through the stinking barracks and past the rows of naked corpses beyond the crematoria, to live with the memory of what has been done in their name, or like the mayor and mayoress of Weimar to come home and slit their wrists.

Berlin has chosen a more grandiose suicide, resisting the extraordinarily powerful and skilful Red Army offensive from the long-prepared jumping-off points west of the Oder. The city should be devastated by the time this reaches print, and the Allies should have joined hands across the fallen Reich. We can then expect the peculiar spectacle of a defeated nation which does not quit, a country without a capital which continues to fight, a decimated and incoherent army which maintains isolated but effective resistance. All this—Buchenwald hardening our hearts, the impossibility of a German surrender, the devastation of German cities and industry, the failure to get in a crop with consequent starvation next winter—makes the immediate problem of "what to do with Germany" take on a comparatively academic shade. There may well be so little left of Germany as to make that problem fade into insignificance.

The British campaign to recapture southern Burma has got off to a good start with a seventy-mile advance southward from Myitkyina toward Rangoon—an advance accomplished through the jungle in twelve days, in which 3,500 Japanese were killed. The Japanese are resisting strongly as they attempt to relieve the flight of stragglers from the central Burma pocket, but this drive down the main Burma railway will prove difficult to stop. The British Fourteenth Army has already demonstrated its courage, tenacity, and skill in the Burma fighting, and it now seems well on the road to victory in that out-of-the-way theater which so seldom breaks into the headlines. The recent campaign has been a brilliant one, and the Japanese have in fact lost as many troops in Burma as they have in all the Central Pacific fighting. The debt of '42, when the British absorbed such a terrible beating, has been largely repaid; and a truly Allied army—British, Americans, Chinese, Indians, West Africans, Burma hill tribes—has followed with distinction the advice of General Joseph Stilwell, offered when he led that awful retreat: "I claim we got a hell of a beating. I think we ought to find out what caused it, go back and retake it."

The capture of Mandalay a month ago was the culmination of one phase of the campaign, and led directly to the entrapment of some 50,000 soldiers of the Japanese Fifteenth Army, which was cut off from all supplies and robbed of air support by the superb work of the R. A. F. and U. S. A. F. Some 10,000 Japanese were killed in the operations leading up to this great encirclement, and many more have been killed since. Prior to the encirclement, the Fourteenth Army was operating on a front of over 400 miles between the Bay of Bengal and the northern Shan States—not, of course, a continuous front as in Europe, but with columns acting independently, widely scattered through the hills and woods, and often supplied solely by air. This army advanced in eleven months, through country which is the most difficult in the world for a modern fighting force to move through, more than the distance between Moscow and Berlin.

Nor has this massive achievement been the only activity of the Allies in Burma. On the Fourteenth Army's right flank, the Fifteenth Army Corps in Arakan has destroyed a considerable portion of the enemy's Twenty-eighth Army, and on the left flank the Northern Combat Area Command—Chinese, with some British and American troops, under the American General Sultan—has contained most of the Japanese Thirty-third Army.

There has been plenty of bad news from Burma: first defeat, then slow progress, delays, shortages of supplies, friction among British and Americans and Chinese; but despite all these difficulties much has been accomplished in the past few months. British and American air forces have operated in the closest cooperation; on the ground, troops of many nations have scored victories side by side. Admiral Mountbatten, with General Slim carrying the ball for him as commander of the Fourteenth Army, has won the first large-scale continental victory over the Japanese in this war.

As we move into the final phases of the war, details leak out here and there which show the enormous technological advances we have made in the science of killing one another off—so that God can start again with the insects, presumably. Among recent developments which have attracted my attention, in addition to the new U. S. A. A. F. incendiary bomb described in an earlier issue, are the following:

Curtiss-Wright has in production, and the navy has in combat, a new version of the Helldiver, called the Beast, or SB2C-4, which carries more than 1,000 pounds of bombs in the fuselage and 1,000 under the wings, where it also mounts two twenty-millimeter cannon and eight five-inch rockets. This aircraft, which has double the bomb capacity of the old navy dive-bomber, has a range of 1,000 miles.

Allied troops in Europe have been employing the rocket barrage, first used by the navy in the Pacific to cover beach landings. A group of 12 projectors, each with 32 barrels, produces a concentration of fire comparable to that of 280 field guns firing 100-pound shells, but only 200 gunners are needed as against the 3,000 gunners necessary for a like effort with artillery. Of course, the rocket barrage is not so accurate—yet.

The R. A. F.'s eleven-ton volcano bomb, dropped from the huge and eminently successful Lancaster bomber, has proved particularly effective. As the Canadian Wartime Information Board points out matter-of-factly, "The explosion of one volcano bomb is comparable to a full salvo from ten fourteen-inch guns of the 35,000-ton battleship, H. M. S. King George V, with the exception that in the case of the bomb the fire is concentrated in one spot." The Lützow, Germany's last pocket battleship, was sunk in Swinemünde harbor last week by one of these bombs which landed sixty feet away; in this case, a miss is as good as a hit down the funnel, for the underwater concussion smashes the armor and lets the water in. The Admiral Scheer, another pocket battleship, and the Tirpitz have been sunk with this bomb, a prototype of which was dropped experimentally on a small granite island off the British coast before it was used in combat. The experiment was a great success: the Ordnance Survey was informed it could leave the island off its maps.

It was announced recently that the Allies captured in France the firing site of a battery of 50 underground guns with barrels of 6-inch caliber and 400-foot length, which were to fire 120-pound rocket shells on London, 95 miles away, at the rate of 10 per minute. The enemy plan was to keep rescue workers and A. R. P. personnel under cover while V-1 and V-2 did their big damage.

I plan to discuss these matters at some length with anyone in San Francisco who will lend an ear.

What the Conference Can Do

BY PERCY E. CORBETT

AT DUMBARTON OAKS last summer the United States, Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and China drew up a plan for the political, economic, and social cooperation of the "peace-loving" nations to prevent war and improve living conditions throughout the world. This agreement was an event of the first magnitude, for everybody accepts it as axiomatic that any security organization that is to have the shadow of a chance must be founded upon the consent of the victorious great powers.

The plan, however, was not simply one of great-power collaboration. It called for the constant participation of the lesser states. How essential this is in the economic and social field needs no demonstration. How important it is for security is easily realized if we consider what could have happened in the early stages of Nazi aggression if Germany's neighbors had been actively associated with the great powers in a strongly integrated protective system.

It was because the United States and Britain, at least, fully realized the necessity of the whole-hearted participation of the lesser states that the Dumbarton text was not simply communicated for comment and acquiescence, but was presented as the basis of discussion at an eventual conference of all the United Nations. That is the great issue for the San Francisco meeting—how to make the projected organization one that will elicit the warm support of the smaller nations without seriously reducing its capacity for effective action.

In the interval since Dumbarton Oaks many states not represented there have made it abundantly clear that they will not cheerfully accept the plan without changes. France and the Latin American nations are worried about the organization's control over regional arrangements. A number of governments want larger powers to be assigned to the General Assembly so that the small states, which are all represented in that body, may have a greater share in directing the work of the organization as a whole. Others want an explicit guaranty of territorial integrity and political independence, which is so far missing in the text. Others—seconded by Senator Vandenberg—urge a clear statement of the general principles, such as "justice," by which the Security Council is to be guided in its action. Some states, led by Canada, are asking that at least two of the non-permanent members of the Security Council be always elected from the group of "middle" powers. Others—here again with Senator Vandenberg's support—propose that the organization should have authority to recommend revision of treaties and adjustment of situations that are working injustice. Various other alterations and additions are being pushed in this quarter and that, but those mentioned are the ones about which most will be heard.

Moscow, it appears, doesn't want amendments. It would like to regard the Dumbarton text as a firm agreement among the greatest powers, not to be altered to meet the desires of the weak. What, then, is the purpose of the conference at San Francisco? Is it to be another Congress of Vienna, with an inner group announcing its decisions to a mob of waiting delegates?

For the United States, on the contrary, it has been intimated that proposed amendments will receive careful study. Here is a further manifestation of that same wisdom which abandoned the claim to a multiple vote. The conference of San Francisco is not to be a gigantic rubber stamp; it is to be a genuine congress, where all invited participants will have a real share in decision. Nor is this soft-headed quixotism. It is common sense and good business. The governments of the United States and Britain know that the active good-will of small nations will save lives and treasure in the main job of keeping the peace.

It is not realism to present the alternatives in world affairs as the pure white of universal federation and the dead black of "power politics." The real thing is the infinite variety of devices in between. What human society has ever lived by any body of logically consistent principles or, for any length of time, by any body of principles remotely approaching consistency? The business of men just isn't conducted that way.

So a workable mixture of power and "constitutionality" can be devised at San Francisco, and the possibilities of compromise between Big-Three domination and community control have not been exhausted by the text drawn up at Dumbarton Oaks.

Is there any need, for example, to keep the clause which forbids the Assembly to "make recommendations on any matter relating to the maintenance of international peace and security which is being dealt with by the Security Council"? Senator Vandenberg is attacking it, and his views will find a sympathetic echo in many delegations at the conference. If a two-thirds' majority in the General Assembly holds that a dispute is not making satisfactory progress in the Security Council, there is much to be said for the liberty to give formal expression to its concern. More doubtful, but still worthy of serious consideration, is the suggestion that a decision by the Security Council to apply sanctions should call for positive action only from states represented on the Council unless and until it is confirmed by a two-thirds' vote in the General Assembly. The idea has distinct merits. The chief responsibility for action will in any case fall on states in the Council, and this proposal, without paralyzing that body's capacity for action, would put a wholesome curb on the ambition of weak states to be represented there.

Nor should the San Francisco conference summarily dismiss the proposal to make explicit provision for the revision of treaties and adjustment of inequitable situations. This, indeed, like the principle of justice, is implicit in the present text. The Council may well have to urge revisions and adjustments in its business of keeping the peace. Revisions and adjustments, again, may well be the subject of recommendations by the General Assembly touching "the maintenance of international peace and security," under Chapter V, B, 1. More effective work in this connection will probably be done by proceedings in the Council under Chapter VIII, A, 3-5, than by formal recommendations. Territorial settlements, moreover, will probably have to be exempt from revision proceedings for an indefinite period after this war. The knowledge that territorial settlement could be brought up at any time for discussion would be a disturbing factor in Europe for years to come. But with this exception an explicit recognition of the need for "peaceful change" is on the whole desirable.

Relations between the United Nations organization and regional associations promise some difficulty at San Francisco. Here, by the way, is a part of the plan which should confound those who describe the proposed general organization as mainly a disguise for the unlimited play of power politics. The great powers represented at Dumbarton Oaks adopted a system which precludes free particular alliances, one of the prominent features of power politics in history. The leading advocate of amendment here is France, officially recognized as a great power but not a participant in the meeting at Dumbarton Oaks. France wants its defensive agreement with the Soviet Union to operate without waiting for authority from the United Nations organization. The Latin American countries also oppose a system which would give non-American states the power to veto action by the Union of American Republics.

What can be done to meet these reservations? As far as France is concerned, its fears might be removed by a temporary exemption from control for arrangements rising out of this war and directed against a resumption of German aggression. The Latin American claim will be harder to satisfy. Partial satisfaction might be given by putting into the charter of the United Nations a clause permitting immediate action by regional associations in defined circumstances. Action might even be permitted in unforeseen emergencies with a proviso of immediate notification to the Security Council and liability to complete justification before that body of all measures actually taken. But the principle of United Nations control should not be abandoned. If it is, the way will be open to competing and conflicting "security" blocs which would eventually break up or paralyze the general organization.

The veto of the great powers on the use of force against themselves will probably have to stand, though it is clearly inconsistent with ideal justice. Whatever we might do on paper, we cannot alter this in fact until the world is ready to submit to one centralized government with a monopoly of force. But one anomaly rising from the Yalta agreement should be removed. A great power that is party to a dispute cannot veto consideration of the dispute or recommendations on it, but it can veto proceedings on disputes to which it is not a party. Was this an oversight? Why should Britain, for example, which cannot veto consideration of a dispute in which it is itself involved, be able to stop proceedings in one involving Canada or Persia?

Other important issues will arise at the conference. Among them will be one which even the briefest sketch cannot pass over in silence. This is a demand that has more support at the moment from private agencies than from governments. What place should be found in the program of the United Nations for basic human rights? In the present text there is only the brief statement that "the organization should . . . promote respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms." A great many people are dissatisfied with this vague gesture. Some want an international bill of rights with all the mechanism of enforcement. Others would be content at this stage if all the United Nations subscribed to such a bill and undertook to apply it so far as possible in their respective circumstances.

This poses a real problem. It is too early yet to saddle an untried League with the difficult business of compelling nations to treat their own citizens according to a common set of rules. This would involve constant intervention in the international affairs of states. But to put a list of universal rights in the charter and not support it by enforcement is to risk cynical disillusionment. Between these pitfalls the delegates must carefully pick their way. Probably they will emerge with another declaration of the rights of man, on the ground that in certain great historic documents, with one of which all Americans are familiar, such declarations have profoundly influenced subsequent developments.

The charter that emerges from San Francisco should not and will not be identical with the text of Dumbarton Oaks. There is reason to expect that the changes will be in the direction of more efficient operation, with some mitigation of the anxieties now troubling the common run of states. It is not realism to think or speak as if the delegates and advisers were about equally divided between knaves and fools. Most of us know men of high integrity and wisdom among them. They will bring back no perfect assurance of perpetual peace. But given the amount of honesty and capacity represented there, it is wholly reasonable to hope from San Francisco something infinitely better than, on the one hand, a glorified debating society or, on the other, a naked alliance of the great.

Will Franco Fall?

BY SIDNEY WISE

A FOREST of upraised arms in fascist salute and the triple chant of "Fran-co, Fran-co, Fran-co" cheered the Generalissimo. It was the fifth anniversary of "the uprising" of 1936—of the day Franco led the rebellion of reaction against a legally elected democracy and the hemorrhage began in Spain which lasted almost three years, the day that opened the Spanish civil war and lifted the curtain on World War II. On July 17, 1941, members of the National Council, commemorating this anniversary, listened intently as the Caudillo proclaimed that the Allies had lost the war. In World War II, he said, "the first battles were joined and won on our soil." Now, he went on, "the war has taken a bad turn for the Allies, and they have lost it."

In February of 1942 Franco was still certain of German victory, and promised that "if there were one moment of danger, if the road to Berlia were to be opened, it would not be one division of volunteers that would go, but a million men would offer themselves." Ever since, by deed and word, he has been on the side of what he has termed "our fascist comrades." He sent his Blue Division to fight with the German army against the Russians. He let Spain serve as a convenient supply and espionage base for the Nazis. He sent volunteer workers to aid in German war plants. As a "neutral" he was Goebbels's most valued mouthpiece. The dossier on his pro-Axis activities bulges with evidence.

So Franco will fall, say the idealists. Franco was backed by Mussolini and Hitler in his seizure of power; the state that Franco built was patterned after the Axis states and cannot survive the defeat of its German-Italian parents. The idealists cite chapter and verse on the vows made to extirpate fascism. They quote from Cordell Hull, from the principles of the United Nations, from Franklin D. Roosevelt. Many are convinced that the inevitable moral collapse of fascism after German defeat will penetrate totalitarian Spain and in some strange way depose Franco.

If you understand the totalitarianism of Spain, you will not be so sure. Study Franco as the dictator and the opportunist, trace the record of Anglo-American diplomacy, and it is difficult to escape pessimism. Look at Spain on the map and picture Franco's position after German defeat. Surrounding him will be the France of De Gaulle, who has shown no sign of taking a strong anti-Franco position; the Portugal of Salazar, who feels that the strengthening of Franco's hand is the best guaranty of his own regime; the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, a war-sick world.

When the fighting ends in Europe, there will be a great ache for peace, continued peace. A back-to-peace-time "normalcy" movement will set in. The sentiment will be exploited by pro-Franco propaganda. "Keep Franco in power or see civil war in Spain," will be the new bogey. But the old bogey will be used too. After German defeat Franco will take Hitler's place in shouting that he is defending the world against the "red menace," that he is Europe's last bulwark against communism. In this role Franco will seek support from those who regard Communist Russia as a greater menace than fascist Spain.

Already he is applying a coat of post-war whitewash over the Axis colors of his fascist state. Last November he declared that his regime was "a democracy." Now, apparently, he is getting ready to scrape off many of the traditional fascist trappings. Reports from Spain last week predicted that the fascist salute no longer would be obligatory, that the Falangist Party might be limited or even liquidated, that political executions might stop.

Radio Berlin's warning to Spain last October has been ignored. Certain circles, said the broadcast, referring to those who wished to preserve their own form of Spanish fascism by cooperating with the Allies, "feed on the hope that it is possible in the midst of a war to change from one moving train to another without losing their ideological baggage, social order, and national existence." Franco has made the jump. He has changed to the Allied victory train and pasted the sticker of democracy on his ideological baggage without losing his equilibrium. The uninvited guest is still on the Allied train and is trying to make himself presentable enough to ride on into the peace and the post-war world.

Inside Spain there is little evidence that Franco will fall. Fascism inside Spain is not just a word, nor is it a Roman salute or a blue shirt. It is a machine which controls life—everything from jobs to newspapers. It is a complicated modern mechanism made up of tanks, radio, propaganda, Gestapo methods. The day has passed when an enraged people could march with sticks and stones upon the castle of the wicked king and make everyone happy.

Franco has a band of Falangist Party fanatics ready to defend the regime against all odds. He fed the armed forces over 26 per cent of the 1944 national budget of a Spain "at peace." Most of the top leaders of this pampered army still support the dictator. Franco holds a bayonet at Spain's back, and cold steel commands more obedience than hot words. He has the planes, the tanks, the ships, the heavy artillery. He has a secret police system which has checker-boarded Spain into squares of vigilance. No one moves from one city to the next without presenting credentials to the police. Every apartment house has an agent—usually the superintendent—who reports to the chief of his street, who in turn reports to the chief of his district, who in turn reports to the chief of the city. Practically all Republicans and even mildly anti-Franco elements are cross-indexed in police files. Some are forced to report to headquarters every week. No one moves, works, reads, or speaks unless it is in the approved Falangist pattern.

Because of military considerations Anglo-American diplomacy has followed a policy of passive and negative support of the status quo in Spain. Franco has profited enormously from these six years of expediency. Military considerations are no longer operative, but Allied policy toward Franco has not yet changed. Franco is trying desperately not to have it change, for he knows that if it doesn't his regime will have established its bridgehead in the post-war world. Without a radical change in United Nations diplomacy, the Franco regime will stand even as fascism falls all over the map of Europe. It will continue to drop its fascist poison into the caldron of global peace.

Eventually, however, Franco's fascism will decay from within, and then its overthrow will be written in rivers of blood. In the meantime, every day of its existence will put the mark of failure on United Nations diplomacy—a failure in sharp contrast to the achievements of United Nations armies.

In the Wind

GOVERNOR CHAUNCEY SPARKS of Alabama is expected to ask the state legislature, which convenes May 1, to repeal the poll tax. The South Carolina Senate has passed a resolution authorizing a referendum on repeal next year, and political observers on the scene think the House will pass it soon. Meanwhile, T. Grady Head, Attorney General of Georgia, has minimized the effect of repeal in his state by ruling that all past-due poll taxes must be paid before the right to vote is granted. In fairness to Governor Arnall, who fought for repeal, it should be pointed out that Mr. Head was elected, not appointed.

H. R. 1528, the "G. I. assault bill," which would provide for federal prosecution of any person assaulting or killing a member of the armed forces, is languishing in the House Judiciary Committee. It was introduced January 16.

THE GOOD GRAY COLUMNIST: Radio Station WNYC, New York, presented a half-hour reading from Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" by Eugene O'Neill, Jr., on April 14. The New York Post listed the program as "Reading of Walter Lippmann's 'Leaves and Grass.'"

THE WEEKLY market letter of Paine, Webber, Jackson, and Curtis, stockbrokers, for April 7 contained this optimistic note: "If Japan should repudiate her conquests and meet Allied surrender terms sooner than our military believes, and mayhap this year, the American economy and its markets are then supposed to sustain a severe shock. Granting the Japanese are treacherous, and might suddenly throw in the sponge, we find it difficult to become depressed contemplating such a prospect."

THE KELLEY KAR COMPANY of Los Angeles is currently advertising that it will include four cartons of cigarettes in the price of any used car it buys.

CHARLES M. BURGESS, an industrialist of Aurora, Illinois, put forth this plan for keeping the peace at a recent meeting of the Elgin Kiwanis Club: "Literally and completely annihilate the Japanese nation. Then turn Japan over to the Chinese. If the Japanese nation is not annihilated, the next really big war will be Russia and Japan together against the white race." He said he was a realist.

IN THE WEEKLY CHESS PROBLEM published by the French newspaper Les Lettres Françaises, the bishops are represented by little figures wearing the cap and bells of a court jester.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Dr. Goebbels Talks to Himself

BY JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

FIRST of all we must get out of Germany. It is dangerous here now. We could take that big plane—Adolf, myself, Heinrich, Hermann, and Ribbentrop—and make for America. This idea of a trial is wonderful. I'll fix up a declaration of surrender, quoting American and British statements that we shall have a 'fair trial.' Very simple. We'll give ourselves up to the Americans because they have promised to treat us justly, according to proper legal form. Americans hate to have a bad conscience. They still have an inferiority complex over Wilson's Fourteen Points.

"The safest thing would be to land right in Washington. People there are so far away from everything. In the first surprise they might shout, but not shoot. The Spanish Ambassador and his staff will make the necessary arrangements and meet us at the airport. By the time the newspapers are on the streets—I can see the headline: Hitler and Goebbels in Washington—we shall be in safe custody. From then on it will be easy, even entertaining.

"The man—or was it a woman?—who invented this 'fair-trial' idea ought to receive the Iron Cross. We're luckier than Napoleon was. The Congress of Vienna just said: 'Napoleon has placed himself outside the pale of civil and social relations, and as enemy and disturber of the peace of the world he is delivered to public vengeance.' Now, for us, no vengeance, but strict legal justice in a real court with judge and jury. These idiots!

"First of all we'll have a rest. Somewhere in the country, I suppose. Adolf needs it—he has been so nervous since Remagen. I wouldn't mind a little quiet myself after the strain of the last few months. And we'll be safe all right. They will have to protect us as the common property of all the United Nations, held for trial by the Americans as trustees. If anybody tries to get at us our guards will never know whether it is with the intention of liberating us or of killing us. We may even have the unexpected pleasure of seeing some anti-Nazis shot in our interest—for the sake of justice.

"It will take time to prepare for the trial. A brand-new international 'commission' will be needed, with plenty of experts. There are so many questions to be settled: the place of the trial, the composition of the court, who is to be the presiding judge and who the prosecutor, what language shall be used, who shall be called as witnesses, and so on. No single nation will want to be excluded from this work of justice. It should take six months to a year before all the governments finally agree, perhaps even longer. And each will blame the others because we have not yet been punished.

"I'll see that the newspapers don't stop talking about us. Good publicity is important. I wonder whether we will be permitted to see the reporters. Adolf must ask one day for a priest—prayer, confession, and all that. People must be made to wonder whether we have become repentant sinners. Perhaps a pious scene in the courtroom would be a good idea. Nazi Leaders Willing to Confess; Ask for Forgiveness and Just Punishment. There will be surprises. Surprises make headlines.

"Eventually the International Commission will succeed in settling all the differences about procedure, and the members of the court will be appointed. We shall still have plenty of time. In a 'fair trial' we can demand our own lawyers. We will ask to have lawyers from Germany, from Switzerland, and so on; perhaps one from South Africa. The trial will have to wait until they arrive. Then the court won't be able to refuse the lawyers time to prepare the defense. That will take more months. After that, Adolf or Hermann or some of the lawyers might get sick, and the opening would have to be postponed. Anything can happen as time passes. One year, eighteen months, two years—we know how fast things can change.

"The trial must start, I suppose, sooner or later. By then we shall be rested, and well prepared for the game. First the talking will be done by our lawyers; it is a legal case, and every legal case has technical problems. No jurist can deny that the technical legal problems of our case are especially tricky. There are no precedents, no Supreme Court decisions. Our lawyers will bring up hundreds of legal questions about which legal authorities could write scholarly volumes.

"And of course every word will have to be translated because it would not be 'fair' to conduct proceedings in a language the 'defendants' don't understand.

"The court will probably overrule the legal objections of our lawyers. Then we will accuse them of having broken their promise about a fair trial and of violating the fundamental principles of justice of Western civilization. We will ask for the withdrawal of all members of the court who are prejudiced against us, anyone who has ever stated that the Nazi leaders are criminals or who harbors any sentiment of hatred against the defendants. Some members of the court may really withdraw. If not, they will at least feel uncomfortable and try to be as 'fair' and just as possible. We will be free to give long explanations to the prosecutor. We will make speeches.

Dr. Goebbels

"What speeches! Naturally there will be microphones in the courtroom. Millions of people in all countries will sit at their radios and listen to us. I swear we'll make the cleverest speeches of our careers. And we won't speak as repentant sinners. We will shout to those millions that our enemies are hypocrites until they believe it themselves. Our crimes? We will prove, out of their own history books, that similar crimes have been committed everywhere, sometimes by men who are honored as national heroes. Violations of human rights? We will quote from American, British, French books about the Bolsheviks and Stalin. As for the Jews, people who dislike Jews will love what we say about them.

"We can bring up some-embarrassing facts, too. We will remind Anthony Eden of his agreeable behavior when he was negotiating that British-German navy pact which legalized the construction of our submarines. We will demand, as witnesses, all those fine gentlemen from England and America who seven, eight, ten years ago encouraged us to prepare a little crusade against Soviet Russia. Ribbentrop might also cite some pages of his diary having to do with his friendly talks with the Russians and his visit to Moscow six years ago just before we started the whole thing. We can tell some tales they've never heard and some they'd like to forget.

"After all, everyone has to die sometime. But by that time, who knows, we may appear as martyrs and heroes. And that would be our last dirty trick on the United Nations. We will leave them a nice mess of confusion, disunity, and bad conscience. We may even become the founders, in death, of a new world-wide Nazi movement. Heil Hitler!"

The New French Press

BY ETIENNETTE GALLOIS

THE question which was put to us, as French journalists, most frequently during our visit in the United States was what is the new French press like. It was, of course, usually journalists and publishers who asked this question. The American public as a whole was interested in other things. But the new French press is a subject of real importance, and America should know more about it.

France has had to make over its press almost entirely since liberation. The pre-war press had to be discarded because it had failed in its mission, which was to inform the people, not as an irresponsible body outside or above the interests of the nation, but with a will to defend the true interests of France.

Formerly anyone with money could start a newspaper—to which there can be no objection in a free country. But it so happened that all the leading publishers in France were tied to big financial or industrial enterprises which were much more concerned to advance their personal and private interests than those of the country. As a result our pre-war press became closely involved in that unofficial collaboration with the Germans which was so prevalent in big-business circles and, wittingly or unwittingly—the responsibility is the same in either case—spread Nazi propaganda in France. Lawsuits about to come to trial against these papers will

MADRID'S LITTLE RIBBENTROP

Now that Foreign Minister Lequerica, with the help of Ambassador Armour, is busy making Spain the most democratic country in the world and a devoted friend of American democracy, it may be interesting to recall that on the day Manila fell, Lequerica, then Spanish ambassador to France, clicked glasses with the German and Japanese ambassadors in a toast to the victorious Japanese army.

perhaps expose to what extent they accepted Hitler's money, so generously distributed by Otto Abetz through De Brinon.

It would be interesting to reread now the newspapers printed in France before the war. Only in a few papers would one find warnings against the fifth column, against that treason in General Staff, Cabinet, and administrative officials which was to bring about our country's downfall. Most of the leftist papers took no part in the poisonous campaign of the Nazis, but neither did they put up any such strong and continuous fight against it—perhaps because they could not believe in the danger—as that carried on in l'Humanité by Gabriel Péri and Lucien Sampaix against Abetz and the Brown House in Paris and Georges Bonnet, whom Péri used to call the "Foreign Minister of French Affairs." Péri and Sampaix paid for their patriotism with their lives, after terrible torture.

All this makes it very clear that the duty of the press is not only to inform. Of course, in Herr Hitler's view the French people were kept well informed, but they were told nothing of the imminent danger, of the treason being organized everywhere, which could be perceived by even the less acute journalists. French finance capital had decided to collaborate with Hitler; the French press followed suit and lulled the country to sleep with meaningless news.

France fell—not because its armies were defeated but because Hitler's supporters had sabotaged war production and military defense. The collaborators believed that Hitler would share the country with them. But Hitler took it all, and the French people were turned into starving slaves. France's stern measures against the men who were most responsible, men who put their personal interests before those of the nation and who accepted foreign pay to support fatal policies, are healthy and unavoidable. Neither those men nor the press which helped to demoralize the people has any claim to respect or consideration.

But what is the new press like? Almost every one of the new papers was born of the underground press, which was launched and carried on by men who refused to let their country bow to Vichy. After overcoming the difficulties of printing and distribution, the underground press succeeded in revitalizing the French people and, working with the armed resistance movement, gave them back, first, their spirit and then the means to resist the invader by fighting and sabotage.

Of course a purely informative press could not have done this. The underground press was a responsible press, responsible for its influence on the reader, ready to be judged at any time by its readers and even by the whole world. Mere information might have had a disastrous effect on the wearied, battered spirits of the people. It was a press full of fight, which not only informed but comforted, which took a constructive view, which inspired its readers to action.

Out of the small clandestine leaflets came our present newspapers. They are still limited in size, limited in news-gathering facilities, being not yet able to maintain a network of correspondents all over the world. But they are determined to serve, or at least never to disserve, the interests of their country. If the aim of their country is to work with the Allies, no correspondent will want to give the impression that unity does not exist.

Journalists can of course express their personal opinions, but they cannot further a political line that is contrary to the people's interests. Each paper reflects a sector of public opinion and remains under its constant control.

The French press no longer belongs to one man or to a small group of rich men—at least it does not in my part of the country. Nor is it subject to government influence or control. The slightest pressure exerted by the government to influence the treatment of news has been immediately resented; newspapers today will not stand any censorship except that of military necessity.

The new press has steered clear of both dangers, governmental and capitalistic control, by the simple process of becoming a truly democratic press. The papers of my area all belong to political movements or parties which played a large role in the resistance. They have a publisher who is legally responsible, but the effective control is in the hands of a board of directors who are responsible for the political line and morally bound to the party or movement the paper represents.

We shall not again permit papers to receive money from foreign agents or from industrial or banking groups. Even under present conditions, with circulations often of only 40,000 copies, our newspapers are able to make money. Toulouse papers, wishing to give as much news as possible to their readers and being limited to the half-sheet size, have carried only advertisements which were of real use to the people or the government. A paper's books and circulation lists are open to a government commission on which the Liberation Committee and the newspaper unions are represented.

Our press is free to criticize anyone and anything, as our ministers know, but criticism grounded on personal resentment or to serve private interests is ruled out. Neither individuals nor companies will get aid from the press in breaking a law which they consider prejudicial. Opposition and criticism must be constructive, used like the surgeon's scalpel, not otherwise. And if the press can build instead of undermine, praise instead of condemn, it will do that too. At all times it will reflect public opinion and lend its aid to all constructive efforts made by the people for the people.

"WELL, WELL, LOOK WHO'S HERE"

BOOKS and the ARTS

HAYEK: DIGESTED AND REDIGESTED

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

OPPONENTS of planning have lately drawn much encouragement and comfort from the writings of Friedrich A. Hayek, Anglo-Austrian economist whose "Road to Serfdom" was boiled down for popular consumption in the Reader's Digest of April, 1945, and reprinted for still wider distribution by the Book of the Month Club. Dr. Hayek repeats the familiar arguments for a free-market economy of the classical economists, but whereas they looked back to the eighteenth century for dreadful examples of the effects of "the dead hand of the state," he seeks his in contemporary Germany, Italy, and Russia. If, he asserts, all the means of production are vested in a single hand, whether it be that of "society" or a dictator, it means the exercise of total power and the loss of all democratic freedoms. He is therefore opposed to any conscious direction of the resources of society: in his opinion only the automatic action of the free market responding to supply and demand is a delicate-enough instrument to decide how they should be utilized.

But stout and able champion of the free market as he is, Dr. Hayek is not wholly opposed to government intervention in the economic field. In a passage which the Reader's Digest found indigestible and ignored he discusses "the supremely important problem of combating general fluctuations of economic activity and the recurrent waves of large-scale unemployment which accompany them." Its solution, he continues, "will require much planning in the good sense" (italics added), but unfortunately he does not give us his own views about the forms such planning should take. Instead he tells us: "Many economists hope, indeed, that the ultimate remedy may be found in the field of monetary policy, which would involve nothing incompatible with nineteenth-century liberalism." He also mentions large-scale public works, though with doubts about their efficacy and a warning of possible dangers. He adds, however, "In any case, the very necessary efforts to secure protection against these fluctuations do not lead to the kind of planning which constitutes such a threat to our freedom. The planning which has such an insidious effect on liberty is that for security of a different kind. It is planning designed to protect individuals or groups against diminutions of their income" ("The Road to Serfdom," p. 122).

In a later passage, after indorsing the idea of a basic minimum of sustenance for everybody, Dr. Hayek calls on us to admit "that with this assurance of a basic minimum all claims for a privileged security of particular classes must lapse, that all excuses disappear for allowing groups to exclude newcomers from sharing their relative prosperity in order to maintain a special standard of their own" (p. 210).

We have, then, a distinction between "good planning," which aims at expanding the total market, and "bad planning," which manipulates the market in favor of sectional interests and in the process tends to restrict it. The first, ideally, should give consumers more opportunity to exercise the "votes" that they cast when deciding how to employ their purchasing power; the second tends to gerrymander those votes.

As a witness for the case of the National Association of Manufacturers, Dr. Hayek appears something less than perfect. Moreover, his strongest words are directed against just that kind of government intervention which American business has not merely tolerated but instigated for 150 years. "Free" enterprise in this country has never, in fact, been willing to abide by the rules of the free market laid down by Adam Smith and restated by Dr. Hayek. Evasion of the rigors of competition is a deep-rooted habit in American business, and anti-trust laws have curbed but not cured it. Besides, private enterprise has constantly demanded government intervention and assistance. In the early days of the Republic, America's infant industries sought and received protection against foreign competition. That was planning for the benefit of industry at the expense of agriculture, that was interference in the free market, that was a conscious effort to direct the resources of society. Tariffs and subsidies have played a considerable part in establishing the pattern of American economy. They still do. Yet in any smoking-car one may hear men denouncing "planning" and demanding tariffs practically in the same breath.

One does not have to be a nineteenth-century liberal, accepting the dictatorship of the market over all social life, to agree that the creation of special economic privileges is usually a dangerous practice. Public props for particular trades hinder measurement of their relative efficiency, tend to produce a static economy, and thus lead to a waste of national resources. Moreover, it is the consumer who provides the real support. If supply and demand, instead of subsidies, determined cotton and silver prices, the capital and labor employed in the production of those commodities would shrink. But consumers who now must pay artificially high prices for shirts and spoons would be able to spend more of their incomes on, say, books and glassware, thus encouraging an expanded production of these articles.

This is hard doctrine, however, for those whose livelihood has been guaranteed by subsidies or tariffs and one they will find difficult to appreciate when widespread unemployment indicates a failure to make full use of national resources. When men and machines are rusting in idleness, who but a few orthodox professors of economics will dare to say that subsidies to cotton farmers or silver miners are inadmissible? Certainly politicians will not, no matter how hostile they are to the theory of a planned economy. As long as the

BLACK BOY

"If enough such books are written, if enough millions of people read them, maybe, someday, there will be a greater understanding and a more true democracy."
—ORVILLE PRESCOTT, New York Times

"... one of the most revealing documents I have read in a long time. Mr. Wright, so far as I know, has done what nobody has done before. He has told the truth about the Negro, and, along with this, what the Negro thinks about the white man's world. This quality of truth, absolute and uncompromising, runs through his book like a charge of electricity; reading it is not unlike taking hold of a high-tension wire... It comes out of life, it is a part of life, and it lets a light into places that have not seen this kind of light before."

—HAMILTON BASSO, The New Yorker

"It should be read word for passionate word."—STERLING NORTH, New York Post

"In turning the leaves of his life, Richard Wright has turned many a bitter page of America's chronicle... He shows us again here the power of prose, the warm, urgent use of word and phrase that made us recognize his great talent as a writer in Native Son."—LILLIAN SMITH, PM

"A triumphant gain... Black Boy is the fulfilment of the knowledge and power that was intermittent in Native Son and the stories in Uncle Tom's Children."

—The New Republic

By the author of NATIVE SON

RICHARD WRIGHT

A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection for March

At all bookstores ■ $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS ■ 49 East 33rd Street, New York 16

fear of depression hangs over America, there can be no hope of cutting through the tangle of special privileges. A post-war slump will, in fact, magnify the problem, for during the war many new vested interests have been created. If the freezing hand of depression grips the land, both capital and labor will cling desperately to whatever shelters they have been able to secure; both will seek to preserve them by every means in their power, and in a democracy that includes political pressure. Only a dictator sharing Dr. Hayek's views could abolish special privilege in such circumstances.

To end planning for sectional interests, there must be planning in the interests of the whole community, planning that does not underwrite the standards of particular groups and individuals but seeks to maintain total consumption at a level making possible the total use of available man-power. Only when this end is achieved will it be possible to say to the silver miner: "You can no longer claim support from the public purse; other opportunities are now open." Or to the trade union: "With general security, the steps you took to limit entrance and thus protect your members' jobs are no longer necessary." Or to the shoe manufacturer: "We have enlarged your market by making sure everyone will be able to buy shoes; you, in turn, must get along without a tariff."

Dr. Hayek is now making a lecture tour of the United States in the course of which he will no doubt be lunched and dined by many chambers of commerce and other business groups. By talking about the tyranny of the state, the horrors of socialism, or the sins of trade unions he can win easy applause from the converted. But if he is really zealous in his mission to rehabilitate the free market, he should begin every speech by inviting his audience to come to the mourners' bench and make public confession of their crimes against the spirit of free enterprise. Let him denounce tariffs and other forms of protection; let him lash business combinations to maintain or increase prices; let him quote chapter and verse (the Department of Justice can furnish him with plenty of material) and not be content merely to preach "against sin." Such sermons may not be popular, but they will be good for the listeners' souls. And by studying the reactions of his audiences Dr. Hayek may learn a thing or two about the practice, as opposed to the theory, of American private enterprise.

Carl Becker

MANY scholars fall in love with the eighteenth century, and not a few try to imitate its attitudes. What distinguished the late Carl Becker, who died on April 10, was his genuine kinship with the great men of the age he so much admired and the complete absence of anything like affectation in either his manner of writing or his manner of thinking. No one was ever less the sedulous ape, and if reviewers inevitably remarked an "eighteenth-century quality" in his books, it was because clarity, skepticism, moderation, and good sense came naturally to him, not because he had consciously adopted any pose.

Born in Iowa in 1873, educated at the University of Wisconsin and at Columbia, he had been for nearly thirty years professor of history at Cornell, and he was the author of various books on American history. His "The Heavenly City

THE ONE PEACE PLAN That Has Always Worked

You have read and listened to so much about peace that you probably feel nothing remains to be said. Yet, realizing this surfeit of peace articles, we have chosen one for the lead feature in the May AMERICAN MERCURY. It is that kind of article—one that simply cannot be by-passed by editor or reader. The way to permanent peace is not via the Yalta and San Francisco routes, not by repeating the mistakes of World Peace I, not by a League of Nations with a new name, nor by an international police force nor a universal debating society. Emery Reves has an idea—new in the discussion of future peace, yet tried and tested through many centuries. This distinguished writer and thinker, author of the widely acclaimed "Democratic Manifesto," expresses a concept so fundamental that all other proposed peace plans must be measured by it. Read "The New League and the Next War."

SHALL WE RETALIATE ON WAR PRISONERS?

The entire country is shocked, horrified, at the Nazi mistreatment of prisoners of war. Yet we hear rumors of extraordinary consideration for German prisoners in our hands. What is the truth of the matter? Precisely how do we handle our prisoners and why? Are they abused, mollycoddled, treated sensibly? Do they get food and privileges denied to our civilians? What is the effect of our policy upon German soldiers in the field and upon American prisoners in German hands? No less an authority than the Provost Marshal General himself, the officer in charge of all prisoners, describes our policies, methods, and results. This is the War Department report—official, authoritative, factual, detailed. Read "The Army Reports on Prisoners of War" by Major General Archer L. Lerch.

THE AMERICAN MERCURY—for May—NOW ON SALE

Are the oil wells and strategic needs in the Near East brewing a fresh cause of war? Read The Big Three in the Near East by Andre Visson. Read Senator Ball of Minnesota, a frank analysis by Roscoe Drummond. East and West by Pearl Buck will help you to understand the Orient. The Behavior of Pain by Betsey Barton is an important aid in removing the psychological barrier erected about our wounded veterans. Claire Phillips tells her own story of her career as an American spy in the Philippines, and Stewart H. Holbrook produces a history of Dorothea Dix who, a century ago, waged single-handed war for humane treatment of the insane. Rollin Kirby, dean of the American cartoonists, writes an appreciation of Low, the great British caricaturist. Channing Pollack tells good-humoredly about The Plagiarism Racket. There's Willard Shelton on The Wartime Press and Labor. Leona Alberts Wassersug writes about Prostigmine—A New Wonder Drug. There's a typical Mercury story by Marjorie Stengel. And we have George Jean Nathan and Alan Devoc, both in fine form, and the usual departments, The Library, Check List, and Open Forum. Altogether a vibrant, stimulating issue—varied, thought-provoking, readable.

Unpopular Truths

THE AMERICAN MERCURY is deservedly unpopular with ostriches and yes-men. That is because it does not hesitate to tell an unpopular truth, regardless of the price in circulation loss. It dares to make enemies. It has no vested interest in a point of view. It believes in facing dangers instead of ignoring them. It believes as a fundamental creed in the curative powers of the printed page. It dares to oppose facts to prejudices no matter how deep-seated. But for the sake of its own publishing conscience, it does not dare to distort, neglect, or conceal the truth. THE MERCURY "calls 'em as it sees 'em."

Frederic E. Spivack PUBLISHER

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

Essential reading for a full understanding of what is happening at the United Nations Conference

These volumes, published for the YALE INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL STUDIES, are recognized as the basic books in their respective fields.

The LATIN AMERICAN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

SAMUEL FLAGG BEMIS. The story of the development of the hemisphere policy of the United States from the founding of the republic to World War II. 470 pages. Maps. $4.50

A NAVY SECOND TO NONE

GEORGE T. DAVIS. The Development of Modern American Naval Policy. 508 pages. Maps. $3.75

THE SUPER-POWERS

WILLIAM T. R. FOX. The United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union—Their Responsibility for Peace. $2.00

The FAR EASTERN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

A. WHITNEY CRISWOLD. Authoritative study of 40 years of American diplomacy. 530 pages. Maps. $3.75

AMERICA'S STRATEGY IN WORLD POLITICS

NICHOLAS JOHN SPYKMAN. The United States and the Balance of Power. A geo-political analysis. 500 pages. Maps. $3.75

THE GEOGRAPHY OF THE PEACE

NICHOLAS JOHN SPYKMAN. The power position of the United States and our strategy for achieving security in a peaceful post-war world. Maps. $2.75

BRITAIN AND FRANCE BETWEEN TWO WARS

ARNOLD WOLFERS. Conflicting Strategies of Peace since Versailles. 467 pages. Maps. $3.75

CHINA among the POWERS

DAVID N. ROWE. China's physical and economic potentialities as a great power in the post-war world. $2.00 of the Eighteenth-Century Philosophers," published in 1932, introduced him to a new set of readers, and just last year "How New Will the Better World Be?" proved again how far he was from being a mere antiquarian, how conspicuously he was a philosopher who could bring the lessons of history to bear upon the problems of tomorrow.

No doubt the secret of Professor Becker's almost unique ability to be at home in two ages lay in the fact that what he took from the eighteenth century was not its specific beliefs or attitudes but its spirit and temper; so that, far from retiring into any past, he could think in modern terms about modern problems with the clarity and the lack of "enthusiasm" which he had recognized as congenial in Jefferson as well as in Diderot, D'Alembert, and Voltaire. It has been said that a conservative is a worshiper of dead radicals, but Professor Becker never forgot that they were radicals. He thought, not what they thought, but what they would have thought had they been alive today, and so neither caution nor a refusal to be stampeded ever made him either reactionary or even fundamentally conservative. His reasonableness, his urbanity, his lack of heat were the result of an assumption which his masters had made before him, namely, that his readers would be reasonable men, but he never supposed that his thinking should stop where his masters' had stopped or doubted that the man who is most like Voltaire is a man as near the forefront of his own time as Voltaire was near the forefront of his. No man was less likely to say what Shaw so shrewdly puts into the mouth of Roebuck Ramsden: "I was an advanced thinker before you were born."

Those who knew Professor Becker personally will perhaps remember best of all his modesty, his friendliness, his charm, and the absolute absence of any assumption of superiority. Anyone to whom he talked seemed to be his equal, and one may readily imagine that he was most at home, not in the classroom, but, like a true man of the Enlightenment, in a drawing-room.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

BRIEFER COMMENT

In Search of the Good Society

IT IS A GOOD THING to read Dr. Harry W. Laidler's "Social-Economic Movements" (Crowell, $5) if for no other reason than to be reminded that the search for the good society has been going on for a long time, that it has been attended by a great deal of conflict, suffering, and disillusionment, and that it has not achieved its objective. Perhaps socialism is old hat: an outstanding American Socialist told me the other day that nobody is interested in socialism. Perhaps Earl Browder is speaking for an important branch of Marx's heirs when he brands "defeatist" the suggestion that American capitalism might conceivably want to stem the tides of social revolution in Western Europe. Perhaps Keynes, Beveridge, and Hansen are today more immediately relevant than Marx himself. But anyone who has observed the eager gleam in the eye of the business man, banker, or industrialist who picks up the gospel according to St. Hayek knows that, alas, the age of social conflict has not passed.

Dr. Laidler presents a living history of those who dreamed

"The nearest thing to an impartial book about India that I have ever seen ... highly readable ... genuinely instructive."

—ORVILLE PRESCOTT, N. Y. Times.

"Moon is refreshingly and caustically frank, censuring British and Indians alike. In fact, he sits on his subject like a magistrate in court, sifting out the evidence on both sides ... One of the most readable books that has appeared on India."—NYM WALES, N. Y. Herald Tribune. $2.00

PENDEREL
MOON'S

Strangers IN INDIA

"The most original and ingenious suggestion for the stabilization of American Government this correspondent has seen."

—ARTHUR KROCK, N. Y. Times.

Have we outgrown our machinery of government? Does democracy need modernizing? This former member of the State Department says yes, and his displan tells how! "One of the most discerning, original and provocative books on American politics I ever read ... The world of political journalism has a bright new star."—JOHN GUNTHER. $2.00

THOMAS K.
FINLETTER'S

CAN Representative Government DO THE JOB?

As vital a warning as Mein Kampf!

THROUGH JAPANESE EYES

by OTTO D.
TOLISCHUS

In his historic new book, the author of TOKYO RECORD lets the Japanese speak for themselves. In their own words, uncensored for western ears, these are their aims and their political and religious beliefs. This is the "inscrutable" Japanese mind that few Americans have understood; this is a revelation of ideology, plain and unequivocal. $2.00

Reynal & Hitchcock

of a juster world and were prepared to fight for it. He sketches the work of the utopian moralists and visionaries, the solid building of pioneers such as Robert Owen, and the development of the monumental body of scientific socialist thought through the labors and inspiration of Karl Marx. The new sections of the book discuss in detail the development of the Soviet state, throwing considerable light on the evolution of its economic plans and foreign policies and relating both to the shifts of the "party line" in countries outside of Russia. It describes the growth of the labor parties in the British Commonwealth and the decline of socialism here. It has a good section on the cooperative movement.

Perhaps its greatest weakness is that it is long on description, short on explanation. We are told a great deal about the Social Democrats in Germany, Austria, France, and other European countries, not enough about the sources of their failure and the main drives of National Socialism. In America the social passion behind the party led by Norman Thomas was in the '30's redirected to the support of Franklin Roosevelt and the New Deal. Why? Now it appears to be reawakening in a vague and undogmatic way in the Political Action Committee of the C. I. O. But in the new progressive movements in this country are there many signs of the basic social and economic analysis that characterized American socialism at its best? Perhaps one must look north of the border to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation of Canada to discover a popular movement in the true succession.

Dr. Laidler has brought the story almost up to date; American progressives had better not delay too long in planning the next chapter.

J. KING GORDON

EMOTIONAL PROBLEMS OF LIVING

Avoiding the Neurotic Pattern

By O. SPURGEON ENGLISH, M.D., and G. H. J. PEARSON, M.D.

A lucid description of the different frictions generated within the individual or through his contacts with his environment. Oriented to psychoanalytic thinking, since the authors feel that Freudian psychoanalysis is the best approach to understanding personality, Emotional Problems of Living is designed to give a point of view and a therapeutic approach that will reduce to a minimum those conflicts that tend toward the neurotic pattern.

AT ALL BOOKSTORES • $5.00

"BOOKS THAT LIVE"

W. W. NORTON & CO., 70 Fifth Ave., N. Y. 11

Life in Caracas

THE SCARCITY OF BOOKS ON VENEZUELA, rather than any considerable merit, earns notice for Olga Briceño's "Cocks and Bulls in Caracas" (Houghton Mifflin, $2.75). One has the sensation, in reading it, of taking part in an interminable telephone conversation with a talkative woman whom one knows to be charming and pretty. There are vivid passages of description, though for the most part the text is merely vivacious, with a conventional, upper-middle-class point of view as to what is witty, humane, or interesting about a very limited range of experience. Servants, hair fashions, saints, cock fights, love, or at least courtship and marriage, convent education, cooking, men as Men, and other such things are the author's themes. In the book's favor it must be said that it really does give an impression of upper-middle-class life in Venezuela and of people with whom persons of that class might be expected to come in contact. The author's love for her own land is warm and engaging, but persistent and superficial contrasting of American with Venezuelan life becomes tiresome after a while. These are severe things to say of a book; so I will confess that a week after reading it I still had the sensation of having talked with a lively and charming person.

For "Our American Neighbors" (Public Affairs Press, $3) I am afraid I cannot say a good word, and I mention it only because its provenance, the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, might incline someone to buy this collection of pedagogic pamphlets. Not even in the public schools of Boston, I should imagine, does one need to be so evasive, not to say behind the times, as this book is.

RALPH BATES

Art, Science, and Psychiatry

I. S. WECHSLER, one of the country's outstanding physicians and the author of a well-known textbook on neurology, has assembled a group of essays on subjects ranging from Sigmund Freud to Palestinian colonization and rather arbitrarily called it "The Neurologist's Point of View" (L. B. Fischer, $3). His book gives evidence of considerable non-medical learning, is not without wit, and is marked on occasion by a felicity of expression and a Hebraic vehemence which are reminiscent of Morris R. Cohen. But it is a sad comment on the present state of psychiatry that it is the only branch of medicine whose practitioners, or commentators, intend most of their books for lay distribution. Most of what Dr. Wechsler says about psychiatry, as a matter of fact, is adverse. He makes, for example, the conventional statement that it is still more of an art than a science, though obviously if it were a fine art this would be praise—indeed, it would suggest the very type of resourcefulness the psychiatrist as an individual must possess. The significance of its successes would then be related to their infrequency, as it no doubt actually is; and psychiatry would perhaps even be doomed as a distinct profession.

Dr. Wechsler's most interesting suggestion is that nowadays, for social and cultural reasons, "the neuroses tend to manifest themselves at higher psychic levels rather than at the lower physical or somatic levels" upon which they appeared in former years; for the crudity of the chief psychoanalytic concepts ("conflict, repression, the unconscious, the role of the sex impulse, transference") probably corresponds in some measure to the grossness of the disorders they were originally designed to deal with. Psychoanalysis, he seems to feel, will survive as a means of diagnosis rather than of therapy, though he fails to observe that it tends to commit the intellectualist fallacy of virtually identifying the two. He is not addicted to consistency, denouncing Adlerian psychology, which he applies with some qualification to the Jews, as an "evolution-defying concept that out of a biologic defect comes a biologic purpose," remarking later on, nevertheless, that "neurosis may . . . add to one's mental stature." Indeed, his negative attitude toward psychiatry is best exemplified by his insistence on the relation of talent to disability. This, of course, as Lionel Trilling points out in the current Partisan Review, is not merely a conventional notion but a highly questionable one; perhaps the most that can be said for it is that it recognizes the fact that though disorder is never the outcome of intellectual achievement it is often its precondition. In that sense art, in fact even science, may be said to go with "maladjustment"; but obviously psychic health means not simply "adjustment" but, above all, the capacity for adjustment.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ

Miniature Perspective

BECAUSE THE PROBLEMS of India are difficult, they lend themselves to countless analyses and solutions by countless experts. In "Strangers in India" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2) Penderel Moon has given a perceptive account of them through the eyes of a British Civil Service officer in charge of one of the peasant districts. The jacket blurb tells us that Mr. Moon spent fifteen years in the Indian Service, and if he does not give us a perfect report of the state of India, he does give us a creditable insight into how the British functionary thinks.

Mr. Moon considers freedom for India a post-war necessity, for better or worse; and a kind of hereditary monarchy the immediate form of transition to a democratic government. "Soviet democracy" and "bourgeois democracy" are incompatible with the complex social spiderweb. It is not that India is incapable of governing itself, but that it is incapable of governing itself according to superimposed standards from an entirely different civilization.

It is too bad that Mr. Moon chose a semi-fictional series of dialogues as a literary form. In an attempt to give a miniature perspective against the backdrop of the more immense problems, he has stilted and obscured a good deal of his argument.

JOHN SENIOR

A Knotty Problem

ADMINISTERING THE INVOLVED systems of wage payment in use in many of our industries is one of the most difficult problems of union-management relations. "Union Policy and Incentive Wage Methods" by Van Dusen Kennedy (Columbia, $3) is a pioneer investigation of this thorny problem, and the author has succeeded in making clear the difficulties that face both unions and managements in their efforts to speed production, reduce costs, and raise the earn-

The War That Won't Stop on V-Day

You—or a loved one—may be the next victim of America's No. 2 killer—CANCER. 17,000,000 persons are doomed by that dread disease—yet at least 5,000,000 of these deaths CAN BE PREVENTED. The war on cancer can be won.

What can YOU do about it?

1. CONTRIBUTE—The American Cancer Society is trying to raise a fund of $5,000,000 for research. Give whatever you can to the field volunteer who calls on you—or send your contribution to "Cancer," care of your local post office.

2. INFORM YOURSELF—Learn to recognize the symptoms of cancer's first dread warning. Realize the importance of prompt examination by your physician if cancer should strike you—or someone close to you. Read about the probable causes of cancer. See how much progress science has made toward eliminating this menace. Find out what types of cancer may be cured—if detected early enough. Get and read THE WAR ON CANCER.

THE WAR ON CANCER

By DR. EDWARD PODOLSKY

Formerly on the Staffs of Fifth Avenue and Flower
Hospitals, New York City.
Now a Captain in the Army
Medical Corps.

A Book That Brings You the FACTS on CANCER

Here is a book written in simple, non-medical terms that gives you the most recent findings on Cancer. It discusses the effectiveness of X-ray, Cyclotron, Radium, Surgery and Refrigeration. In addition, it brings up to date the effect of diet and the very latest advances that Science has made in the battle against this terrible killer—Cancer.

180 Pages

Illustrated

$1.75

At your bookstore or direct from

REINHOLD PUBLISHING CORP.

330 West 42nd Street

New York 18, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

ALHAMBRA
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
COLISEUM
81st STREET
86th STREET
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
58th STREET
HAMILTON
MARBLE HILL
125th STREET
PELHAM
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
ROYAL
23rd STREET
WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHELLE
WHITE PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO

"Tremendous Emotional Punch"—N. Y. Times
"Resolute and Striking Film"—Herald-Tribune

Betty Smith's
A TREE GROWS IN BROOKLYN
Tender and Heartwarming Version of Betty Smith's Best Seller

NOW RKO

"An Eye-Filling Joy"—N. Y. Post
"Musical & Colorful Riot"—PM

WALT DISNEY'S THE THREE CABALLEROS
Disney's Technicolor Feature Masterpiece of Fantasy! Hilariously Funny!
Plus
'TWO O'CLOCK COURAGE' with Tom Conway

BROOKLYN & QUEENS
ALDEN
JANICA
BUSHWICK
DYKER
Kelt's
FLUSHING
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
Kelt's
RICHMOND HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
TILYU

Paramount Presents

ALAN LADD GAIL RUSSELL

SALTY O'ROURKE

with
William Demarest
Bruce Cabot
Spring Byington
Stanley Clements

On Stage .. In Person!

CHARLIE SPIVAK
and his Orchestra

★
JO STAFFORD

★
TIP, TAP & TOE

★
DEAN MURPHY

★
BUY BONDS

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

ings of labor. Many manufacturing industries use either straight or intricate piece-work methods—usually called incentive systems—based upon analysis of the job and time and motion studies. Some of these systems are highly complex, and the difficulty of explaining them is increased by the suspicion among workers that they are devices for speeding up production, for reducing piece rates, and for undermining the solidarity of the group by stressing individual effort.

Improvement in techniques, arrangement of work, or flow of materials is usually followed by reevaluation of the jobs, and the setting of new rates. The problems rising out of this process are the most difficult which face the union leadership. The suspicion of the worker is often unfounded, but on the other hand some employers do misuse the incentive system to cut rates arbitrarily, thereby making the task of the union more difficult. Some of the labor groups which follow the Communist Party line are enthusiastic about the incentive systems, which they compare to Stakhanovism, but Dr. Kennedy finds widespread suspicion among the rank and file.

Dr. Kennedy makes a few modest proposals that may help to relieve the tension. A knowledge of job evaluation and time and motion studies on the part of shop stewards and union officers would enable them to explain to their members the basis upon which the rate for the job is set, thus eliminating unjustifiable complaints and at the same time preventing employer abuses. He also advises greater union participation in the setting of rates, but industry is in the main strongly opposed to giving labor a voice in such matters.

PHILIP TAFT

MEETING

New York Nation Readers are cordially invited to the Annual Spring Luncheon of the
LEAGUE OF INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY on
60 MILLION JOBS, FREEDOM AND THE GOOD LIFE
SAT., MAY 12, 12:30, Hotel Roosevelt, N. Y.

Speakers: PHILIP M. KLUTZNICK, Commissioner, Federal Housing Authority; LELAND OLDS, V.P., Federal Power Commission; Congressman JERRY VOORHIS; BORIS SHISHKIN, Economist. A. F. of L.; Chairman: HERBERT W. PAYNE, V.P., Textile Workers Union.

Tickets, $3.75, including gratuities.

Round Tables, 10-12:15 and 1 to 5 respectively, on Cooperatives, Social Services, Trade Unions, Housing, and Full Employment in Postwar Period at 50¢ per session with prominent group of panel members including J. King Gordon, Edward C. Lindeman, John J. Corson, Charles Abrams, Marion B. Hedges, Mark Starr, Leroy Bowman, Johanna Lintlof, Winslow Carlton, Cleveland Rodgers, Maurice P. Davidson, William Withers, Stanley Isaacs, Rebecca Simonson, Alfred Baker Lewis, Cabel Smith, and Nathaniel Minkoff.

Make reservations immediately with

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
112 East Nineteenth Street New York 3, N. Y.
HARRY W. LAIDLER, Program Chairman.

STAGE PLAYS

KATHARINE CORNELL BRIAN AHERNE
THE BARRETTS OF WIMPOLE STREET
with McKAY MORRIS • Brenda Forbes
BARRYMORE THEATRE, 47th Street w. of Broadway. Cl. 6-0890.
Evenings, 8:30-11:20 to $4.20, tax included. Matinees Wednesday & Saturday, 2:30.

MICHAEL TODD Presents
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 69th Street, Matinees Wed. & Sat.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

THE moving pictures of President Roosevelt made at Teheran and at Yalta and when he reported to Congress after Yalta are, I believe, the best records we have of him. In the first I had fully and with sympathy and deep respect realized, however belatedly, how much that had seemed frivolous and even silly in Roosevelt was the high-pitched nervousness of a vivid, sensitive intelligence, and was inextricable from an extraordinary gallantry, in part created by background and in part limited by it, which I have always venerated. In the Yalta pictures there is not only the frightening thinness and sickness, or portent of sickness, but also much more. President Roosevelt had long been a great and fascinating figure for reasons which seemed mainly external, historical; now beyond any question, it seems to me, he was himself becoming a great man. An exceedingly complex and in many ways devious personality was undergoing profound and very rapid change. It was becoming integrated on a level it had scarcely before approached. In the plainest, simplest senses of the words that I can think of, his face was becoming the face of a religious, even of a seer, without loss of its adroitness and worldly resourcefulness and its singular, triumphant, essential gaiety. I felt in the face an intimacy with death and with tragedy which I had never seen in it before, and through that quiet and resolute, cheerful intimacy, a wonderful kind of recklessness, of all save the best that might be perceived and endeavored for the good of all other men. In this curiously light, shining, calm recklessness; this sense that all personal scores were settled and dismissed, in this quality of heroism emergent at last upon its highest level and its grandest prospect, I felt hope of a kind it was impossible to feel in any other living man, and reverence, regardless of how sure I felt that the best hopes must be proved idle. In the moving pictures made when the President addressed Congress, I saw all these same newly crystallized qualities at ease within the gentleman, and was convinced that nothing could destroy them. Their only impermanence was in their great possible increase; now this possibility has been ended. I will not try to describe with what glacial implacability this fact and the following days corroborated and enhanced my impressions.

If there is any possible excuse for my writing so subjectively, beyond the fact that I can hardly write or think of anything else, it lies in the fact that I was and remain fairly close to political agnosticism; and that if a person of my kind can be so moved by such a man, and such an event, that may be one more measure and one more expression of what the man and the event mean to those who have and who practice political hope and faith. For my own part I continue without much hope. But I doubt that I can ever again think of a man who works in politics, if his effort seems truly disinterested, without deep-seest respect.

So, too, I think of the new President. It is hard to imagine that history can ever have brought any man into a more terrible predicament. I realize too, as he does and as everybody does, that, forced to stand up and work his best under pressures which would fill the greatest and wisest of men with an annihilating sense of inadequacy, he is not very far, if far at all, from what we too contemptuously describe as mediocrity. But here again I am a sample of alteration which I assume applies still more powerfully in others. I have always believed, and still believe, in gifted individuals, and have trusted chiefly in their performance. But I have also always believed that the best that is in any ordinary man is illimitable; and now when that kind of faith is to be so severely tested, in the President and, just as acutely, in millions of others, I find it greatly fortified. Partly, it is because I know that greatness can emerge only under adequately difficult circumstances and that most people, including the great President who has died, find in themselves not the circumstances but merely the intellectual or still more important the moral adequacy to circumstance if it arises. Just as much, it is because sympathy, responsibility, love, magnanimity, resoluteness, and the obligation to selflessness, now more clearly than before, rest with great and equal weight upon all human beings who can so much as apprehend their existence. The wish that one might be of use is as great at least as the dismay, the shock, and the sorrow. The ways by which ordinary men can be of use are tragically limited, even in a democracy. To a great extent one is forced to fall back on a metaphysical yet very literal faith in unanimity and massiveness of spirit. I believe that this exists, and that if it is known to exist it can have very great power.

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language. MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ♦ ♦ 29 LANGUAGES Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

The Jewish World Problem Solved!

by JOSEPH ERDALEY

Twain-Harte, Calif. and bookstores—50c

"A DARING PIECE AND A PROVOCATIVE ONE!"—Reader's Digest Editors

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT? We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating. Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE. SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION 22 East 17th Street, New York City

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8

☐ 3 Years $11

☐ Servicemen's Rate: $3 a Year

☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Canada $1 a year extra

Foreign $1 a year extra

Pan American Union requires no extra postage

Name.....

Address.....

4-28-45

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

WHAT an artist!" exclaimed the lady in front of me to her husband, after Lehmann, with a sudden explosion of emotional intensity, had blasted the concluding phrase of Schubert's "Täuschung" out of relation to what had preceded. That was what the explosion had been intended to get the lady to think; but the means which Lehmann used in much of "Die Winterreise" to impress her Y. M. H. A. audience with what an artist she was made the opposite impression on me. For they were not what I consider art in the singing of such songs. When the lady in front of me said "What an artist!" she meant "How intensely she feels!" But a song is a piece of music; hence a singer's feeling for its expressive content must operate through a feeling for the musical phrase, and the expressive effect of the phrases must be achieved, as it is in any other piece of music, by inflection and articulation which makes them part of a plastically continuous and coherent progression. That is what Lehmann has done in her Town Hall recitals of recent years; but at the Y. M. H. A. she reverted to her earlier practice of throwing emotions and voice around without regard for the damage to musical phraseology. She may have thought this necessary for success with her Y. M. H. A. audience, and can point out that it succeeded enormously; but I can answer that the audience would also have liked the flawlessly phrased singing that delighted her Town Hall audiences this season, and if she had won her success with good singing she would have done something an artist should do—which is to cultivate good taste in the public by letting it hear what is good and find that it is enjoyable.

But I don't suppose people like Lehmann think very much of such things. It was amazing to observe how in "Wasserflut"—to take only one example—in every one of the places where she was required to wait the three quarter-notes of the measure she shortened the measure to two quarter-notes. It could be a lack of rhythmic sense; but my guess is that it is rather a lack of concern for anything in the song but her own singing; and I guess that from her treatment of the piano parts of the songs. The piano, as Schubert writes for it, not only sets the stage and creates the atmosphere for the voice, but collaborates with it in the development of the musical thought; but it does none of these things effectively when it is reduced, as it is by Lehmann, to a pallid whisper, and often it leaves the vocal phrase or Lehmann's vehemence without a context.

I should add that at the Y. M. H. A. the pallid whisper was produced from a piano which Steinway should have been ashamed to acknowledge as its own if it was not ashamed to send it to the hall. And, since I am speaking of such matters, the timbre of Lehmann's voice was sharpened and the effect of her vehemence increased by the excessive acoustic liveness of the Y. M. H. A. auditorium.

As for her farewell appearance in "Der Rosenkavalier" at the Metropolitan, I wish I had been content with my memories of her earlier performances. It may be that in them she did the same tragic flinging of her head back and her shoulders and arms around and I didn't notice it; but my recollection of those earlier performances is of something done with subtlety; and my impression is that whereas in former years she gave her performance, on this last occasion she gave a performance of herself giving her performance. It is the first act that I am thinking about; and I will complete my account of it by reporting that it suffered from the quavering bleat of Emanuel List, and Kurt Baum sang his Italian aria with a constriction which made me fear he would burst a blood-vessel, but that Rise Stevens's Octavian was excellent, and what I heard of Nadine Conner's singing in the second act (I left after her first duet with Stevens) was very good, and that Lothar Wallerstein contrived a good show for the first-act levée, and the music seemed to be well handled by Szell.

After the first American performance of Prokofiev's Eighth Piano Sonata by Horowitz at the Russian Consulate in New York I heard Szigeti say: "I found it a lit—tle atavis—tic," and then explain that it was "a return to the early Prokofiev." I took Szigeti to be referring to the finale—an explosion of motor energy in rapid figuration, in an ostinato interlude, and in the figuration again which it builds up to a terrific conclusion—as against the first movement, with its "modern" distorted lyricism such as one hears in Shostakovich's music. But a musician to whom I mentioned all this replied: "Why no; the phony lyricism is as early as the style of the finale; I can show it to you in Prokofiev's First Sonata; that's where Shostakovich got it." Whether the "modern" distorted lyricism is phony or not it is there in the first movement; and then the second movement astonishes us with an un-"modern" undistorted lyricism which is even more sugary in its prettiness than the similar second movement of the Seventh Sonata; whereupon the question arises how Prokofiev can ask for our belief in both these things in one man at one time in one work. I should be interested in what the Russians make of the work and say about it.

CONTRIBUTORS

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN, Woodrow Wilson professor of government at Williams College, is widely known as a political economist. Among his books are "Europe on the Eve," "Night Over Europe," "Design for Power," and "International Politics."

PERCY E. CORBETT is professor of government at Yale University, a member of the Yale Institute of International Affairs, and author of "Post-War Worlds." He was on the staff of the League of Nations from 1920 to 1924.

SIDNEY WISE is a newspaperman whose experience before he went to Spain included work in Buenos Aires, Montevideo, and other Latin American capitals.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN was for many years managing editor of the Tagebuch in Berlin and later became editor-in-chief of the Pariser Tageblatt.

ETIENNETTE GALLOIS before the war was on the staff of the Dépêche de Toulouse. During the war she did a great deal of writing for the underground press, and since the liberation has been on the staff of Voix du Midi, organ of the National Liberation Movement. She visited the United States at the invitation of the OWI.

RALPH BATES has long been a student of South American affairs. Among his books are "The Olive Field," "Rainbow Fish," and "The Fields of Paradise."

MARTIN LEBOWITZ has contributed to the Journal of Philosophy and the Kenyon Review.

PHILIP TAFT teaches economics at Brown University.

Letters to the Editors

Test for Anti-Nazis

Dear Sirs: Writing in The Nation of March 24, your columnist Argus says that "Allied personnel can furnish no more than the skeleton" for the administration to be set up in Germany and that Germans will have to be used in large numbers. Of course, as he indicated, the question immediately arises — which Germans? Nazis are not to be used. So Argus is constrained to ask, What is a Nazi? And he answers, "The great mass of Germans, let us say 95 per cent, were in fact both Nazi and non-Nazi at the same time—in every possible degree, and gradation, and mixture. And, furthermore, there are practically no outward criteria by which they can be sorted out."

I believe that there is a decisive test which he has overlooked. The Nazis found their mass support in the German middle classes; they were financed by the upper classes. The overwhelming majority of the workers were outspokenly anti-Nazi before Hitler came to power, and certainly far more than 5 per cent remained opposed to the regime. The Allies can discover which ones have been anti-Nazi by a very simple method. Millions of foreign workers and prisoners of war have been employed in German industry. These foreigners have been in close and continuous contact with German workers. If they are carefully questioned they can indicate pretty accurately which workers are anti-Nazi and therefore fitted to serve as the framework of a new democratic Germany.

So far, to judge from reports, nothing of this kind has been attempted. Max Lerner wrote in PM for March 26, "Instead of exploring and encouraging the democratic strength that exists, we are giving power to former Nazi officials provided they are not 'ardent' Nazis, and we are encouraging the formation of a new business and professional governing class which is deeply anti-democratic in all its ideas and aims." In the same article he spoke of "the complete absence of workers, of Social Democrats, of Communists, of trade-union officials, of the Christian left from the important offices in the German civil government." And he adds, "There is no evidence of our having made an attempt to tap these groups for leadership. I have been assured by competent sources that a list of people who might have been drawn on for running the local government was available to our authorities in Aachen but was not acted on. There were enough of them to fill the strategic posts. The workers in German cities already have shown signs of becoming bitter at seeing the very people who once were Nazis, the people who served as labor spies in Nazi factories, the people who were able to survive and prosper under the Nazis, now running things even after Nazi power has been destroyed."

The question who is an anti-Nazi will be comparatively easy to answer if the Allies really ask for cooperation from the German workers, a great latent force for democratic progress.

FRITZ STERNBERG

New York, April 3

Report from the Pacific

Dear Sirs: Here is an account of one participant's reactions and experiences in a recent Pacific campaign. When the landings were made, my unit was the only hospital landed. The navy left immediately to thwart an enemy convoy coming in behind us. We were on our own. We set up a field hospital at once and moved along behind the division. Since hazardous sea communication interfered with evacuation rearward, we treated and held for some time all the wounded. I was forced to operate on cases that ordinarily require extremely specialized care, as brain, eye, and spinal-cord cases. We could not stay in one place, for as the infantry moved forward the rear was exposed to Jap troops. Once we moved over 200 patients. To the problem of operating on and caring for a big load of casualties there was the added necessity of tearing down and setting up a new hospital three times during the short campaign. And of course we were subject to all the hazards of rear troops.

A portable surgical hospital attached to us was capable, as we were, of running two operating tables constantly. I was in charge of our two tables and operated on one constantly. My two tables did about four hundred operative cases before General MacArthur called all organized resistance over. Sleep consisted of dozing for a few minutes while waiting for a plaster to be put on, for an abdomen to be shaved, or for the assistant to finish the dressing.

The natives with whom I have come in contact have a refreshing dignity and self-respect. Here and there one sees a highly cultured native, as for example, a guerrilla leader who was a patient in my unit for a time. His diction, intelligence, and social sense marked him as an extraordinary man even before he told me of his life as a guerrilla. His experiences included night raids, trips among the islands under the nose of the Japanese navy, and the maintenance of relations between American forces in Australia and his homeland by radio and submarine communication. He is twenty-five, but already a military and political leader. Like all natives, he expects that liberation will automatically mean freedom, prosperity, and the benevolent philanthropy of the United States. Only large subsidies and technical help can provide the necessary education, sanitation, and reconstruction these people need to support themselves properly. It would be wrong for us to free them and leave them to their own devices.

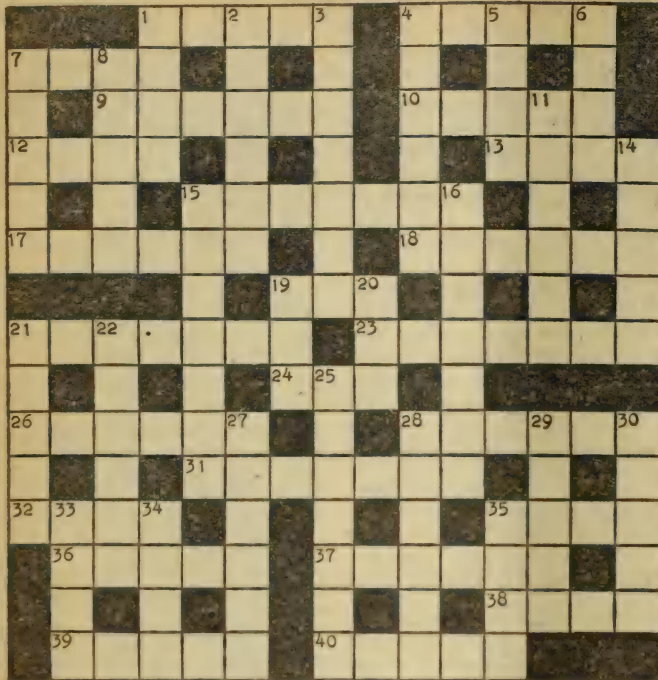

I am not optimistic about the length of the war. I have seen some of the difficulties of supply and bad terrain; that is what will prolong the war.

The men in this section of the army are much disturbed over reports of the American public's indifference to the war effort. A captain recently returned from a three weeks' furlough in the United States told us he felt that only people with relatives in the service were anxious for the war to end quickly. The others were too happy over the money they were making. He felt out of things in his home town and could not enjoy the dancing, dining, and free spending that went along with the gas-coupon chiseling. I pointed out that a large proportion of the population has friends and relatives in the service, and, frankly, I feel that his attitude was largely due to personal inadequacies. He may have expected to be welcomed as a conquering hero. But whether or not these reports are strictly true, they are believed. We are drifting into a cleavage of veterans and civilians that augurs ill for the future.

MAJOR —

Somewhere in the Pacific,
January 18

Crossword Puzzle No. 113 by JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Of worth maybe to the gambler
- 4 Two-legged animal, with or without feathers
- 7 A note the prime mover conceals
- 9 Majestic month
- 10 Ananias and Baron Munchausen, for example
- 12 German industrial district
- 13 She could easily be hurt
- 15 Palindromic pick-me-up
- 17 In the words of the song: "Over there!"
- 18 French seaside place
- 19 "The fair, the chaste, and unexpressive ---" (As You Like It)
- 21 Scottish dish to which the police seem extremely partial
- 23 "It ----- not how a man dies, but how he lives"
- 24 French five-franc piece
- 26 You have perhaps done this at bridge
- 28 Sort of dog that doesn't stay to see the end of the game
- 31 North-east African tribesmen
- 32 A bit long in the tooth
- 35 Invalid
- 36 Fiat
- 37 Britain's famous cartoonist in bed! Well, I'm -----!
- 38 Fiddlesticks
- 39 A cheese fancier
- 40 Sherry

DOWN

- 1 If you split this trip it would still be a long way there
- 2 German baron who gave his name to a British news agency
- 3 Somewhat wet
- 4 Everybody in bed?

- 5 Conice or Sweet William, perhaps
- 6 What thou art and shalt return to
- 7 Twice blessed quality, sometimes strained
- 8 Much-quoted American admiral (1840-1914)
- 11 In this case it's all right for an M.P. to break the rule
- 14 When a friend asked Simple Susie if she liked French -----, she said she didn't know any
- 15 Promotions from one class to another
- 16 Rio to U. S. without a break! That's luxurious!
- 19 A direction
- 20 You must know this bird
- 21 Horse-headed snake
- 22 Purely floral
- 25 Enemy shell of the last war put to a domestic use
- 27 Plug of tobacco at bottom of pipe after smoking
- 28 Turkish Christian name
- 29 So about to ruminate on an old coin
- 30 Hollers
- 33 Cause of most of our ills
- 34 "---- et mon droit" (A royal motto)
- 35 Birds' beaks

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 112

ACROSS:—1 PERSONABLE; 6 ASPES; 10 ENDLESS; 11 INFANTA; 12 SCOTTISH; 13 LING; 15 CURVE; 17 AVICULAR; 19 NOMINATED; 21 SPURN; 23 MARAT; 24 LARKSPUR; 27 CHARITY; 28 INDIANA; 29 LOTS; 30 SLEEVELESS.

DOWN:—1 PIED; 2 REDUCER; 3 OVERT; 4 ASSAILANT; 5 LEITH; 7 SUNDIAL; 8 STAGGERING; 9 AFFLICTS; 14 ECONOMICAL; 16 EINSTEIN; 18 UNDERMINE; 20 MORDANT; 22 ULULATE; 24 LOYAL; 25 SIDLE; 26 PASS.

CHILDREN'S CAMPS

CAMP WASHINGTON

BELLPORT, L. I. • GREAT SOUTH BAY
(60 miles from New York)

Boys and Girls, 3-12 Years

Well equipped buildings, Guest House. Small groups, careful supervision by matured counsellors. Expert instruction in Swimming, Music, Arts and Crafts, Riding, Tutoring, etc. Planned programs to consider individual interests and provide adequate rest. Friendly and informal environment. Limited enrollment.

P. O. BOX 264, BELLPORT, L. I.

Camp CHI-WAN-DA

FOR BOYS and GIRLS
ULSTER PARK, N.Y.
On the Mountain Lake
Esopus overlooking the
Beautiful Hudson River

We present a modern cultural environment for your children. All cabins with latest improvements. All activities. For full information, write or call for booklet.

JACOB I. DOKOSHKEIN, Director
645-5th Ave., MU 2-4217 MA. 2-5546 DI. 6-8849

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

1 OUT OF 6 ADULTS

DIES OF ## CANCER

YOU MAY BE THE ONE

GIVE!

Eminent scientists lack funds for experiment... cancer clinics are starved for equipment... money is needed to care for advanced cases.

Five million dollars a year might cut the deaths from cancer. Might save you, one dear to you. Yet Americans give less than one million dollars. Do your part! Send us anything from 10¢ to $1,000. Every bit helps!

AMERICAN CANCER SOCIETY

350 Fifth Avenue
New York 1, N. Y.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MAY 5, 1945

NUMBER 18

San Francisco Clears Its Decks

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

San Francisco, April 29

WHEN I saw the headline "GERMANY QUILTS" in the press room of the Veterans' Building yesterday I threw away the copy I was writing. That headline running across the front page of Mr. Hearst's Call-Bulletin, white on bright red six inches tall, was a lie, but it stopped proceedings at the plenary session still going on at the Opera House next door. It stopped me. Lie or truth, it was a reminder that Hitler's eleven-year reign of terror was fast collapsing in blood and shattered stone and that the events in the last few days in San Francisco should be considered in the glaring light of the final battle on the plains of Europe. Beside those monstrous events the bargainings of statesmen in hotel lobbies or behind the closed doors of the steering committee take on more modest dimensions. Suppose that Molotov annoyed his colleagues by demanding four presidents instead of gracefully accepting the single chairmanship of Stettinius. Is it worth arguing an afternoon away trying to figure out whether this action implied something more sinister than a bid for equal authority? While the Russians and Americans unite in tumultuous joint celebrations in the midst of the shambles of Berlin, it seems more pertinent to concentrate on the job of welding the Soviet Union into the security set-up. One experienced observer said this morning: "The more completely Russia forces its way into the show here and the more responsibilities it takes on the better chance there is of successful cooperation. This is the only way to wipe out the effects of twenty-five years of hostility and suspicion culminating in the freezing out of Russia at Munich. Once the Soviet delegates convince themselves that they needn't prove their power on every issue they will quit taking the offensive."

This does not mean, of course, that Russia will suddenly yield on points of major significance. No power here shows any sign of subordinating its interests to over-all ideas of justice or international community. It does mean that Russia will probably be a fully integrated member of the big-power coalition which must form the core of the security organization as soon as its delegates become convinced that their every gesture is not played up in sensational headlines and viewed with suspicion by commentators and editorial writers. Unused to the happy irresponsibility of the uncontrolled press, they find it hard to evaluate the fantastic interpretations of certain reporters covering the conference or the nonsense cabled back from Madrid by Hearst's Von Wiegand.

Molotov's press conference, followed by his able and genial appearance as chairman of yesterday's plenary session, has done a lot to offset the impression created by his demand for coequal chairmen and for the immediate seating of delegates from White Russia and the Ukraine. But hostility to Russia is still strong enough to endanger actual progress toward unity. Kingsley Martin, who is here reporting the conference for the London New Statesman, told me he had been astounded and frightened by the strength of the anti-Russian feeling he had encountered as he came across the country. The feeling exists in England among similar groups, but there it is mitigated by the universal realization, first, that the Red Army saved Britain, and, second, that only a close permanent relationship with Russia would prevent another war.

Whether viewed as a hope or a menace, Russia is certainly the pivot around which this conference revolves as well as the object of endless gossip and local excitement. Yesterday I saw for the first time a crowd of people, mostly women and girls, waiting outside the door of the St. Francis Hotel for a glimpse of the Russian delegates. My taxi driver said contemptuously: "Do they think Molotov has three legs or what?" The doorman had told the people that the Russians weren't expected to appear, but they stayed on anyway. Today in the corridors of the Palace Hotel, where most of the press is housed, I heard two reporters exchanging views on the whereabouts of the White Russian and Ukrainian delegates. "Sure, they're here," one of them said, "just waiting to take their seats. Uncle Joe knew he would get them in. Perhaps they're keeping them out on that Soviet ship in the harbor."

But gossip and bargaining alike seem pretty trivial when you consider them beside the mighty tasks facing this conference. They are important only in so far as they impede these tasks. And by this time it is clear that the conference will at least survive its differences. It will not blow up over the issues of power or over Poland or Argentina. Within a few days it will begin discussing the problems for which it was called together. And the lines of discussion have already been laid down in several of the speeches that have been so far delivered. The conference will survive, and the international security organization will be set up. This is certain now, though it was uncertain a few days ago.

Only a confirmed anarchist or isolationist will dare question the value of this assurance. The security organization will at least provide the instrument which, assuming the United Nations remain united, can be used for peace as the present alliance has been used for war. Without it there is nothing. With it there is a hope and a machine. Whether the new organization will be only a power alliance with democratic trimmings as Frederick Schuman predicted last week in The Nation or an alliance modified in some real measure by the established rights of the lesser states remains to be determined. Already several delegates have proposed changes in the Dumbarton Oaks plan which would greatly extend the powers of the middle and smaller nations. This, of course, is the chief constitutional problem facing the conference. It is immensely important, but it is less important for all than the unity of the Big Three. If a contradiction lurks in this fact, it can only be worked out through the patient weighing of one set of values against another, not by thundering oratory about the rights of small nations or the menace of the great.

The truth is that only a well-balanced cynic can avoid cynicism at San Francisco. The person who hopes for too much is going to emerge with very little. A person of shrewdly limited expectations will be able better to appreciate the accomplishments likely to be chalked up in the next few weeks. For this conference will do no more than put together the framework structure of security. It will not create international government. It will not produce justice as between nations comprising the security organization. Least of all will it move toward a more democratic society which would provide safe ground for such a structure to stand on. One may be sure, for example, that Argentina will be admitted to membership, and it seems almost certain that an Argentine delegation will be seated in the conference. The efforts of the Friends of the Spanish Republic to prevent the admission of Franco Spain to the security organization on the basis of technical neutrality will be seriously hampered if Perón and Farrell, Franco's quislings, are given seats. And, as Del Vayo points out elsewhere in this issue, the presence of fascist states in the new international set-up would again open the door to the fatal tactics of appeasement. Beyond these possibilities lies the still greater problem of creating or permitting the creation of genuine anti-fascist states throughout the world. No one with sense expects San Francisco to accomplish this work of political regeneration. But none the less it is alarming to look down the list of delegates and discover how few are the new men, how many are the left-overs of old and discredited governments. It is alarming to see how few labor men are included. Across the bay in Oakland the administrative committee of the World Labor Conference is in session with Philip Murray as chairman. Yesterday Russia asked that representatives of this body be invited to attend the sessions here as observers. One can imagine how little this proposal will appeal to the State Department. Nevertheless, labor should be here, not to observe but as an integral part of every delegation. The liberation movements as a whole are also poorly represented. What sort of peace shall we have if the men and women who contributed so bravely and effectively to the freeing of Europe are all but shut out of the process of building the machinery of peace?

The Shape of Things

THE WAR DEPARTMENT HAS ISSUED, FOR THE guidance of discussion leaders in camps at home and abroad, an "orientation fact sheet" on fascism and fascists which ought to be printed in full in every newspaper in the country and then clipped out and saved by every citizen. It contains as good a brief analysis as we have seen anywhere of the beginnings, the methods, the aims, and the inevitable results of fascism—under such headings as Fascism and Business, Small Business Betrayed, Why Fascists Are Anti-Union. To the question, Can It Happen Here? it answers yes. And in a section headed, Three Ways to Spot United-States Fascists, it gets right down to the fascist business of anti-Semitism, red-baiting, labor baiting, and opposition to any form of international cooperation. It is sound and sensible and plain, exactly the sort of thing we have a right to expect from the War Department of a democratic country—but seldom get. It should, as we have said, be very widely distributed among civilians as well as soldiers. And we should like the privilege of reading it aloud to the striped-trousers division of the State Department and to every official having anything to do with the governments of liberated countries.

★

ARGENTINA IS LIKELY TO REMAIN A SUBJECT of controversy during the whole period of the San Francisco conference. Some of the Latin American delegates are insisting that if the representatives of White Russia and the Ukraine are immediately given seats, as Molotov demands, then Argentina should be invited to join the United Nations and to attend the conference. Why the Latin American countries and particularly Mexico should be fighting this most unpopular battle to bring a fascist regime into the new international organization has puzzled many people. Actually the reason is an obvious one and is linked to the role played by our State Department. In Mexico on the eve of the Chapultepec conference many Latin Americans wanted Argentina to be compelled to appear before the assembled delegates and reply to the charges that had been made of open complicity with the Axis. Such a demand would have put Farrell and Perón on the carpet and could easily have provoked an internal crisis in Argentina which would have brought a democratic regime into power. The United States said no. Under no circumstances could Argentina be invited to Mexico. The veto sounded very impressive. But as many Latin Americans had suspected, our firm stand ended in a polite invitation to the Argentine government to reform and sign the charter of Chapultepec. Since then the mysterious travels of Avra Warren to Buenos Aires and back by bomber and the dispatch of a cruiser and an American military delegation to the Argentine capital to thank Farrell and Perón for having abandoned Hitler when Hitler was already being abandoned by the German army showed how events were developing. And so the Latin Americans are saying that if Argentina is finally to be accepted, they are not going to wait until Washington presents them with another fait accompli. If there is a diplomatic success to be scored, the enterprising Mexican Foreign Minister Ezequiel Padilla does not intend to let it slip out of his hands. But not even this record justifies any delegation that seriously supports democracy and peace in trying to smuggle fascist Argentina into San Francisco.

✕

WHETHER OR NOT THE SPANISH QUESTION will formally come before the conference is not yet clear but one thing is certain, it is one of the questions most actively discussed in the corridors. When the news of Mussolini's execution broke, several people said in various words: "Today Mussolini, tomorrow Hitler—the day after Franco." The unpopularity of the Spanish regime is such that when an important radio forum planned a broadcast on the subject "Should Franco Spain be admitted to the new international organization?" it could not find two reputable persons to argue the affirmative. One thing that contributed to making Spain a live issue at the conference was the release on Monday of the memorandum submitted to every delegation by the Friends of the Spanish Republic. This document, prepared for the purpose by Ralph Bates, exposed the services Franco has rendered to Hitler during the past five years and established the case against his admission to the world security organization. It is now a question whether any delegation will take the initiative in raising the issue when the status of neutrals comes under consideration. If so, it will be easy to demonstrate that Franco Spain was never a neutral but a non-belligerent ally of Hitler, while Republican Spain has been an active belligerent on our side whether the State Department and the Foreign Office admit it or not. Among the nations participating in the San Francisco conference five never recognized Franco—Russia, China, Czechoslovakia, Mexico, and New Zealand—while Guatemala broke with Spain immediately after the recent overthrow of the dictator Ubico. Any one of these countries would be in a strategic position to press the Spanish issue but Russia's attitude on this point as on others is being awaited with particular interest.

✕

FOR HENRI PHILIPPE PETAIN, LATE MARSHAL OF France, the war has been a long time coming to an end. Back in 1940, on May 28, according to Janet Flanner's brilliant sketch, he remarked to De Gaulle: "We must capitulate. What you say to the contrary is stupid and childish. I am old and experienced and know that England is lost. The war is finished." One June 16, as Premier of France, he asked Germany for peace. Now, as the war really finishes, but with a difference, the old man of eighty-nine returns from Germany to France to meet trial for treason. There are many in France, in England, in America, who will not be happy to see him back. It would be more convenient for this ancient ghost to fade out in exile and carry with him his own and others' secrets. Not so venal as Laval, Pétain is a high symbol of appeasement and collaboration. Anti-republican, counter-revolutionary, friend of the authoritarian state, he became the natural heir to the appeasers who assisted Hitler to power. Their half-forgotten accents will be heard as he presents his defense; they will be in the box beside him. And they won't all be Frenchmen. It is an interesting suggestion that Admiral Leahy may be called as a witness for the defense. Certainly Pétain had no stauncher American friend.

Perhaps it is an awkward time for our State Department to be reminded of its Vichy days. Perhaps not, for we have yet to give Europe proof that we are squarely behind those democratic forces that Vichy strangled for so long in France and that Allied policy has consistently frustrated in other liberated areas of Europe. There is a danger that Pétain's return may split France: the legend of the "hero of Verdun" is still strong. And there will be some who will want to make Pétain the scapegoat for all the guilty ones whose basic treason began months and years before Hitler's divisions rolled into the Low Countries. That would be a pity; there are more active and more subtle traitors who seem destined to die in bed. The trial must mark the eradication of Pétainism from the life of a nation. Already the results of the first French elections in nine years show the rugged strength of the new France which Vichy tried in vain to kill.

✕

IN SPITE OF THE FACT THAT GREECE HAD ONE of the strongest and most effective resistance movements in Nazi-occupied Europe, no representative of this important factor in Greek political life is to be found among the members of its delegation at the San Francisco Conference. This reflects the situation existing in Greece today, which is vividly described by Hal Lehrman elsewhere in this issue. The only liberal in the present government is John Sofiano-Poulos, head of the Greek delegation to San Francisco. His position is that of many liberals who have been induced to cooperate with reactionary governments in order to save what they can for the people. They usually do no more than strengthen the position of the reactionaries.

✕

PRIVATE PHILIP PERLMUTTER OF BROOKLYN arrived at the Danube one day last week and discovered, rather to his disgust, that it isn't blue. Next thing you know we'll be hearing from G. I. witnesses that the Black Forest is not black, that the watch on the Rhine has run down, that red Russians aren't red, and that there's no such place as Berlin.

✕

TO GET FOOD GET YOUR POLITICS STRAIGHT. This seems to have become the Allied slogan for administering relief to the lesser nations of Europe. Albania is the latest case in point. The UNRRA organized an Albanian mission in Cairo as early as July, 1944. So far the Albanians have got nothing, and now it is announced that the original $20,000,000 program has been indefinitely postponed. The trouble is political. The Premier of Albania is a mild-mannered professor named Enver Hoxha. He heads up the left-wing National Liberation Front which chased the Germans out and with them a number of their pals in the nationalist movement, adherents of the erstwhile King Zog. These latter escaped in some numbers across the Adriatic and are now snug in British sanctuary near Bari, although the Albanians want them back to answer charges of collaboration. In keeping with early policy in Yugoslavia and late policy in Greece, the Allies are holding up recognition of the Hoxha government and setting up conditions for relief administration under outside direction that make the Albanians very suspicious. They are afraid that what is happening across the border in Greece may well happen to them. Meanwhile the Albanians are desperately in need of medical supplies, clothing, and food which the UNRRA is equipped to give were not politics a chief consideration.

✱

FROM A MILITARY HOSPITAL BEHIND THE LINES came two letters dated "Italy, April 14." Pfc. B. L. wrote, in part, as follows:

The death of the President was a shock to all of us. I felt sort of empty when I heard the news. For he has been President half our lives and stood for, and was, the vital, dynamic America that we knew from the time we first became aware of the world. I disagreed with much that he said and did. Particularly in matters of foreign policy I think he could have made a more daring stand for fighting democracy in the case of Spain, Vichy France, and Greece. But now his loss is irreparable. The man who held the liberal dike is gone and the flood-tide of reaction will come—the reactionary wave that has started once again to trickle in America will swell to a torrent. Unless every liberal in America starts to get on the damn ball and work, we are going to have to admit some day as we start to remobilize that this war was in vain and that people who have suffered must suffer again and again and again until man either becomes extinct or intelligent enough to develop the resources of all the countries in the world for the common good of men everywhere. For all my love of the graceful, comfortable life, I have seen enough savagery, misery, and apathy to make me want these things for all men—for every Yank, every Chinaman and Negro and Jew, every Jap and Pole, every plumber, barfly, and scholar. And I won't take no for an answer. I can't stand the sight of human pain—mental and physical. I am tired of digging in. I want to build.

And Pfc. A. A. adds this:

Unconsciously we all feel like this: that something solid has been suddenly jerked from under us, and not a little confidence is gone. Not in winning the war, but in what follows. On the credit side, of course, is the faint hope that those of us who leaned too heavily on Roosevelt will wake up to think for ourselves.

✱

DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER WILL BECOME President Emeritus of Columbia University on October 1. For many years he has been the type and symbol of the College President, and there is no living executive holding a non-political office whose name is so well known to the public. Of the large private universities Columbia has come, for many reasons, to seem the most completely American, and President Butler has been so closely identified with its rise that to praise or attack the institution has inevitably been to praise or attack him. When he was first elected president in 1901 the enrollment was something over four thousand and the budget for the year something over $1,000,000. During its peak year, just before the effect of the war began to be felt, the student body numbered more than thirty-one thousand and the budget was more than $15,000,000. But it was not size alone which gave Columbia its hold upon the popular imagination. Under Dr. Butler the growth of the various professional schools and, even more importantly perhaps, of the summer session and the Department of Extension, made resources of the university meaningful and accessible to many thousands of those in all parts of the country to whom university education would otherwise have seemed the exclusive privilege of those specially fortunate in one way or another. The Nation has criticized some of Dr. Butler's policies and pronouncements. But there is no doubt either that his has been a prodigiously successful career or that the university is faced with a difficult problem in finding a successor. Probably no other college president of our time has, by his policy, so successfully refuted the contention that in present-day society the private as opposed to the state university is an anachronism.

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

San Francisco Clears Its Decks	by Freda Kirchwey	501
The Shape of Things		502
The Breaking Up		505
Italia Resurrecta		505

ARTICLES

The Same Old Codgers	by I. F. Stone	506
Geneva Casts a Shadow	by J. Alvarez Del Vayo	507
The "Discovery" of Buchenwald	by Alan Barth	509
From the Record		510
New Hope for the Jewish People	by Sumner Welles	511
Canol, the War's Epic Blunder	by Edward A. Harris	513
In the Wind		514

POLITICAL WAR

Athens Calling	by Hal Lehrman	515
Behind the Enemy Line	by Argus	517

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way	by Margaret Marshall	518
Education Can Be Interesting	by Gail Kennedy	520
Briefer Comment		522
Fiction in Review	by Diana Trilling	522
Drama	by Joseph Wood Krutch	525
Art	by Clement Greenberg	526
Music	by B. H. Haggin	527

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 114 by Jack Barrett 528

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor	Washington Editor	Literary Editor
J. KING GORDON	I. F. STONE	MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor	Music Critic	Drama Critic
J. MITCHELL MORSE	B. H. HAGGIN	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager	Advertising Manager
HUGO VAN ARX	MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL	JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER	CAREY MCWILLIAMS
	REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Breaking Up

THE junction of American and Russian troops on the Elbe spells the imminent end of Hitler's Germany, yet in the present chaotic state of military affairs it is impossible to predict just how that end will come. It may well be that the unconditional surrender of the Germans will have been announced by the time this issue of The Nation reaches your hands, and it may equally well be that isolated resistance will drag on for weeks, with Allied soldiers losing their lives long after any rational basis for defense is gone.

It is thus a peculiar concomitant of the present military situation in Europe that rumors of the wildest character should be given wide circulation. In an impossible situation the most impossible stories will be believed. The extraordinary performance in San Francisco last week-end, when baseless reports were widely credited, will no doubt be repeated over the entire Allied world at frequent intervals before the final declaration of unconditional surrender is released.

In a certain sense it is well that this should be so. The false reports and false demonstrations of joy may serve to relieve public feeling to the point where the authentic declaration will be received with gravity, with recognition of the fact that when so much has been irrevocably destroyed public merrymaking is a travesty of good sense. There is little cause for turning cartwheels over the crushing of a tarantula, especially when another tarantula remains to be crushed, and long after the Germans have been stripped of power the Japanese will remain to be dealt with.

Recognition of these essential facts does not detract from the profound feeling of satisfaction that Germany is split in two. Military history knows nothing comparable to this great spectacle of power amassed on opposite sides of the world and projected toward a common enemy. If proof were still needed, it is proof indeed that we live in one world when power brought from the Golden Gate joins on the Elbe with power brought from Stalingrad, crushing the aggressor in the process. Last week's manifestations of that power have brought the Germans very close to complete disintegration. The joining of Russian and American troops means that the defense of the Third Reich is now vestigial, incoherent, and without hope. What remains to the Allied armies is a large-scale mopping-up process rather than a military campaign. The outstanding German forces in the field are left without centralized control, without sources of military strength, without bases of supply, without lines of communication. They can fight on as separate entities, but they cannot continue to function as a coordinated mass of resistance.

Even as this massive juncture in the center of Germany was robbing the enemy of his means of coherent defense, the energetic blows of Allied troops in the north and in the south were robbing him of his hopes for protracted resistance in the highly defensible redoubts prepared for his retirement after the loss of Berlin, that erstwhile nerve center now being fast reduced to ashes and rubble. The British capture of Bremen and the Russian capture of Stettin have greatly diminished the value of the northern redoubt, exposing both its flanks to drives inward toward its base across the foot of Denmark, and the same process has been carried through on an even larger scale in the south. There the astonishingly rapid Allied advance across the line of the Po River in Italy has eaten deeply into the southern boundaries of the redoubt, and the encircling of Bohemia and Moravia, coupled with Patton's penetration of Austria, has broken through its northern boundaries.

The great drama of the "Thousand-Year Reich" is thus unquestionably reaching its bloody and sordid close. We are witnessing the final breaking up of military power which once terrorized the civilized world. The utter disaster to Germany signified by this breaking up points an obvious moral to any would-be aggressor in the world today, just as the costly triumph of the powers which have brought it about points an obvious moral for delegates at San Francisco who are interested in the future security of the world.

Italia Resurrecta

IT IS fitting that it should be the Partisans who disposed of Mussolini. For the spiritual heirs of the murdered Matteotti had the right to deal swift justice to this sawdust Caesar, this strutting egotist, this small-scale dictator who destroyed a nation to build his tinsel empire. The carrion remains in the market place of Milan, where twenty-six years ago Mussolini founded the Fascist movement, are an ignominious symbol of the completion of a cycle.

Now a new spirit is stirring in northern Italy. For eighteen months the Italian Partisans have made a magnificent contribution to the Allied effort in Italy. They have fought alone, engaging the enemy in battles of such scale that the Germans and the Fascists were forced to make ample use of tanks, big guns, and air support. Aneurin Bevan, before the House of Commons, revealed that "it is on record from Field Marshal Alexander that the resistance movement in Italy has been more effective in fighting the Germans than any other resistance movement in Europe. More than 250,000 Italians have lost their lives in that movement." The Nation has already mentioned the statement by a high Canadian officer that "without the efforts, big and small, of the Patriots, our task would have been doubly difficult and three times as costly." And even Mr. Churchill was forced to admit that "very desperate battles" were being waged by "brave men who have been fighting and maintaining guerrilla warfare in the Alps."

No one can therefore deny the tremendous contribution of the Italian Partisans to the Allied cause. But this great contribution has been hidden as much as possible from the peoples of the Allied nations—the above mentioned declarations, with the exception of Churchill's, did not appear in the American press. The reason lies in the fact that the Partisans speak with the voice of democracy, which is quite out of tone with that of the Fascism now represented by the House of Savoy and its supporters in and out of Italy. The Partisans are organizing the first local governments in regions they have liberated, and the Committees of Liberation are military as well as political bodies. Behind these committees stand not only the Partisans but the great majority of the Italian people. Without such help the Partisans could not have carried on their fight for eighteen months. The workers especially, with their strikes and sabotage, have supported the activities of the Partisans.

As our forces sweep northward they are confronted with a popular movement which the international reaction concentrated in Rome tries to suffocate. The Partisans are disarmed when they are found within the Allied lines, unless they enter the army of the King. The Partisans distrust the old military bureaucracy of a state in disintegration and claim that they represent the strongest and most faithful army of the new Italian popular state. But the Allied administration when it arrives immediately tries to build up sympathies for the Italian monarchy. The same day that we read about the liberation of Milan, Turin, and Genoa, and of the probable capture of Mussolini, the New York Times carried a dispatch from Bologna telling of the "acclaim" that greeted a visit of Prince Humbert. It seems strange that during the fifteen minutes of his appearance in public the Prince found "500 assorted Bolognese" ready to mill around him, when, a few days before, the same paper in a dispatch from Bologna carried the following: "Queries throughout central Bologna today evoked the response that the Socialists and the Communists were the strongest parties, with the Actionists third. Moreover—and vitally indicative—all who replied said they were strongly anti-monarchist and did not expect the House of Savoy to survive the Constituent Assembly." A powerful state machine is being built for the monarchy, and the tragic result may be a civil war. In view of the importance of the events in Italy today, and of their bearing on the future not only of the Peninsula but of Europe, we feel that this plot should be made known. Future issues of The Nation will carry a series of articles on the subject, explaining the Allied policy in Italy since the fall of Mussolini.

The Same Old Codgers

BY I. F. STONE

San Francisco, April 28

THIS is a splendidly vigorous and beautiful city. Its lofty hills, great bay, clear skies, and fresh breezes make it an exhilarating place. The cable cars that crawl up and down its steep streets provide almost as exciting a ride as the chute-the-chutes of Coney Island, and the view from luxurious Nob Hill, where one feels closer to the stars at night, goes to one's head. For the press this has been a glamorous week spent scooting around between press conferences and plenary sessions. We saw and heard the bright, bird-like Dutch Foreign Minister, Van Kleffens; the school-masterish Deputy British Prime Minister, Clement Attlee; the monolithic but quick-witted Molotov; Nehru's fragile but intense sister, Mrs. Pandit; dapper Georges Bidault, the French Foreign Minister, who looks more like a care-free boulevardier than an underground leader; and, of course, Mr. Stettinius, our matinee-idol Secretary of State, whose press conferences are remarkable chiefly for his extraordinary facility in remembering the faces and names of reporters. It's the old apple sauce, but we lap it up just the same.

The press is housed in the huge Palace Hotel, on Market Street, down near the wharves, and the correspondents, for whom this is a kind of old-home week, obtain much of their mysteriously authoritative inside information by interviewing each other at the crowded bars and in the high glass-ceilinged dining-room. We are perpetually in transit, like skating bugs, from the Palace to Union Square, which is neat and fashionable and quite unlike its New York namesake; there, at the St. Francis, the Russians and the French are housed. Thence we go to Nob Hill, where the British and the Chinese are in the de luxe Mark Hopkins, with its famous rooftop bar, and the American delegation in the equally plushy if less famous Fairmount. Down hill again we speed to the domed Opera House, where the conference sessions are held, and the big Veterans' Administration Building next door, which is the "press room" of the conference; there are batteries of typewriters and telegraph machines and a most delightful clatter.

Hollywood, as though fearful of being outshone, is well represented here. Your correspondent, as goggle-eyed as any movie fan, was introduced to Charles Boyer by a member of the French delegation and later that night in the lobby of the Palace to Edward G. Robinson. "Well," Robinson asked, with that overtone of quiet menace for which he is famous, "is our side going to win?" It was definitely an "or else" question, and I hastened to assure him that all would be well.

The main event, the opening of the conference Wednesday afternoon, might have been an M-G-M opening. Crowds strained against the ropes for blocks around the Opera House to watch the arriving notables; the press flashed its cards with pride; the foreign delegates poured out of their black limousines, trying hard to look dignified and unmoved. Within, in an interior that seemed to have been done by Maxfield Parrish, floodlights lit up the gilded gesso, red plush, and stainless steel; against the blue background of the huge stage stood four brown pillars, symbols of the four freedoms, connected at the top by what appeared to be large segments of a boa constrictor. The press was with difficulty confined to the triple-tiered galleries by the feminine élite of San Francisco, among whom many heart-rending battles were fought for the honor of ushering at the occasion. But down below camera men swarmed among the delegates of the forty-six nations, kneeling in the aisles and all but hanging from the boxes to get their shots. Flashlight bulbs kept going off like summer lightning, and statesmen obediently composed their faces for the camera.

The affair itself was sobering. The speeches at the opening session were as banal as the juke-box music which was piped into the Opera House as the delegates arrived. The President's address was disappointing. The occasion called for either Lincolnian eloquence or plain, common-sense statement. Mr. Truman is fully capable in private of the latter, but he seems to have been prevailed upon to indulge instead in windy moralisms, turgid periods, and the kind of untruths which are regarded as inspirational. I pick one of many examples from the speech. "None of us doubt," Mr. Truman said, "that with divine guidance, friendly cooperation, and hard work we shall find an adequate answer to the problem history has put before us." Mr. Truman would never talk that way in private to a visitor. Why does he in a speech? The statement is not true; some of the wisest of the delegates here certainly do doubt whether we shall find the "answer to the problem history has put before us." The rhetoric is false, the effect is hollow, it is hokey. In private Mr. Truman would say, "It's a tough job. I'm not sure we can do it. But we're going to try our best." Why not say that in public? That kind of plain talk inspires confidence. The tawdry and flatulent rhetoric which marked most of the speeches depressed one. The occasion was so momentous; the danger so grave; the need so great; the utterance so mediocre.

The San Francisco conference is as important as Versailles or the Congress of Vienna. But one's first impression of it is how mediocre is its leadership. The second is how little the cast of characters has changed since Geneva. To be quite frank about it, the conference, for all its glamour, is a meeting of pretty much those same old codgers to whose fumbling we owe World War II. They are still dishing out the same old platitudes and thinking in the same old terms. And so, I suspect, are many of the people they represent. The war, for all its terror and destruction, has not brought about that long-overdue revulsion against nationalism which can alone provide the basis for world order and security. The delegations assembled here indicate that the political parties and the dominant classes of the Western countries and of China are emerging from the conflict momentarily sobered, perhaps, but little changed. Except for the French and Yugoslav delegations, there is no sign here of the new men and forces which welled up from underground in continental Europe to fight fascism. The basic idea at San Francisco is that the big powers must stick together to maintain the peace; this was Metternich's idea in 1815; it is the kindergarten stage in education toward world security. The problem is how to keep the big powers together; it is the problem that these same men—the Halifaxes, the Edens, the Paul-Boncours, the Van Kieffenses—failed to solve at Geneva. Given the same men, the same parties, the same social systems, can one expect a different result?

These men lost the last peace, and unless they are replaced they will some day lose the next one. They can give us the first tentative framework of a world order; it is the job of progressive forces to take over from there as soon as possible. For whatever these men do on paper, they do not have the capacity to withstand and deal with real crises. The weak handling of the Polish issue, the clerical power politics focused upon it, the covert anti-Soviet urges associated with it, are indicative of the stresses and strains which peace will put on the relations of the big powers. It will take new leadership, deeper understanding, and firmer resolution if big-power unity is to be maintained when peace comes and trouble begins.

Geneva Casts a Shadow

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

[J. Alvarez del Vayo, Foreign Minister of the Spanish Republic, was Spain's representative on the Council of the League of Nations from September, 1936, to January, 1939.]

San Francisco, April 27

DURING this inaugural week at San Francisco Geneva has thrown long shadows on the wall. Perhaps those who are sharing for the first time in the attempt to organize peace for the world do not feel themselves haunted by this shadow. But for those who were participants in or witnesses of the failure of the League, memories of Geneva are impossible to escape. After all, Geneva and San Francisco are stages along the same historic route. The immediate landscape has changed, but the end is the same—world peace. Those who know why the wrong road was taken at the earlier stage should not now remain silent.

Unfortunately, there are few who can tell the story. Of those who sat at the Council table in the last three fatal years of the League, some cannot speak because they still occupy official positions; others will not speak because they are directly responsible for what happened and have little desire to revive unpleasant memories. In the Council were saboteurs of peace like the Polish Colonel Beck, Hitler agents like Georges Bonnet of France, men like Anthony Eden who were honestly convinced that international law should be respected but who were restrained from action by the policy of their governments, anxious appeasers like Lord Halifax, for whom the most important thing was not the fact of aggression but the political color of the victim; if the color appeared red in his eyes, as in the case of the Spanish Republicans, the aggression itself looked a little like the fulfilment of the will of God. In the Council fighting against totalitarian aggression and for collective security were only the representative of Russia and the representative of Spain. Nobody could tell that story with greater authority than Maxim Litvinov, but his official position prevents him from doing so. I, on the contrary, am perfectly free to establish the inevitable comparisons between San Francisco and Geneva.

For me the most important task in the creation of a new security organization is rigidly to maintain the principle that no nation whose political regime makes it unfit to work for peace should be admitted to membership. No fascist state can be taken in without endangering the whole structure. By the simple fact of being fascist, every fascist state is potentially an aggressor, and Geneva offers conclusive evidence that to attempt to hold together aggressors and non-aggressors is to paralyze the machinery of peace.

Even after Germany and Italy left the League, not because they were expelled but because they felt they could prepare for war more comfortably outside than in, even then the Council was paralyzed by the fear of offending them. Addressing the Council in 1938, I said bluntly: "Here the friends of the League are continually sacrificed to its enemies. It would seem as if we had only one aim—to make happy those who are engaged in destroying the League and peace." In the secret meetings of the Council, in the conversation of its members, in the innumerable intrigues of the Secretary General, Joseph Avenol, one of the greatest living war criminals, even more than in the public discussions, it was evident that the insane desire to win back Hitler and Mussolini condemned the League to inaction and discredit. The deserters from the League dominated it even in their absence. In the Assembly and even in the Council Hitler and Mussolini had their quislings. It made no difference whether they were little quislings or big ones. They became the vehicles of all maneuvers, the rallying points of all defeatist tendencies. In each commission, in the secretariat, throughout the various chan-celleries, their poison spread. At the most crucial moments of decision the Council put off its meetings as a result of these maneuvers. One could not get the draft of a resolution drawn up without its content becoming known in fascist capitals before the Council could make a decision. The expression "fifth column" was coined in Spain, but in 1936 Mussolini had already used his fifth column in the League, and its chief, Pierre Laval, to ruin the first serious attempt to apply sanctions against an aggressor.

Until Munich the League could still have regained strength and used it against aggressors. It has been said many times, but one must repeat it this May, 1945, when a new organization is coming to life: it was not the defects of the Covenant, not the lack of an international police force, not the voting procedures, but the capital vice of attempting to maintain the peace by working with the aggressors that produced the tragic failure of Geneva.

That is why in San Francisco the question of the admission of Argentina is of much greater significance than are the problems of multiple voting, of the rights of small nations, or even of trusteeship. These are all most important, but any error committed in regard to these matters can be made good later on. The recognition of a country ruled by a regime like that of Perón and Farrell can hardly be made good.

IRONING OUT THE CREASES

With the admission of Argentina, fascism is admitted to the peace organization. The war, which President Roosevelt said was waged "to secure the destruction of fascist tyranny," misses its chief aim.

In view of all the maneuvers going on to take in Argentina, it was not surprising that the word fascism was not pronounced a single time at the inaugural session, as it was not at Geneva. In every motion adopted by the Council in regard to the act of aggression I fought to have the aggressor mentioned by name. I never succeeded. The names Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy, whose armies had invaded Spain, a member of the League, were never spelled out. Since the majority of the bosses desired only to win back Hitler and Mussolini, they refused to name them even in a weak resolution of reproach. Similarly those who are working for the admission of Argentina believe that to use the word fascism would show a lack of international courtesy.

Again, as at Geneva, "friends are sacrificed to enemies." The friend of the United Nations, the Argentina we should welcome into the new organization, is exiled in Montevideo or shut up in prisons and concentration camps (conditions in these camps were recently described in The Nation by John W. White and were such that the security organization would be justified in appointing a special committee of investigation to report on them). This democratic Argentina includes the people who intend to go into the streets on the day of the fall of Berlin in spite of the government's threat to use violence to suppress any demonstration.

If the Argentina of the Perón government is taken in, the precedent created will be fatal. One fascist state will be followed by another. The admission of Argentina would give great encouragement to Franco to continue the farce of democratization. Already we know that Franco has other reasons to feel encouraged. Indeed, it is time to speak the entire truth. Within the last few weeks very influential British conservatives have again come to the conclusion that Franco must be kept in power, and in this effort the American ambassador is warmly cooperating. Of course they would have preferred Don Juan, but the poor reception given his manifesto has convinced them that the hour of monarchy in Spain has passed. They would accept a General Arendt, a Maura, or another intermediate figure. What they do not want is power in the hands of the people of Spain, united and as firm in their anti-fascist convictions as during the years of war. They do not want Spanish Republican unity, and they are doing everything in their power today to prevent Republican leaders who want unity and can achieve unity from meeting and working together.

I know how these Tories are talking now. They talk as they did in the best days of appeasement, on the eve of the Munich betrayal. They say, "We don't want the Russians west of Gibraltar." To them it is not so important that the Nazis are already west of Gibraltar inside Spain. The main thing is to keep the Spanish "reds" from ruling the country. As in 1938, as at Geneva, to prevent the Spanish people from holding a well-merited seat in the new security organization these people will be ready when the proper moment arrives to put Franco in that seat. Not now; there are already too many headaches at San Francisco. Later. For the moment Argentina will be enough.

The "Discovery" of Buchenwald

BY ALAN BARTH

Washington, April 27

THERE is always a danger in war that the culture of the conquered will prevail. This is particularly true of a culture that is debased. For war, which is itself a denial and debasement of civilization, sets in motion a curious variation of Gresham's Law on currency: inferior values tend to drive civilized values out of circulation. We have successfully overcome Nazi arms; we have yet to prove ourselves invulnerable to Nazi ideas.

One of the dominant Nazi ideas is the doctrine of German racial supremacy. This doctrine was used to justify all the hideous acts of savagery within Germany which have lately come to light. It was quite in order for the master race to torture, starve, and exterminate such inferior creatures as Poles and Russians and stateless European Jews. Indeed, the savagery was not widely recognized as sadism until we discovered its application to French and British and even American prisoners of war. Now, strangely and ironically, we are beginning ourselves to interpret this savagery in racist terms. Some people in reacting to recently disclosed German war crimes attribute them directly to defects in German genes. Here we have the typical Nazi confusion between race and nationality; the assumption of German racial inferiority is as unintelligent as the Nazi doctrine of racial supremacy.

This sort of thinking was implicit in a recent statement by Representative Ed Izac of California, a member of the House committee which will inspect prison camps in Germany. The German atrocities, he told a reporter, could not be laid solely at the door of the Nazi system or of Hitler. Rather, he said, they were the result of something innate in the German people. Perhaps Representative Leonard Hall of New York suffered from a similar confusion after viewing the horrors of Buchenwald. "You have to see Buchenwald," he said, "to realize fully what debased beasts the Germans are."

Representative Luce, on the same occasion, was enigmatic. "The most important thing to remember," she declared, "is that this could happen to us in twenty years. Only a few years ago some were talking about there being good German people. After seeing this, one wonders whether there is good in any German people."

One also wonders, if this could happen to us in twenty years, whether there is good in any Americans. And one knows, when one thinks of Georgia chain gangs and Florida sweat boxes and riots in Detroit and West Coast attacks on Americans of Japanese ancestry, that Mrs. Luce is quite right—it could happen here. No people is altogether without elements of savagery and sadism. These elements are sublimated or unleashed, depending on the cultural environment.

The most important thing to remember, Mrs. Luce might have said, is that the horrors she witnessed were manifestations of German culture—that is to say, of Nazi culture, which has become the dominant culture of Germany. It is true enough, as Mr. Hall observed, that the Germans, or at any rate those responsible for the horrors, are "debased beasts." But it is vital to understand that the debasement stems from the ideas and values with which those Germans were indoctrinated, not from any biological peculiarity. To understand this is in no sense to condone their guilt; it is merely to distinguish the real root of the evil. The distinction is essential if we are to overcome the problem they present. The evil that men do undoubtedly lives after them; but there is scarcely a biologist outside of what is left of Hitler's Reich who would hold that it lives in the chromosomes and is genetically transmitted.

The way in which men who have plenary power treat those who are in their hands and helpless is as good a criterion as any of their civilization. We may justly call the Germans debased because they used their power over prisoners bestially. But we had better be on guard against the contagion of debasement when we hear talk of retaliation against the German prisoners now in our possession. The record of the War Department in this connection, it should be noted, has been exemplary.

Nearly all the stir about "pampering" our prisoners of war has come from civilians. And it is generally from sheltered and delicately nurtured folk that one hears the suggestion that after the German army has been beaten we ought to let the Poles and Czechs and Russians wreak the bloody vengeance they are presumed to desire on the German populace. As a rule, to be sure, the sponsors of this idea prefer to have their rapine committed by foreigners, as though they recognized it to be, somehow, slightly un-American. One is reminded of C. E. Montague's observation that "hell hath no fury like a non-combatant."

Perhaps the outstanding sample of racist reasoning was offered a couple of weeks ago by Paul V. McNutt. He remarked in the course of a speech at Chattanooga that he was in favor of "extermination of the Japanese—in toto." Asked if he meant extermination of the Japanese army or of the people, he replied that he referred to "the people." Mr. McNutt, no doubt, thinks of the Japanese as uncivilized.

We have waged this most serious of all wars, on the whole, with notable sobriety. The national hysteria which accompanied our participation in World War I has not this time tainted our attitude to all things German, although it has been reflected in our treatment of Japanese Americans. But hysteria sometimes comes when the battle is ended, as a release from tension. That is when its dangers are greatest, for it may subvert the values for which we fought. Ideas are the last weapon remaining to the Nazis, but the weapon is a powerful one.

From the Record

[The concentration camp has been a standard part of the Nazi apparatus from the beginning. The following descriptions, published by The Nation, forecast the discovery of Buchenwald.]

CRIMES HAVE BEEN COMMITTED whose very magnitude stifles protest because the mind is stunned into incredulity. It was weeks before the atrocities of the Brown Terror became known to the outside world, simply because the editors of responsible papers abroad could not believe that even their picked reporters were not being misinformed or carried away by their own emotions. It must be categorically stated that even today there is no conception of the barbarism which has prevailed and which still continues.—August 2, 1933.

A YOUNG GERMAN told me this story. . . . "Three months ago they arrested a man in East Prussia. They found my address among his papers. The next morning I was in a concentration camp. The S. A. asked me what I knew. I said that I hadn't participated in revolutionary activity since such activity became illegal. That was an 'unsatisfactory' answer. So they beat me for three hours until I crumpled up on the floor. Then they took me away from the concentration camp to a special station for torturing stubborn prisoners. I was carried into a small room with only a bed in it. The door to the main room was slightly open. I could hear the wails and screams of a man who was also 'stubborn'—he was refusing to betray his comrades. After two hours I heard him break down. He whispered the names of two men, very faintly. The S. A. brought him in and threw him on the bed, smeared all over with blood. Then they took me in."—EVELYN LAWRENCE, September 5, 1934.

THREE HOURS at Esterwegen change a man from a normal product of twentieth-century culture into the lowest of creatures, helplessly exposed to shame and brutality. Pity him who is sentenced to "dark arrest" for weeks. These poor devils are bound with chains and left in the dark. They can neither sit nor lie. Their arms and feet become swollen and infected. Only every third day do they get the usual prison fare; the rest of the time they have only bread and water. And they are subject to frightful tortures. The silence of the night is shattered by their cries. The prisoners, used to suffering and mistreatment, grow pale and tremble when they hear their screams.—JOHANN SCHMIDT, September 12, 1936.

THE GHASTLY HORRORS of the German concentration camps, related in the new British White Paper, cannot, unhappily, be written off as baseless war-time propaganda. Incredible as the facts may seem, they have been confirmed all too amply by other sources. . . . With documents of this kind in its archives, how was it possible for the British government to maintain for so long that there was nothing in the nature of the Hitler regime which precluded a deal, or even friendship, between the two countries?—November 11, 1939.

New Hope for the Jewish People

BY SUMNER WELLES

THE tragic decades through which we have just passed constitute the blackest period of modern history. Little by little we have seen vanish almost every one of those standards of international conduct and of humane civilization which had gradually been built up during preceding centuries. We have seen the entire face of the earth burst into the mightiest conflagration that peoples have ever known. We have seen warfare assume the most frightful guise which mankind has ever yet devised. But worst of all, we have seen humanity itself sink to its lowest level.

The crimes committed by the Nazis and by their accomplices against the Jewish people are indelible stains upon the whole of our modern civilization. They are stains which will shame our generation in the eyes of generations still unborn. For we and our governments, to which we have intrusted power during these years between the Great Wars, cannot shake off the responsibility for having permitted the growth of world conditions which made such horrors possible. The democracies cannot lightly attempt to shirk their responsibility. No recompense can be offered the dead. The effort today to right the wrongs which have been committed will be of all too little avail to the bereft, to the orphans, to the homeless, and to the wanderers on the face of the earth. But such measure of recompense as can be offered surely constitutes the moral obligation of the free peoples of the earth as soon as their victory is won. And that measure of recompense lies in the assumption by all the United Nations of the obligation to make such reparation as is still possible to the sufferers, wherever they may be found.

Seven years ago Franklin Roosevelt was the only chief of state who saw with clear vision what the needs of the future would be. True humanitarian that he was, he assumed the leadership in creating the Inter-Governmental Committee on Refugees, which was intended to become the sheltering arm of the democracies for millions of distressed human beings. After it was set up the committee encountered vast practical difficulties when it undertook to cope with the tragic problem placed under its jurisdiction. That it has failed to accomplish any substantial portion of the duties with which it was charged cannot be denied. Certainly in some instances its efforts brought about the escape to places of refuge of some of the persecuted, but the number of persons saved pales into insignificance when compared with the number of those who perished. The creation of the committee, however, at least accomplished one great objective. That was the establishment, through the participation of many governments in the committee, of the principle of collective international responsibility. It seems to me that at this moment that is a principle which none of us can permit to fall into abeyance.

For that reason I have greatly welcomed the proposals put forward by many democratic organizations urging the Conference of the United Nations at San Francisco to designate international commissions to frame an International Bill of Rights, to deal with the problem of migrations, and to cope with the great question of those who have no present national status. These basic issues are truly international. They can never be fairly or permanently solved save through a sincere, wise, and common effort on the part of all the United Nations. They are issues which vitally affect the very foundation of the new world order we must create.

I firmly believe, and I am confident that enlightened public opinion throughout the United Nations will also maintain, that one of the immediate responsibilities to be assumed by the international organization, as soon as it is established, must be the carrying out of effective plans to take care of the refugees who have been driven from their homes by Nazi persecution, so that they may be afforded the opportunity of living out their lives in safety and with every possible chance to find security and happiness. It is regrettable to find some in authority in other countries already insisting that all that is required is to make it possible for these refugees to return to the places of their origin, safely and without fear of renewed persecution. Under the conditions which today exist we all of us know that that is not enough.

When refugees who have been cast adrift by the tides of war wish to return to their original homes, they must, of course, be given not only full assurance that they can do so but the chance to start life anew in those homes in such a manner as to be secure until they can once again become independent. There are countless numbers of refugees, however, who will not wish to go back to the scenes of horror from which they escaped. And it is the plight of this category which in my judgment constitutes the gravest and most pressing problem.

Some of them undoubtedly will wish to come to the Western Hemisphere or to other new scenes of opportunity. Here again that opportunity can be given to many hundreds of thousands of them if the international organization coordinates common action between the countries which are underpopulated and which wish to encourage desirable immigration, and the agency which must supervise the settlement of refugees. I cannot overemphasize my conviction that if coordinated action is not undertaken, and measures are not carried out through intergovernmental action to tide these immigrants from the Old World over the difficult period of their readjustment in new homes, only an infinitesimal part of the needed rehabilitation work will be satisfactorily accomplished.

For it is evident that unless this flow of immigration is regulated, and safeguarded by competent agencies of the international organization through the negotiation of practical and individual arrangements with each government which desires suitable immigration, harm rather than good will result. The unregulated flow of unselected and destitute emigrants, under post-war conditions, to new and undeveloped regions will inevitably stir up new difficulties and new frictions. By the negotiation of agreements between the international agency and each government which wishes to stimulate desirable immigration, however, such dangers can be guarded against. In this way the immigrants will be qualified for the new homes to which they go; they will not be a charge upon local communities during the months before they can become self-supporting; and they will have a fair chance to grow into useful and welcome citizens of the land which offers them a new life.

Finally, of course, there is that great number of refugees who will wish to find shelter in the homeland of Palestine.

Among the vital questions which must imperatively be solved, justly and practically, when the international organization is established and peace settlements are made, there are few which possess such intrinsic significance and at the same time hold so many elements of danger as those involved in the decisions which must be reached with regard to Palestine. In the whole of the world today I know of no other region which contains so many potentially explosive forces as that area of the world in the center of which Palestine is located. That sacred spot, from which stems the civilization of our Western World and the civilization of vast reaches of other continents, must never again find itself submerged in the whirlpool of antagonistic rivalries. Those who, like myself, know that the establishment of an independent Palestine as a National Jewish Homeland is an ideal which represents the spiritual conviction of many millions of people throughout the earth, and who also believe that it is an objective inherently right and just, cannot but be profoundly concerned over some of the political developments of recent times.

But I would be remiss were I not to take this opportunity to say once more what I have already publicly stated—that the views which Dr. Weizmann has expressed as to the manner in which this great objective can best be eventually attained are views which seem to me to be wholly sound and altogether wise. Dr. Weizmann has demonstrated the highest qualities of statesmanship. I think that he has never better demonstrated those qualities than in the various public statements which he has had occasion to make during the past few months.

I do not think that the creation of the Commonwealth of Palestine can ever be advanced by violence, or by the threat of force. On the contrary, I am convinced that the attainment of that objective will thereby only be retarded. I am further confident that only through the initial creation of an international trusteeship over Palestine by the coming international organization to replace the present British mandate will a just solution of the problem of Palestine be effectively furthered.

For the purpose of advancing world stability and increasing the effectiveness of world organization, I am a believer, as I have often said, in the establishment of regional systems of states under the supreme authority of a universal international organization. If a Pan-Arab League is now established under the supreme authority of an international organization for the purpose of furthering the legitimate political, cultural, and economic interests of the people of the Arab states, and if the functioning of that league demonstrates that those are in fact the sole objectives sought, I would most certainly regard the creation of such a regional system as of great positive value in the world to come. But if such a league is founded in part as a means of exercising greater pressure against the realization of that kind of solution for the problem of Palestine which I have long upheld, its functioning must inevitably result in further hostility in this already sadly distraught world.

If, however, the international organization exercises a trusteeship over Palestine during a transitional period, until all outstanding international problems in the Near East can be equitably solved and the Commonwealth of Palestine can be prepared to enjoy its independence, I would regard the entrance of Palestine, during that transitional period, into some form of economic federation with its neighbors—with Syria, the Lebanon, and Transjordan, for instance—as a development which would be wholly wise and wholly desirable.

Some of us have read in recent years able technical works which demonstrate, beyond the shadow of a doubt, the tremendous development of Palestine which can be effected by the scientific use of its natural resources. By the proper utilization of these resources, many hundreds of thousands of additional persons can profitably be assimilated into the body politic of Palestine. And many of us are equally convinced that if Palestine and its neighbors formed the type of federation to which I have referred, not only could a far greater utilization be made of water and power resources, but large development projects similar in character to our own successful experiment in the Tennessee Valley could be advantageously carried out.

This is not the moment for me even to touch upon the highly intricate and controversial question of the relationship of the Jews and Arabs at present within Palestine. That, it seems to me, is a problem which can undoubtedly be solved in a spirit of justice as soon as the main lines of an over-all solution are established. But certainly upon one point I am confident, and that is that should the international organization, as I so earnestly hope, establish an international trusteeship over Palestine, the number of Jewish immigrants permitted entry into Palestine would in the future be limited solely by the capacity of the land profitably to take care of them.

It may be that direct negotiations with a view to the settlement of these basic questions can be successfully carried out between Jewish leaders and the leaders of the Arab world. In my considered judgment every possible effort should be made to advance such negotiations. But they should be undertaken only under the auspices and with the assistance of the international organization. The great powers must press for the success of such negotiations. By doing so they will provide the best assurance that a just, and a final, solution will be found.

These are the immediate issues as I see them. We can but recognize that, until they are settled, one of the greatest and most difficult problems of the world will remain unsolved. It is not too much to say that, until it is solved, the peaceful, the stable, and the progressive world which we envisage will not exist.

And here again is one of the great questions in which the government of the United States, within the world organization to come, must exercise its effective leadership. Our country has no selfish interests at stake. It can here utilize its unquestioned influence to bring about the creation of a new member of the family of nations, a member which at the same time will be one of the oldest of them all. It can here once more give evidence of its devotion to the cause of international justice as the surest foundation of world peace.

[This article is taken from a speech delivered by Mr. Welles on April 16 before the New York chapter of Hadassah.]

Canol, the War's Epic Blunder

BY EDWARD A. HARRIS

THE sorriest chapter of the American war effort on the home front has just been completed with the casual announcement by the War Department that the $134,000,000 Canol (Canadian oil) project will be discontinued by next June 30. The decision to abandon the whole undertaking was reached "because of the anticipated improvement of the tanker situation, as well as the greatly improved military position of the Alaskan area supplied by the refinery, in the light of American progress in the Pacific war." Thus hundreds of miles of pipe line, laid by thousands of troops and American laborers, are being abandoned in the army's most colossal blunder. Despite the attempt of the War Department to whitewash the whole affair, the story of Canol contains certain pertinent lessons that should serve as warnings in the future.

As late as December, 1943, testifying before the Truman investigating committee, Lieutenant General Brehon B. Somervell, chief of the Army Service Forces, said the project should not only be completed but expanded. He expressed sharp disagreement with Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes and others who urged its abandonment without spending any more of the taxpayers' money. Now, three years after the project was started and less than a year after oil and high-octane gasoline began pouring through the pipes to fuel our air bases in Alaska, General Somervell is in full accord with the decision to write it off as a bad investment.

Somervell admitted that he had authorized the venture on the basis of a one-page memorandum submitted to him by his dollar-a-year civilian technical adviser, Dean James H. Graham of the University of Kentucky School of Engineering. He said frankly that he agreed with Graham's testimony before the committee that "from an economic standpoint the whole project was cockeyed from the beginning," but explained that early in 1942 the military situation looked perilous and military expediency dictated Canol.

He told the Senators further that at the time he gave the green light to the project his time schedule called for completion of the 600-mile line from Norman Wells in Canada to White Horse and construction of a refinery there by the fall of 1942. "I knew that the time schedule was very optimistic," he went on. "In fact, I knew it couldn't be done." The Joint Chiefs of Staff did not approve the enterprise until October 26, 1943; this, of course, was after the Truman committee had announced its intention of making a probe.

Canol was really a combination of two projects. The first was for the construction of storage and docking facilities for oil products and pipe lines for their distribution at a cost of $35,000,000. The second, involving a total expenditure of $99,000,000, included the prospecting for oil and development of new wells in the vicinity of Norman Wells at a cost of $17,000,000; construction of a 600-mile four-inch pipe line to transport 3,000 barrels of petroleum a day from Norman Wells to White Horse, at a cost of $31,000,000; the transfer of a refinery from Corpus Christi, Texas, to White Horse, in Yukon Territory, at a cost of $24,000,000; and the construction of winter and summer transportation facilities for freight over the Great Slave Lake-Mackenzie River route at a cost of $27,000,000.

One cannot take issue with General Somervell's insistence that the perilous military situation in the Far East dictated the launching of the project. Major General T. M. Robins, deputy chief of United States Army Engineers, after studying Somervell's original directive, commented that ten times the volume of oil delivery contemplated under the project could be made by barges and tankers available on United States rivers at one-tenth the cost and effort of Canol, but when the phrase "military expediency" is raised in war time, the door is presumably closed to civilian criticism. No one could question, for example, the statement of Under Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson before the Truman committee in November, 1943, that the success of Canol might determine the "size and extent" of an air offensive aimed at the heart of the Japanese Empire.

But in the light of the record it is not only permissible but important to point to some of the glaring errors that were made once the project was decided upon. Never satisfactorily answered before the committee were the following questions: Why was the refinery built at White Horse, in Canada, instead of at Fairbanks, Alaska, where it would have been better placed for the war against Japan? Why did General Somervell rely on a one-page memorandum from a technical adviser in deciding to start the project, and why did the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as late as the fall of 1943, refuse to turn over to the Truman committee their "confidential file" on the undertaking? Why was Ickes not consulted in advance? Why did Somervell ignore the pipe-line route advised by the noted Arctic explorer, Vilhjalmur Stefansson, who Patterson said had "fathered" the Canol idea and who told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that his simpler, less costly route would have placed the refinery in Alaska? Why was a four-inch pipe line built from Norman Wells to White Horse instead of a pipe line of greater capacity? And, finally, why was the contract between our government and Imperial Oil, Ltd., a Canadian company that is controlled by Standard Oil of New Jersey, so drawn that the War Department was obliged belatedly to take steps to safeguard our interests?

The final report of the Truman committee pointed out that Imperial Oil controlled an "oil field" at Norman Wells consisting of five wells, two of which were dry at the time the War Department contracted with Imperial for expansion and development of the field. Imperial furnished nothing for the $1.25 we paid per barrel of oil except the right to drill on its property, subject to its supervision. "The $1.25 per barrel," said the report, "is in substance a royalty, and should be contrasted with royalties of about 15 to 20 cents per barrel paid for oil in the United States. The contract is really too favorable to Imperial Oil, because in addition to being paid the royalty, Imperial Oil, at the end of the war, will own the wells drilled and the oil reserves proved at the expense of the United States." The report also pointed out that the contract failed to contain the usual provision requiring renegotiation under the Renegotiation Act.

An agreement reached with the Canadian government at the start of the project provided that the crude-oil pipe line and refinery would be appraised at the close of the war, and that Canada would be given first option to purchase the property at the appraised value. It was specified that if Canada failed to exercise the option, the property could be sold to any other bidder. Since the Canadian government already has indicated its disinclination to take up the option, Standard Oil, through its Canadian subsidiary, will presumably be in a position to acquire the pipe line and refinery at a fraction of their actual construction costs. With title to the wells and proved reserves at Norman Wells automatically reverting to Imperial Oil at the end of the war, this fortunate company will find itself in an enviable oil-producing position in Canada. Yet it is one of the anomalies of the entire bizarre Canol episode that technicians of Standard Oil advised the War Department against the undertaking three years ago. The "unfavorable" provisions in the contracts with the oil company and the Canadian government, said the Truman report, were inserted, not because those parties to the contract "were greedy and sought to take advantage" of the United States, but on the suggestion of the War Department.

In retrospect it becomes painfully clear that Canol was ill conceived and ill executed, and that responsible War Department officials clung stubbornly to their mistake. Even as the sponge is tossed in, with the announcement that operations will cease in June, there is no confession that a staggering blunder was made, and persisted in, despite repeated warnings by the Truman committee, by Ickes, and even by the Navy Department, which frowned on the undertaking from the start. The story of Canol, in short, is an indictment of decisions based on one-man snap judgments, of the unwillingness of the War Department to seek the advice of other government officials more familiar with the matter under discussion, and of the obstinacy that army men so often exhibit when they can use the excuse of "military security." After Canol the country is poorer but wiser.

The futility of the Canol undertaking is all the more deplorable in view of the rich possibilities in the full development of Alaska and the Canadian Northwest. The region not only contains great pools of oil but is certain to become of tremendous importance as the new air gateway to Asia and northern Europe. "Go north, young man," may well become the modern substitute for Greeley's historic advice.

In the Wind

HERE ARE SOME FIGURES (1) for those who grumble about rationing and (2) for those who hint darkly that the bureaucrats are shipping most of our meat to Canada. The Department of Agriculture's "Report on the National Food Situation" shows that meat consumption in the United States last year was 147 pounds per person; in Canada, where meat is not rationed, consumption was 138.8 pounds per person.

FORMER CONGRESSMAN Martin L. Sweeney of Ohio celebrated his sixtieth birthday on April 16 by denouncing "British imperialism" for "dragging my country into war," at a meeting of the Intelligent Voters' League in Cleveland. He received birthday greetings from Gerald L. K. Smith, Senator Burton K. Wheeler, and William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor.

ADVERTISEMENT in the Lincolnshire, England, Chronicle: "Owner of tractor . . . wishes to correspond with widow who owns a modern Foster threshers; object matrimony; send photograph of machine."

I. J. FOX, the New York furrier who used to advertise by sky-writing before the war put a stop to such use of airplanes, recently started advertising war bonds that way at the request of the Treasury Department. So many protests poured in, however, that he has dropped the idea.

A SURVEY of 150 soldiers discharged in New York City revealed that only 13 were still able to get into their old civilian clothes.

WEST IS WEST: The January 21 issue of the Forum, an Indian nationalist weekly published in Bombay, has just reached us. This is from its review of M.-G.-M.'s "Kismet"; "A part of 'Kismet' is meant to be purely sex-appeal business. . . . Marlene Dietrich is now too old a dame for all this. . . . [It] is a hotch-potch of romance and Oriental splendor. . . . The whole bunch of Western players should not have been made to play Easterners' roles."

LEGISLATIVE MEMO: The $500,000 appropriation of the FEPC will expire June 30, and the next fiscal year begins July 1. Representative Clarence Cannon of Missouri is chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, which is now pondering the question whether to renew the FEPC's funds. . . . The House Judiciary Committee, headed by Hatton W. Summers of Texas, is sitting on H. R. 7, a bill to outlaw the poll tax. The committee will have to let the House vote on the bill if 218 Representatives sign a petition for the bill's release. At this writing the petition has 178 signatures. Senator Claude Pepper of Florida has promised to introduce a companion measure in the Senate if the House passes H. R. 7.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Athens Calling

BY HAL LEHRMAN

Athens, April 24

IN THE six months since its liberation Greece has had three governments and sixty-one Cabinet ministers. The country's biggest business is politics. Very little else is done. Prices are astronomical, wages microscopic. The war-shattered economy is moaning for first aid but getting only large doses of political oratory. Some 150 persons have been killed by the rightest terror since the Varkiza accord of February 12, and according to the E. A. M. 7,500 have been killed. The truce which followed last winter's civil war, when 11,000 persons died and $250,000,000 worth of property was destroyed, has suffered too much violation through pro-fascist lawlessness, abetted by official indifference to continue to be a sound international investment for a Balkan peace.

If the Yalta decision concerning liberated territories means anything at all, the place to apply it is Greece, and the time is now. President Roosevelt told Congress in his last message that Britain, Russia, and the United States had agreed "to join together during the temporary period of post-hostilities to help the liberated peoples solve their [political, economic] problems through democratic processes." Greece certainly has tremendous problems. And no democratic processes are operating. Moreover, it is torn by complex feuds which may explode at any moment into fresh hostilities.

The highest American official observers here during the first days of the December uprising were convinced that further bloodshed could be avoided only by an Anglo-American or tri-power commission. They still hold this opinion. So do many Greeks of various persuasions. The leftists have long been demanding an international inquiry into Greek affairs, and one of the unpublicized acts of the late government of General Plastiras, who was no leftist, was to ask the British to arrange for tripartite supervision of the plebiscite which was to decide between the monarchy and a republic.

In terms of United Nations policy, unilateral intervention in Greece has failed. This is not intended as British-baiting. The individual Briton in Greece is sick of the whole adventure and would like to get out. Official British policy is the usual muddle, whether its purpose is still to restore the monarchy—as only a few now believe—or to settle for any regime favorable to British strategic interests, or merely to establish order so that the Greeks may choose the form of government they like. The British brought back Plastiras from exile, and billed him as an impartial strong man. Everyone else in Greece knew that Plastiras was a good general and king-hater but not a good politician. He appointed men to office because they had been his republican friends twenty years ago, ignoring their subsequent political divergences and the question of their fitness. As a result, right and left began to assail him, especially the royalists because he refused to set an early date for the plebiscite. The British found him "inconvenient." A fortnight ago, under cover of a scurrilous monarchist charge that he had been pro-Nazi in 1941, Plastiras was fired. The circumstances indicated British pressure on Regent Damaskinos—which automatically made Plastiras a popular hero again and Ambassador Leeper a villain. If the royalist maneuver had been ignored, there is reason to believe that the Regent would have dismissed Plastiras later anyway. Damaskinos, who is credited with anti-royalist sentiments himself, feared the Premier's lack of suppleness might eventually provoke a genuine crisis and really upset the republican apple cart. But the British were blamed.

Whom did they select to succeed Plastiras in the work of soothing the country and preparing for the plebiscite? Admiral Voulgaris, whose last noteworthy deed was the suppression of the Alexandria mutiny in April, 1944! The choice again underlines London's penchant for somersaults: the Admiral was once prominent in Churchill's little black book because of his dubious activities in the Middle East, particularly his connection with the Greek arms manufacturer Athanassiadis Bodossakis, whom the British locked up for a spell.

One item in the British program, however, is difficult to explain as mere confusion. The Greek army is now being reconstructed with the aid of a British military mission, and the British are furnishing first-rate modern equipment; during the recent Independence Day celebration a display of mechanized armor and pursuit planes dazzled the Athenian crowds. The Greek General Staff is methodically welding this army into a political weapon, loading it with royalists from the ranks to the top command. Quisling security battalions and monarchist mountain and sacred brigades are being incorporated en masse. Eighteen to twenty-six of the brigade colonels of the National Guard are royalists. Conscripts suspected of an E. L. A. S. taint are rejected for "medical" reasons; former E. L. A. S. officers are not given even that excuse.

National guardsmen sent to the provinces to restore "order" have been responsible for innumerable acts of violence. The Communist press may exaggerate, but enough instances have been authenticated to justify the charge that E. A. M. adherents, republicans, and sometimes just plain people who neglect to adorn their homes with the King's portrait are being arrested, beaten, and even murdered. When the guardsmen themselves do not join in the man hunt, they and the local gendarmerie look the other way while illegal pro-fascist bands smash printing presses, burn organizational headquarters, and torture non-converts. (Among these bands is the notorious gang called "X," after the two crossed gammas which are the initials of George and his Glücksberg dynasty.) Peasants are taking to the hills as in the days of the Germans.

If the terror is less evident in Athens, it is only because the capital is larger than a village. I saw the fresh bloodstains on an Athenian sidewalk where Michael Milos, owner of a coffee house, was shot dead by X-men in the middle of the day because he had Communist papers in his possession. Last Wednesday police, escorted by armed civilians, arrested my friend Statis Someritis, liberal Socialist leader, because he had a rusty Italian pistol in his home. These are characteristic, not isolated, incidents. But collaborationists stroll about freely or continue to hold high posts.

During the Plastiras regime officials dismissed reports of terrorism as Communist propaganda. The Voulgaris government at least admits "a number of incidents throughout the country." The police have been vainly instructed to protect the sale of left-wing newspapers. The Premier has shaken a menacing finger at pro-royalist political associations within the army. But no effective measures have been taken or are planned; and rightist violence is still explained as the natural reaction to earlier E. A. M. excesses. Though such excesses have been magnified in the telling, it is undeniable that atrocities did occur. They were committed, however, during the civil war and largely by uncontrollable criminal elements, and do not justify official toleration of a nationwide vendetta.

The Voulgaris Cabinet, composed of technicians and university professors, is a service government without party roots. It is a stop-gap until the plebiscite. The royalists are demanding a plebiscite within three months in order to profit by the popular reaction against the December disorders. The republicans, expecting a renewed democratic trend once the memories of December have faded, protest that a plebiscite cannot be arranged quickly. Electoral lists must first be drawn up—and Greece has not gone to the polls for more than ten years. Communications are still paralyzed. Tens of thousands of refugees must be returned home. Many districts lack adequate police and administration. The Voulgaris government, which represents nothing save expediency, may go down in the struggle over the plebiscite's date.

The Greeks, it is said, would spend less time on politics if they had more work. Four-fifths of the country's pre-war industrial workers are jobless. Anticipated 1945 agricultural production is 40 per cent of normal. Confidence in the national currency is nil. The value of the gold sovereign, established by military fiat at 2,400 drachmas, reached 10,000 this week. These sovereigns could be bought for $20 in Cairo and sold for $60 in Athens. Factories lack raw materials and machines lack power. Farms need plows, chemicals, and draft animals; half the animals in the country were killed during the war. Industry and agriculture alike need transport; in all Greece less than a dozen locomotives of ancient vintage are operating over a few miles of surviving track; yesterday's newspaper said that the government had "asked the UNRRA for trucks and iron bridges." Unless the powers contribute several days of their war budgets as a free gift to Greece the UNRRA is its only hope. But the UNRRA agreed to furnish supplies and let the government distribute them. The mechanism for this was set up after long negotiation, and then Plastiras fell. Now the whole process must begin again.

Without a stable government Greek economy cannot revive. Unless the people can make a reasonably free choice between monarchy and republic, no Greek government can be stable. Without benevolent Allied joint intervention no plebiscite can be minimally safe or honest. A loud silence greeted the Stettinius statement that the Greeks had consulted the British ambassador during the Plastiras crisis but not the American. Our habit of offering criticism while avoiding responsibility is resented. As for the Russians, they named a minister to Athens but sent him to Brussels. It does no good to point cynically to the situation in Bucharest or Sofia or the Polish morass. Greece is the test par excellence of future peace. Here Britain and the Soviet Union are squarely face to face, and America is there to link their hands. Athens is where Yalta should begin.

YOU MUST HAVE SOMETHING THAT WILL FIT

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

CONCENTRATION camps were established in Germany in 1933, immediately after the Nazis came to power. In the twelve years that have passed since then the horrible conditions in these camps were always well known. Hundreds of books, reports, and signed and sworn-to documents gave a detailed picture of the tortures, the starvation, the murders in such camps as Buchenwald, Esterwegen, and Dachau. The authenticity of these accounts was finally recognized officially: in the winter of 1939-40 the British government published a White Paper in which were collected a number of the most terrible reports.

None of the atrocities which the progressive occupation of these camps has disclosed to a horrified world are therefore really news. It is true that the picture familiar to us for the past twelve years has been filled out with some new details. What one might call the normal standardized horrors were intensified in some camps during the weeks of military collapse. Methods that were once apparently restricted to concentration camps were extended to some camps for war prisoners. But essentially nothing has been uncovered that was not established beyond the shadow of a doubt a long time ago. The indignation and rage, twelve years overdue, which have now broken forth, only prove that people react much more violently to what they see with their own eyes than to what they read about, and are incomparably more outraged by atrocities against their own kind—that is, against American and British prisoners of war—than against foreigners, such as Jews, German political prisoners, and slave workers from the occupied countries.

This belated indignation revives the old unfruitful debate about whether the Nazis alone or all Germans should be blamed for such horrors. One of the last Swedish correspondents to leave Germany, a Mr. Jaegerlund of the Stockholm Tidningen, has attracted international attention with some articles vigorously defending the German people. After observing them for twelve years, he holds that they "are far more Christian than their government." He wrote, for example, that "the German people had nothing to do with the persecution of the Jews; everyone living in Germany after 1933 could testify to the reaction of Germans to the anti-Jewish drive." And not only did the average German, according to Mr. Jaegerlund, disapprove of the persecution of the Jews; he was kept in ignorance of what was actually done to them. "After the Jews disappeared from Germany, their extermination proceeded without the public's knowing anything about it. Most Germans never had the least idea what became of the Jews, except that they believed them to be concentrated in large eastern camps. I myself did not know what happened in those camps."

Mr. Jaegerlund's statements were received in Sweden as "an outburst of pro-Germanism" and vehemently contradicted. In America and England only a few cautious voices have been raised in defense of the Germans, but as the war draws to a close and the excitement ebbs, it is easy to foresee that that point of view will find expression. In Russia, if appearances are not deceptive, the former intransigent anti-German attitude, of which Ilya Ehrenburg was the official exponent, has recently been abandoned and a sensationally softer "line" has been adopted.

That not all Germans are Nazis is too obvious to be seriously disputed. Germans not only invented concentration camps but formed their most numerous inmates and victims. Before 1940 there were only Germans, and German Jews, in these butcher pens. That alone, in simple logic, refutes the assertion that all Germans are Nazis. Of course no one can figure out the percentage of non-Nazis among the Germans. There are no statistics on the subject and none can be gathered, for there is no clear-cut dividing line between Nazis and non-Nazis. But however large or however small the percentage of non-Nazis may be, some certainly exist.

The fact, however, has no practical application. The problems to be solved at the end of the war are, first, how to prevent another war, and, second, how to obtain reparations for the damage Germany has done in this one. Whether all Germans or only some Germans are Nazis has no bearing on the solution of these problems. The measures that must be taken to assure protection and compensation will of course hit the relatively guiltless, the non-Nazis, as well as the others, but it has always been true in this imperfect world that collective measures can scarcely ever be taken against a group without the innocent suffering. Indeed, the innocent are often hit by measures against other individuals. Society imprisons an arsonist or an embezzler although terrible suffering is thereby inflicted on his innocent wife and still more innocent children. Consideration for these innocent victims has never influenced lawmakers or courts to forgo action protecting society from arsonists and embezzlers.

Germany is an analogous case. It is quite clear that perfectly innocent non-Nazis are to be found there, in greater or smaller numbers. But it is also clear that in practice this fact cannot be taken into account. The realities of human existence, its incurable imperfections and contradictions, compel the innocent to suffer inescapably along with the guilty.

In some fields, of course, it will be possible to make a distinction between good and bad Germans. When, for example, the battalions are formed which are to furnish reparation in the form of labor, individual innocent non-Nazis should not be mobilized indiscriminately with individual guilty Nazis. All action against individuals can be differentiated. But it is a great error to think that the presence of non-Nazis in Germany should influence the general, collective, national peace regulations. This error arises from the tendency to drag the notion of "guilt and expiation" into a problem which should be regarded as a purely practical one. The understanding and the moral instincts of men cannot be trusted at a time like the present to assign the blame justly in Germany or to determine the proper punishment. Let us content ourselves, more modestly, with finding the right way to obtain protection and compensation.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

ANGRY PENGUINS, you will remember, is the Australian magazine which last fall published with great éclat the poems of "Ern Malley," only to discover that both poems and poet had been invented by two Sydney writers, McAuliffe and Stewart, bent on "debunking the modern literary movement." In Angry Penguins for December, just received, is another Ern Malley section, in which the editors defend the "substantial correctness of our judgment" and print a series of comments for and against. The section leads off with a cable from Herbert Read:

I TOO WOULD HAVE BEEN DECEIVED BY ERN MALLEY, BUT HOAXER HOISTED BY OWN PETARD HAS TOUCHED OFF UNCONSCIOUS SOURCES INSPIRATION. WORK TOO SOPHISTICATED BUT HAS ELEMENTS OF GENUINE POETRY.

A. R. Chisholm, dean of the Faculty of Arts and professor of French at Melbourne University, also maintains that the hoaxers hoaxed themselves and "lapsed into poetry more often than they intended"; a psychiatrist rules that the poems were "an unwitting projection of [the] separate secret wishes [of the two inventors], fashioned in the unconscious admiration of a modern surrealist poet," which should put the inventors in their places. Another commentator says the poems which McAuliffe and Stewart wrote for Ern Malley are better than anything of their "own." Several note the glee of the philistines of press and public in using Ern Malley as a stick with which to beat modern literature and art in general. It all adds up to a rather interesting discussion of the writing and judgment of poetry. It doesn't, however, vindicate the perspicacity of Max Harris, one of the editors of Angry Penguins, who went so far overboard for Ern Malley. One critic, Dorothy Green, suggests that the editors deserved and were bound to be taken in sooner or later because of their longstanding lack of critical responsibility, which enabled them "to despise those who did not see eye to eye with them" and "to reserve to themselves the last word on all matters of criticism of the arts, while neglecting often to make their criticisms even grammatical." It's quite possible that a little humility might have saved them, first, from mistaking the concoction of McAuliffe and Stewart for authentic poetry, and, second, from proclaiming so dogmatically that it was superior poetry. "The literary life," says Miss Green, "has been too easy for Mr. Harris." Another critic, Nettie Palmer, has this to say:

We are passing through a period when forms are being loosened or superseded. This places an exceptional responsibility on writers and critics. For unless standards are continually defined and maintained, the escape from the old Latin proverb, "Art is long," may be only toward the other, "The market for monsters is always open."

The Ern Malley affair turns out to have been instructive as well as entertaining. Certainly it does not, as the philistines would have it, discredit modern poetry. It does show how critics like Mr. Harris, who is obviously short on real perception and long on the desire to be way out in front, may be hoist with their own avant-gardism.

SUNDAY HAS ITS DEFENDERS South and North. In Alabama both the Montgomery Advertiser and the Gadsden Times took me politely to task for my remarks about it, and the Gadsden paper went to the trouble of suggesting how I might spend the day happily. First I mustn't stay up too late the night before, though the editor admitted that "working girls like Miss Marshall will want to indulge themselves some on Saturday night." A leisurely breakfast, the Sunday paper, and a second cup of coffee; then the "rush for church" in my Sunday best. Then Sunday dinner, "which is quite an event in itself." After that a walk or a visit; and at twilight "one can get several friends or kinsmen together for scrambled eggs or waffles, or in case of maiden ladies, perhaps those pale salads they seem to like so much."

A correspondent in New Hampshire is much sterner about my confession to the Sunday neurosis. "It would be too much," he says, "to commend Emerson to you after your sad and contemptuous reference to Sunday. And yet it is interesting that anyone could say as he did in that memorable address: 'the jubilee of the whole world, whose light dawns welcome alike into the closet of the philosopher, into the garret of toil, and into prison cells, and everywhere suggests even to the vile the dignity of spiritual being.'" Emerson, I admit, is very persuasive, and I'm quite ready to believe that the trouble lies with me and not with Sunday. But a letter from a soldier which tells me that he hates Sunday too makes me feel at least less lonely.

VERCORS HAS TURNED UP AGAIN, this time in a letter from Kay Boyle which I find so interesting that I print the pertinent parts. And even those readers who may feel, at mention of his name, that this is where they came in, will find it worth staying for.

I believe that Lincoln Kirstein, among others, is quite justified in being shocked at our questioning of the ideological source of the book, and of Jean Bruller's integrity—I was of the same opinion as you, and expressed it in my review of Vercors's book in the New York Times.

Where I think Kirstein errs is in his defense of Jean Bruller as "a serious writer" on the evidence alone of "The Silence of the Sea." (Incidentally, it reads no better in French than in English, the translation being admirably done.) No serious writer, I am convinced, could have treated the subject of enemy occupation with such faltering conviction.

I met Jean Bruller in Paris two months ago. There is not the slightest doubt that he was a man of courage and of the Resistance, but his book remains for me an apologetic little book. I talked with several French writers who know him well, and they stressed the point which I think cannot be made too often in any discussion of "The Silence of the Sea"—that it was written in 1941 at a time when the Germans were being, for the French at least and because they

THE SEVEN MYTHS OF HOUSING

A definitive survey of low-cost public housing

by
Nathan Straus

First Administrator of the United States Housing Authority

At all bookshops • $2.75

This is a BORZOI BOOK, published in New York by

ALFRED A. KNOPP

- The foremost authority in the Nation today on public housing sets out with two objectives and ably achieves both.
—Max Spindel, Philadelphia Inquirer
- Mr. Straus' able and comprehensive treatment of the essential issues is an important contribution and should lead to a better understanding of the social value of good housing.
—Arthur Bergholz, Chicago Tribune
- To the demolition of the myths he brings an iconoclastic sledge hammer of documented figures. A volume essential to the informed student.
—St. Louis Globe-Democrat
- Many will quarrel with details of the Straus plan or its whole thesis. It is up to those who do to suggest something better.
—R. L. Duffus, N. Y. Times
- An informative and exceedingly readable book.
—Catherine Coyne, Boston Herald
- He exposes the machinations of selfish interests which have so far successfully resisted large-scale efforts to rebuild the slums from which they derive huge profits.
—Albert Deutsch, PM
- Nathan Straus puts the quintessentials of his unusual experience in private and public housing into this timely and helpful book.—Cleveland Rodgers, Saturday Review of Literature
- Through the sheer strength and logic of his presentation he disproves the myths.
—Edward E. Clark, Chicago Sun
- He has managed to turn innumerable fiscal and factual statements into a book that ranks well in interest among current non-fiction works.
—Architectural Forum
- This is by all odds the best book on the philosophy of public housing now available.
—American Journal of Public Health
- Clear, concise, challenging.
—Harper's Magazine
- Should command the attention of every forward looking and thinking citizen.
—Boris Shishkin, American Federationist
- Popularly written, excellently documented and illustrated and filled with facts. A must book for all interested in a decently housed America.
—Harry W. Laidler, Survey Graphic
- The writing is simple, direct, and on the whole sweetly reasonable. Mr. Straus marshals facts in a way that should appeal to a businessman or civic leader seeking light.
—Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science
- A very valuable contribution to international thought on low-rent housing.
—Sir Ernest Simon, member of the Economic Advisory Council of Great Britain
- It is a relief to find the fundamental A B C's stated so sharply and to see the current hysterical blitz on public housing answered with such exact documentation and lucid common sense.
—Catherine Bauer
- I hope it will be widely read throughout the country.
—Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt
- The most thorough and authoritative discussion of what is going to be one of our acute postwar problems.
—Ted Robinson, Cleveland Plain Dealer

had been instructed to be so, the "correct" and even gallant gentlemen. "The Silence of the Sea" was not written after the deportation of French labor into Germany had begun, and after the Resistance had developed into an organized movement. It was written at least two years before.

Jean Bruller has un petit talent, as it was put by one French author whose name I obviously cannot disclose. And un petit talent I think explains Bruller's irresolute and unforgivably sentimentalized approach to a situation which demanded almost any other kind of treatment but that. My amended and perhaps even clarified verdict on the book now is that Jean Bruller wrote in a rather engaging way an ailing little story which, there is not the slightest doubt, did a great deal of harm outside of France. I spoke of the book to an active Resistance man in Paris and he seemed rather taken aback that, with so many vital issues afoot, I should have troubled to mention the book at all. "Mais, ça ne compte pas," he said.

In Italy I met at a lunch party an Italian count who was obviously convalescing from a prolonged and violent case of Fascism. During our conversation at table he said to me that he had had the good fortune to procure a French book recently—a book that was a "poetic masterpiece" and at the same time the only reliable book about the Germans which he had seen produced during this war. He had met in Italy a hundred Germans like the hero of this book, he said, and he, as a cultivated man, had certainly more in common with them than he had with the pure home-product of America.

I think you will see what I mean.

Who Walk WITH THE Earth

a new novel by

DORSHA HAYES

Richard Wright, author of BLACK BOY, says: "Dorsha Hayes handles a memorable situation with a notable degree of narrative and dramatic power. She confronts a daring and crudely individualistic East Side labor leader with a sensitive and naive Boston boy who wants to change the world... a big and important theme... a meaning and message that should command wide attention."

By the author of MRS. HEATON'S DAUGHTER

At all bookstores • $2.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

SEVERAL PEOPLE have informed me that chives are a cultivated product and that what I took for chives on the Capitol grounds were really wild onions. No doubt they are right. In a word, if it were June and if there were cows on the Capitol grounds, we might expect June butter, if there were any butter.

THE MOST AMUSING COMMENT on President Truman that I have seen so far was contained in an A. P. dispatch from Lamar, Missouri, which read as follows:

The second best-known native son of President Truman's home town is Arthur Aull, editor of the Lamar Democrat, who says what he pleases at all times, and is nationally famous for his unorthodox daily.

Aull was not exactly lavish in his comment on Truman's ascendancy to the Presidency. He said: "We are not unfortunate in having Truman for President. He wants to please. He is conversant with statecraft, and he is likely to do pretty well. He is a man of fair judgment and real patriotism. We expect to see him succeed reasonably well at his giant task."

Education Can Be Interesting

TEACHER IN AMERICA. By Jacques Barzun. An Atlantic Monthly Book. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

IT IS rare to pick up a book the whole of which persistently contradicts the first statement in it. Mr. Barzun begins: "Education is indeed the dullest of subjects, and I intend to say as little about it as I can." He then proceeds to write the wittiest and most amusing as well as one of the soundest and most penetrating books upon that theme that I have ever read. The reason is, of course, that he is writing about the real process of education, the living contact of teacher and student. His book is, throughout, inspired shop talk about the art of teaching; there certainly is nothing in it of that battery of doctrines, formulas, and statistics, masked by a smoke screen of "pedagogue," by which the professional "educationist" tries to prevent the reader from coming to a clear view of the subject.

Writing out of the intimacy of his experience, Mr. Barzun never loses sight of the supremely obvious points that while there may be a philosophy of education, it will never be a science; and that teaching, in contrast to certain kinds of training and instruction, is a personal relation and education a personal affair. "Teaching is not a lost art, but the regard for it is a lost tradition." That art has greatly changed as our society has changed. What is teaching like now, what should it promise, and what can it perform?

The layman has the resentful illusion that while he works a solid eight or nine hours a day, the college teacher graciously meets two or three classes in the morning and spends his afternoons on the golf course and his evenings reading out-of-print books or playing bridge. In contrast to this Mr. Barzun vividly describes what teaching is really like. When one adds to the tension and strain of conducting classes the long hours on committees, in counseling students and superintending their advanced work, in study and research, the fact is that teaching is among the most arduous of professions and "steady teaching is a task that would fray the nerves of an ox." Good teaching, he quotes a dean as saying, is really a matter of basal metabolism.

What does all this expenditure of energy accomplish? Here again certain illusions should be corrected. Some people believe that by making changes in the school system the world can be reformed. More people think that the teacher should at least instill certain attitudes and mold the characters of their students. These are sadly exaggerated claims. "No one in his senses would affirm that schooling is the hope of the world"; and the more modest demand, that the pedagogue shall make his pupils moral paragons, comes down to the fact that attitudes, so far as they are teachable at all, are communicated indirectly to the young by the example of everyone with whom they come in contact. It is not possible to teach tolerance or democracy as such. Only skills and subjects are teachable. Teaching is primarily intellectual; character is a by-product.

Mr. Barzun accordingly proceeds with a series of chapters on skills and subjects. Foremost come the three R's. They are the basic skills in which the student must be retrained on every educational level. He has sound advice to give on "How to Write and Be Read" and "How to Read and Be Right"; and mathematics, he thinks, might become more intelligible if its teachers took pains to show its applications and to translate it into the vernacular of common sense.

These are the basic skills which should be the ingredients of every education. On the side of content there has been, he thinks, a great deal of over-pretentious to-do about the organization of the curriculum. The clue is obvious. We start not from the college but from the world. A liberal education should be framed in such a way as to unify the most fundamental cultural interests of the society in which we live. If we ask what are the broad divisions of thought and action in that world, it becomes apparent that the curriculum should be organized around three basic foci of interest—the mathematical, physical, and biological sciences, history and the social sciences, and literature and the fine arts. Exposition of subjects should be in terms of these great divisions rather than in terms of a number of diverse departments and a multitude of separate courses. During the first two years every student should have the same basic education, one that would prepare him to specialize in any one of these three fields.

Columbia College, in which Mr. Barzun teaches, affords, he thinks, the clearest example of a curriculum organized in this way. It is increasingly evident as one college after another publishes its post-war plans that while there will and should be a great variety of individual differences among the colleges, this is becoming the predominant pattern that will gradually be imposed upon the disorder provoked by the elective "system."

One does not have to wish that this book will be read. It is too good and too delightfully written not to become well known. Perhaps even some college and university administrators and trustees will read it. If they do, it should greatly help us to get off to a new and better start in the post-war period by enforcing the lesson that education is not a matter of panaceas or gadgets but of bringing gifted teachers and able students together under the most favorable conditions.

GAIL KENNEDY

What We Laugh At—And Why

This book by Dr. Isaac Goldberg is not only a study of the meaning of humor and the sense of humor but is the repository of hundreds of illustrations in the form of jokes, wisecracks, stories, and the like. The book contains the following chapters:

1. HUMOR AND SENSE-OF-HUMOR. Laughter and Tears as Twins. The Mood of Laughter and Humor. Origin of the Word "Humor."
2. TYPES OF LAUGHTER. Automatism and Abnormality. Deception and Cruelty. Sex, Obscenity—Incongruity—Mock-Logic. Travesty.
3. THE WISDOM OF NONSENSE. "Escapology." The Humor of Omnipotence. Nonsense "Reason" and Nonsense Rhyme. The Music in Verbal Nonsense.
4. THE OFF-COLOR JOKE. Comments on Obscenity and Profanity. Off-color Humor and Wit. The Digestive and the Sexual Joke.
5. ASPECTS OF WIT. Rhymes With—and Without—Reason. Repartee—"Staircase Wit." Charlie Chaplin's Comicality. Negroes and Their Humor.
6. PUNNOLOGY. Punish Perpetrations and Atrocities. Famous Puns. Malapropisms. Examples.
7. FORMS OF RACIAL AND NATIONAL HUMOR. Scotch Jokes—How Scotch Are They? The Negro Joke. Jewish Wit and Humor. Humor and Social Class. American Humor. Humor and Madness—And Gertrude Stein.
9. MAX EASTMAN AND DR. FREUD. Theory of Laughter. Laughter As Medicine. Dreams, Poetry and Laughter.

"WHAT WE LAUGH AT—AND WHY" is a delightful, informed, wise, understanding, entertaining book. There are laughs on each page, and a smile in each paragraph. The author drew on the great writers and thinkers of all ages for his material and uses them not only to explain what humor means but to show the readers how the thing is made to tick, what gives a joke or an anecdote its "kick." He not only turns the reader in the direction of good humor but warns them how to avoid bad humor. Only a widely read scholar who also is himself a humorist and a philosopher could turn out a book like "WHAT WE LAUGH AT—AND WHY." A reading of this book will enable you to understand human psychology better. It will help you—but, above all, it will amuse and entertain as it delves into shrewd discussions of this most difficult of subjects, for only the smallest minority of writing men can explore the world of humor and emerge with a sane, rational, clear, workable theory.

This large book (60,000 words, 5½ x 8½ inches printed in a legible face of type and bound in card covers) may be had as a premium—FREE—if you will subscribe, or renew your subscription, to THE AMERICAN FREEMAN, the questions and answers monthly magazine, that is edited by E. Haldeman-Julius. Here are the terms of this premium offer:

Send only $1 for a year of THE AMERICAN FREEMAN (Canada and other foreign, $1.25) and you will receive the magazine once, with a FREE copy of the book described above.

E. Haldeman-Julius, Box 300, Girard, Kansas

YES! SEND ME A FREE COPY OF ISAAC GOLDBERG'S
"WHAT WE LAUGH AT—AND WHY"

E. Haldeman-Julius, Box 300, Girard, Kansas.

Enclosed find $1 (Canada and other foreign, $1.25) for which please enter my subscription to THE AMERICAN FREEMAN for a year and SEND ME A FREE COPY OF ISAAC GOLDBERG'S "WHAT WE LAUGH AT—AND WHY."

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

MEETING

New York Nation Readers are cordially invited to the Annual Spring Luncheon of the
LEAGUE OF INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY on

60 MILLION JOBS, FREEDOM AND THE GOOD LIFE
SAT., MAY 12, 12:30, Hotel Roosevelt, N. Y.

Speakers: PHILIP M. KLUTZNICK, Commissioner, Federal Housing Authority; LELAND OLDS, V.P., Federal Power Commission; Congressman JERRY VOORHIS; BORIS SHISHKIN, Economist, A. F. of L.; Chairman: HERBERT W. PAYNE, V.P., Textile Workers Union.

Tickets, $3.75, including gratuities.

Round Tables, 10-12:15 and 1 to 3 respectively, on Cooperatives, Social Services, Trade Unions, Housing, and Full Employment in Postwar Period at 50¢ per session with prominent group of panel members including J. King Gordon, Edward C. Lindeman, John J. Corson, Charlie Abrams, Marion H. Hodges, Mark Starr, Leroy Bowman, Johanna Lindler, Winslow Carlton, Cleveland Rodgers, Maurice P. Davidson, William Withers, Stanley Isaacs, Rebecca Simonson, Alfred Baker Lewis, Cabel Smith, and Nathaniel Minkoff.

Make reservations immediately with

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
112 East Nineteenth Street New York 3, N. Y.
HARRY W. LAIDLER, Program Chairman.

BRIEFER COMMENT

Family Resemblance

JAPAN'S MODERN EMPIRE-BUILDERS, like those of Germany, are being currently reduced to their proper proportions, somewhere below the superman level. It is still useful, nevertheless, to have a good look at their mentality, as provided by Otto D. Tolischus in "Through Japanese Eyes" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2). By the liberal use of direct quotations the author has permitted leading representatives of Japan's ruling cliques to expose their motivations and ambitions. The "incredible" character attaching to this material bears a strong family resemblance to much that is in "Mein Kampf," and has proved to be no less mischievous for the world at large. In its exposé of the imperial mythology this little volume does its neatest job. It will take an expert apology to show how these tribal concepts can continue in a world that is to be organized for peace. The most timely quotation is from Shigenori Togo—once more the Foreign Minister—on December 8, 1941, in a reply to Roosevelt's message to Hirohito: "Establishment of peace in the Pacific, and consequently in the world, has been the cherished desire of His Majesty, for the realization of which he had hitherto made his government continue his earnest endeavors. His Majesty trusts that the President is fully aware of this fact."

T. A. BISSON

Brief and Brilliant

IT IS IMPOSSIBLE to describe in a brief review the very great merits of "A Miniature History of the War" by R. C. K. Ensor (Oxford, $1.50). In about 18,000 words it provides a survey, which may be fairly described as brilliant, of the whole of the war, from its preparation down to the recapture of Paris. The lucid and vernacular, yet never "popular" style is adapted to carrying a great quantity of fact. The author's selection of material has been controlled by a single principle—the desire to show the progress of the war from the economic and military standpoints alone. There is little reference to the political aspects of events, and while the underlying political philosophy is clearly conservative, it is never allowed to color the author's analysis. There is no better way to indicate the guiding concept of the book than to give the titles of Chapters I, II, and IV: "How Germany Prepared Her Advantage," "How Germany Exploited Her Advantage," and "The Allies Free Their Hands." The integration of the economic account with the military narrative is beautifully accomplished. A brief epilogue satisfactorily refers to matters of minor importance omitted in the main body of the book. A chronological table of events is provided.

RALPH BATES

Medicine and Commerce

A SPECK OF MOLD wandered into the laboratory of the English bacteriologist Alexander Fleming one day in the fall of 1928, and it took the war to make anyone interested in its tremendous significance. In 1939, through the work of H. W. Florey in England and a host of research men in the United States, the difficult extraction of penicillin assumed practical proportions. J. D. Ratcliff in "Yellow Magic: the Story of Penicillin" (Random House, $2) gives a swift, dramatic account of this "greatest medical discovery of the age." He uses the drama of medical witchcraft to hide what can only be called criminal negligence—for all this could have been done fifteen years earlier. Mr. Ratcliff applauds American industry for gambling on the commercial venture of saving human life, and ignores the implication that without the promise of tremendous returns as a result of the war emergency this would not have been attempted at all.

JOHN SENIOR

ONE OF THE MORE IMPORTANT of New England's founders has waited three centuries for his deserved recognition. Clifford K. Shipton now gives him his due in "Roger Conant—A Founder of Massachusetts" (Harvard, $3). From scattered sources Mr. Shipton has reconstructed much of the life of Roger Conant and has skilfully portrayed him against the background of his times. This interesting volume is written with imagination and logic, as well as from a depth of accurate knowledge.

IN "THE BIBLE AND THE COMMON READER" (Macmillan, $2.50) Professor Mary Ellen Chase provides an enthusiastic book-by-book exegesis which many will find useful. She quotes, she summarizes, she fills in a historical background, she brings the Bible into the realm of common-sense discussion. All of which is only to note that she fulfils the promise of her title.

FICTION IN REVIEW

I AM not sure I know who the ghostly lover of the title of Elizabeth Hardwick's "The Ghostly Lover" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50) is. It might be the shadowy young Southerner—is Kentucky the state?—who appears early in the story to offer Miss Hardwick's heroine a questionable love which he later backs up with the money for a year's study at Columbia. Or perhaps it is the equally shadowy but rather more commonplace youth whom Marian meets in New York and whom she contemplates marrying in order to have a point of security in a peculiarly rootless life. More likely, though, it is Marian's mother, Lucy, one of a pair of the most elusive parents in fiction, for whom Marian lives and dreams in a curiously inverted child-mother relationship.

Of course the appropriateness of a novel's name is not necessarily of any moment in judging the novel, and if I begin my review of "The Ghostly Lover" with a statement of my confusion about its title, it is only as a token of my larger confusion in regard to Miss Hardwick's book as a whole. For by any of the usual tests "The Ghostly Lover" earns only a poor score. It lacks drama and even a coherent story direction; many of the characters are not given their narrative due; there is no unity of prose rhythm; a large part of the book is dull reading. Yet—and however paradoxical strong praise may seem after such a strong indictment—it has sporadic evidence of more real talent than a dozen current novels which can boast all the manifest skills which Miss Hardwick's book lacks.

I often think that the chief path being followed to the destruction of the modern novel is the path of sensibility. The ability to clothe fastidious insights in fastidious language is the modern literary stock in trade, and by Miss Hardwick's talent I most emphatically do not mean the sentences or paragraphs of fine writing of which "The Ghostly Lover" has its fashionable share. Indeed, I mean precisely the opposite—the quite fierce creativeness of which Miss Hardwick is capable when she leaves off being concerned with pursuing insight to its last pointed syllable. The general tone of "The Ghostly Lover" is a twilight tone of sensibility; yet it has a way of every now and then suddenly bursting into the full crude light of a rare imaginative intensity. Scattered through Miss Hardwick's book are perhaps twenty or thirty pages that would be remarkable from the maturest writer. There are the amazing moments, for instance, when Marian's grandmother, a delicate, invalid Southern gentlewoman, is all at once revealed as mesmerized in her dream of the possibility of violence between the sexes; and there is a scene between Marian's mother, Lucy, and a Negro rifling her refuse cans which has more bleak concentration of terror than almost any scene I have ever read out of the South; and there is the conception of Lucy's relation with her husband—Lucy's need to find the land beyond land where she can finally absorb all of her husband's masculinity into herself without the intrusion of any other human relationship. These are the moments in which Miss Hardwick passes beyond, say, Eudora Welty at her beginning best, to come close to the slashing courage of D. H. Lawrence.

It is worth noting that the inspiration for these grand occasions seem to be the South. When Miss Hardwick moves her heroine to New York, "The Ghostly Lover" is no longer either somnolent or flashingly brilliant. Instead, it is merely accurate, sensitive social reporting. Although, to me, Miss Hardwick's social observations are only conventionally interesting, in the opinion of her publishers her picture of a graduate women's dormitory at Columbia is the especially distinguished portion of her novel, and I am afraid there will be enough others to agree with this judgment to tempt Miss Hardwick to forfeit her larger powers in favor of what should be merely an adjunct of her creative imagination. D. H. Lawrence, too—let me adduce him again, since I have once already—had the reportorial gifts in sufficient abundance. He learned to subdue them to the intensity of his larger creative vision.

In the reviewing vocabulary "promising" is a favorite word to use of first novels. So far as I can recall, I have never used the word—and not only because I wished to avoid jargon, but because I have never felt the propriety of projecting a present merit into a hypothetical future performance. In the case of Miss Hardwick's novel, however, the disparity is so great between talent and a kind of romantic literary mediocrity—the high points are so really high, as well as so much higher than what surrounds them—that it is only in the light of a possible future fulfilment of Miss Hardwick's gifts that the book impresses itself upon me. Yet even here I hesitate; for in order to bring her talent to fulfilment Miss Hardwick has a tremendous task ahead of her. She has to learn to make her

Know the truth about the Negro!

Better race relations come from the better understanding of the Negroes' part in American Life.
These books give you all the facts you want to know.

"The NEGRO, TOO, in American History"

by MERL R. EPPSE, M. A.

The amazing story of over 300 years of the Negro and his progress down to the present era. An inspiration and a revelation. Written free of prejudice and opinion.

591 Pages, Cloth Bound, 90 Photographs, Indexed, $3.00

ALL THREE BOOKS FOR $5.00

- An Elementary History of America Including the Contributions of the Negro Race.
350 Pages, Cloth Bound, 24 Photographs, Indexed. $1.50
- A Guide to the Study of the Negro in American History.
182 Pages, 600 REFERENCES ..... $2.00

ORDER NOW!

NATIONAL PUBLICATION CO.
 P. O. Box 445, Nashville 2, Tenn.
 Gentlemen: I enclose $....., please send me the book(s) checked below.
☐ The Negro, Too, in American History. $3.00 ☐
☐ An Elementary History of America, Including Contributions of Negro Race. $1.50 ☐
☐ A Guide to the Study of the Negro in American History. $2.00 ☐
☐ YOU MAY SEND ME THE THREE BOOKS FOR $5.00 ☐
 NAME .....
 ADDRESS .....
 CITY, ZONE, STATE .....

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

Vivid Drama of Collapsing Germany!
"As Timely as Last Night's Headline"—PM

Vicki Baum's HOTEL BERLIN

With
Helmut DANTINE • Lisa DORN
Raymond MASSEY • Faye EMERSON
— Plus —
"Having Wonderful Crime"
PAT OBRIEN • CAROLE LANDIS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island
Queens
Kew-Forest
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
Manhattan
COLONIAL

"Tremendous Emotional Punch"—N. Y. Times
"Resolute and Striking Film"—Herald-Tribune

Betty Smith's A TREE GROWS IN BROOKLYN

Tender and Heartwarming Version of Betty Smith's Best Seller

20th Century-Fox presents
Betty GRABLE ★ Dick HAYMES

Billy Rose's DIAMOND HORSESHOE

In Technicolor!

On Stage—In Person
COUNT BASIE and his Orchestra
EXTRA! JERRY LESTER
Other Big Acts!

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave.
& 50th St.

Paramount presents
ALAN LADD • GAIL RUSSELL
SALTY O'ROURKE

Big In-Person Stage Show
Charlie SPIVAK and His Orchestra
JO STAFFORD • DEAN MURPHY
TIP, TAP & TOE

TIMES SQUARE PARAMOUNT BUY BONDS

prose her servant, not her mistress; she must use her powers of observation in the service of her powers of imagination; she must find stories big and open enough to allow her imagination its full intensive play. And nothing in "The Ghostly Lover" tells me whether its author has either the understanding or the energy to choose this course. DIANA TRILLING

MEETINGS—LECTURES

France Forever

is proud to honor

FRENCH RESISTANCE and FRENCH LABOR

ON TUESDAY, MAY 8th, at 8:30 P.M.
WASHINGTON IRVING HIGH SCHOOL
40 Irving Place, New York City

Louis Saillant

President of the National Council of French Resistance, Secretary General of the French Confederation of Labor (C.G.T.)

J. Raymond Walsh

Research Director of PAC, Economic Consultant of CIO, will speak on INTERNATIONAL LABOR

Hon. Newbold Morris

President of the New York City Council, will welcome M. Saillant to New York

Reserved Seats, $1.00 and 76 cents, tax included, at

FRANCE FOREVER

Associated with the Provisional Government of the French Republic
587 Fifth Avenue, New York 17, N. Y. • EL 5-4051

"PALESTINE at SAN FRANCISCO"

Progressive Palestine Association

Meeting, May 12, 8:30 P. M.

Hotel Edison, 228 West Forty-seventh Street

Speakers:

DR. JOACHIM PRINZ • DR. ADRIAN SCHWARTZ
DAVID KUSSELOWITZ and others

Admission free

TUESDAY, MAY 8, AT 5:30 P.M.

"RUSSIAN IS SO EASY TO READ"

A new method for alphabet and pronunciation

Capt. JACOB CHAITKIN, U. S. Army, retired

Author of "Russian Is So Easy to Learn" (Equire, November, 1943)

The Challenge of Scientific Russian

(Scientific Monthly, April, 1945)

ADMISSION $1.00 (plus tax) AT THE DOOR

TOWN HALL, 123 West 43rd Street, New York

STAGE PLAYS

"Most utterly delightful play on Broadway."—Kenny, Mirror.

FRANCHOT TONE

JANE WYATT in

HOPE FOR THE BEST

ROYALE THEATRE, 45th Street W. of Broadway. Circle 5-8760.

Days, Incl. Sunday, 8:30—$1.20 to $3.60, tax incl. Mats. Saturday & Sunday, 2:40.

NO MON. PERP. MAIL ORDERS PROMPTLY FILLED.

"A SWEET AND HAPPY HIT."—Garland, Journal-American.
Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account" with JOAN TETZEL

MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4958

Even. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 59th Street. Matinee Wed. & Sat.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

CAROUSEL (Majestic Theater) is the second-best musical show of this or several seasons. If that seems an ungracious way to begin a review, it is also, I am afraid, very nearly inevitable, for in the theater at least success is harder to live down than failure. Already the public has probably forgotten the lesser efforts of the Messrs. Rodgers and Hammerstein, but it will be years before either can write anything for the stage without having this same public ask first of all, Is it as good as "Oklahoma!"? In time they may come almost to wish they had never produced that cheery and ingratiating piece. They may even begin, as authors in a similar situation have sometimes done, to disparage their own most popular work and to persuade themselves that they prefer some brain child whose merits seem insufficiently appreciated. But they will probably be wrong, and when worst comes to worst it may be wiser for all authors to say as Swift said on rereading "A Tale of a Tub": "What genius I had when I wrote that book!"

Partly no doubt in order to discourage comparison, "Carousel" carefully avoids being too much "like 'Oklahoma!'" The scene is again America, but the story follows quite closely that of "Liliom," from which it is taken.

Molnar, as nearly everybody will remember, begins with a story told in the mood of sentimental pathos and then, a little past the middle of the play, switches suddenly to what is commonly called fantasy but might in this particular instance be more accurately described as theatrical bravura. Both the composer and the librettist recapture for themselves the two moods the playwright had established, and they negotiate very successfully the abrupt switch; but neither of them, I think, really finds in either the pathetic or the bravura passages anything to provide him with one of his happiest inspirations, and I base this judgment on the fact that the three best lyrics and the three best melodies are all gratuitous additions quite independent of anything the playwright had suggested. Two of them, "June Is Bustin' Out All Over" and "This Was a Real Nice Clam Bake," are buoyant with the same hearty cheerfulness which made so many thousands happy to hear or to sing, "Oh, What a Beautiful Morning." The third, "There's Nothin' So Bad for a Woman," is more or less in the manner of the comic songs in "Oklahoma!"

I believe that both Mr. Rodgers and Mr. Hammerstein grew up in New York City. So far as I know, neither of them has ever had more than casual contacts with "the great open spaces," and I see no reason for supposing that either should find in rustic rather than urban backgrounds their happiest inspirations. But I do suspect that both are at their very best when the occasion calls for something fresh and cheery and youthfully innocent. In the course of a casual meeting with Mr. Rodgers I once had the temerity to ask if he had ever thought of providing a musical setting for Elmer Rice's comedy "Two on an Island." He replied that he had, but he raised technical objections which I readily grant him competent to judge. I still think that he needs some story more buoyant than "Liliom" to provide the occasion for his best and most characteristic music.

Despite all this, my readers will, I hope, not forget what I said at the very beginning, namely, that "Carousel" is still second only to "Oklahoma!" among all the musicals current. By comparison, the very best of the others seem limping and childish, mechanical and tawdry. Mr. Rodgers's music is written, not contrived; the story, despite certain difficulties in the first of the two acts, is told, not merely dragged in from time to time; and Mr. Hammerstein's lyrics have freshness and wit. The most ambitious of Agnes de Mille's ballets is charmingly danced with Bambi Linn in the leading role, and a newcomer, John Raitt, has both the physique and the voice for Liliom. Another newcomer, Jan Clayton, plays Julie with great charm, though her pleasant voice is rather small; and Jean Darling is very engaging indeed as the girl friend who married "a good man."

As for the production as a whole, it is extremely lavish, possibly even a little too splendidous. And that leads me not only to end as I should not on a slightly querulous note but also to risk the scornful disagreement of nearly everyone connected with the theater by saying that the direction of Rouben Mamoulian seems to me something less than perfect. His besetting sin—and it cannot be blamed on Hollywood since it was exhibited before he ever had any traffic with the movies—is what I am tempted to describe as a tendency toward nimety or a too-muchness. He loves to crowd the stage. He will never use three girls or three urchins or three jugglers or three what-nots if five can be possibly be crowded in. Being a specialist in handling crowds, he seems always anxious to exhibit his virtuosity and to complicate the maze by adding a few more figures. And with it all, the groups begin to be too studied, too obviously effective to be really so. If my memory serves, it was Mr. Hammerstein himself who said shrewdly in an article about "Oklahoma!" that the first thing he and his collaborator decided was that they would not begin with a chorus of cow-girls. The opening scene of "Carousel" is a little suggestive of just that sort of thing.

OPEN MAY 14

FREE GOLF

TO JUNE 16

196 Practical Suggestions that will help you to get

- better gas mileage
- longer tire life
- better performance
- lower upkeep costs

Get a FREE COPY from any General Motors dealer or use the coupon below

Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.

Please send FREE COPY of new edition 64-page "Automobile User's Guide"—containing 196 practical suggestions on wartime operation.

Name..... please print

Address..... please print

City..... Zone State

Make of car now owned..... year model

5.....

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

A REACTION against what was called the "formlessness" of impressionist painting cast a pall for a time over the reputations of Claude Monet, Pissarro, and Sisley. There now seems to be a reaction against that reaction. We have discovered more "form" than had been supposed in their pictures.

Cézanne detected a lack of three-dimensional structure in their painting, but this lack became really compromising only in the work Monet turned out in his last period, when he went off in a direction tangential to that of all art. His ambition to note, record, and make permanent the most transitory aspects of nature was an extra-aesthetic one that had more to do with science than with painting. It meant an unwillingness to consider the work of art as a complete event in itself. The picture became only one notation in a series, with the artist hurrying on to the next. In the poem that furnishes the epigraph to the catalogue of the spectacular Monet show now running at Wildenstein's (through May 12) Henri de Régnier says with much insight:

Et pour vous, o Monet, le plus beau passage

Sera toujours celui que vous peindrez demain.

Coincident with the notational fallacy was the equally serious if more aesthetically relevant one of chromaticism. As Debussy would often present the mere texture of sound as the form itself of music, so Monet in his last period offered the mere texture of color as adequate form in painting. Monet, logical nineteenth-century materialist, forgot that art is relations, not matter, and that it exists primarily by virtue of relations, while all that matter can do is repeat itself: thus clusters of lily pads, masses of foliage, gray mists, and watery reflections—the canvases on which Monet painted them look like segments cut from much larger pictures.

But the earlier Monet is something quite different. Brought up as a painter under Boudin's tutelage, but with Manet's the decisive influence, he was already producing first-rate painting in his middle twenties in a somewhat eclectic style that betrayed the influences of Corot and Courbet as well. The broad, heavy earth tones of the latter, the gray lighting of the former, and Monet's sharp value contrasts alternated or were combined. Pursuing naturalism and the effects of light, Monet worked into the photographic impressionism of atmospheric darks and lights and summary definitions that Manet was the first to devise; and then, along with Renoir and the other impressionists, he arrived at the divided tone and the colored shadows which became the hallmarks of high impressionism—that is, the fusion of colors optically by juxtaposition on the canvas instead of by mixture on the palette and the recognition of the fact that objects cast shadows in colors complementary to those of their lighted surfaces. Gone for good were the gray and brown half-tones that had been the glory of painting since the Venetians. The style of the divided tone reached its full blossom in the eighteen-eighties in Monet's landscapes (some of the best of these, though now in this country, were for some reason not included in the otherwise so comprehensive show at Wildenstein's). Their yellow luminosity, feathery definitions, delicate surfaces, and solid, simple design make a perfection the painter did not attain before or after that time.

It is the pictures Monet turned out between 1870 and 1890 that earn him greatness. The strongest item in the present show, the still life Vase de Capucines, was painted in 1880 at the exact middle of this period. He produced an occasional strong painting after 1890—a startling Haystack, for instance, at this show, which anticipates Vlaminck—but on the whole his design disintegrated progressively and his color thinned out and lost its juice. His pictures became exercises in his particular technique of notation—mere instances of his style but not works of art. There may still be something to savor in these things, but to do so one has to work oneself up to a very high and unendurable pitch of sensitivity.

Monet followed the impressionist logic in too straight a line and too tenaciously. Pissarro, on the other hand, swerved away for a time to pursue Seurat's pointillist technique, and after he abandoned that he felt refreshed and went on to paint some of the best pictures of his career—even though his color, too, had begun to lose itself in atmosphere and turn gray. (Incidentally, Monet and Pissarro, the two painters who more than any others relied on their sheer eyesight, both suffered from cataracts in old age.)

Monet was a flat painter, and the first concern of his métier—a concern that leads from him straight to Mondrian—was to maintain plastically the equilibrium that the surface of the canvas already possesses physically. Impressionism meant naturalism as understood in the terms proper to painting rather than to literature. The impressionist painter, once he found his "motif," took care to slice it out naively, without posing it and without differentiating his interest in its various parts. There could be no high-lighting or dramatic centering; the corners of the picture were to show with the same clarity and come as close to the eye as the middle, and the projected field of vision was not permitted to blur toward its horizontal and vertical limits (in this respect impressionism violated its own naturalistic tenets and introduced, before cubism itself, the multiple point of view). Thus the impressionists brought back into painting a flatness not seen since the Italian primitives. Monet's style after the seventies shows such consistency and continuity because he stays so willingly inside this flatness. Renoir and Cézanne struggle in each picture to transform it as much as possible before surrendering to it, whence the drama and complexity. Monet surrenders almost in advance. Thus his pictures stay in their places on the wall much more quietly, even as their creator stayed within his style.

But at the same time light moves inside them, dissolving objects and attacking identities. Monet saw the world as sadly reconciled to itself, with all its conflicts eliminated by the inevitable working out of atomic mergers. The uniform surfaces and texture of his paintings, built up—atmically—with small touches of pigment, and inhering in and creating the objects depicted, make everything finally one—in contrast to the strata of varnish under which the Renaissance painter usually protected his objects and their separateness, and in contrast, too, to the

"HEAVEN AND HELL"

The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of famed scientist, philosopher, theologian and statesman. His book on HEAVEN AND HELL, FROM THINGS SEEN AND HEARD, may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG

SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, Inc.
Room 1636, 51 East 42nd St. New York 17

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for leading. Hired-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE. SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

impasto'd surfaces of Courbet which emphasize the corporeal identity of things. But Courbet was an earlier and more optimistic materialist than Monet, who had begun to feel the pathos of such a point of view. Like another late materialist, Mallarmé, he knew that the flesh was sad in the end.

The Wildenstein show, said to be the largest or most representative Monet exhibition ever assembled, contains eighty oils and three drawings. It is being held for the benefit of the children of Giverny in France, the town on the Seine in which Monet spent the last half of his long life—dying there in 1926; and there is an admission charge of fifty cents.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IF YOU have not read Virgil Thomson in the New York Herald Tribune you should acquire the collection of some of his daily reviews and Sunday articles in "The Musical Scene" (Knopf, $3). He has been writing the only newspaper music criticism worth reading in recent years; and the book contains some of the most penetrating and brilliantly phrased comment on music and musicians that has been done in this country or any other.

If I say this I must add that it also contains writing which in its own way is as bad as any that has been done—bad both in quality and in effect. The difference between good and bad can be made clear by two examples. On the one hand Thomson will write that "Mitropoulos has taken over the Philharmonic-Symphony concerts like an occupying army," and refer to his "Panzer division tactics"; on the other hand, having described the members of the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony, and the Philadelphia Orchestras correctly as "expert instrumentalists, internationally trained, prepared to meet any emergency of technique or of style according to accepted formulas," he will write: "These elements are as mutually replaceable and as anonymous as members of the Roman Catholic clergy. And the summum of their integrity, their consecration, and their efficacy is as beyond question." In the first example his figure of speech has a connection with the fact of the situation; it expresses vividly and forcefully a perception of something real—that in Mitropoulos's performances "all is discipline, machine finish, tension, and power," and "he makes every piece . . . sound nervous and violent." In the second the figure of speech has no such relation with fact; it represents not a perception but a playing around with fine-sounding ideas and words without regard for the realities of the situation, which in consequence are misstated. The Boston and Philadelphia Orchestras could not exchange their famous solo wind-players or even a considerable number of their rear-rank players without a loss of what, in the functioning of each orchestra, is the result of the long working together of its members. And while "the summum of their integrity, their consecration" has some relevance to the Philadelphia Orchestra, it is laughable in its irrelevance to the New York Philharmonic. The volume contains considerable writing which is bad in this way—which misstates or invents the facts it needs for its spinning out of ideas and phrases.

As for the bad effect of such writing, this column's favorite correspondent included in a letter from Belgium a couple of months ago a "Note on the critic as pedagogue," in which he observed: "The critic can perform many functions, but if he has the courage of his convictions, or any convictions at all (and he is not worth the paper he is printed on without them; vide the so-called music critics now functioning in N. Y. C.), he must have at least the interest in leading his fellows out of darkness and error that a good revivalist has." To this I would add that whether or not the critic performs a "pedagogical function by intention he does so in practice. That is, he cannot write about a piece of music or about its performance by a violinist or a conductor and orchestra without expressing ideas about music, about performance, about violin-playing, about conducting, to readers who are assumed to know less about these things than he and who are intended to benefit by his ability to hear and understand more than they can. And Thomson sometimes leads such readers into, rather than out of, darkness and error.

There are, then, in this volume constructions of thought—about the personalities of the great eastern orchestras, about what was wrong with the New York Philharmonic and how it could be made right, about how we really cannot understand the music of a hundred years ago though we think we do but really do understand the music of today though we think we can't, about Toscanini, Ormandy, Schnabel, Hofmann, about the French style or the French anything—which deal with these things as they exist in a private world of Thomson's, and which are so remote from the realities of our world as to be worthless, and in some instances not to make coherent, understandable sense even in their own terms. But there are also occasions—when Thomson is dealing with Stravinsky's Concerto for two pianos alone, with works of Hindemith, Shostakovich, Roy Harris, David Diamond, Samuel Barber, with performances by Koussevitzky, Artur Schnabel, Horowitz, Szigeti, Heifetz, Jan Peerce, with youngsters like Kapell and Isaac Stern, with the methods and performances of the Metropolitan—occasions when his sharp ears and mind are applied to what is actually happening, when his writing in consequence is brilliantly illuminating by its insights and its phraseology, and the results are superb pieces of criticism which I would be glad to have been able to write myself.

When you consider the kind of writing about music with which newspapers are content to disgrace themselves and mislead their readers it is astounding and wonderful that one newspaper should feel impelled to publish writing like Thomson's.

Alcoholics ARE Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.

Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist

JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL

(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)

Book Dealers' Agent

REMINGTON PUTNAM CO.

Baltimore 1, Md.

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS

2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.

☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound

Name.....

Address.....

Crossword Puzzle No. 114

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 You can't get rid of the darned thing!
- 6 Demanded in every tavern in the town — in England
- 9 A French wit called them disguised vices
- 10 Disease of which all old men sicken
- 11 Comparatively poor
- 12 Simple Susie was horrified when she read that Mr. and Mrs. Blank had ----- clothing of every description (two words, 4 and 3)
- 13 A starting point
- 15 Good kit-bag material
- 17 Is anything given so profusely as this?
- 18 Eat one a day and keep everybody away
- 19 "On his bold visage middle age Had slightly pressed its ----- sage" (Lady of the Lake)
- 22 Code of Jewish civil and economic law
- 25 Expressive of repugnance
- 27 An Irish lass
- 28 Turn Florence Nightingale into "Flit on, cheering angel," and you have one
- 30 Might have made Poe sore
- 31 Town of New Jersey
- 32 The three-card trick is not strictly according to him
- 33 Bewhiskered lord in Our American Cousin — a role created by the actor Sothern

DOWN

- 1 Fagot of brushwood
- 2 Myself (as a king or queen might express it)

- 3 Deceptive
- 4 "Those who know most ----- the least"
- 5 Often directed to leg, at cricket
- 6 Despair (anag.)
- 7 I rob Ian in an East African place
- 8 Not U. S. steel
- 14 Giving a monarch a letter is undeniably stretching it a little
- 15 Clout
- 16 His wife turned to salt — or was it to rubber?
- 17 "Go to the ---, thou sluggard"
- 20 "A greenery-yallery, Grosvenor -----, foot-in-the-grave young man" (Patience)
- 21 A sty, maybe
- 23 He plays for the fun of the thing
- 24 A light operatic Countess (that is, the opera is light)
- 25 Straighten up and relax
- 26 Hurry
- 29 Rabelais called the lack of it a disease

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 113

ACROSS:—1 THROW; 4 BIPED; 7 MEMO; 9 AUGUST; 10 LIARS; 12 RUHR; 13 RUTH; 15 REVIVER; 17 YONDER; 18 DIEPPE; 19 SHE; 21 COLLOPS; 23 MATTERS; 24 ECU; 26 BALKED; 28 GUNSHY; 31 SOMALIS; 32 AGED; 35 NULL; 36 EDICT; 37 BLOWED; 38 DOWS; 39 MOUSE; 40 XERES.

DOWN:—1 TOUR; 2 REUTER; 3 WETPISH; 4 BALLED; 5 PEAR; 6 DUST; 7 MERCY; 8 MAHAN; 11 RUMPLE; 14 HEBELS; 15 REMOVES; 16 RIOTOUS; 19 SSE; 20 EMU; 21 COBRA; 22 LILLED; 25 COALROX; 27 DOTTLE; 28 GIAOUR; 29 SCUDO; 30 YELLS; 33 GERM; 34 DIEU; 35 NEBS.

CONTRIBUTORS

SUMNER WELLES, former Under Secretary of State, is chief commentator on the San Francisco conference for the Columbia Broadcasting System. He is the author of "The Time for Decision."

ALAN BARTH is an editorial writer for the Washington Post. He has contributed to The Nation, the New Republic, the Public Opinion Quarterly, and other magazines.

EDWARD A. HARRIS is a Washington correspondent for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

HAL LEHRMAN is The Nation's accredited correspondent in the Mediterranean area.

GAIL KENNEDY is a member of the department of Philosophy and Religion at Amherst College.

T. A. BISSON, a member of the staff of the Institute of Pacific Relations, is the author of "Japan in China."

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through

THE Nation

20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy on request

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8

☐ 3 Years $11

☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Servicemen's Rate
$3.00 a Year

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union
requires no extra postage

Name.....

Address.....

5-5-45

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MAY 12, 1945

NUMBER 19

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

This is the Day	529
Conference Notes by Freda Kirchwey	531
Feeding Our Friends	532
Looking to the Pacific	533

ARTICLES

Anti-Russian Undertow by I. F. Stone	534
Address to the German People by Thomas Mann	535
World Labor at San Francisco by J. Alvarez del Vayo	536
Berlin: a Necrology by Martin Gumpert	538
Fascism Without Mussolini—I by Mario Rossi	539
Lilienthal and the Valley by Barrett C. Shelton	544
In the Wind	545

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	546
Work of Art by Martin Lebowitz	547
Briefer Comment	548
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling	550
Music by B. H. Haggin	553
Films by James Agee	554

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

555

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 115 by Jack Barrett

556

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

This Is The Day

THIS is the day for which free men of all nations in the world have longed and prayed and given up their lives. Fascism as a system of power and terror is dead. The black night is over. It is strange, then, that after the first lift to the spirit which the news of victory in Europe brings, the mind sinks back into the foreboding that has become its habit for more than a decade. Partly it is the realization that the other war in the Pacific must now be brought to its peak of effort. But perhaps it is also that we are unprepared for victory. To us in America, with our cities unbombed, our shores untouched, the lights cannot appear so bright as to the citizens of London, of Moscow, of Paris. Perhaps we have supped too full of horrors: the concentration camps, the pulverized cities, the millions of torn bodies, have used up our imaginative emotions so that the words of victory have lost their meaning. Perhaps, with Max Lerner, who wrote the most perceptive piece we have seen on Hitler's death, we realize that if Hitler was himself evil "he could not have succeeded had there not been evil potential in men"; if Hitler had a hysterical will he would have failed "had not the collective will of the world been ready for fragmentation." If we have overwhelmed Nazism we have yet to eradicate the evil in our civilization from which it issued as a plague. It may be that in this hour of victory our minds are divided between General Eisenhower's headquarters in Europe and the Opera House in San Francisco. The shock to the average decent American of the admission of Argentina to the United Nations went very deep. The anxiety over the Polish issue was more than a fear that we might break with a great nation whose armies have shared the glory of victory with our armies. Failure at San Francisco would make meaningless much of the victory in Europe. For in these days we think back to beginnings—to Ethiopia, to Spain, to the first victims of concentration camp torture who were Germans and Austrians, to Czechoslovakia betrayed, to the shameful days of appeasement, to the relief of war after the months of frayed nerves. We think back to the small heroes of the war, whose names never reached dispatches, who piloted the little boats across the Channel on the day of Dunkirk, who fought fire and carried on rescue work during the worst days of the London blitz, who organized and kept alive underground resistance in Norway, in the Low Countries, in France, in Yugoslavia, who manned the merchant vessels on the Murmansk run, who fell on the beach at Dieppe a year and a half before the final D-Day. This hour belongs to them: many of them are not here to celebrate it. This is the victory they worked and fought and died for. Rather it is the beginning of the victory.

THE BREAKING UP OF THE MODEL MONOLITHIC state on such a titanic scale was bound to be awe-inspiring. What could not be foreseen was that the smash would come so quickly when it did come. The great complex of German armies, armaments, supply systems, lines of communication, defense zones, and integrated administration appeared too formidable to be broken with such suddenness. But the pressure of Allied arms, skilfully directed against a Germany badly overstrained from the ceaselessly damaging attacks of Allied bombers, proved irresistible. So the terrible Hitlerian nightmare ends in the darkness from which it sprang. Death and destruction have been visited upon Germany in the highest degree, and everywhere the tired, beaten soldiers are filing into prisoner inclosures. Yet so completely was the German state organized for war that even this great breaking up does not occur in one day or two: "Total victory" has already taken more than a week as this is written. The facts of this defeat and the vistas opened for Europe's future are too overwhelming to allow of any prolonged celebration. There can only be deep satisfaction that the bloody business is finished and high praise for the men who did the job.

✱

PIERRE LAVAL, WHO LANDED CONFIDENTLY IN Franco's Spain the other day, was surprised and hurt to discover that Spain had promised to turn over war criminals to the United Nations. Indeed, he said that if he had known it he wouldn't have come. We sympathize with him in a way. How was he to suspect, in Germany, that Spain had gone over to the Allied side? Even in this country there are those who haven't been convinced.

✱

THAT LEON BLUM AND LARGO CABALLERO ARE free and in Paris is wonderful news. The absence of their names from the earlier list of leaders, including Herriot, Reynaud, and Daladier, rescued by the Allied armies, had filled us with deep apprehension. Among the prominent hostages Hitler had brought into Germany these two men were the most exposed to last-hour vengeance at the hands of the Gestapo. As a Jew and a Socialist Blum was bitterly hated by the Nazis, while the former Spanish Premier, a labor leader and also a Socialist, surely reminded them of Spain's magnificent resistance to their first offensive against the democratic West. During the German occupation of France both had shown extraordinary courage—Blum by reversing the roles of accused and accuser at the Riom trial, where he launched a brilliant attack upon the traitors of Vichy; Caballero by refusing to make use of the visa which the American government on the plea of hundreds of liberals had granted him. From a purely human point of view the safe return of these two leaders is profoundly moving. One is seventy-three, the other seventy-eight, and according to reports the elder, Caballero, is in remarkably good health. The return of Blum, like that of Herriot, is bound to have an effect on political developments in France. The post of leader of the Socialist Party has been held open for him, and, from the first number printed after liberation, Le Populaire has carried the name of Léon Blum on its masthead as director in exile. As for Caballero, it seems certain that he will become an important factor in the efforts to bring together the Spanish Republican groups. Though he was in frank opposition to Negrín much has happened since then which may have influenced a man known for his stubborn character but also for his unquestionable integrity.

✱

THE ALREADY FAMOUS CARTOON BY LOW which is carried in this week's Nation points up the significance of the announcement that a German anti-Nazi prisoner from the notorious Buchenwald camp has been selected to be the Mayor of Weimar. Perhaps the most diabolical aim of the Nazis was to eliminate entirely the group from which a new free Germany might some day arise. Only last July they made their final attempt to round up all those who held minor positions in the former Social Democratic, Communist, and Catholic parties. The bodies of many of these are to be found in the pitiful heaps in the courtyards of the charnel houses. But some survived. How difficult will be the task of recreating a decent society out of the physical, economic, and moral waste that is Germany is beyond the power of the human mind to grasp. The summary justice meted out to the most flagrant Nazi criminals will be the merest beginning. Afterward there is the long road not back but forward to something more robust than the well-meaning but spineless Weimar Republic. It is good to know that our military-government authorities recognize the best guides for that road. But they will need our support if Nazism is to be utterly abandoned and the goal of a new European democracy is to be reached.

✱

ONLY A FORTNIGHT AFTER VIENNA'S LIBERATION by the Red Army the Russians announced the formation of a provisional Austrian government headed by Dr. Karl Renner, a former right-wing Social Democrat. Renner, a septuagenarian now, was Chancellor in 1918-20 when a coalition of Social Democrats and Christian Socialists organized the Austrian Republic. Both London and Washington showed "surprise" over the new government; it is said that the Russians violated a pledge to let a tripartite inter-Allied commission administer Austria. The new government is again a coalition, but now of Social Democrats, Communists, Christian Socialists, and some non-partisan experts. Renner himself is a well-proved democratic statesman who was always in favor of constructive cooperation with the Christian Socialists. The two outstanding Christian Socialists of the new regime, Leopold Kunschak and Rudolf Buchinger, also over seventy, have been leaders of the Christian Socialist Workmen's Association and of the farmers' cooperative movement, respectively. Corresponding with Russia's position of power in Austria, the Communists hold the Ministry of the Interior (with police and gendarmerie) and probably also the Ministry of National Defense. The key position of Minister for Public Instruction and Religion is also held by a Communist, Ernst Fischer, who has been the Austrian voice on the Moscow radio during the war years. He will obviously become the propaganda minister of the new regime. The Americans, British, and French will probably restore the traditional regional governments in the Austrian federal lands outside Vienna and thereby oppose a federalist system to the centralism to which the Russian-sponsored Renner government in Vienna might be inclined. Always midway between East and West, Austria may well become the test case of cooperation between Russia and the Western allies.

★

THE KEY TO THE DEADLOCK IN THE HOUSE on Mrs. Norton's bipartisan bill for establishment of a permanent Fair Employment Practice Committee is to be found at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. A few days before last fall's Presidential election Mr. Truman said to a Liberal Party rally in New York: "President Roosevelt established the Fair Employment Practice Committee to prevent job discrimination. The President now proposes permanent legislation to maintain the open door in industry. I have always voted in favor of appropriations for the FEPC." This was not only an unequivocal assertion of support for the proposal but also a significantly accurate description of its purposes. It is as good an answer as could be devised to those who seek to sabotage the Norton bill by likening it to Prohibition and calling it moralistic legislation designed to outlaw racial prejudice and promote social equality. The bill is of course nothing of the sort. It aims simply to outlaw the effects of prejudice in the practical realm of economic opportunity. As such, it is, for Negroes in particular, a touchstone to test the real meaning of American democracy. Negroes will judge President Truman by what he does on this issue. A word from him would quickly bring the additional signatures necessary to complete Mrs. Norton's petition for release of her bill from the reactionary Rules Committee. We hope that he will speak this word soon.

★

IT WAS AN OPEN AND SHUT CASE. THE THREE defendants, two of whom were A. W. O. L. privates, had been on a two-day drinking party and one of them had had a bright idea. "There's some Japs here I don't like," he said. "They've got a packing shed. Let's burn it down." At the trial in Auburn, California, the defendants admitted setting fire to Summio Doi's shed; they did not conceal the fact that after Doi and his parents beat out the flames they returned the next night in an attempt to dynamite the shed. Facts and witnesses were offered by the prosecution but not by the defense, which proudly denied no charges. It didn't have to. After all, this is the U. S. A. and the defendants were loyal white Americans—nothing yellow about them. They stood their ground and relied on Defense Attorney Floyd Bowers's summation, which relied on the Bataan Death March, other Japanese atrocities, and the fact that "this is a white man's country" to do the trick. It did. The jury took two hours to return a verdict of not-guilty. Not long—but after all it was an open and shut case.

★

THE FREE MAN IN AMERICA WAS FOUND IN Mexico City's garbage heaps at about the same time that Argentina was invited to the San Francisco Conference. But don't be alarmed. "The Free Man in America" is a book written by Mexican Foreign Minister Ezequiel Padilla, the very same who moved to extend the invitation to Argentina. Delegates to the recent Mexico City Conference that paved the way for Argentina's come-back were presented with autographed copies. Most of the delegates stayed at the Hotel

Reforma, and most of the several hundred scrapped copies were found in that hotel's garbage heap. No reflection on the book or subject, we are sure, but simply a demonstration of the fact that diplomats must travel light these days; "The Free Man in America" was obviously excess baggage.

Conference Notes

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

San Francisco, May 7

VICTORY in Europe has brought overwhelming relief rather than excitement to San Francisco. The end, coming as it had to come, in separate surrenders of scattered armies spread over days rather than in a general surrender by a single high command, emphasized the total collapse of the great centralized tyranny that was Hitler's Reich. Now at last, after twelve years, the prison doors are blown open and the world's most efficient terror is over. Now the job of recovery begins. It involves punishment of the Nazi hierarchy, rehabilitation of the people, reconstruction of a ruined continent. But more than these it means creating a society proof against the rise of new fascist tyrannies and new wars. Part of this job is being attempted here in San Francisco. But the difficulty of agreeing upon even the basic principles of international order shows how much remains to be done before the world, even the western world, conquers the enemy still in the field—political reaction and the economic power it defends. Victory over these forces, tougher and more aggressive than Hitler's Wehrmacht, is still ahead.

The Argentine decision let loose a whole swarm of nasty consequences, some of which are mentioned by L. F. Stone in his story this week. One of the most unfortunate is the widespread impression that the American countries, minus Canada, now form a solid voting bloc which will outnumber any other probable grouping in the Assembly of the world security organization. I talked to many newspapermen and a handful of delegates, and every one of them raised this issue of balance of power. One very conservative correspondent said seriously that the vote on Argentina had ended the chance of creating a system through which the smaller states could influence policy, while it had cracked open the nuclear alliance between Russia and the West. A delegate of a "middle" power said that Russia would be justified in demanding sixteen votes instead of three "and even then it couldn't match the American bloc." A Canadian remarked cynically: "Where is that famous British bloc the Russians were so worried about? It never existed, but now perhaps we'll have to invent it." A French Communist correspondent said almost the same thing. He added: "It startled us Europeans. We'd never thought of the Americans as a unit—especially a reactionary one."

This interpretation is an exaggerated one, as Nation readers will realize. Even the unanimous vote on Argentina concealed an intricate background of maneuvering—Latin American suspicion of State Department intentions, resentment of unilateral decisions, fear of Argentina itself, a whole complex which cannot be understood without a detailed study of the record. Few non-American delegates know this record. Worst of all, the Russians don't know it. But the truth is that the Latin American nations have never been and are not now united, among themselves or with us. The influence of the State Department is compounded of one part good-will to about four parts lend-lease. While we may use our immense power to hold those countries more or less in line and continue to cooperate with the Catholic church to prevent revolutionary change, the chances are that both money and propaganda will largely dry up after the war. In that case the Latin American republics will fast revert to normal, which means that they will be anxious to assert their individual claims as sovereign states and to appeal to the new world organization over the head of their domineering big neighbor. Their action in the case of Argentina cannot be taken as a fair sample of hemispheric solidarity.

A ghost appeared at the Argentine feast the other day—not the ghost of Banquo but of Franco. It could not be exorcised, though the presiding hosts did their best. Even in the meeting of the Steering Committee, where the Argentine deal was shoved through, one of the delegates (I wish I could give his name, for he deserves credit, but I must protect both him and the person who told me) asked directly whether the admission of Argentina would not establish a precedent which might make it possible for Franco to come into the security organization later on. Anthony Eden raised his hands in a gesture of horror and repudiation and said, "Oh, oh!" But afterward he admitted that an awkward situation might develop if Franco or one or two other neutrals—he was thinking of Eire—tried to get in on the same grounds. The question of Franco was also raised in the Executive Committee. All this is gratifying since the chief obstacle the friends of the Spanish Republic had met before the Argentine incident occurred was the bland assertion, especially in high British and American quarters, that the whole question of Spain was irrelevant and could not possibly become an issue at San Francisco. It is an issue now, as everyone knows who has been listening to the radio this past week. It will become even more acute within a few days.

Everybody is surprised at the rather ineffectual role played here by the French. It is not hard to explain. First, France was not included in the inner group of powers; it was the Big Four, not the Big Five. Second, Bidault is not on the best terms with De Gaulle, and so perhaps hesitates to take positions on controversial questions. Third, his delegation is not a strong or a young one. Too many pre-war names appear on the list. Fourth, France is shattered, disorganized, hungry, stripped of its wealth and man-power, and terribly dependent on the United States for material help. As the result of all these things France has not assumed in San Francisco its proper position as leader of the new democratic Europe, the Europe that resisted Hitler through four years of occupation and terror. It follows Britain and the United States, works to get itself recognized as a great power, but does little that would stamp it as great. I hope and believe the vote in the recent elections will serve as a reminder to the delegation that it is not enough to stand up stoutly for the acceptance of French as one of the two official languages of the conference and then fail to vote against admitting Argentina in spite of an obvious wish to do so. France will be great in the years to come only if it represents the whole meaning of the resistance movement. There are many French men and women here who know that, delegates, labor men, and writers. They analyze the policy of the delegation with sharp realism, but they do not direct policy.

Feeding Our Friends

RELIEF for liberated Europe is a problem in publicity as well as in the allocation of scarce supplies. Judge Rosenman took note of this fact in the final recommendation of his report last week to President Truman. "Since allocation of civilian supplies to liberated countries, in all probability, will cut into the ration of the American consumer," he said, "a widespread official and public campaign should be undertaken to inform the American people of the gravity of the needs of our allies in liberated Europe."

A campaign of this sort has been made imperative by the irresponsible scare talk about over-all food shortage, even famine, in America which has emanated from some of the food trades, from the old-line farm agencies, and from meat packers and big livestock men. The Farm Bureau and the Grange have resisted full production out of a fear of post-war surpluses; the slaughterers and cattle growers are seeking additional profit incentive to produce. Their spokesmen on Capitol Hill, especially in the Senate's food-investigating committee, preach the new isolationism by projecting vague fears of disaster for the nation if we play a responsible part in meeting the world's need.

Sending food to Europe entails no danger of hunger for America, not even any impairment of our nutritional standards. It does entail continued rationing—even more stringent rationing in some items—and a renunciation of some of the delicacies to which we are accustomed but which we do not actually need. The magnitude of the sacrifices we shall be called upon to endure was suggested just lately in the announcement of a 25 per cent cut in the value of sugar-ration stamps. For a people notoriously sweet-toothed, whose average consumption of sugar increased from 87.3 pounds in 1921 to 103.6 pounds in 1941, this is undoubtedly an inconvenience. But surely we can endure it, and with good grace, when we understand that it will enable other human beings to live. The picture must be presented to the American people in perspective. No one can make the presentation so effectively as President Truman himself.

"The most immediate and urgent needs common to all northwest European countries," says the Rosenman report, "are certain types of food, coal, coal-mining equipment, and the means of internal transportation." These are indispensable to restoration of any measure of self-sustenance. The furnishing of these touches our self-interest quite as intimately as it touches our generosity. Judge Rosenman put it very simply:

The needs of northwest Europe's liberated areas are grave, not only from a humanitarian aspect, but because they involve internal and international political considerations. The future permanent peace of Europe depends largely upon restoration of the economy of these countries, including a reasonable standard of living and employment. United States economy, too, will be deeply affected unless northwest Europe again resumes its place in the international exchange of goods and services. Furthermore, a chaotic and hungry Europe is not fertile ground in which stable, democratic, and friendly governments can be reared.

But the moral aspect of the matter is also worth remembering. The people of northwest Europe are not merely unfortunate victims of the war; they have earned our help. In the Netherlands, for example, D-Day was the signal for a transport strike that seriously hampered German troop movements, but at the same time exposed Dutch cities to famine. Americans who understand what the people of the occupied countries have contributed to the Allied cause are unlikely to begrudge them a portion of our bounty.

Looking to the Pacific

WITH the collapse of Nazi resistance in Europe our attention will increasingly be focused on the vast unfinished task in Asia. Although we face great handicaps imposed by vast distances, wretched climate, and a fanatical foe, the campaign in the Pacific from a military point of view is undoubtedly going well. The whole of the Philippines have been liberated, presumably months ahead of schedule. The capture of Rangoon not only assures the swift liberation of Burma with its treasure of rice, oil, and lead but presages the early opening of direct rail and road communications with China. Seizure of Iwo Jima and the larger part of Okinawa gives us important bases well within Japan's inner defenses. The Tarakan landing assures us that one of the world's principal oil fields will be denied Japan and ultimately utilized to supply our forces. Only in China is the military situation generally unfavorable for the United Nations, and even here there are indications of increasing Chinese resistance.

Although the Pacific campaign will continue to be pushed at the accelerated pace that has been evident in the past few months, we cannot expect the end of hostilities in Europe to speed it up immediately. General Eisenhower has vetoed any immediate cut in replacements for the European theater, and while hundreds of thousands of men will ultimately be shifted from Europe to Asia, from four to six months will elapse before substantial forces can be moved, regrouped, and in some instances retrained for the Pacific war. The transfer of planes, tanks, and other equipment may take even longer.

The next phase of the attack will not, however, await the transfer of forces from Europe. As a result of our recent achievements we have effectively cut Japan off from its empire in the south. The reduction of its war industries by air is well under way. Until recently it had been generally assumed that the next stroke would be a landing somewhere on the China coast. This is still possible. But in recent weeks there has been increasing speculation that our next attack may be against Japan itself. There are several reasons for this. The inability of the Chinese to reach an agreement providing for unified military operations of the Kuomintang and Communist forces imperils such a landing and makes it difficult to work out a strategy utilizing the advantages of continental bases. Moreover, the elimination of the Japanese fleet as an effective force and the decimation of the Japanese air force make an attack on Japan far more feasible than could have been anticipated a year ago. An important element in the picture, of course, is the date of Russia's entry into the Pacific war. Early Soviet participation would make an extensive American campaign in China wholly unnecessary. It is doubtful, however, that the Soviets are prepared to undertake the responsibilities of a major campaign in Asia soon after the completion of their tremendous effort in Europe. The granting of air bases to the United States seems more probable.

Popular attention will undoubtedly be focused chiefly on military developments in the Pacific. But in Asia, fully as much as in Europe, what seems at first sight to be primarily a military problem has many political ramifications. We have already noted this in connection with China. The creation of an effective national government in China, representing all the leading political groups, is vital not only for speeding up the war but for the assurance of post-war security in the Pacific. That this is the view of Russia and Britain as well as the United States was confirmed recently in an official statement made by Ambassador Hurley after visiting Washington, London, and Moscow.

Another political problem with obvious bearing on basic military strategy is the ultimate disposition of the islands and colonial areas reconquered from the Japanese. Is each of the United Nations to retain its conquests from Japan, or shall we have joint action in most areas, followed by a sharing of bases in the post-war period? This issue is likely to be settled by the decisions taken at San Francisco in the near future. Of pressing importance also is our understanding of the enemy. Many of the men who know Japan best believe that the big-business groups, the Zaibatsu, will make a determined effort to save Japan from the destruction wrought in Germany by eliminating, or seeming to eliminate, the present dominant power of the militarists. In seeming preparation for such a move the last two Japanese Cabinets have contained increasing representation from the Zaibatsu groups. It is quite possible that they are prepared to offer peace terms which will seem attractive to the elements in this country who still believe that we can do business with Japan. It must be recognized, however, that the Zaibatsu not only have cooperated closely with the militarists in their expansion program but have been the principal barrier to the economic reforms that are necessary to the growth of a genuine democratic movement in Japan. A peace which leaves the Zaibatsu in power would merely restore the unhealthy conditions existing in Asia before 1931.

Before we can deal wisely with the basic political problems of the East, we shall probably have to undergo a profound readjustment in our habits of thought. Throughout our history, in peace as well as in war, America has been European-minded. It has taken a war to show how little we know of the basic facts of Far Eastern geography. We are even less aware of the fundamental political and economic forces at work in the Pacific area. If we are to meet the challenge successfully we shall have to transfer our minds and our interests as well as our armed forces from the Western to the Far Eastern front.

Anti-Russian Undertow

BY I. F. STONE

San Francisco, May 6

IT IS time the American people became aware of what is really going on in San Francisco. On the public plane a charter is being written for a stable peace. But in private too many members of the American delegation conceive this as a conference for the organization of an anti-Soviet bloc under our leadership. And it is no exaggeration to say that not a few of them are reckless enough to think and talk in terms of a third world war—this time against the Soviet Union. That this is the basic pattern of the United Nations Conference is the conviction not of myself alone but of many astute American and foreign correspondents here and of progressive members of the American delegation and its entourage. If this is kept in mind, it will be easier to understand the Argentine and Polish issues, and to be forewarned and forearmed against a rightist turn in American Far Eastern policy and a softer attitude toward the future of the Reich. If this dual aspect of the San Francisco conference is brought forcibly to public attention, it may yet be possible to stem dangerous undercurrents which have the gravest potentialities for the future.

I do not know the full facts about the arrest of sixteen Polish leaders in Poland, but I know enough to advise American progressives to keep their shirts on. Explanations are due in San Francisco as well as from Moscow. The way in which the news of the Polish arrests was given out to the press by Stettinius, and the timing, lead one to suspect that some people may have deliberately sought to torpedo a Polish settlement just as one was in prospect. Friday morning's papers brought the news that Mikolajczyk had been invited back to Moscow. There was renewed hope of a reorganized government in Warsaw satisfactory to the Western powers as well as to the U. S. S. R. Such a reorganization means the political death of the London government, for the only Poles in exile acceptable to the Russians are those who, like Mikolajczyk, have resigned from the London government to accept the Yalta decision on Poland. On Friday the pro-London and anti-Soviet Polish-American Congress asked Mr. Stettinius to press the Russian delegation for information on the fate of the sixteen Polish leaders, about whom there have been questions in the House of Commons.

Friday evening Mr. Molotov told Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Eden that the sixteen had been arrested on charges of diversionary activity against the Red Army. The information was given in confidence but leaked out to Frederick Kuh of the Chicago Sun and P.M., who filed the story that night. I have no doubt that it was permitted to leak out deliberately, and the leak was made the excuse for a press conference Saturday morning at which Mr. Stettinius gave out a statement on the arrests while Mr. Molotov was away on a tour of the Kaiser shipyards with Ambassador Harriman. Mr. Molotov did not know that the story was to be given out and did not know it had been given out until several hours later, when he returned from the shipyard tour. That afternoon the Moscow radio reported that the sixteen had been arrested for installation and maintenance of illegal radio transmitters in the rear of Soviet troops and for acts which had cost the lives of more than a hundred Red Army officers and men. These specific charges were given to Kuh and used by Kuh the night before and were known to Stettinius. One wonders why, in fairness to the Russians, they were not included in the Stettinius press release, which created the impression that the arrests were wholly arbitrary and the charges significantly vague. One wonders about another point in the Stettinius release. It referred to those arrested as "prominent Polish democratic leaders." Abe Penzik, press representative of the Lublin government, said at the press conference that two of the sixteen—he gave their names—were anti-Semites and fascists and asked Mr. Stettinius how he could describe them as "democratic." Mr. Stettinius complained that the Russians were not supplying enough information. Mr. Penzik then asked why, in the absence of sufficient information, Mr. Stettinius described these arrested men as democrats. To this there was no satisfactory reply.

Sources in the American delegation which constantly let anti-Soviet reports leak to the press spread word that the Russians had said more would be known when the guilty were tried. The implication was of condemnation before trial. The Moscow radio said, "All of these persons or some of them, as investigations may warrant, will be committed for trial." The difference is obvious. There is another significant point in the Stettinius press release. Earlier reports from the London Poles said that the sixteen had been invited to negotiate with the Russians and that Marshal Zhukov had sent a plane for them. That implies a safe conduct. But Mr. Stettinius did not say the sixteen men had been invited to negotiate. He said only that these prominent Polish democratic leaders in Poland had met for discussion with Soviet authorities. I advise suspension of judgment until we learn more about the circumstances. In the light of what is known of the London government's attitude and of the operations of Sosnowski's forces in Poland, it would be very unwise to assume, as so many newspapers do, that the arrests must have been arbitrary, unjust, and another example of Soviet high-handedness. This is exactly the position into which the anti-Soviet press is trying to stampede public opinion.

From the standpoint of the London Poles, the sensational character of the disclosures served to block a settlement of the Polish problem. From the standpoint of Mr. Stettinius and his colleagues, it served to destroy the good effect created by Mr. Molotov's strong opposition last Monday to admission of Argentina. That had put our delegation in the wrong and given the Russians moral leadership at the conference. I said in last week's letter that we have here pretty much the same old codgers who were such a flop at Geneva. The Argentina issue was a characteristic Geneva issue with a characteristic Geneva solution. It confronted the conference with a choice between a sterile legalistic formula and actualities. The former was preferred, and great-power unity breached. Mr. Stettinius refused, even after Mr. 'Spaak's statesman-like plea, to consent to the Russian request for postponement. We won a diplomatic victory that was a moral defeat and may be the beginning of a serious rift in the big-power unanimity with which the conference began and which is the essential condition of peace. England and Holland seem to have been our only European supporters in this; even China abstained.

The American consultants were told that Argentina was a special case whose admission was required by the Chapultepec conference. But the principles laid down by the Latin American delegates in the debate—"universality" of the new organization and "non-intervention" in the internal affairs of states applying for membership—lay the basis for the admission of Franco Spain. Just as the Germans whittled away the Versailles settlement piecemeal, so the process has begun of whittling away the anti-fascist character of the United Nations: there will be new legalistic reasons for new compromises with fascism. That is not the way to maintain an entente with the U. S. S. R. or the stable peace an entente would make possible.

Address to the German People

BY THOMAS MANN

This is an actual message to the German people, broadcast to them in the hour of Nazism's catastrophic defeat. It was prepared by Germany's most distinguished scholar in exile and transmitted by the Office of War Information.

Santa Monica, Cal., May 6

SOME have survived, the pitiable remnants of the multitudes of innocent men, women, and children who were sent to German concentration camps. Most of them suffered a horrible death, many at the last moment before the arrival of salvation; their emaciated corpses and charred bones were found along with the ingenious contrivances which served for their extermination. It is a solace to know that these few have been wrested from the power of their tormentors and returned to the laws of humanity. For the German, however, quite different emotions are mingled with this feeling of relief.

The thick-walled torture chamber that Hitlerism had made of Germany is broken open, and our disgrace is bared to the eyes of the world. Foreign commissions who have been shown these incredible scenes report home that the horrors they have seen exceed anything that men could imagine. It is our disgrace, German readers and listeners, for every German—everyone who speaks German, writes German, has lived as a German—is affected by this shameful exposure. It is not a small clique of criminals who are involved; hundreds of thousands of a so-called German élite—men, youths, and brutish women—committed these misdeeds in morbid lust under the influence of the insane doctrines of National Socialism. Call it the dark potentialities of human nature in general that are revealed here, but remember that it was Germans, hundreds of thousands of them, who revealed those potentialities. The world shudders at the sight of Germany. Even the German who escaped in ample time from the realm of National Socialist leadership, who did not like to live in the vicinity of these abodes of abomination, did not like to go about his business in ostensible virtue and pretend to know nothing while the wind carried the stench of charred human flesh to his nostrils—even this

German is ashamed in the depths of his soul for the things that were possible in the land of his fathers and his masters.

It comes as a shock to such a German that in the twelve years of the Hitler regime one thing only, Nazi rule, could induce such human depravity in a people certainly not by nature devoid of justice and morality. One of the last commentators on the Goebbels radio, a man named Fritsche, shouted into the microphone that nothing could alter the fact that National Socialism was "the only appropriate form of government for the German people" and that Germany was made for this regime. This he dared to say to people who, full of dire foreboding, had lived for more than a decade under National Socialism and who now, amid the ruins of their country, confronted a catastrophe the like of which neither their own nor any other history has ever witnessed. The "only appropriate form of government" for the German people led them in just a few years into not only the most terrible but also the most disgraceful defeat; so that Germany stands today as the abomination of mankind and the epitome of evil. Justice and truth strangled, falsehood reigning supreme, liberty trampled, character and decency crushed, people drilled from childhood in the blasphemous delusion of racial superiority, in the primacy and right of violence, educated for nothing but covetousness, rape, and looting—that was National Socialism. That is supposed to be "German," the "only form of government appropriate to the German nature." My readers and listeners in Germany, you were unable to rid yourselves of this rule by your own strength. The liberators had to come from abroad. They have occupied your broken country and will have to govern it for years. At least do not regard them as your enemies, as Bishop Galen incites you to do. Do not, like this ill-advised cleric, regard yourselves primarily as Germans, but as men and women returned to humanity, as Germans who after twelve years of Hitler want to be human beings again.

Power is lost, but power is not everything. It is not even the main thing. And German greatness was never a matter of power. It was once German and may be German again to win respect and admiration by the human contribution, by the power of the sovereign spirit.

World Labor at San Francisco

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Oakland-San Francisco, May 5

SAN FRANCISCO and Oakland are only a half-hour apart by trolley, but the distance might be a thousand miles, judging by the two conferences taking place simultaneously in the two cities. I spent the morning at the City Club Hotel in Oakland, covering the meeting of the Administrative Committee of the World Trade Union Conference, and the afternoon at the San Francisco Opera House, where the plenary sessions of the United Nations Conference are held. The subject at both places was the same, and so was the goal—to organize the post-war world in terms of permanent peace. At the labor conference one could see faces inspired by faith, faces of men and women who knew perfectly well toward what end they were working; at the United Nations Conference a certain skepticism and fatigue were already evident, only two weeks after the inaugural session.

Let us be clear. Out of the San Francisco conference an operating international organization will surely arise, no matter how many difficulties must still be overcome. The mere fact that such an organization is to be set up, even before the cessation of hostilities in Europe, is a tremendous step forward after four years during which the United Nations have been incapable of producing an international political program worthy of the sacrifice of the millions who have perished in this war. I am not among those who, because events have not developed at San Francisco according to their notions of democratic policy, are ready to throw up the sponge and return home to wait for World War III.

At a rally held in the Civic Auditorium in San Francisco on May 2, Philip Murray promised the support of labor for the United Nations Conference even though the new trade-union organization had been refused admission, in even a consultative capacity. Yet these labor men do not fall into the simple error of believing that merely by pronouncing the word "Yalta" all the peace problems will be settled. They are absolutely in favor of the coalition, not an artificial coalition but one so vital and alert that it can even permit one of the great powers to oppose the admission of Argentina, as Russia did, without suffering irreparable damage. Had labor had a voice at San Francisco as the Administrative Committee of the trade-union organization requested, it would not have been so easy to smuggle fascist Argentina into the conference, giving it the opportunity of heading an eventual anti-Russian Latin American bloc—reactionary and opposed to a peace based on social justice and economic democracy. If it has come to seem almost impertinent to speak of fascism at the United Nations Conference, in the World Trade Union Conference fascism is constantly present as the enemy which the war has not conquered and which must still be destroyed. "Military victory," said Lombardo Toledano, speaking for the Confederación de Obreros de la America Latina at the meeting in the Civic Auditorium,

"does not mean victory over fascism. Hitler may be dead, but he has left a legacy—fascism. Fascism will not die until the economic and political forces which helped it grow are destroyed. It will not die as long as one fascist branch survives. While fascist Spain exists, we cannot say that we have won the war."

In Oakland the various disguises which will be assumed by fascism in the months and years to come have been carefully studied. It is the unanimous belief of the leaders drafting the constitution of the new international labor federation that fascism will change its name and its methods; in some countries it will try to revive the isolationist spirit, in others it will sabotage any attempt at a planned economy, and everywhere it will do its best to revive the political appeasement of fascism which led to Munich and the present war. Labor leaders have not overlooked the intelligent last-minute move of the Nazis to replace Ribbentrop by Count Schwerin von Krossig, representative of a Germany, conservative but not exactly Nazi, with which it might be possible for British-American reaction to come to an understanding should Russia prove too unbearable. Organized labor, as I have seen it at work in Oakland, knows that the only way to meet the next fascist political offensive is by anticipating its moves and striking hard before it regains its strength.

In order to be in condition to carry on this fight, a strong international trade-union movement is essential. At the London conference in February a general policy was laid down for the war and the post-war era. Two bodies were entrusted with carrying out the London resolution—a Committee of Forty-five, on which all trade-union organizations participating in the conference were represented, and an Administrative Committee of thirteen members selected from the forty-five. These two bodies would act as parliament and cabinet during the transitional period. The Administrative Committee, meeting at Oakland, after ten days of work has drawn up the international charter and has approved the text of the agenda for the conference to be opened on September 25 in Paris. In September this constitution will be submitted for discussion, and once it is approved, the new organization will be definitely established.

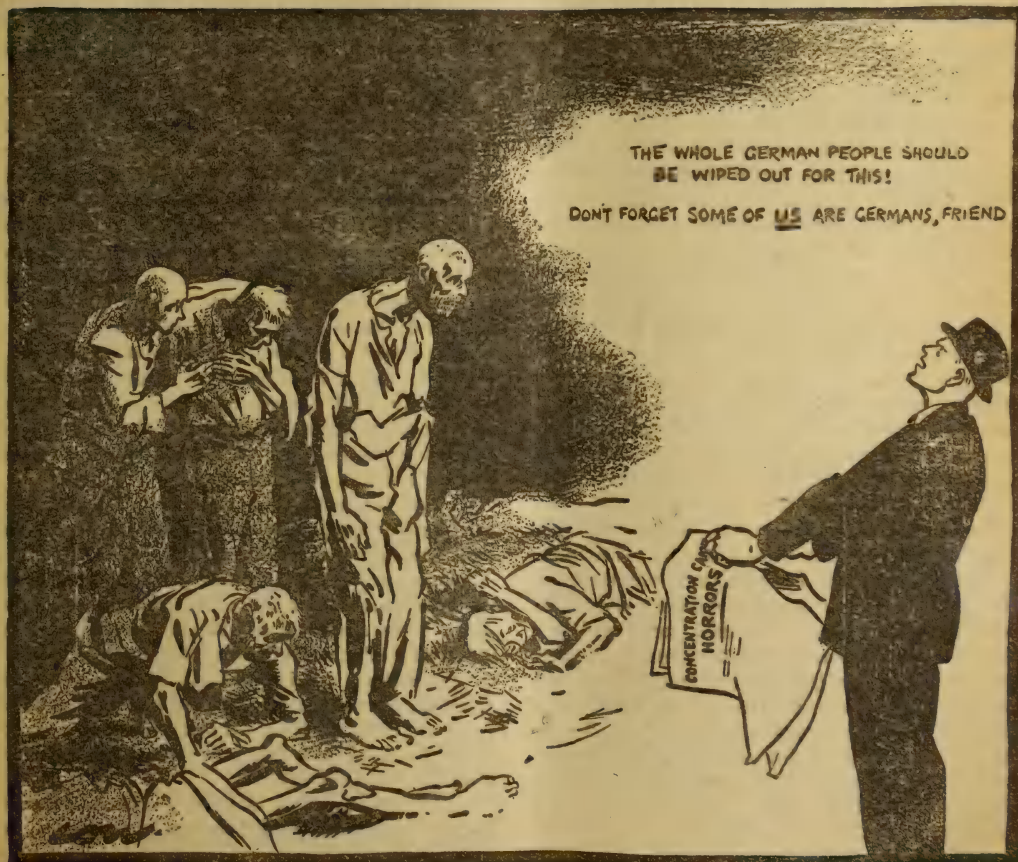

The debates in Oakland were laborious, but in the end unanimous agreements were reached. The most controversial issue with which the committee had to deal was how to assure equality and internal democracy in the organizational set-up. This has been achieved through the adoption of two principles. The first is the autonomy of the national federations. It is not an autonomy to be used negatively, but one which will permit national federations to comply with the agreements of the world federation in the light of conditions in their respective countries. The other principle is proportional representation of the affiliated organizations in the congress of unions as well as in the Administrative Committee. The more members a constituent organization has the more delegates it can send, but there will be this limitation: in the administrative body of the organization the British Trades Union Congress will have two votes; the French organization (the C. G. T.), two also; the C. I. O., two; the Latin American Confederation of Workers (C. T. A. L.), two; and the Soviet trade unions, three. If the basis of representation were purely numerical and not functional, the Russian unions, with 27,000,000 members, would have almost half the votes in the Administrative Committee. As it is, they have only one more vote than the French C. G. T., which according to the capable and energetic Louis Saillant, head of the Council of National Resistance in France, has approximately 4,680,000 members.

Altogether the new world trade-union organization comprises some 60,000,000 workers. This is not a final figure. The labor leaders meeting in Oakland hope to bring into the federation other national organizations, including the A. F. of L., to whose membership a strong appeal was made by Philip Murray in his speech at the Civic Auditorium. No matter what the officials of that organization desire, its members are certain to respond to repeated invitations from the new international, especially since one of its characteristics is its determination to go on asking for what it wants. I discussed with some of the members of the Administrative Committee the rejection by the United Nations Conference of its request for recognition in a consultative capacity. They said, "We shall try again and again—here in San Francisco until the show is over, at the September conference in Paris, after that on every possible occasion. We are convinced that whatever may be the post-war program drawn up by the United Nations, if the new security plans do not have the support of organized labor they will fail." These men know what they want. They will not give up the fight. At the London conference certain maneuvers were used in an effort to exclude the Spanish trade unions; visas and transportation were refused the Spanish delegate coming from Mexico. Nevertheless, the delegate arrived on time because the conference insisted on his presence, and the U. G. T., which for three years during the Spanish war rendered such courageous service to the cause of democracy, now has a representative in the Committee of Forty-five.

Not only is the attitude of the new international trade-union organization entirely different from that assumed by labor during the period between the two world wars; its approach to post-war problems is more dextrous and shows more fighting spirit. The leaders meeting in Oakland expect the new international not merely to tackle problems of wages and hours, with which it would naturally deal, but to use its influence to guide the international conscience of the peoples of the world. The attention they received from the British press during the London meetings showed that they were on the right track in preparing themselves for this great role. Two newspapers, traditionally conservative but with political perception—the London Times and the Financial News—gave equal importance and space to the two conferences then taking place, the Crimean conference and the trade-union conference. A Times editorial made the acute observation that the labor meeting was “at least as important because governments come and go and can be replaced by others representing opposite principles, while the people remain.” The new international intends to be political. It wants labor to play a major political role.

The position of the new organization is strengthened as a consequence of recent developments in Europe. That Europe is going to the left, as I have steadily maintained it would, is even more obvious since the elections in France and the liberation of northern Italy. Though at the moment of writing full information is still lacking, it is unquestionable, as M. Saillant told the Oakland meeting, that the French people have “voted for social democracy and for what labor demands.” The position of labor is further reinforced by the economic consequences of the war. From that point of view alone it is absurd that the United Nations Conference has refused to admit the delegates assembled in Oakland in even an advisory capacity. The statement addressed to the four chairmen and signed by Sidney Hillman, Sir Walter Citrine, Louis Saillant, and M. Tarasov, stressed this point. It said, “We ask for representation in the United Nations Conference for a further and compelling reason. Organized labor will be charged with many serious and important tasks and will be called upon to assume grave responsibilities in the work of the international security organization. Its assistance will be essential in perfecting international cooperation against the economic causes of war by assuring rising living standards, greater security, and a more abundant life for all the peoples.” The World Trade Union Conference, following one of the decisions taken in London, is already working out a plan of economic security and will be far better able to provide solutions than all the economic experts the United Nations organization may appoint if the experts work as they did at Geneva without direct contact with the masses, their needs, and their sufferings. As I talked to the men who framed that statement I recalled the days when the doors of the League were closed on labor, to be opened once a year when a trade-union delegation to Geneva was formerly received and then sent back home to await the next international crisis and accept its consequences. Labor’s intimate collaboration with the world security organization would serve that organization as much as it would serve labor. What this assembly sorely needs is a spark of fire and determination. Merely to listen to the delegate of New Zealand pledge his effort to the fight for a decent peace for the common man raised the spirits of the assembly. A new faith is required, but more urgently still new men are needed to restore confidence in the capacity of the nations to accomplish the tasks that lie ahead. Labor would provide this confidence if it should enter the new league in the mood that the meetings at Oakland have revealed.

Berlin: a Necrology

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

THE grave of my parents is in Weissensee, the grave of my wife is in Halensee. I was born in the neighborhood of the Alexanderplatz. I was in love for the first time in Monbijou. I studied medicine in the Charité. I headed a hospital in the Wedding district. My child was born in Joachimsthalerstrasse. I lived at Steinplatz when I left Berlin early in 1936. Now I live in New York. Now I look at the maps of burning Berlin in American newspapers. Now I am an American citizen. I try to remember. The graves will be destroyed, the parks aflame, the houses fallen to dust and ashes. Friends will be killed. Seldom has the past of living beings been so cruelly amputated, so helplessly degraded.

When I left Germany I knew that it was forever. In Aachen, on the border, I flashed the ten-mark note I was allowed to take along. I did not look back. It was a journey out of a realm of shadow. All my love and tenderness and yearning for my lost homeland I took with me into the beckoning freedom and space of a new world. The sky hung pale and leaden over Germany, and the smokestacks of the factories vanished into the mist. There was still a Europe then. Only the Cassandra-like gaze of the émigrés saw its splendid, self-assured cities brought down in blood and ashes. And those among us who found words to describe the horror of which we were the eyewitnesses or victims were pitied like madmen or suspected like traitors.

When I left, Hitler had been in power for almost three years. There were the concentration camps—Oranienburg, Dachau, Buchenwald—the torture chambers of the Gestapo, the gnawing cancer of terror with all its mortal symptoms. Of course, everybody in Germany knew about it. When we talked about it, we closed the window, cut off the telephone, and still—one’s own friend might be a henchman, an agent, an informer. There was no laughter; the best, the most sincere, the most dearly beloved faces changed into horrifying masks under the impact of fear and suspicion.

We tried to tell you over here. You would not believe. It is hard to imagine misery before it appears on one’s own doorstep. The death of strangers has no reality. But cancer is incurable if not cut out at its first onset. You believed us too late. But we too were too late. We too did not understand until the brutal fist hit us squarely.

We have been longing, for twelve feverish years, for these holy days of victory. Now that they are here, I am overcome by an almost unbearable sadness.

It is not the pyre of my ghostlike past that affects me. It is rather that so much of my earlier life must have been lie and deceit. I love America more with every sunrise. But I cannot forget the first words I learned, the first landscape I saw, the first kindness, the first pain, the first enthusiasm. They were German, untranslatable, incomparable; they remain forever a part of my existence. And that this part of me is now inseparably mixed with dirt, with stench, with unspeakable nausea, this is a sickening pain.

I could say to myself: I am a Jew, I was never a German. But that would be untrue. All my happy memories, my first literary adventures, my musical impressions, my early friendships were German, European-German, rooted in a humane artistic and scientific spirit that seemed sound and beautiful—and that ended in disaster. During all these years of faithful transition from a European into an American I have searched myself again and again to find out what was wrong with my life, my time, my former country. It is easy to form an opinion and to cling to some dogma. Too easy. If one could destroy all Germans, the pest which broke out in their organism would still exist and be in danger of spreading. Fascism is a global disease, a universal shame, fermenting in the soil of this century, breaking out to mutilate the brains and limbs of mankind everywhere. Victory will not be enough to eliminate this perverted relationship among men, continents, races. What are we to do to make the rest of our life span immune to this epidemic which has so disfigured us?

Berlin has often been called an ugly city. It was not ugly to me. It was—to European minds—a young and daring city; its climate was crisp and stimulating; it was a city in which writers could work; it was meant for new thoughts and new ideas as no other city in Europe. It was surrounded by pine woods and tender, dreamy lakes, and its summer nights were enchanting. Its people seemed no different from other people.

What happened in Berlin, what happened in Germany? What must be done that such ignominious decay of a country and its people can never and nowhere be repeated?

Sooner or later, we must find the answer. If we do, the death of this city will not have been in vain.

Fascism Without Mussolini—I

BY MARIO ROSSI

If war is a continuation of politics by different means, the reverse is equally true. Italy sets an example and a precedent. Italy was not only the first nation to be freed by the effort of the Western Allies but the test of whether or not we meant what we said. To study Allied policy in Italy is to study Allied policy in general. The defeat of Germany and the creation of the new international organization at San Francisco will not lead to peace unless we avoid a repetition of the blunders committed in Italy. For this reason The Nation intends to publish a series of articles on Italy, of which Mr. Rossi's is the first.

WHEN the Allies landed in Sicily in July, 1943, the traditional anti-German sentiments of the Italian people had been revived by the passage of German troops through the country en route to Sicily. The war on the side of the Germans was extremely unpopular. Anti-Fascism was spreading everywhere. The opposition was ready to act. From all sides one word was heard: Enough! Enough of Mussolini, enough of Fascism, enough of war!

Mussolini was perfectly aware of the popular mood. Since the end of 1942 he had realized what a mistake he had made in entering the war against the Allies. Prominent Fascists in his own entourage were maneuvering against him, knowing that the end of the war meant the end of Mussolini. The Gestapo heard of these maneuvers, and the Duce was summoned to Salzburg in February, 1943. Upon his return Foreign Secretary Count Ciano, Minister of Justice Dino Grandi, and Minister of National Education Giuseppe Bottai were eliminated from the government. Ciano became ambassador at the Holy See, Grandi president of the Chamber of Fasces and Corporations, and Bottai editor of a newspaper. The three had frequent conversations with known anti-Fascists, particularly with former Premier Orlando, and became the center of all intrigues in the high Fascist hierarchy.

For the House of Savoy also Mussolini was now a liability and an embarrassment. After March, 1943, when the strikes of 50,000 workers at Milan and Turin made it clear what the popular mood was, the King received hundreds of persons who urged him to act to take Italy out of the war. His answer was, "I am a constitutional king and cannot form a new government without the vote of Parliament." But the Parliament had been abolished by Mussolini, and so the King countenanced the farce of using the Grand Council of Fascism for this purpose. Churchill, in his speech of December 23, 1940, had said that "one man, against the crown and royal family of Italy, against the Pope and all the authority of the Vatican and the Roman Catholic church," was responsible for the war. Those Fascists, therefore, who took the King's side, felt secure, and Mussolini lost most of his followers.

Badoglio stated later that when Mussolini met Hitler at Feltre on July 19, 1943, his intention was to inform Hitler that he was about to ask the Allies for an armistice. But Hitler did not let him speak. Upon his return to Rome Mussolini told the King that he was going to break with Hitler before September 15. The moment had come for the monarchy and the dissident Fascists to act; they must get rid of Mussolini before he engineered the break with Germany. These Fascists met secretly and decided to ask Mussolini for his view of the situation. Mussolini agreed to call a meeting of the Grand Council of Fascists two days later. Grandi, Bottai, and Ciano had meanwhile been joined by Federzoni, Rossoni, Bastianini, Bignardi, and Albini, all members of the Grand Council—Albini was a valuable addition in his capacity of Under Secretary of the Interior and Chief of Police. As their leader they chose Dino Grandi, who prepared a memorandum in which the Grand Council of Fascism would ask Mussolini's government to invite the King to resume his constitutional prerogatives. After twenty years of dictatorship some of the plotters had forgotten what these prerogatives were. To them Dino Grandi explained that according to Article 5 of the constitution, executive power belongs only to the king: he commands all armed forces, declares war, and ratifies peace treaties and treaties of alliance and commerce.

On July 24, Palermo, the capital of Sicily, was occupied by the Allies. The meeting of the Grand Council was scheduled for five o'clock. The most important gerarchi were present in black shirts. The Secretary of the Fascist Party ordered the salute to the Duce. Then Mussolini opened the session with an exposition of the military situation. His speech was long and apologetic. "The problem," he concluded, "is war or peace? Unconditional surrender or fight to the last? Moreover, there is the question of fidelity to the pacts." The members of the Council were confused. After a general discussion Grandi presented the following resolution:

The Grand Council of Fascism, meeting in this decisive hour, turns, first of all, its thoughts to the heroic fighters of the Italian armed forces, which are renewing, side by side with the brave people of Sicily now reflecting the faith of all the Italian people, the noble traditions of bravery and self-sacrifice of our glorious soldiers. Having examined the internal and international situation and the political and military conduct of the war, the Grand Council of Fascism proclaims the sacred duty of all Italians to defend at all cost the unity, the independence, and the liberty of the fatherland, the results of the sacrifices and of the efforts of four generations from the Risorgimento to today; affirms the necessity of the moral and material unity of all Italians in this decisive hour for the destiny of our nation; declares that to this end it is necessary to restore immediately all the functions of the state, by giving to the crown, the Grand Council, the government, the Parliament, the corporations, the tasks and the responsibilities which are established by our laws and by the constitution; invites the government to beg His Majesty the King, to whom the heart of all the nation is turned with fidelity and faith, that for the honor and the good of the country he deign to assume, with the effective command of all the armed forces, according to Article 5 of the statute of the kingdom, that supreme initiative of decision given to him by our institutions, which have always been, in all our national history, the glorious heritage of our august dynasty of Savoy.

The intent of this declaration is clear. Victor Emmanuel wished to act as a constitutional king in dismissing Mussolini, but he could hardly do so after having consented to put aside the constitution and give to Mussolini the prerogatives of the crown. Thus the supreme organ of Fascism had to admit, not only that Fascism had been a complete failure, but also that the King had acted unconstitutionally for the past twenty years. Obviously also, from a purely legal point of view, the supreme organ of Fascism, being itself the product of an illegal act, could not restore the prerogatives of the monarchy, but this fact was ignored.

The resolution bore eighteen signatures. Grandi then made a speech accusing Mussolini of incompetence and of having exploited Fascism to his personal ends. Ciano reminded his father-in-law that it was Germany, not Italy, which had constantly betrayed the spirit and the letter of the alliance. One by one all the dissident members of the council attacked Mussolini for his way of conducting the war. Mussolini saw clearly that the majority was against him and tried to adjourn the meeting. The council was against the proposal and consented only to a recess for dinner. After dinner Grandi asked for and obtained a vote on his resolution. The Secretary of the Fascist Party called the names. There were nineteen votes for the resolution, seven against, and one abstention. Thus the meeting ended. The Secretary again ordered the salute to the Duce. Mussolini tried to smile and said: "I will take the resolution to the King and we will laugh together about it."

Grandi, clearly enough, thought that the resolution was an invitation to the King to get rid of Mussolini and name him, Grandi, Prime Minister. But the King had different plans.

ARREST OF MUSSOLINI

Toward midday on July 25 General Angelo Cerica, newly named chief of the Carabinieri, was summoned to the Palazzo Vidoni, where he was received by the chief of the General Staff, General Ambrosio. Present also was Duke Pietro Acquarone, Minister of the Royal House. "General," said Ambrosio to Cerica, "we have called you to a task that is extremely delicate and of great responsibility. This is it. You will choose the most faithful of your officers, as many as you wish, and you will send them this afternoon, around three, to the Villa Savoia [the King's residence]. Your men will wait there for Mussolini, and after his conference with the sovereign they will arrest him. You must be careful not to attract attention. Guard him well. Do not let him communicate with anybody. Above all, don't let him escape. Orders of the King!" General Cerico was bewildered. Then Acquarone told him about the vote of the Grand Council of Fascism and that it was necessary to arrest Mussolini in order to avoid civil war.

General Cerica chose three of his most trusted men—Colonel Frignani, Captain Anversa, and Captain Vigneri—three non-commissioned officers, and three police agents. They arrived at the Villa Savoia soon after three in an ambulance which was followed by a closed truck containing fifty Carabinieri armed with submachine-guns. Mussolini arrived at 4:35 with his private secretary, De Cesare. The King received him at once. Mussolini reiterated his intention to break with Germany before September 15. Then he spoke briefly about the meeting of the previous night, maintaining that the Grand Council had only consultative powers and that the government was not bound by its decisions. The King cut him short. "The Grand Council," he said, "is a recognized organ of the state having very precise powers. You always insisted on this point and now you cannot forget it." Mussolini replied that in his opinion the motion was void, but the King maintained his point.

"Does this mean that I have to go?" asked Mussolini.

"That is right; you will have to go," the King replied. "And I may add that I have decided to name Marshal Badoglio as your successor. I expect you to put yourself at his disposal."

Whereupon Mussolini left the room. In the garden he was approached by Captain Vigneri, who led him to the waiting ambulance. That evening Mussolini sent Badoglio a letter thanking him for saving his life and asking him to protect his family. Subsequently Mussolini was moved from one barracks of the Carabinieri to another to protect him, as Badoglio explained later, from popular fury.

BADOGLIO VS. THE PEOPLE

The removal of Mussolini caused tremendous joy among the Italian people, but this joy was short-lived.

Badoglio was given full power to form a new Cabinet. The war, he said, would go on, on the side of Germany. "There has been no revolution and no coup d'état," explained Radio Rome.

As Premier, Badoglio had two courses open to him: he could use the army and the monarchy to save the Italian people; or he could use the army and the Italian people to save the monarchy. If he had chosen the first, it might have been necessary for him to sacrifice the monarchy, which was completely compromised by its relations with Fascism, in the name of national unity. There is evidence that the anti-Fascists would have been willing to collaborate in a government if the question of the monarchy were left in suspension. It would have been necessary to send troops at once to the Brenner Pass and to inform Germany that Italy could not continue a war which had been imposed by Mussolini's regime on an unprepared country against the will of the people. Hitler, to be sure, would have attacked at the Brenner, but at that time the army was still faithful to its officers and could have fought back. All Italians, except a minority of Fascists, would have supported the army. The war would have become a popular one.

Badoglio chose without hesitation to use the army, not against the Germans, but against the Italian people in order to save the monarchy. Perhaps in his ancien-régime mentality he really believed in the "indivisible good of king and country" and thought that to save the King meant to save the country. There had been hostility between Badoglio and Mussolini, but it was more a clash of personalities than of ideologies. Although it is true that Badoglio was opposed to the March on Rome, he faithfully served Mussolini as soon as he realized that Fascism was in power to stay. As early as April 10, 1925, Badoglio took the occasion of Mussolini's nomination as Minister of War to send him his "fervid salute as general of the army and as soldier of our glorious and respected country." Mussolini was pleased with this act of submission and named Badoglio chief of the General Staff. After that, Badoglio gave innumerable demonstrations of his devotion. After Zaniboni's attempt on Mussolini's life Badoglio sent the Duce a message saying that "God protected Your Excellency and Italy. . . . In the name of the King we are absolutely faithful and devoted to you." In 1928, when Badoglio was appointed governor of Libya, he wrote to Mussolini asking for a title of nobility transmissible to his descendants, "well knowing the generosity of Your Excellency in rewarding his faithful collaborators." "As I told you personally," he concluded, "Your Excellency can count now as ever on my most complete and absolute devotion." So he became Marquis of Sabotino. After the Ethiopian war he asked Mussolini for a second title and an annuity. He got his money and was made Duke of Addis Ababa.

As soon as Mussolini was ousted, Badoglio conferred with the German ambassador in Rome, Hans-George Viktor von Mackensen. He requested forty German divisions in order to prevent the Allies from invading Italy. Should this request not be granted, he said, Italy would sue for peace.

Mackensen telephoned Berlin, and Berlin agreed to Badoglio's request. The war against the Allies continued.

But meanwhile something wonderful had happened. The anti-Fascist underground parties came to the surface and expressed their will in the following united proclamation issued in Milan on July 26:

Italians! The will of the people and the deep aspiration of our gallant army are satisfied: Mussolini has been driven from power. The anti-Fascist parties, which for twenty years have fought the Fascist dictatorship, in blood and sorrow, in prison and in exile, proclaim their common will to act in full solidarity for the realization of the following aims: (1) the total liquidation of Fascism and of all its instruments of oppression; (2) an armistice for the conclusion of an honorable peace; (3) the restoration of all civil and political liberties, above all the freedom of the press; (4) the immediate liberation of all political prisoners; (5) the reestablishment of an exemplary justice, without summary procedure, but inexorable with regard to all those responsible; (6) the abolition of the racial laws; (7) the constitution of a government formed by the representatives of all parties which express the national will.

The anti-Fascist parties invite the Italians not to confine themselves to manifestations of rejoicing but, aware of the gravity of the hour, to organize themselves so as to bring to bear their inflexible will that the new situation shall not be exploited by anyone for reactionary ends or for the salvaging of interests which have upheld Fascism and have been upheld by Fascism.

The anti-Fascist parties have therefore decided that the whole of the working masses—workers, clerks, artisans, professional men, students, and soldiers—should consider themselves to be in a permanent state of alert and watch so as to affirm by action their unbreakable will to peace and freedom.

GROUP OF LIBERAL RECONSTRUCTION PARTY OF ACTION
CHRISTIAN DEMOCRATIC PARTY
SOCIALIST PARTY MOVEMENT OF PROLETARIAN UNITY FOR THE SOCIALIST REPUBLIC
COMMUNIST PARTY

The institutional question, it may be noted, was not raised: the anti-Fascist parties simply wanted to make sure that the situation was not exploited to salvage the monarchy. But this was exactly Badoglio's aim!

On July 26 Badoglio formed a "technical" government of career functionaries, the majority of whom had served under Mussolini but remained faithful to the King. On the same day he placed Italy under martial law, proclaiming that "this is not the moment to indulge in demonstrations because they will not be tolerated. . . . Assemblies are prohibited, and the public authorities have orders to disperse all gatherings. The control of public order has now come under the military authorities." In its first fortnight of power the new government took a number of measures to strengthen the crown: the Fascist militia was incorporated into the regular army; the formation of political parties and the wearing of political badges were banned for the duration of the war; listening to the Allied radio was forbidden. On August 23 Radio Rome announced that the Ministry of Culture had taken over the complete control of the Italian press and would confiscate papers which "opposed the interest of the nation"—that is, of the monarchy.

Marshal Badoglio

The Badoglio Cabinet also took measures to purge Italy of Fascism, but the military dictatorship deprived such measures of all meaning. Fascist laws were abolished, but military laws made absolute. It was announced that all political prisoners would be released, but many of them were still in prison or concentration camps on September 8. The Fascist Party was dissolved, but Fascism, for most Italians, meant dictatorship and war on the side of the Germans—and both continued. The Fascist special tribunal for the defense of the state was abolished, but military courts took over. Such measures could not fool the Italian people.

Demonstrations for peace broke out all through northern Italy. The extent of the opposition is indicated by the retaliatory measures of the government. The Milan military court was "overwhelmed with work." During the first week of August the military courts sentenced men to as much as twelve years' imprisonment for distributing posters and pamphlets, calling on workers to strike, cheering the Allies in public, spreading rumors, etc. The Minister of the Interior, Umberto Ricci, sent the following telegram to all prefects (regional officials appointed by the government): ". . . We must defy anti-national [that is, anti-monarchist] forces and suppress any demonstrations with maximum firmness. We must restore the power of the law and the moral code in all administrations. We must keep a close watch on disruptive elements and attune the people to a new Italian life of devotion to King and country."

While Badoglio was busy waging his war against the Italian people, the Germans were pouring men down through the Brenner Pass. On August 6 Ribbentrop went to Italy on Badoglio's invitation to discuss the situation. In Tarvisio he met the Foreign Minister, Raffaele Guariglia. Next day General Wilhelm Keitel, German chief of staff, and General Vittorio Ambrosio, Italian chief of staff, joined the party. The conference was ended on August 9 with Badoglio agreeing to continue the war.

In mid-August Badoglio's emissaries conferred with the Allies in Madrid. At the same time a series of broadcasts by Badoglio's official radio indicated the terms on which the Marshal would collaborate with the Allies. These included the neutralization of Italy and its control by military experts acceptable to both the Allies and the Germans; Italy's guaranty that all German troops would be withdrawn immediately and the Italian forces demobilized; cession of Sicily to the Allies for the duration of the war; the Italian mainland not to be used for any military operations by either side.

For Badoglio the problem was to save the structure of the state so that the monarchy would not lose its strength. It was necessary for him both to prevent a revolution and to take Italy out of the war without turning it into a battlefield. The Allies, also, had two objectives. One was to obtain Italy's "unconditional surrender"; the other was to prevent a revolution.

THE KING AND THE ALLIES

The day after Mussolini's fall the OWI asserted that "the essential nature of the Fascist regime in Italy had not changed" and that war would go on against the "moronic little king" and Badoglio, "the high-ranking Fascist." In Algiers, however, General Eisenhower "commended the House of Savoy." And a few days later, in Washington, President Roosevelt scolded the OWI radio speakers who "had imperiled the most difficult of international negotiations."

Then it was the turn of Mr. Churchill to declare before the House of Commons that he did not wish to "break down the whole structure and expression of the Italian state" or "to reduce Italian life to a condition of chaos and anarchy and find ourselves without any authority with which to deal." Unconditional surrender, he said, should be brought about "wholesale" and not "piecemeal." "I certainly don't wish to tread a path that might lead to execution squads and concentration camps, and, above all, to have to carry on our shoulders a lot of people who ought to be made to carry themselves." Those words meant that Mr. Churchill was unwilling to weaken the position of the King and Badoglio since he hoped they might surrender the country "wholesale" and thus avoid "chaos and anarchy." To induce the Italians to force the King to surrender, Churchill warned them that Italy "would be seared and scarred and blackened from one end to the other." "We should let the Italians, to use a homely phrase, stew in their own juice for a bit and hot up the fire to accelerate the process until we obtain from the government, or whoever possesses the authority, all the indispensable requirements" for carrying on the war against Germany.

The following day, July 28, 1943, to scare Victor Emmanuel and Badoglio a little more, President Roosevelt declared that "we will have no truck with Fascism in any way, shape, or manner. We will permit no vestige of Fascism to remain." Later President Roosevelt must have thought he had scared the King and Badoglio too much, for on July 30 he announced that he was willing to have peace dealings with any element "that was not out-and-out Fascist and that could prevent the country from plunging into anarchy."

Naturally, in order to back up the insistence of Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt on the danger of anarchy, some cases of anarchy had to be produced. On August 1 the New York Times cited "many reports of disorders in Italy." "It appears that the spirit behind these clashes is a demand for peace. If that were all, it would be logical to suppose the disorders would end with Italy out of the war." But "it is likely that domestic political axes are being ground and that anti-Fascist elements are seeking their own advantages. There are evidences that Communists are heavily involved in many of the disorders."

Allied propaganda told the Italians further that the United Nations sympathized fully with their desire for liberty, but that liberty could not be realized without peace, and therefore their first duty was to induce the King to surrender. British propaganda, particularly, was willing to promise the Italians anything to make them force the King to act. The first sign of Britain's real intentions came in the second week of August when, just as the Italian masses were most active in their peace demonstrations, Allied planes launched terror raids against the northern cities. The Italian people realized then that the war was against them and not against Fascism. The Allies never had the moral courage to tell the Italians the plain truth—namely, that peace was impossible for Italy, and that they could offer it, in place of Mussolini's war against the Allies, only the chance to fight for liberation from the Germans.

In their desire to prevent any change in the internal situation, the Allies and Badoglio could count on the support of the Vatican. The position of the church after Mussolini's fall was made clear by the Vatican radio and the pastoral letters of the bishops bolstering the efforts of the Badoglio government to control radical tendencies. At the same time the Vatican supported a separate peace for Italy.

TREASON IN ROME

As I said above, by mid-August Italian emissaries were in Madrid and in contact with the British ambassador. It is now well known that the Italians were General Castellano, a trusted friend of General Ambrosio, and his adviser and interpreter, Franco Montanari, former Italian consul general in Honolulu. Informed of their arrival, the governments of London and Washington agreed to send their representatives to Lisbon. On August 19 Major General Walter B. Smith and Brigadier General K. W. Strong, representing General Eisenhower, met Castellano in Lisbon in the house of the British ambassador, Sir Ronald Campbell.

General Smith opened the discussion by saying, "I know you have come to ask for armistice terms. Here they are." And he read the terms one by one: unconditional surrender, full use of all Italian bases to be granted, surrender of the fleet and air force, recall to Italy of all Italian divisions abroad, postponement to a later day of all political and economic agreements. "These terms are not to be discussed," said General Smith; "they must be accepted without conditions." "The aim of my trip was not exactly to ask for an armistice," General Castellano replied, "but to see how Italy could cooperate with the Allies." "We are not willing to discuss any terms short of unconditional surrender," retorted General Smith. "You have heard the conditions. They cannot be changed. You must either accept them or refuse them." Castellano said he understood, and the conversation turned to military matters. We do not know the details of this part of the conversation. According to Clark Lee of the I. N. S., Castellano asked that Allied troops be parachuted near Rome at the moment of the landing in Italy; he further assured the Allies that the Italian forces would aid them and that the Germans were not strong in the region of Rome.

Meanwhile, Rome was worried lest Castellano's mission should fail and sent to Lisbon General Zanussi, of the staff of General Roatta, chief of staff of the Italian army. As credentials Zanussi brought with him the British General Carl de Wiart, who was a prisoner in Italy. Because Roatta was known as a Fascist and pro-Nazi, the British became suspicious. Fearing a German trick, they sent De Wiart to England at once and General Zanussi to Algiers.

On August 27, at three o'clock, Allied Headquarters received word that Badoglio accepted the armistice terms. On August 31 General Castellano and Montanari left Rome by plane and landed in Sicily. Castellano now stressed the fact that Italy's condition was very much changed since the conversations in Lisbon. The country was virtually occupied by the Germans, and the government was no longer free. He asked therefore for certain guarantees. General Smith gave Italy until September 2 to make up its mind. On September 2, at 7:30 P.M., Castellano, who had returned to Rome, cabled the Allied Command that he would fly to Sicily the next day. On September 3 he met the Allied commanders, and it was decided that Badoglio in Rome and Eisenhower in Algiers should simultaneously announce the signing of the armistice. It was five o'clock when Castellano put his signature to the document. The same day Allied troops landed in Calabria.

The proposal to land air-borne troops in the area of Rome was accepted by the Allies. It was furthermore decided that two Allied officers should go to Rome to get firsthand information. General Taylor and Colonel Gardiner volunteered and left on the night of September 6 on an American PT boat. At Ustica they were transferred to the Italian corvette Ibis, which landed them at Gaeta. They reached Rome in an ambulance by the Appian Way. It was understood that in case of capture by the Germans, the two Allied officers would appear as prisoners of war in order not to be shot as spies. The ambulance entered Rome at 10:30 P.M. of September 7. The Americans went first to see General Carboni, military commander of the Rome area, who begged them to call off the air-borne invasion and to postpone the announcement of the armistice. He pointed out that there was a very strong German garrison in the Tiber valley. Taylor and Gardiner then insisted on seeing Marshal Badoglio. Badoglio confirmed what Carboni had said, and suggested that the Allied officers return to their headquarters with his decision to postpone the announcement of the armistice. The officers refused but sent a code message saying, "Do not attack with air-borne troops. The operation is canceled." A few hours later they received the order to return.

After the departure of General Taylor and Colonel Gardiner, the morning of September 8 passed in Rome as if nothing had happened. But around five in the afternoon, while Badoglio was working at his desk, General Ambrosio entered the room waving a piece of paper. "Marshal," he shouted, "we are ruined." And he gave him a telegram from Eisenhower in which the Allied commander informed Badoglio that he had decided to announce the armistice over the radio at 6:30 P.M. He invited the Marshal to speak immediately afterward. Badoglio thereupon prepared a reply to Eisenhower, asking him not to take any action before the arrival of General Rossi, who was on his way to Allied headquarters with General Taylor. It was too late. The Allied fleet was already before Salerno.

King Victor Emmanuel

Shortly afterward the King met his most trusted men at the royal palace. While the Chief of Staff, Ambrosio, was explaining the new situation to the King, an officer announced that Eisenhower was speaking over the radio. After a final consultation with Badoglio and Ambrosio, Victor Emmanuel decided to accept the fait accompli. At 7:05 P.M. Badoglio announced over the radio that the Italian government, in view of the superior forces of the Allies, had been compelled to ask for an armistice. The request having been accepted, the Italian army would cease all hostilities against the Allies, but would reply to eventual attacks from any other quarter. Ignoring the Italian people's clearly expressed ideological reasons for refusing to fight for Germany, Badoglio adduced only the fact that the Allies were too strong.

At first it looked as if the Germans would retreat to the north, but the next day it became clear that they were preparing to seize Rome. Flight from the capital was decided on. The King, the Queen, the Crown Prince, Badoglio, and the personnel of the court left first; then Ambrosio, Roatta, Navy Minister De Courten, and Air Minister Sandalli. At the last minute Roatta gave a few written instructions to the troops left to defend Rome. Early on the following morning the fugitives boarded a navy corvette at Pescara on the Adriatic coast. In the meantime the commanders of the army telephoned in vain to the various ministers to ask for instructions.

The outer defenses of Rome were held by the Motorized Army Corps under the command of General Carboni, who took his orders directly from the General Staff. South of the city was an army corps under General Barbieri, who took his order from the command of the Fifth Army. The two commands were in continuous conflict over authority. Furthermore, many units were considered untrustworthy because they contained a great number of Fascist militiamen, incorporated into the army by Badoglio. The troops were poorly equipped and trained and wrongly placed. It was clear that the High Command had never thought seriously of defending Rome, but wished only to prevent a coup de main before the flight of the King. Achille Corona, whose analysis of the fall of Rome in Avanti I have extensively quoted, says that the dispositions made were more like the work of a chief of police than of military strategists.

Roatta had ordered the Motorized Army Corps to abandon Rome in order to avoid damage to the city, and to retreat toward the Adriatic coast. This meant that the corps must enter a mountainous zone where the movement of motorized units was practically impossible. One cannot escape the conclusion that the corps was moved west because the King was in that sector. When the divisional commanders received Roatta's orders, they replied that it was impossible to retreat from a fortified position while the Germans were attacking. Nevertheless, they carried out the orders.

In the meantime the Germans started the attack. Some units resisted splendidly but in vain. Others surrendered. The officers received no further instructions. The news that the King and his generals had fled spread among the troops with fatal effect. Rome fell to the Germans.

To the Italian forces fighting on foreign ground the General Staff had given a secret order, known as the "OP 44," containing instructions for attack and defense. The Italian Fourth Army in France received this order only on September 7. Italian commanders abroad telephoned Rome to ask whether or not to apply the "OP 44." But no officer of the General Staff was in Rome to answer.

[Next week Mr. Rossi will analyze the sharpening conflict between the monarchists and the partisans.]

Lilienthal and the Valley

BY BARRETT C. SHELTON

Decatur, Alabama, May 3

TODAY'S people are thinking of a home-grown agricultural and industrial empire in the Tennessee Valley, an empire built by their own hands and with their own resources. You'll find few defeatists in this Valley. Folks are cocky over the achievements of the past ten years and looking toward a future bright with all sorts of possibilities.

TVA changed the thinking of the people. Their own strength was discovered in them. Now they are building the land, planting and harvesting new income crops, adopting modern marketing and processing methods. New industry, small-scale, home-grown, and home-financed, is developing in community after community as Valley folk digest the belief that the South does not have to wait for industry to move in.

TVA brought the tools of navigation, flood control, lower-cost power, community planning; it stepped up educational and health standards; it advocated the right uses for the soil, the forests, the minerals. TVA has worked with local and state agencies in fashioning these tools of economic growth. There have been no directives, no edicts, from a centralized government authority. Rather, the general attitude in this Valley, among the people, the local and state agencies, and the TVA, is "Come, let us reason together."

Many visitors come to this Valley. Only the other day a newspaperman from Melbourne, Australia, was here. The Australian wanted to learn whether TVA principles could be applied in Australia. Visitors want the whole truth of the experiment. They want to know how it is working. They want to know whether the TVA principle would work for their community in the river basin whence they come. It is not an uncommon sight in the Tennessee Valley to see farmers, business men, industrialists taking these visitors on tour, answering their questions, telling them the truth about the TVA.

It is right for us to do these services. This Valley belongs to the United States and the world. What has been learned here can be applied elsewhere. The progress made here can be made elsewhere.

Let me try to answer a few questions that seem to bother folks who cannot come to the Valley to see for themselves. Is TVA sound? Does TVA pay its way? Does TVA pay fair taxation?

Let's be specific. The Electric Department of the city of Decatur, Alabama, pays twice as much tax to the city as was paid by the private utility. At the same time annual savings in electric bills to the consumers on the Decatur system total more than all the ad valorem and license taxes now being collected locally. The state of Alabama is receiving more tax money from TVA than it received from the land now flooded—by the construction of dams—and from the private utility's license and ad valorem taxes in the area now commonly called "TVA territory."

Decatur has the cheapest electric rate in the world for some classifications of residential consumers. Yet even with these rates the department is clearing $100,000 annually on an investment of $600,000. This profit is net, not gross, and there will be further rate reductions. However, the lowering of electric rates is not the major objective of the people of the Tennessee Valley.

Twelve years ago, before TVA was authorized by a far-seeing Congress and went to work, the people of this Valley looked to the outside world for the means of industrial development, thought comparatively little of the sleeping giant, agriculture. All capital, all "know how" had to come from the outside, of so we thought. Today we look back upon our methods of former years and grin at ourselves for our stupidity in economics.

The change was brought about largely through the personal efforts of David E. Lilienthal. Mr. Lilienthal has spoken before community after community in the area, telling us that we will not come upon a brand-new world when these wars are over, that the approach to national soundness must start at the community level, that after these wars personal initiative will still earn a premium, and that the Valley must strive toward self-sufficiency in agriculture and industry.

David Lilienthal is an idealist and a dreamer, but he bases his ideals on the truth of solid economics. And the people have faith in his beliefs and his suggestions for action. A man without confidence that the impossible could be done would never have made a success of the experiment in this Valley. Dave Lilienthal has so captured the imagination of the plain people that they do not hesitate to fight at the smallest suggestion of change in the basic law under which TVA was created or in the personnel of the directorate and management. Honesty of purpose and sound economic practices created that feeling in the Valley.

It is the belief up and down the Valley that only the surface has been scratched, that our opportunities are limited only by our imagination and our energy to activate our dreams of community sufficiency. The record of the past ten years shows the reversal of trends in the Valley; the coming ten years will show how far an area can develop under the dynamic combination of an inspired public servant, a sympathetic government, and a bold, self-confident people.

In the Wind

ENEMIES OF THE OPA have staunch allies in England. A British friend sends us the following clipping from the March 19 issue of the Daily Film Renter, a movie-theater trade paper published in London: "Further cable from New York intimated that OPA—who they are I haven't the faintest idea—are asking Congressional authority to control admission prices, stating they are up 38½ per cent since 1941. I suppose it's some well-meaning body who wants to interfere without knowing the slightest thing about the facts. Haven't heard that there's any likelihood of any such control being initiated, and very certain that OPA—whoever they might be—won't get very much satisfaction from the American government. Later cable—Senate committee have turned it down—I thought they would—OPA just a lot of busy-bodies!"

OVERHEARD IN NEW YORK on May 2: "I don't trust that bum. I don't think he's dead at all. I bet he's skipped to Argentina or some place. Oh, no, that's right, Argentina's on our side now, isn't it?"

THE FOLLOWING AD appears every Sunday in the Norwich, Connecticut, Record: "BINGO. Immaculate Conception School, Westerly, R. I. Every Monday, 8:00."

DORIS VORMBROCK, president of the Pan-Hellenic Society at the University of Louisville, Kentucky, told some of the qualifications for sorority membership in an interview in the Louisville Courier Journal of April 8: "We try to find out something about a girl's parents before we pledge her, because we want nice people, but the girl herself is what we go by. . . . We don't pledge Jewish girls, but they wouldn't want to join. Our ideals are based on Christianity."

JAMES A. GRIFFIN, Catholic Bishop of Springfield, Illinois, offered this explanation of Roosevelt's death in an address April 17: "While President Roosevelt was a casualty of the war, he was also a casualty of the heartless criticism of his enemies and a casualty of Russia. The perfidy of Russia is notorious. No man can deal with the red elements and hope to survive."

LEGISLATIVE MEMO: The House Judiciary Committee has reported favorably on the so-called "equal rights" amendment, which would nullify all legislation designed to protect women workers. . . . The Senate Commerce Committee is expected to issue a report on the Murray bill (S. 555) for a Missouri Valley Authority by May 15. The bill then will go to the Senate Agriculture and Irrigation committees successively. . . . By a referendum vote of 2,667 to 101, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States has put its O.K. on the Bailey bill (S. 754), which would prohibit royalty payments by industry to representatives of employees. The Judiciary Committee is now considering the bill.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

TO YOUR LIST of bed-time reading add "The Land of the Great Image" by Maurice Collis. It relates the experiences of an Augustinian friar, Sebastiao Manrique, who was sent to Goa, the capital of Portuguese Asia, early in the seventeenth century. He was later transferred to Bengal and made a journey to the court of Arakan—which forms the principal matter of this book. Arakan is now part of Burma, but it was then an independent kingdom. Mr. Collis begins by presenting a picture of the luxurious decadent city, "Golden Goa," during the last years of Portuguese prosperity. This section includes an account of Francis Xavier, who had landed in Goa in 1542 on his way to convert all Asia and had shocked "high folks" because he insisted on going about barefoot and in rags among the poor and diseased. "White people," they said, "will be despised by the natives because of him, for only if they see us as splendid and magnificent conquerors will we be able to impress upon them that we are a superior race." His mummified body, retrieved from the remote Asian wayside where he died, was brought back to Goa. Needless to say, it was reverently enshrined by the "high folks" and became one of the sights of Goa. This first section also includes an inside account of an auto-da-fé by a French traveler named Dellon, who was caught in the toils of the Inquisition. Dellon had been so indiscreet as to make imprudent remarks about matters of faith—and to visit the mistress of a high official.

All this is interesting enough, but even more fascinating is the account of Manrique's long stay at the court of Arakan and his record of what went on there. It is based on Manrique's "Travels," published after his return to Europe in 1643. The "Travels" cover a great deal more than the material of this book, but they are written in what Vela, the historian of the Augustinian Order, calls "castellano desastrado"—a phrase which makes me want to read Vela—and are in any case not easily available. Still, according to Mr. Collis, who has obviously read them in their entirety, even Manrique was roused out of dulness by his adventures in Arakan. "His style in this part," says the narrator patiently, "is generally less tiresome."

Mr. Collis's own style is rather dry, but he has a nice sense of irony, which combines with the reader's to throw into strong relief the story of King Thiri-thu-dhamma, who aspired to become a Buddha and bring perfect government to the world. But he became so obsessed with his mission and desire that he even consented to the murder of many of his own subjects when a master of magic prescribed, in order to prolong the King's life, an elixir of which one ingredient was the essence of six thousand human hearts.

I was just finishing "The Land of the Great Image" when the news of Mussolini's end and the rumors of Nazi surrender came through. For the moment the whole fascist nightmare of the past twenty-three years seemed like another fabulous story from a remote age when dungeons were in flower—except that torture on the scale of Buchenwald and Dachau could not have been achieved without mass-production methods and modern medicine. Eyewitness accounts of the fascist obsession in the twentieth century will have to be even duller and more matter of fact than Manrique's to be believed three hundred years from now.

Unless, of course, we continue to cherish the delusion that only other people, in this case the Germans, are capable of such evil. That can start a new cycle of cruelty which is none the less vile for being based on self-righteousness. Friar Manrique was shocked at the cruelty of the Arakan king—which was, in the king's mad logic, a means to an ideal end—but Manrique himself approved of the Inquisition and of the taking of infidel slaves, and condoned the terrible human consequences of both because of his belief in the infallibility of Rome. "Ideals," says Yeats, "make the blood thin and take the human nature out of people." Certainly that is true of fanaticism, whatever its source.

We are witnessing the most gruesome and complete demonstration in history of the fact that cruelty ends in the moral and even the physical destruction of its perpetrators. Yet the dangerous talk of "doing the same thing" to the Germans goes senselessly on.

Only those people who are willing to take on in person the actual work, from torture to cremation, of paying back the Germans in kind should be allowed to advocate it. And I wouldn't care to associate with any of the volunteers.

SOME NOTES on the American language: A Frenchman reports that he finds the English in The Nation quite easy to read but that the language of such papers as the Daily Mirror is beyond him. That reminds me of the complaint of a Hungarian friend whose second tongue has been English all his life. Soon after he arrived in this country he said that the talk he heard around New York was spoiling his English. And both remarks bring to mind a statement of Bertrand Russell's, of slightly different import, in an essay in Horizon:

We found, in America, that strangers in shops or buses at first took us for Germans and tolerated our way of speaking, but when they found that English was our native language they became indignant with us for not speaking as they do. It never occurred to them for a moment that the English have some rights in the English language.

He has a point.

THE ADVERTISING FEDERATION OF AMERICA is worried because "public-opinion polls insist that a considerable section of the general public has various prejudices against advertising." A while ago it sent out a letter asking all good media to come to the aid of "the advertising way" of doing business and asking also for $25 with which to combat its enemies. These enemies include legislators and bureaucrats. "Forty Congressmen formed a so-called consumers' bloc, about a year ago, to fight for a program of compulsory government grade labeling, standardization, and generally socialistic reform of business (my italics).<sup>24</sup> The federation is planning to expand its "many-sided national program of education and public relations. . . . In this we utilize numerous avenues of public information including materials used in the schools."

The advertising business has, I think, accomplished one job of education in its long and loud career. It has inculcated in a great many people a skepticism about advertising which will be very hard to eradicate. The excesses of the advertisers have made the whole business a national joke; and the radio commercial in particular has become so blatant and so boring that in retaliation one often refuses to hear it even though one listens. For even if it does not offend the taste, it offends the sense of the ridiculous, which is not confined to any "culture group."

The Barnum law, which the advertising profession has exploited so cynically, worked wonderfully at first; and of course it still works up to a point. But it is a law of diminishing returns. The stress on the opinions of experts is one attempt to overcome the decline; what is called institutional advertising may be another.

I'm curious to know what material is being used in schools and how it is insinuated. It will have to be clever, for even the school kids I know scoff at advertising if only because that's the fashionable thing to do. This does not mean that they are not responsive to advertising, but the fact that it's smart to be skeptical won't make things any easier for the A. F. A.

Someone was suggesting the other day that a firm which advertised its products quietly and by means of under- rather than overstatement would probably be very successful. I pass on this suggestion to the A. F. A.—it seems to me worth at least $25. A long experience of discovering that products were slightly better than the ads say they are—instead of the other way round—might restore the public faith in advertising. But I doubt that so sensible a device will be considered. It is hardly compatible with "the advertising way."

Work of Art

ANGEL IN THE FOREST. By Marguerite Young. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

MARGUERITE YOUNG's first prose volume is repetitive, obscure, diffuse, overwritten, firesomely obsessed with copulation and with analogical images of flowers, insects, and birds, scornful at many points of coherence, continuity, and form; yet it is a book of astonishing subtlety and brilliance, a genuine work of art, and together with her two previous volumes of verse it should establish its author as one of the truly notable writers of her generation. Its faults are in no sense deficiencies. Miss Young, on the contrary, is prodigal of her talent, and her book suffers from her excessive absorption in its theme. She cannot resist the characteristic temptation of gifted writers to give us too much of a good thing. The grandiose failure of two Utopias, George Rapp's and Robert Owen's, is the subject of a prolonged discursive meditation that points up the central, seminal paradoxes of man's relation to society. But this is not an expository or an argumentative work but a contemplative one, something rare these days, and cathartic. It is a true narrative, despite its factual shortcomings, for the same reason that it is in the best sense poetic: it dwells upon those contradictions that are not only the source of history but the only serviceable commentary on it.

The charm and verity of the book, as well as its inexhaustible irony, lie in its ambiguous attitude toward its subject. George Rapp's community was monastic, chiliastic, autocratic; Owen's was the reverse in everything but its communism. For a brief period Rapp's flourished, however, largely by selling whiskey to the natives, and its site was sold at a profit to Owen, who, for all his rationalism and business acumen and benevolence, was speedily proved the more visionary of the two, as his community disintegrated by secession, himself losing four-fifths of his fortune. "Who fails to love this man," says Miss Young, "fails to love humanity."

Miss Young, a native of Indiana, has not only done an extensive job of research on these settlements, as well as on the English background of Owen's career; she has visited New Harmony as one would a museum, or a mausoleum, talked with its citizens, all of whom are "aware of New Harmony's strangeness," finding, she tells us, "in 1940, all kinds of contrasts . . . babies squalled where Rappite celibates had slept profoundly. . . . A whore where there had been an angel. . . . No sky rolling back, no coming of Christ on a golden throne upheld by cherubim, but only a lonely crow, monogamist bird—and an airplane on some mysterious mission of its own, the advertisement of Lucky Strikes, a writing in that sky."

Such poignant incongruities as these largely compose the volume. The irony, indeed, is sometimes gross. Miss Young is continually approaching the border between the ironic and the grotesque, on occasion crossing it, as in her account, wholly fanciful no doubt, of Father Rapp in extreme old age becoming gradually disabused of his millenarian dream. On the whole, the section on the Rappites is much the better half of the book, sharper, more lucid and sardonic, less disfigured by philosophic digressions; the portion on the Owenites tends to embody the confusion it depicts, and the concluding chapters on Owen's unregenerate son, Robert Dale, trail off into irrelevance. Miss Young performs best as a commentator when she is not consciously philosophizing. Indeed, her book tells us in effect that life is an interminable implicit critique of itself, requiring no supplementary hypothesis.

The inherent irony of her material does not, however, explain the great impression her book gives of virtuosity. New Harmony for her is an image of human destiny, the perpetual mixture of exaltation and defeat. The real aesthetic virtue of the book is its inextricable propriety of style to theme. That style is mock evangelical, an almost reverent parody of the King James Bible. It is this exuberant satiric prose that is the embodiment of Miss Young's romanticism, of her doubts about not only rationalism but rationality, of her whimsical concern for whatever is deviant, singular, unique, of her metaphysical delight in fantasy, eccentricity, and madness, of, finally, her sense of life as an incalculable, chaotic thing, meaningful only for those passionate enough to imagine it so.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ

BRIEFER COMMENT

Out of James

"YOU KNOW," says the Princess Casamassima in James's novel, "you know people oughtn't to be both corrupt and dull." It is what George Santayana has pretty well managed to be in "The Middle Span," the second instalment of his memoirs (Scribner, $2.50). The corruption—or at any rate the frankly cynical over-ripeness—we have long been accustomed to; but Santayana has rarely been merely tedious, and certainly "Persons and Places"—no doubt because the materials were those of childhood and adolescence—abounded in interest, humor, and poignancy. There are a few animated moments in this volume—two or three glimpses, for example, of Rockefeller, who on learning from Santayana that there were nineteen million people in Spain, observed at once that his associates didn't sell enough oil there—but in general the book succeeds only in reminding us how successfully Santayana has insulated himself against the life of his time, and what abysses of Latin sentimentality there have always been in his nature.

The real value the book has—indeed, a moderate one—is as a footnote to James's later novels: its pages are filled with the ghosts of real Ververs, real Strethers, real Graham Fielders; and of course, in a sense, Santayana belongs very much in that gallery himself. His book confirms our sense of James's uncanny clairvoyance about the American-European cosmopolis of his time. Certain of James's dénoués, if they had lived into our decade, might quite imaginably have spoken, as Santayana does, of a young man, his nephew, who joined the Falange in the Spanish civil war: he was, says Santayana, "among the first to catch the new wave of hope and enthusiasm for the moral regeneration of Spain." Santayana's conception of both morals and rebirth have always been a little alien to us: no wonder he felt, in the eighties, that he had to apologize to a visiting English lord for the mean and inelegant appearance of the Harvard Yard.

NEWTON ARVIN

Argentina Now

FOR THE READER whose principal interest is in contemporary Argentine politics the most striking feature of Ysabel F. Rennie's "The Argentine Republic" (Macmillan, $4) is her analysis of the Nationalist Revolution of 1943, now recognized, in its most totalitarian form, by the United States. Mrs. Rennie's view is almost diametrically opposed to the common, and slovenly expressed, Marxist opinion that the "revolution" was an expression of the landed oligarchy's resistance to the industrialists and their political allies. The author points out that the new society, intended to be Catholic and corporate, is Falangist. Nationalist conceptions strongly favor industrialization as a means of "de-colonializing" the country. The church is held to be only reservedly sympathetic to this new regime, which signifies the end of government by and for the estancieros. This view is in the main well expressed, though it is impossible not to believe that it is a hazardous over-simplification. Its chief point of value would seem to be that it calls attention to the most important aspect of the Argentine economy, the imbalance between the agrarian and cattle-breeding interior and the partially industrialized littoral. The earlier parts of the book are of very great value, particularly the two chapters on the land. In fact, despite the reservations made above, it must be said that Mrs. Rennie's book is a quite superior one and deserves to stand beside the Felix Weil volume recently reviewed here.

RALPH BATES

THIS INFORMATIVE BOOK, written by experts of the American Jewish Committee, will help you understand the complex problems that face all Jews. Here are eye-opening facts on the plans of the various world organizations as they affect the Jew, minority rights, resettlement and migration schemes, Palestine, relief needs. "For the good of the world, we should learn its lesson well."—Senator Leverett Saltonstall

$3.00 at your bookstore

THE Dryden PRESS

(Publishers of Sumner Welles' GUIDE TO THE PEACE)

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy on request

Planning in a Democracy

WITH THE APPROACH OF V-E DAY it has once more become respectable to say out loud that one believes in planning. The fact that we are approaching the problems of reconversion without an orderly over-all program has disturbed business perhaps even more than labor. As a result we have a belated rush of interest in planning which may mean very little in terms of the problems that lie immediately ahead but which may create a more favorable atmosphere for tackling the long-range issues of full employment.

DO YOU KNOW THAT:

The law of gravity is not what you learned it was, when you went to school? The difference between matter and spirit is purely a question of electronics? The earth is not one of those brass pin-points in the night-sky? Consciousness is the most general of all the known physical elements? Except for the movements of its corpuscles within their own orbits, Light has no velocity at all?

Introducing SAMUEL ROTH'S

The PEEP-HOLE OF THE PRESENT

AN INQUIRY INTO THE SUBSTANCE OF APPEARANCE

With an INTRODUCTION by SIR ARTHUR EDDINGTON

Plumian Professor of Astronomy and Experimental Philosophy in the University of Cambridge

Which Has Created a Revolution in Our Conception of the Physical World, so Clear and Far-sweeping That, Compared With It, the Changes Wrought By This Bloody World-War Fade Into Insignificance!

From the

INTRODUCTION:

"A summary of the world, known and felt, it singles out all the elements of knowledge, and welds them into such a fluent comprehensive unit that reading it becomes an intellectual adventure of a high order. I am greatly mistaken if it does not live to exert a deep influence on thinking of the future."

Three Reasons Why This Book Should Be on Your Shelf:

1. In language so simple that it can be understood by any reader with a primary-school education, it reviews the whole range of human thought from Lao Tse to Einstein;
2. Inquires into the validity of these ideas in the light of two revolutionary scientific discoveries: that what we called the ether is no more than physical consciousness; and that sun, stars and planets are parts of a Luminum whose operations explain away all universal discrepancies;
3. then adapts them into a new surprisingly simple system which promises not only to revolutionize the average man's idea of what he is, but also of what he might do with himself.

Published at $3.75
Club Price: ONLY $3

Samuel Roth's
The Peep-Hole of the Present is the current choice of
The Philosophical Book-Club

ORGANIZED TO BRING THE LATEST IN SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY INTO THE AMERICAN HOME

MEMBERSHIP IS FREE!

This means only that you have the privilege of getting these wonderful books at less than the regular price. You don't have to buy a certain number during the year to keep in good standing—you buy only what you like. And with every book you do buy we send you usually a classic of fiction or non-fiction as valuable as the book you pay for.

A FREE DIVIDEND BOOK

THIS MONTH'S DIVIDEND

Roger W. Holmes'
THE IDEALISM OF GIOVANNI GENTILE

First study in English of an Important
Living Philosopher 264 pages
Published at $3

Because of the Paper Shortage

the membership of The Philosophical Book Club will have to be limited. That is why we are conducting our advertising campaign only in a few quality periodicals of national circulation. Those who respond quickly enough will be added to our membership and kept there for the duration.

ORDER FORM

THE PHILOSOPHICAL BOOK CLUB
Box 141, Station D, New York 3, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $3, for which send me a copy of THE PEEP-HOLE OF THE PRESENT, and FREE, the $3 edition of The Idealism of Giovanni Gentile, or any one of the other substitute books listed below. Though this constitutes me a member of your club, I will buy only those of your monthly book selections which I choose of my own free will.

(PLEASE PRINT PLAINLY)

NAME.....

No. &amp; St. ....

City &amp; State..... Zone.....

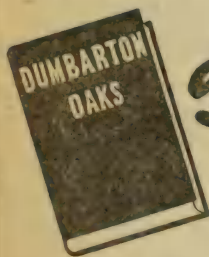

Substitute Bonus Books:

- ☐ GIDEON PLANISH, by Sinclair Lewis.
☐ MY NAME IS ARAM, by William Saroyan.
☐ Check here if you prefer to receive C.O.D.

A more appropriate moment could hardly have been selected for publication of "Time to Plan" by Lewis Lorwin (Harper, $3), who was one of the pioneer advocates of social and economic planning in the United States. Despite its imperative title, the book is not argumentative in tone. It is historical and philosophical, concerning itself with the basic problem of our time—the reconciliation of centralized planning and democracy. Lorwin has no one solution for this problem; he believes that different countries may work out different answers. In the United States he sees the government not as the determiner of all economic activities but as an arbiter among our many economic groups, so that their rivalry may be subordinated to the interests of the nation as a whole. For leadership he believes that America will not look to business, labor, or even the middle class but to a composite leadership which "will become one with the 'plain people.'" He also lays great stress on the necessity for international planning for making the maximum use of natural resources and the raising of living standards throughout the world. This would be done, not by any single agency, but by a series of international organizations and by industrial, trade and commodity, and financial agreements between economic groups and governments in the various countries. Space does not permit the tracing of the details of this organization here, but it is so logical and realistic that even the most diehard opponents of planning are likely to find themselves persuaded if they can overcome their prejudices sufficiently to read the book.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

THE KEY to San Francisco is found in

Dumbarton Oaks

There the Big Three agreed on the formulas now under discussion at the momentous conference called to chart world peace.

Dumbarton Oaks presents the proposals, the pro and con arguments, and fills in the background.

267 Pages. $1.25 Postpaid.

H. W. WILSON CO.
956 University Ave., New York 52

FICTION IN REVIEW

"The Big Uncensored Fun"

SINCE I myself was caught by the teasing title of Helen Haberman's "How About Tomorrow Morning?" (Prentice-Hall, $2.50) I suppose I should warn you at once that the name has very little to do with the content of the novel—about as much, say, as the name of a cold cream has to do with its content. Mrs. Haberman's book is about the advertising business; its heroine, Tina, of the doll-like body and the giant energies, makes $40,000 a year promoting Caress Cosmetics before she goes amateur in favor of cooperatives. The novel's title, then, can be thought of as an advertising slogan—Tina applying her promotional talents to the merchandising of fiction. There is also the biographical material supplied by the author for the dust-jacket of the book, which caught my attention and seems to me to be worth study as an expression of the advertising approach to the creation of literature. Here are the last lines of Mrs. Haberman's intellectual history:

And books! Emerson and Arnold and Wordsworth, the college loves, and in the last few years Henry James, volume after volume of James.

The intake growing bigger and bigger all the time and not enough outlet in the neat, tight pieces of advertising copy. Sublimating it with photography for years. Then bursting out with the great big lush luxurious form. The novel. The most fun of anything I've ever done. The big uncensored fun.

Actually, of course, "How About Tomorrow Morning?" turned out to be neither uncensored nor fun; it was clearly not the intention of the author to disclose what she does disclose both of herself and her sex; and to take the book at all, one must take it quite seriously, as a social document. Because Mrs. Haberman's novel avoids the royalist excesses of Ilka Chase's "In Bed We Cry," the lyrical excesses of a book like Ayn Rand's "The Fountainhead," and the excesses of infantilism of Rose Franken's Claudia stories, it has an unusual awful authenticity as a portrait of the modern female psyche. The fact that women novelists are always held to speak for their whole sex, as men novelists never are, is manifestly a measure of the extent of the "woman problem"; nevertheless, "How About Tomorrow Morning?" is the last book in the world to be exempt from this typicality. Indeed, I can think, at the moment, of no better single exhibit of the mind and spirit that forms, and is formed by, the higher-tensioned women's magazines.

In the first place, there is the quality of its sexual narcissism. A current advertisement addressed to women bears the legend "You have never been so pretty," and this effectively sums up the attitude toward herself of Mrs. Haberman's heroine. When Tina wrinkles her nose in that adorable way of hers, when she looks in the mirror to be so childishly pleased with what she sees, life imitates the advertiser's art with an embarrassing fidelity. Similarly, Tina's emotional plight is expressed in the clichés of duty and self-fulfilment that support and surround the advertising in women's magazines. Someone once told me that furniture, table settings, clothes, and so on are described in such careful detail in popular women's fiction in order to focus the reader's attention on objects and thus make her more receptive to advertising. And although there is no such conscious process involved in "How About Tomorrow Morning?" the emotional symbols it employs unmistakably betray the commercial association. When, for instance, Mrs. Haberman wishes to suggest the nervous breakdown threatening her heroine, she has Tina constantly thwarted in her efforts at interior decoration: because of her emotional conflicts Tina can somehow never manage to make her rooms look right. Also her servants are discontented, and she neglects entertaining the people who could be of use to her doctor-husband.

At twenty-three Tina earned $10,000 a year. Advanced to $15,000, she is bitter because male chauvinism still refuses her her right to see the clients, to be on the contact front. Tina conquers the sexual obstacle in her career by taking her agency's chief client as her lover: she achieves the contact front, and her earnings increase apace. But having profited to the extent of an East River town apartment, a home in the country, and the equipment to maintain both, she discovers that in the process she has lost her soul. While visiting in New Hampshire she has a nervous collapse and is nursed back to health by a refugee doctor.

It is this healer of body and soul who introduces Tina to the salvation of cooperatives. Throughout the book cooperatives have been the deep motif of idealism sounding against the thin tinkling music of success in the crass world of advertising. Tina throws up her job and decides to devote herself to the national cooperative movement. All the old bounce immediately reasserts itself; before you can say "Sweden" Tina has begun to apply the techniques for selling cosmetics to selling social progressivism; and we are assured that when cooperatives pall or fail, there will always be some cause which could use Tina's advertising genius. This is of course the point at which Mrs. Haberman speaks most unconsciously but most contemporaneously for her sex. For what she is saying, in substance, is that the realm in which competitiveness and egoism operate has only to be a socially good realm for the competitiveness and egoism not to matter. She is also saying—though if she were made aware of its reactionary implications, I dare say she would be uneasy—that if you remove the obvious money drive from female careerism, you remove the source of all emotional conflict. One wants to remind Mrs. Haberman of that older salvation of the well-placed woman, philanthropy. The circle has come full swing, even though Lady Bountiful wields a typewriter instead of a wicker basket.

I am sure that the author of "How About Tomorrow Morning?" intended her novel as an objectified comment upon the sad condition of the successful career woman. But Mrs. Haberman has so little creative superiority to her material—she doesn't recognize, for instance, that the solution of Tina's problems is part and parcel of Tina's whole career—that the book has its considerable interest only as an item of the contemporary confusion. Tina's cultural color, her social ambitions, her mean little educated tastes and values, are dyed deep into the whole of Mrs. Haberman's literary effort. What price then—Mrs. Haberman herself forces the question—Emerson, Arnold, and Wordsworth, and volume after volume of James?

DIANA TRILLING

"... it is a life-size portrait of a courageous, compassionate, gay and cerebral man."—EDNA FERBER

The Best is Yet...

By MORRIS L. ERNST

The rich and delightful autobiography of a happy man—lawyer, expert sailor, amateur scientist—written as informally as he talks.

"He has acquired a large assortment of enthusiasms and some equally violent dislikes... These and many other hobbies and hatreds he airs with zest in this highly personal, partisan, sparkling volume... He has obviously had a lot of fun writing it. His readers—except his victims—are likely to share his amusement."—Frank S. Adams, N. Y. Times Book Review

"I like this book better than any he has written before, partly because it is more inconsecutively, flamboyantly, effervescently and earnestly Morris Ernst."—Lewis Gannett, N. Y. Herald Tribune

At all bookstores • $3.00

HARPER & BROTHERS

A GREAT SCREEN PLAY IS ON THE WAY!

With all the delightful, deep-down heart-appeal of "Going My Way", scripted by the same author, Frank Butler.

PARAMOUNT presents

DOROTHY LAMOUR
ARTURO
DeCORDOVA

in

"A MEDAL FOR BENNY"

From the story by

JOHN STEINBECK and JACK WAGNER

with

J. CARROLL NAISH

Mikhail Rasumny -:- Fernando Alvarado
Frank McHugh

Directed by IRVING PICHEL

Screen play by FRANK BUTLER

World Premiere

MAY 16th

RIVOLI

B'way & 49th Street

MOTION PICTURES

NOW

RKO

BROOKLYN
& QUEENS

ALDEN
Jamaica
BUSHWICK
DYKER
Kew-Forest
FLUSHING
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
Keith's
RICHMOND HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
TILYU

Vivid Drama of Collapsing Germany!
"As Timely as Last Night's Headline"—PM

Vicki Baum's HOTEL BERLIN

With

Helmut DANTINE • Lisa DORN
Raymond MASSEY • Faye EMERSON

— Film —

"Having Wonderful Crime"
PAT OBRIEN • CAROLE LANDIS

Paramount presents

ALAN LADD • GAIL RUSSELL

SALTY O'ROURKE

Big In-Person Stage Show

Charlie SPIVAK and His Orchestra

JO STAFFORD • DEAN MURPHY
TIP, TAP & TOE

TIME SQUARE PARAMOUNT BUY BONDS

20th Century-Fox presents

Betty GRABLE ★ Dick HAYMES

BILLY ROSE'S

DIAMOND HORSESHOE

In Technicolor!

On Stage — In Person

COUNT BASIE and his Orchestra

EXTRA! JERRY LESTER — Other Big Acts!

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. & 50th St.

STAGE PLAYS

"Most utterly delightful play on Broadway." — Kenny, Mirror.

FRANCHOT TONE

JANE WYATT in

HOPE FOR THE BEST

ROYALE THEATRE, 45th Street W. of Broadway, Circle 5-5760.
Brgs. incl. Sunday, 8:30—$1.20 to $3.60, tax incl. Mats. Saturday & Sunday, 2:40.
NO MON. PERF. MAIL ORDERS PROMPTLY FILLED.

"A SWEET AND HAPPY HIT." — Garrison, Journal-American.
Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
In JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account" with JOAN TETZEL
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway, Phone: Circle 6-4838
Eves. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Music by
& DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 59th Street, Matinee Wed. & Sat.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

ON COLUMBIA'S May list is Mozart's Symphony K.551 (usually referred to as the "Jupiter") performed by Bruno Walter with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra (Set 565; $4.50). The performance is very good—which is to say that it achieves the grand style which the utterance should have; it is in fact surprisingly good in view of Walter's emotional softness and flabbiness, which this time manifests itself only in the slowing down of one passage in the first movement. And it remains very good, even though Beecham's performance in the old Columbia set imparts greater majesty to the first movement, greater power to certain passages in the second (Walter plays the second movement without the mutes which my score prescribes for the violins and violas; Beecham uses them on the first side but not on the second!). In one respect Walter's performance is better: his pace for the minuet movement is sufficiently animated, whereas Beecham's is unacceptably slow. And Beecham's performance comes off the records without the brightness of the sound of his later Mozart recordings. The recorded sound of the Walter performance I will speak of in a moment.

In addition, Brahms's Fourth Symphony is performed by Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra (Set 567; $5.50). This, for me, is Brahms's finest large-scale work; its best recorded performance, for me, remains Weingartner's in the old Columbia set; what makes that performance good, for me, is its steadiness of pace, and particularly the single tempo maintained, as Brahms evidently wished, throughout the series of varied repetitions of the opening eight-measure statement in the concluding passacaglia. And Ormandy's performance is poor, for me, because of his lack of feeling for continuity in pace—his tasteless preparatory retardations, his whipping up of the end of the first movement, his slowing down of the beginning of the second, his changes of tempo which prevent the repetitions in the finale from building up their cumulative impact.

And finally Stravinsky's "Scènes de Ballet" is performed by Stravinsky himself with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set X-245; $2.50). This is the music which he wrote for Markova's scene in Billy Rose's "Seven Lively Arts"; and like "Dances Concertantes" it is expertly put together but horrid stuff which invites use for dance purposes—but the purposes of a Balanchine, not of a Dolin.

As for the recorded sound of these performances, I will discuss Columbia's results in relation to its purpose, which one of its executives told me is to make recordings that will sound good on what he called "standard machines." First let me describe what machines I play the recordings on. One is my own, a wide-range amplifier and speaker-system with which I use (1) a Brush PL-25 pickup that gives the entire reproducing set-up a frequency-range sufficient for the 8,500 cycles of the widest-range (highest-fidelity) commercial recording, or (2) an Astatic Tru-tan pickup that limits the frequency-range of the set-up to 4,500 or 5,000 cycles. And sometimes I check with a friend's Scott "23," whose single speaker gives it a range of about 6,500 cycles with the Brush, and 4,500 or 5,000 again with the Astatic. Now I have reason to believe that what that Columbia executive means by a "standard machine" is one of limited range, like my friend's or my own when used with the Astatic pickup, which is stand-

BLACK MOUNTAIN COLLEGE SECOND SUMMER MUSIC INSTITUTE

In Mountains of Western North Carolina, near Asheville

(Devoted to Study of Polyphony and Ensemble)

JULY 2—SEPTEMBER 8

STAFF: ERWIN BODKY, piano and harpsichord; CAROL BRICE, contralto; FRANCES SNOW DRINKER, flute; ALFRED EINSTEIN, music history; ROLAND HAYES, tenor; EVA HEINITZ, viola da gamba and cello; HEINRICH JALOWETZ, conductor; HUGO KAUDER, composer; EDWARD LOWINSKY, music history; GRETEL LOWINSKY, viola; JOSEF MARK, oboe and English horn; TRUDY STRAUSS, violin; WILLIAM VALKENIER, horn; EMANUEL ZETLIN, violin. • GORDON STRING QUARTETTE

COURSES • TUTORIALS • OPEN REHEARSALS • CONCERTS TRIO • QUARTET • CHAMBER MUSIC ORCHESTRA • A CAPELLA

Write to Registrar:

Black Mountain BLACK MOUNTAIN COLLEGE North Carolina

Black Mountain College Second Summer Art Institute running concurrently

JULY 2 — SEPTEMBER 8

IMPORTANT READING

in the April CONTEMPORARY JEWISH RECORD

THE STATELESS PEOPLE

Hannah Arendt

In western Europe before the war millions who had fled political persecution took refuge in "statelessness"—they preferred French concentration camps to deportation to their "homelands." Other millions were made stateless by decree. The war has added to their number—Russians and Czechs who fought in Hitler's armies, Poles who fought with the British, ELAS partisans, have become men without a country. How can they be assured human rights? The newest political phenomenon is subjected to searching analysis by Hannah Arendt, whose brilliant articles on European developments have attracted wide attention.

PALESTINE

IN THE CHANGING
MIDDLE EAST

Bernard D. Weinryb

Britain's rivals in the Middle East—Italy, Germany and France—have been eliminated in the course of the war, but the United States and Russia have new interests in that area. The war-induced industrialization of the Arab lands brings further problems. Dr. Weinryb, who formerly taught economics in Jerusalem, soberly and frankly examines the new political constellation in the Middle East.

THOMAS MANN'S "JOSEPH": A Humanist Myth...Harold Rosenberg

ANTI-SEMITISM IN BRITAIN.....George Orwell

POEMS FROM THE WARSAW GHETTO.....A. Glanz-Leyless

FRANZ WERFEL'S SELF-HATRED.....Henry Rubin

BOOK REVIEWS

by Sidney Hook, Bertram D. Wolfe, Solomon F. Bloom and Robert Pick.

The CONTEMPORARY JEWISH RECORD is pleased to announce the appointment of Elliot E. Cohen as editor. Under Mr. Cohen's editorship, the magazine will be issued as a monthly, beginning next fall. Clement Greenberg is managing editor.

CONTEMPORARY JEWISH RECORD, 384 Fourth Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.
Please enter my subscription for 1 year (6 issues). I enclose $2.

Name ..... City ..... Zone No. ....

Address ..... State .....

Single copies 40¢ each.

Published by The American Jewish Committee

N555

ard in the sense that it, or worse, is what most people have in their homes. As for making recordings that will sound good on such a machine, my experience has taught me that the right way to do that is to make them so that they sound good on wide-range machines, like my friend's or my own when used with the Brush pickup. When I speak of my experience I have in mind things like Victor's recordings of the Toscanini-N. B. C. Symphony performance of the finale of "Götterdämmerung" and the Golschman-St. Louis Symphony performance of Sibelius's Seventh, Columbia's imported recordings of the Beecham-London Philharmonic performances of Mozart's "Linz" and "Prague" Symphonies, Columbia's own recording of the Mitropoulos-Minneapolis Symphony performance of Mahler's First: these are magnificent when reproduced by my wide-range set-up, and continue to sound well with my limited-range one. On the other hand when Columbia's new recordings of the New York Philharmonic's performances of Mozart's K. 551 and Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" and the Philadelphia Orchestra's performance of Brahms's Fourth are reproduced by my wide-range set-up they come out with an over-emphasis of high frequencies insufficiently balanced by middle and low that makes them strident; but they lose this stridency with my limited-range set-up. This method of making recordings that sound good on limited-range machines is only partially successful, since the recordings still do not sound as good as the ones made the other way. And it does not always have even that much success—the Philadelphia Orchestra recording of Beethoven's Seventh remaining strident even with the limited range. As for Stravinsky's "Scènes de Ballet," the engineer's hand appears to have slipped, producing a recording which is excellent on both wide-range and limited-range machines.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

THE script of "Counter-Attack" was written by John Howard Lawson, and the picture was directed by Zoltan Korda, who wrote and directed "Sahara." Barring the beginning and a few shots which show the Russians building and crossing an underwater bridge, it is one of those specialized pictures, like "Lifeboat," in which the problem is to keep a movie alive and exciting in limited space. (Here two Russians and eight Germans, trapped in a shelled basement, with limited light, wrestle out their national and class traits.) It isn't really such a hard problem as might offhand be imagined, since rigorous form and self-denial furnish their own tensions and suggest many of their own solutions. It seems to me for that matter rather a ham one. But the director and writer and camera man (James Wong Howe) and most of the cast are to be complimented on solving it, most of the time, very intelligently, without much resort to trick incident or emotional balderdash. The Germans, indeed, like all the supporting players in "Sahara," are out of a class with anything you can ordinarily see in a contemporary American-made fiction film; so is Korda's handling of them except when each steps forward and does his histrionic equivalent to the old cliché in which each girl in the chorus line executed a solo Charleston—but it looks as if that should be blamed chiefly on the script. These enemies, incidentally, are presented as individuals, not as congenital criminals; one of them even comes over to the Russian side, and does so without any blathering about repentance. Paul Muni, excellent in his quieter moments, is too often an over-generalized, stagy embodiment of Russia. There is a certain amount of complacent formula about the picture, of a kind nearer Russian than American (the original story is Russian), but there is a lot of aesthetic and psychological good to it, too. I think it is worth seeing; and I expect that any Lawson-Korda picture is going to be.

Greer Garson has kinds of vitality and resource which might do very good kinds of work, but ordinarily they are turned into wax. She is waxen in stretches of "The Valley of Decision," and embarrassingly actressy in some others; but quite often too, as an Irish servant in a rich Scottish household, she is alive, vivid, and charming, and suggests how really good she might be under better circumstances. If she were not suffocated and immobilized by Metro's image of her—and, I'm afraid, half-persuaded of it herself—I could imagine her as a very good Lady Macbeth. I could still more easily imagine her as a wonderful Elisabeth Ney (the half-sane sculptress who reduced Schopenhauer to a drooler and left the court of Ludwig of Bavaria for a rotting estate in Texas). But I suppose the best she will ever be allowed is this sort of short trot in pre-conditioned open air. Tay Garnett's direction is good, too good to be wasted on big, solemn, expensive trash-collectations like this.

CONTRIBUTORS

THOMAS MANN, one of the greatest of living writers, is a voluntary exile from Nazi Germany. His famous letter to the dean of the philosophical faculty of the University of Bonn was published in The Nation of March 6, 1937, under the title "I Accuse the Hitler Regime."

MARIO ROSSI is a former member of the Italian underground now in the United States.

BARETT SHELTON is editor of the Decatur Daily, Decatur, Alabama.

MARTIN GUMPERT is a well-known physician and writer on health. Among his books are "Dunant: The Story of the Red Cross," and "Heil Hunger: Health Under Hitler."

LETTERS TO JUDD

An American Workingman
By UPTON SINCLAIR

Upton Sinclair, the famous author of numerous books, asks and answers three questions in this 30,000-word book: 1. Why is there poverty in the richest country in the world? 2. Why, throughout America, are the rich growing richer and the poor poorer? 3. Who gets the wealth that you produce, and how are the dice loaded against you?

Upton Sinclair's "LETTERS TO JUDD" contains the facts, also the reasons and the remedy, in simple, straight-forward language, appealing to every-day men and women.

Upton Sinclair's 30 years' study of American economic, political, financial and industrial problems has gone into this 64-page book; also 30 years of learning how to write.

Upton Sinclair wrote this book as an act of love for America. It is made out of faith in our country, and in you. Our fathers bequeathed to us a great democracy and a great ideal. We must preserve and strengthen them.

This book will not be reviewed in the great press, nor promoted by the powers that be. If it is read, it will be because the plain people do their part in passing it about from hand to hand.

This large pamphlet (5½ x 8½ inches in size) sells at 25¢ net per copy; 10 copies for $1.50. Prepaid. Send orders to:

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS
BOX 375 GIRARD, KANSAS

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.

MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGAPHONE

The world-famous Lingaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple! Thousands have succeeded. ♦ ♦ 29 LANGUAGES Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration LINGAPHONE INSTITUTE 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-9830

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

For Federation

Dear Sirs: It is frequently said, "Yes, world federation is the ultimate goal, but Dumbarton Oaks is the best we can do now." But Dumbarton Oaks is not even a small step toward world federation. It proposes a new League, and there is nothing federal about it. One fundamental principle of federation is that laws properly passed by law-making authority should apply only to individuals or corporations. In the United States state officials are subject to federal law as individuals, but Congress does not have the authority to pass laws governing states in their corporate capacities nor does the Executive have the power to use the military to enforce a decision of the Supreme Court against a state.

I suggest that, in a limited field, the United Nations organization delegate to the Assembly powers to make laws effective upon individuals or corporations. At first this delegation must be limited to fields in which there is almost universal agreement, such as the control of illicit international traffic in opium and the punishment of war criminals.

Dumbarton Oaks has not recognized sufficiently the necessity of creating a world opinion and a sense of world citizenship. If Mr. Smith, an American citizen, goes to France, he obeys the laws of France or is tried and punished by a French court. I suggest that if Mr. Smith engages in the illicit international opium traffic, he be apprehended by international police, tried before an international court, and incarcerated in an international prison. Law-abiding citizens everywhere would begin to see that these laws were made for their protection and benefit. In actual practice a sense of world citizenship would develop. As confidence increases and necessity dictates, more powers, though still limited, could be delegated to our international assembly. Within twenty or thirty years we should have developed a true international bill of human rights which, if properly enforced on individual violators, would stop would-be Hitlers before they control even one government. This is the true, though difficult, road to peace.

Our forefathers created an effective federation from which the United States of America developed. Are we so bound by the fetish of unlimited national sovereignty, that popular adaptation of the ancient and foreign idea of the divine right of kings, and so limited in vision and courage, that we cannot or will not plant even a tiny seed for world federation?

WALLACE T. PARTCH
Oakland, Cal., April 23

Browder vs. Del Vayo

Dear Sirs: Earl Browder's reply in the New Masses of April 3 to Mr. del Vayo's V-Day and Revolution, published in your March 17 issue, is a weak argument in support of the Communist position. Browder states that defeatism is the abiding danger of the non-Marxist left. But perhaps it is appeasement of capitalism that is the real defeatism.

Del Vayo says: "Only through a planned economy and through solutions very close to socialism have the rebuilders of Europe any reasonable chance of success. The day of effective capitalist control is over; the trend of Europe is toward the left. If the democratic powers had been willing to gear their foreign policy to this trend, the change to a socialized society might have been a peaceful one. They have not done so; instead they have moved from one costly experiment in reaction to another, and in doing so they have only promoted revolution."

To Browder this is defeatism of the worst sort. He says, "Now if this is to be taken as a correct description of the dominant current in world affairs, then indeed the military victory over the Axis will be only the curtain-raiser to World War III."

But although Mr. del Vayo's statement may be a bit strong, he neither implies a third world war nor advocates revolution. What he does say is the plain truth.

To secure permanent peace we must work in the direction of socialist democracy as opposed to the continuance of a decadent capitalist democracy. True liberals and Socialists should spread this thought. Work in this direction is not "defeatism" as the Communists have played up the word. The Communist Political Association has deviated from this course toward a species of appeasement of capitalism—at least in America.

CHARLES T. CARPENTER
Placerville, Cal., April 18

Honeymoon Haven

In the Heart of The Adirondacks

SCAROON FAIRYLAND in JUNE

The Ideal Vacation Time

9 HOLE GOLF COURSE ON PREMISES

9 Clay Tennis Courts

8 Handball Courts

OPEN MAY 14
FREE GOLF
TO JUNE 16

SCAROON MANOR HOTEL
612 SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

THE MCCORMICK-PATTERSON AXIS

The Pro-Fascist Cavorings of the Chicago Tribune, the N. Y. Daily News and the Washington Times-Herald

By L. M. BRKHEAD
Director, Friends of Democracy, Inc.

This new pamphlet (15,000 words, 5½ x 8½ inches) is hot as a pistol and as timely as a good newspaper. L. M. Brkhead knows more about McCormick and the Pattersons than any other man in the country. Thoroughly documented, here's a complete exposure of the most sinister element in American life—a force that would destroy American democracy and make the world safe for totalitarianism. 25¢ per copy, prepaid. 10 copies for $1.00, prepaid. Mail orders to:

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS
BOX 88 GIBRARD, KANSAS

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating. Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books. OLD or NEW. mailed POST-FREE.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
21 East 17th Street, New York City

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS
THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 16 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8
☐ 3 Years $11

☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Servicemen's Rate • $3.00 a Year

Canada $1 a year extra

Foreign $1 a year extra

Pan American Union requires no extra postage

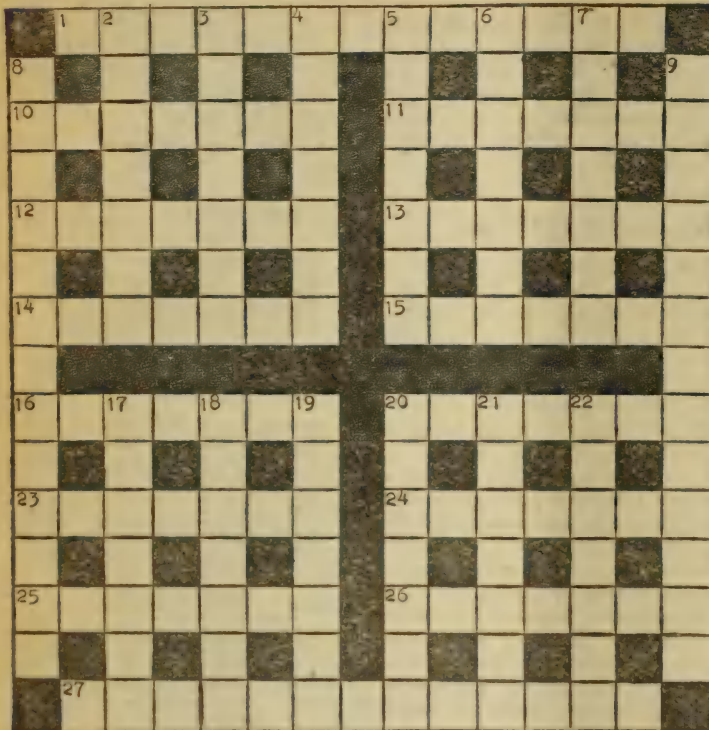

Name.....

Address.....

6-12-45

Crossword Puzzle No. 115

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 American statesman (two words, 6 and 7). (He reminded Sidney Smith of a steam engine in trousers)
- 10 "I'm her Pa" (anag.)
- 11 A Fuzzy-wuzzy
- 12 "An agreement between two members of a legislative body holding opposite opinions to refrain from voting so that both may absent themselves" (Whew!)
- 13 Likely to be found in the laundry, but Shaw is mixed up in it
- 14 Safety valves? Could be
- 15 "----- his fib or sophistry in vain! The creature's at his dirty work again" (Pope)
- 16 "He that hath wife and children, hath given ----- s to fortune" (Bacon)
- 20 It would hardly do for a True Story magazine
- 23 French explorer who traced the Mississippi to its mouth (two words, 2 and 5)
- 24 A hare in its first year
- 25 Wrapping in silver paper?
- 26 Set free
- 27 Where road transport gets even with the railroad (two words, 5 & 8)

DOWN

- 2 A believer, apparently, is just the reverse!
- 3 Conceive
- 4 Center of the porcelain industry in France

- 5 Gave a dowry, so is mostly an injunction to marry
- 6 The pineapple, for example
- 7 Even if you knock his block off the thrower-out will still be victor
- 8 Plea of the political extremist on the road in England (four words, 4, 2, 3 and 4)
- 9 Elver's poor Pa? (two words, 6 & 7)
- 17 The Pope's chapel in the Vatican
- 18 Knowing everything—or the Cockney's rendition of "Always" (hyphen, 3-4)
- 19 C. I. Green, thoroughly upset, is exhibiting energy
- 20 Sicily's chief city
- 21 Mutinies
- 22 Good buy

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 114

ACROSS:—1 BOOMERANG; 6 PINTS; 9 VIRTUES; 10 AVARICE; 11 NEEDIER; 12 CAST OFF; 13 TEE; 15 DUFFEL; 17 ADVICE; 18 ONION; 19 SIGNET; 22 TALMUD; 25 UGH; 27 COLLEEN; 28 ANAGRAM; 30 OPEROSE; 31 TRENTON; 32 HOYLE; 33 DUNDEARY.

DOWN:—1 BAVIN; 2 OURSELF; 3 ELUSIVE; 4 ASSERT; 5 GLANCE; 6 PRAISED; 7 NAIROBI; 8 SHEFFIELD; 14 EXING; 15 DISHLOTH; 16 LOT; 17 ANT; 20 GALLERY; 21 EYESORE; 23 AMATEUR; 24 MARITZA; 25 UNBEND; 26 HASTEN; 29 MONEY.

RESORTS

SPRING TONIC!

Riding through the woodland trails
... fishing on a 7 1/2-mile lake ...
... hiking on a 1,600-acre estate ...
... golf ... tennis. Nature's vitamins! Then to delicious, well served food ... and
airy, comfortable rooms ...
evening entertainment.

Only 51 miles from New York

The Glenmere

CHESTER, N.Y. Chester 200 (N.Y.) RE3-8047

INVITATION TO RELAX

Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous country-side, outdoor activities, delicious food — and fun. Only 25 miles from New York.

MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY

plum point
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

CRESTWOOD

on a wooded Knoll overlooking Picturesque Peconic Bay

FISHING, BATHING, BOATING

A. P. Posner, Peconic, L. I. Peconic 6977

HATHAWAY LODGE

Formerly the palatial 300 room Mary estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, most of which have open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming Pool, Horseback Riding, also Golf nearby. Marvellous food. Open all year. Specially low pre-summer rates.

For recreations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.

Telephone: Tannersville 888

BREEZEMONT PARK

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.

OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

ARCADIA

Fishkill, N. Y.
Tel. Beacon 727
ALL SPORTS, including tennis, volleyball, handball, ping-pong, swimming, racquet ball, etc. Recordings. Informal social surroundings, delicious food.

Reservations for Limited Number of Families for Extended Stay Now Accepted
N. Y. Tel.: WAD. 3-6026, before 11 a.m., after 9 p.m. R.R. Station, Beacon, N. Y., 12 miles from city.

WALTELL HOUSE

ON FRANKEL FARM
MT. BETHEL PENNSYLVANIA
"The Only Modern Farm Hotel Combined with a Children's Day Camp"

Meats, Poultry, Eggs & Produce right from our own farm. All Rooms with Private Bath. 75 miles from New York. All Sports. ELLA FRANKEL, Phone Dangler 6273, or N. Y. LEX. 2-9864.

JUNE ACCOMMODATIONS ONLY

ZINDOREST PARK

45 Miles from New York City
MONROE, NEW YORK

Telephone Monroe 4421

A resort for Adults only

Exclusive location, 150 acres of unusual beauty. ALL SPORTS. Delicious food, relaxing atmosphere, recorded concert music, dancing, modern accommodations.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MAY 19, 1945

NUMBER 20

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

557

EDITORIALS

Conference Notes by J. A. d. V.

559

Will There Be Jobs?

559

Fragments of One World by Freda Kirchwey

560

ARTICLES

Pie in the 'Frisco Sky by I. F. Stone

561

Truman: A Trial Balance by Alan Barth

563

Back to Grandfather by Stuart Chase

564

Criminals and War Criminals by Rustem Vambery

567

In the Wind

568

POLITICAL WAR

Fascism Without Mussolini—II by Mario Rossi

569

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Ernie Pyle by Randall Jarrell

573

Briefer Comment

576

Films by James Agee

579

Art by Clement Greenberg

581

Music by B. H. Haggin

582

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 116 by Jack Barrett

584

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARK

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE HOPELESSNESS OF JAPAN'S PLIGHT WAS underscored by the news coming in from the various Pacific fronts in the week following V-E Day. In spite of furious Japanese resistance, progress is being stepped up on Okinawa, and the end of that bloody campaign seems in sight. In the southern Philippines and on Tarakan the enemy's grasp on vital economic areas has been loosened, and both struggles are entering the mopping-up stage. Burma has been nearly cleared of the foe, and there are intimations that an attack on Singapore may be launched before many weeks. Even in China, where setbacks have come to be expected, a substantial United Nations victory is reported. Chinese troops, with powerful support from the American Fourteenth Air Force, are said to have broken Japanese lines in western Hunan and surrounded at least one enemy unit. This victory apparently removes the Japanese threat to the important American air base at Chihkiang. The most portentous development for the Japanese, however, was the renewal of large-scale B-29 raids against Japan's war industries. A 400-plane raid on the Tokuyama, Otake, and Oshima oil-storage areas, in which not an American ship was lost, indicated that General Doolittle's prediction of 2,000-plane raids is no idle boast. *

THE COMMITTEE OF NATIONAL LIBERATION FOR Northern Italy has taken a clear stand with respect to the monarchy and the Italian provisional government. Although it wishes to do nothing which might endanger the unity of the country, it declares openly that the monarchy is hated not less than Fascism, and that the Bonomi government has neither the ability nor the authority to remain in power. When representatives of the Committee of National Liberation for Northern Italy met with Premier Bonomi recently, the president of the committee, Rodolfo Morandi, reminded him that the "very advanced and complete democratic legislation introduced in the north of Italy by the partisans" contrasted strongly with the backward situation persisting in the south. The committee therefore unanimously demanded the formation of a government whose key ministries, beginning with that of the Interior, would be entrusted to men capable of understanding the "very advanced legislation operating in the north." Until now the key ministries—Interior, Army, and Navy—have been in the hands of faithful monarchists. The great strength of the monarchist political machine in the south, built up with British aid, is described in detail by Mario Rossi on a later page. It is to be hoped that the committee's demands will be met and that a split between north and south may be avoided. If, as has been repeatedly hinted, the Premiership should go to Pietro Nenni, the government would be headed by a man who understands and would try to realize the ideals for which the partisans have been fighting.

✱

THE FIRST BONA FIDE GERMAN TRADE UNION meeting in 12 years took place in the Aachen Chamber of Labor on March 18. An account of the meeting attended by 70 former unionists appears in the March 21 issue of the AMG newspaper, the Aachener Nachrichten. A woman trade unionist (and member of the town council in pre-Hitler days) said, "All who were too cowardly to defy the Nazis share their guilt for the suffering of the innocent." A 13-point program was adopted, which includes the following immediate and long-term objectives: destruction of Prussian militarism and fascism; cooperation in removing Nazis from government, business, and industry; trade-union representation in all branches of public life; reintroduction of the right to strike, the eight-hour day, and the labor code; regulation of wages and vacations; suppression of the Nazi labor spy system in factories; safe-keeping of all Labor Front records; the establishment of May 1 as a legal holiday; admission of former Nazi party members to union membership but not to union office; cooperation with world labor movements; education, particularly of young people, in international understanding. The program is a catalogue of labor's losses under fascism; now all the goals must be won again. More than most groups in Germany, the labor movement is capable of laying the ground-work for a decent democratic life in that hate-levelled land.

✱

THE HIGH ARMY OFFICERS, ON THE OTHER hand, guilty as a class and guilty to the last man of promoting the rise of Nazism and its aggression against the world, are already busy establishing their claim to power in Germany. And in this attempt they have been helped by the inexplicable leniency of the Allied military authorities. Perhaps it is necessary to use members of the German high command as aids in demobilizing the German army, but certainly they need not be offered facilities to make radio pronouncements to the people, asserting their authority and dissociating themselves from the fallen Nazis. Von Falkenhorst, for example, former commander of the German forces in Norway, claimed all responsibility for the political administration of that country and shamelessly announced that the Allies had "liberated the army and the German people from the Nazi yoke." Busch, commander of the forces that surrendered to Field Marshal Montgomery, announced that he was "in charge" of northwestern Germany with the consent of the Allies. Inquiries are being made by the British government as to the circumstances under which such statements have been issued, but even if they are prevented from now on, great harm has been done. The German people have every right to be confused when they find the military leaders of Hitler's army placed in positions of responsibility by the Allied command. Even more disturbing has been the handling of captured Nazi leaders, particularly Goering. To permit this fascist terrorist to expound to the world his views on his fellow Nazis, the war, and world affairs generally was political stupidity of the lowest order. General Eisenhower has done well to repudiate this spectacle and forbid similar behavior in the future. It is high time American and British officers quit treating Hitler's gangsters like honorable colleagues. We much prefer the methods used by the Italian partisans. They are rough but they bear some relation to justice and common sense.

✱

PERHAPS ED KENNEDY'S PRESS COLLEAGUES IN Europe slightly overstated the case when they referred to his world "scoop" on the V-E Day news as "the most disgraceful, deliberate, and unethical double-cross in the history of journalism." But we think in the main they were justified. A news beat scored through the breach of a solemn pledge and involving, according to General Eisenhower, "possible loss of American and Allied lives" is hardly a credit to a journalist or to a great press service. How wide will be the repercussions of Kennedy's action it is difficult at this time to calculate. General Eisenhower was placed in the position of having apparently "broken an understanding with our Russian allies" at the very moment the Germans were doing everything to cause dissension and at a time when fuller understanding was desperately needed. Kennedy has not helped the standing of American correspondents in Russia. Moreover, from many accounts, army-press relationships in the European theater had been steadily deteriorating and army censorship had reached a peak of exasperating stupidity. Kennedy's irresponsible action, the only case of violation of confidence in the European war by an American correspondent, will vastly complicate rather than unravel this snarl. The AP's frank apology may help clear the air. Reform in censorship is needed and should not be delayed by one unfortunate defection, however serious might have been its consequences. This applies not only to our military censorship but to that of our allies. The free exchange of news is a prerequisite if understanding between nations is to be developed.

✱

FIORELLO LAGUARDIA WILL NOT RUN AGAIN for Mayor of New York, and the chances are that the city will revert once more to partisan government. To the half-million or so independent citizens whose balance of voting power has kept LaGuardia in office since 1934, this will be a cause for regret, but the regret will be tempered by a certain amount of relief. Insofar as New York City is a corporation, LaGuardia has managed its affairs well. The city government, under him, has been as nearly incorruptible as a city government can ever be. He himself has been honest, competent, and often creative in his leadership. He has, however, shared the common failings of reformers—intolerance and meddlesomeness—and he has manifested them through a remarkably aggressive and self-righteous personality. His high-handedness in dealing with what he considered moral issues in the theater, in the schools, and very often in private homes has exasperated many of his most loyal supporters and left him vulnerable to his enemies. Nevertheless, what New York needed most when LaGuardia took office was solvency, common honesty, and efficient administration. If he has not as yet made the city solvent, his success in removing the high smokehouse flavor from city politics may be measured by the fact that the party leaders, now casting about for a possible successor, seem to be looking to men who can give the city as honest and efficient an administration as LaGuardia has given it. On the basis of past performance, this could be expected from William O'Dwyer, Joseph McGoldrick, Jonah Goldstein, or Newbold Morris, the four men who seem to lead the field at the present moment.

Conference Notes

San Francisco, May 13

PURELY by accident I found myself at the airfield when the first member of the Argentine delegation arrived. On hand were a strong complement of M.P.'s, the functionaries of the Argentine embassy in Washington, a band, several reporters, some photographers—no one else. The head of the delegation, Miguel Angel Carcano, Argentine ambassador to London, a former Minister of Agriculture, not especially connected with the present regime, was easily the best man the Farrell-Perón government could have sent. The other two members of the delegation originally announced, Espil and Escobar, both former ambassadors to Washington, avoided San Francisco by as wide a margin as possible. Espil proceeded to Madrid and Escobar to Paris to take up their ambassadorial posts.

Ambassador Carcano, who is well known for his social grace, stepped out of the plane with an ingratiating smile. Suddenly the Argentine ambassador to Washington, Ibarra Barcia, whispered something in his ear. Instantly the smile vanished and Carcano's face became pale. It was not hard to guess what he had been told. Only that morning the papers had carried the story of the suppression of V-E Day celebrations in Argentina and the arrest of Raul Taborda, editor of the liberal newspaper Critica, because he insisted on flying the flag of the Soviet Union alongside of the other United Nations' flags. Taborda had been the chairman of the parliamentary committee for the investigation of Nazi activities.

For Ambassador Carcano this news made a bad start for his San Francisco visit. He did not dare hold a press conference for fear that questions would be asked about the Critica incident. He must have been personally shaken, because he himself is owner of a mildly liberal paper published in Cordoba. For all he knew, his own editor at that very moment might be languishing in a cell.

It is interesting in these days to watch French-Spanish relations. I should not be surprised if one morning we read that De Gaulle had broken with Franco.

In that case there would be nine countries that have broken with Franco: until now I have always counted seven—Russia, China, Czechoslovakia, New Zealand, Mexico, Guatemala, Yugoslavia. But when I went over this list the other day in the presence of the very keen and truly democratic Foreign Minister of Australia, Mr. Evatt, he challenged me furiously: "What about Australia?" It was Mr. Evatt who introduced the first amendment seeking to bar Franco from the new international organization.

A very lively topic of discussion in conference circles is: "Who will be the general secretary?" The prevailing impression is that the post will go to an American. Names are beginning to be mentioned. It was interesting to hear from an intelligent diplomat who has lived in the United States for many years and who knows Washington circles intimately that his candidate is not an acknowledged expert on foreign affairs like Sumner Welles, not a great administrator with experience in large affairs, but a Justice of the Supreme Court—Hugo L. Black.

J. A. d. V.

Will There Be Jobs?

DESPITE all the talk of post-war plans in the past three years, V-E Day caught the United States without an over-all program for reconversion or full employment. True, the War Production Board and the army were ready with an orderly program of cutbacks and gradual demobilization. A few hours after the final signatures were put on the surrender documents many WPB controls were relaxed to encourage a gradual resumption of the production of essential civilian goods. But no steps have been taken to enable the war workers who lose their jobs to find new ones readily or to cushion the economic shock of the transition period. Nor have any preparations been made to assure ex-service men and former war workers of jobs after V-J Day.

The announced cutbacks for the next few months are not large. General Somervell, commander of the Army Service Forces, has said that the army will cut about $3,500,000,000 from its procurement program in the next 90 days. It is estimated that procurements will drop 18 per cent in the next eight months and from 25 to 30 per cent in the next twenty months. Cutbacks at this rate would seem to present few problems during the next six or eight months; the materials and men released are needed for the production of civilian goods. But no allowance is made in these estimates for the reduction in ship construction. Shipbuilding in the third quarter of this year will be 15 per cent below the present level; in the fourth quarter it will be down 35 per cent; and by the end of 1945 the cutbacks will become really severe. Scheduled tank production for the last three months of the year has been reduced by approximately 70 per cent. Aircraft production may be trimmed by as much as 30 per cent. Most observers feel that the army and navy are being extremely cautious in announcing cutbacks. A few months from now they are likely to find themselves overstocked on many types of equipment, thus forcing many unanticipated cancellations. According to some estimates, the cut in military output may reach 50 per cent by the end of the year.

Translating the officially estimated cutbacks into lost jobs, Director of War Mobilization Vinson has indicated that 1,500,000 workers will lose their jobs in the next six months and that 3,000,000 more will be thrown out of work in the ensuing six months. During this year approximately 2,000,000 men are expected to be demobilized from the army. Because of present shortages of man-power in most industries, the chances are that four or five million workers can be absorbed in civilian pursuits during the year. So far so good. But what if the cutbacks turn out to be much greater than the present cautious estimates? And what will happen if Japan collapses in six or eight months, as many authoritative observers confidently predict?

While the first stages of reconversion appear well under control, there is grave danger of chaos in the later stages, particularly after V-J Day. A large proportion of the WPB controls have already been lifted, and most of the others are expected to be removed by the end of the year. J. H. Krug, head of the WPB, has declared that all controls would be dropped as soon as possible after the defeat of Japan. Thus the major task of reconversion—the closing of the greater number of the war plants and the reabsorption of the bulk of the demobilized service men, will be completely unregulated.

Some private concerns, notably the General Electric Company, have laid plans for expanding their output in order to provide as many jobs as possible, but industry spokesmen confess frankly that they see little possibility of even approximating the present employment level in the post-war period. In an effort to forestall public criticism, business spokesmen are at the moment engaged in a campaign to discredit a program of 60,000,000 jobs as an unrealistic and unobtainable goal. While they do not deny that the present labor force, together with the men and women in the armed forces, totals considerably more than 60,000,000, they insist, with little evidence, that at least 6,000,000 will voluntarily withdraw from the labor force at the end of the war. And they suggest that we should accept 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 unemployed as normal, thus leaving the job goal at slightly over 50,000,000. Even this goal, they admit, probably will not be attained through the efforts of industry alone.

Yet except for the limited assistance provided by an inadequate unemployment insurance system, the government has taken no steps to guarantee jobs or otherwise to sustain consumer buying power during the difficult transition period that lies ahead. For the moment, to be sure, the problem is still one of excess buying power. Not enough consumer goods are being manufactured to absorb the buying power created by war production. But this situation will rapidly change as consumer goods begin to appear on the market and the level of wages is reduced through the elimination of overtime. The number of jobs that will be opened up in private industry to replace those lost in war plants will depend primarily on industry's prospects for selling its goods. And this in turn will depend chiefly on the extent to which purchasing power is maintained during the reconversion period.

President Roosevelt made the maintenance of purchasing power one of the chief campaign issues last fall. We can be sure that if he had lived the Administration would have come forward with a concrete program designed to assure 60,000,000 jobs. Except for the Murray bill, which has been ignored at the White House, no such program appears to be under consideration today. Congress has not even taken up the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill for expanding and extending social-security protection. Unless action is taken shortly on both these measures, our fighting men may find themselves returning to an America of bread lines and soup kitchens as did the heroes of 1918.

Fragments of One World

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

En route, San Francisco-New York, May 12

I LEFT San Francisco with relief this morning. The conference has gone into a period of committee work, of behind-the-scenes bargainings, which is difficult to report for a daily paper, impossible for a weekly. Even speculation, the stock in trade of the reporter without news, is likely to blow up in one's face before the week is out. And the secrecy that has closed down on all the committee proceedings adds to the difficulty of keeping tabs on a circus of changing acts taking place in about two dozen rings. The "leak," intentional or cleverly procured, is the reporter's best bet, but it is an unreliable kind of information, useful chiefly as a crowbar to pry real news out of tightly closed officials. The open rows of the first days which made stories have subsided, although the tensions that caused them are still there, and the delegates are warily picking their way among political time bombs toward agreements which appear likely to circumvent rather than solve the difficulties.

How is it possible to deal intelligently with such a picture? I don't know, but I hope, as the smooth tableland of Kansas flows westward down below me, that time and distance will provide the perspective San Francisco denied the truly inquiring reporter. If I have formed any opinions during the past three weeks, they are tentative, based less on facts than on the general temper of the meeting, the character of the people who compose it, the tendencies suggested by decisions so far made. I put them down with diffidence, reserving the right to change them as the days pass; hoping I can change them.

First of all, I reject the notion so generally accepted in the press that Russia is to be looked upon as a maverick state, unbranded and unpredictable, or that its actions are mysterious. A favorite attitude among writers, including liberal writers, is to assume that Soviet policy poses a unique problem. "We must try to get along with Russia, but how far should we go in making concessions?" I believe a more realistic view would admit that every nation represented at San Francisco is looking after its own interests, and that the hope of a collective system depends upon the degree to which each nation accepts such a system as necessary to its own survival. Russia plainly wants an international security organization. Equally plainly it has little confidence that such an organization is going to be strong enough to depend upon in the near future; so it is building up simultaneously a system of national security. The danger that the second will still further weaken the first does not deter Russia.

But look at the other big powers. Their methods may be more discreet, their manners nicer, but are they sacrificing any measures of national protection to the general plan? China alone offered to yield some area of sovereignty to the new collective organization. It is not too cynical, perhaps, to suggest that China's weakness as a nation, its need of protection during the period of national integration that lies ahead, may have influenced its attitude. In any case China's words resounded in a vacuum. The new mandate scheme, renamed trusteeship, differs little from the old one. The most important change, to permit the establishment of military bases and fortifications in mandated territories, is hardly a sign of increased trust in collective measures. The Russians intend to ring themselves round with friendly states—which means, obviously, states whose governments are free of anti-Russian elements and which are prepared to gear their economic life, under whatever system, closely to Russia's requirements for defense and reconstruction. But how much more deplorable is this attitude than Britain's apparent determination to keep the liberated Italian colonies in Africa, to fortify them, and levy troops from the native populations—all under the aegis of the trusteeship plan? And how much worse was Russia's arrest of the "sixteen" Poles than the arrest last summer of the Greek delegates from the E. A. M. who went in good faith to Cairo to confer with the British? As far as anybody knows, the Greek envoys are still in prison, but nobody has suggested that cooperation with Britain will be impossible as long as it goes on doing these things. Why is it that nobody suggests such a thing? Because it would be manifestly absurd. But since that is so, why do people wonder anxiously how long we can put up with the behavior of Russia?

And how much more of a threat to peace through collective action are Russia's measures for security than our own firm hand on the Western Hemisphere and our claim to the Japanese islands? We may give to both the appearance of subordination to the world organization, but in each case the actual power will remain with the United States. We, like Russia and Britain, will hold on to everything we think may augment our national security and will yield to the new League only such powers as will not interfere with basic measures of defense. Russia, a great land power, is drawing around it protective land areas. We are interested in far-flung strategic bases necessary to the security of a hemisphere. Britain is still clinging to—and adding to—the defenses of its empire routes. France fights to retain the "automatic" application of its defense pact with Russia and looks toward a similar agreement with Britain. Defenders of the Western Hemisphere security plan are still, as I write, seeking a "formula" which will permit it to function and yet somehow to gear into the over-all system: a formula will undoubtedly be discovered, but it will not hide the fact that any scheme of hemisphere security demonstrates a lack of confidence in world security.

The best hope as I write these words rests in an honest attempt on the part of the still allied nations to overcome mutual suspicions and fears. At the worst we shall get an agreement at San Francisco. It will establish a world organization of strictly limited powers. At the center of this organization will be an armed alliance of the three greatest nations. For the immediate future the effective functioning of the organization will depend upon the capacity of those three nations to work together. If that fails, the security system itself will crumble. If some measure of unity is maintained, the system will survive and may gather strength. The elements that create distrust in each governing group may be shoved out of power by processes of revolutionary change already visible. Meanwhile the nations represented in San Francisco have at least the elementary obligation to repair the damage already done by openly expressed distrust. If each delegation would admit for the duration of the conference its own interested motives and forswear self-righteous accusations of the others, a start might be made toward the honest and realistic relations which must form the basis of even a limited system of collective action.

Pie in the 'Frisco Sky

BY I. F. STONE

*Demo & Helen
San Francisco*

Secretary of State Stettinius

San Francisco,
May 13
FROM one point of view, the whole trusteeship question is the big fraud of the United Nations Conference for International Organization. It is pie in the sky, a very distant sky, for the colonial and colored peoples. What has really been going on here under the grandiose and attractive idea of trusteeship is a polite but unmistakable wrangle over strategic bases and the territorial booty which will be left over after the Axis is finally defeated.

Honestly to discuss the very real problem of bases and the disposition of the Italian and Japanese empires is one thing. But to cover it over with the concept of trusteeship is dangerously to arouse, and then to disappoint, the hopes of 750,000,000 colonial and colored people. The contrast between the universal principles enunciated in the American, British, and French proposals and their niggardly application is politically explosive. It is of just such inflated expectations and morning-after disillusionment that revolutionary movements have often been born.

Foreign Minister Molotov

But it is not enough to make this observation. The question goes deeper and is more complex. The trusteeship idea was Rooseveltian, as the mandatory idea at Versailles was Wilsonian. Both reflected the effort of humane and enlightened but politically weak forces to insert the thin edge of the wedge into the harsh block of imperialism, to establish a principle that might serve as a starting-point for its amelioration and ultimate end. This was always Mr. Roosevelt's way at home—to get the main principle written into law at the cost of whatever compromise and in however meager a form. This was, for example, his attitude on social security; he was fully aware of how imperfect was the first Social Security Act. That seemed to him trivial beside the achievement of enacting the principle itself, and he was right.

There is an important difference, however, between doing this on the domestic and on the international plane. At home Mr. Roosevelt had strong support; the principles could be put into practice under popular pressure. But in foreign affairs, and especially in so distant a matter as the fate of colonial and colored peoples, there is no comparable organized, informed, interested, and insistent opinion; the colonial peoples themselves have but faint voice. Under such circumstances, the expression and acceptance of noble general principles have little effect and appear in retrospect as mere insincere window-dressing to disguise the continuance of imperialist exploitation.

That this would be the ultimate fate of the trusteeship idea seemed probable after Mr. Roosevelt's death. He left the idea as an unwelcome legacy to the American delegation, a group not overcrowded with men of vision. The State Department and the delegation itself were at once set upon by the Navy Department. "We have spent millions of dollars and thousands of lives conquering the Japanese-held islands in the Pacific," Admiral Hart told the Institute of Pacific Relations at Hot Springs, "and we have no intention of relinquishing their sovereignty to another international authority after this war." The American proposals had to be whittled down to satisfy the navy. The net effect of the American, British, and French proposals is to permit any country to give up its empire if it chooses to do so! In the meantime, while awaiting this unlikely event, "trusteeship" is actually a step behind the League mandates system in that it gives the possessing power a legal right to fortify dependent areas and to use dependent peoples and resources for war.

This highly satisfactory—from the imperial point of view—state of affairs has been upset by the Soviet Union. The U. S. S. R. at San Francisco has seized world leadership on three great issues whose importance for the future cannot be overestimated. The first was the Argentine issue. That this is neither a special case nor a settled question was indicated by Mr. Molotov's statement to the press on May 7, in which he said that the program being charted here "is incompatible with the membership of fascist countries in the organization of international security . . . for fascist countries are known to be sinister centers not only of reaction but of war as well."

The second issue was connected with the right to work and the right to an education. Mr. Molotov revealed, what some of us already knew, that the Soviet Union had sought to include these among the human rights referred to in the charter. He said the U. S. S. R. withdrew its request when told that "it would be inadvisable to mention any specific rights." I know from reliable American sources that Senator Vandenberg and Representative Eaton led the fight to keep the right to work and the right to an education out of the charter.

The third issue on which the U. S. S. R. has taken the leadership is the question of colonial and colored peoples. This became apparent in three stages. I know from both the Indian press and the Indian Nationalists here what a sensation was created when Mr. Molotov during the debate on Argentina said, "We have at this conference an Indian delegation. But India is not an independent state. We all know that the time will come when the voice of an independent India will be heard too." There were, I am told, banner headlines on that statement in the press of India, and for the colonial and colored peoples India is the touchstone and the test of imperial intention. The second step came at the May 7 press conference when Mr. Molotov said that in considering trusteeship proposals the Soviet delegation "realizes that from the viewpoint of the interest of international security we must first of all see to it that dependent countries are enabled as soon as possible to take the path of national independence." The American delegation, at an off-the-record press conference, sought to counteract the effect of this statement by saying that no concrete proposals had been made by the Russians and implying that they were just talking for political effect. But the Soviet delegation has now taken the third step and embodied this idea in formally suggested amendments to the American proposals.

If Mr. Roosevelt were alive, he would utilize this Russian pressure—which certainly accords with the natural sympathy of average Americans for subject peoples—to force the British and the French and the Dutch to compromise, to meet the desires of the colonial peoples halfway, to give some substance to the concept of trusteeship. Mr. Roosevelt understood with instinctive vision that the coming century would see the colonial and colored peoples rise to the place in the world they deserve, that their friendship is important to our children and grandchildren, that our own democratic traditions call for an understanding attitude toward their aspirations, and that their freedom would eliminate the imperialist rivalries which are a major cause of war. Unfortunately, there are not more than two or three persons on the American delegation who understand this. And unless President Truman rises to the occasion as Mr. Roosevelt would have done, the Soviet position is likely to be utilized only as another means of creating distrust between the U. S. S. R. and the West. But that would be to identify our own country with imperialism and reaction in the minds of the colonial and colored peoples and to orient them toward the U. S. S. R. This would be unworthy of what America has meant to the world in the past and should mean in the future.

What would meet the hopes of dependent peoples halfway? First, for the colonial and colored peoples, the right of oral petition in person to the trusteeship council, the right to have the reports of that council made public, the right to native representation upon it, the right to an education. This is not much to ask. Second, for India—which has a dual disadvantage in being a subject state whose purely formal sovereignty is made an excuse for continuing its subjection—some provision must be made at least to let its own voice be heard by the trusteeship council, and to provide an international guaranty of Britain's past promises of self-government. Third, for my own people, the Jews, millions of whom still want and need a national home in Palestine: unless certain amendments suggested by the American Jewish conference can be obtained, the upshot of the shift to "trusteeship" will be to deprive the Jews in Palestine and their homeless brethren abroad of what fragile rights in that country are still left to them from the promises so solemnly made in the last war. Palestine would still be a British mandate, but Jewish rights in it would be less than before, the pawn of maneuvering by English and American oil interests for Arab favor. The trusteeship issue brings the great powers to a historic moment. If President Truman has the foresight to seize upon it, he can utilize the leverage made available by the U. S. S. R. to win considerable concessions from the other powers, and with it for America the gratitude and respect of mankind.

Truman: a Trial Balance

BY ALAN BARTH

Washington, May 10

ON V-E DAY, Harry S. Truman celebrated his sixty-first birthday and neared the completion of his first month as President of the United States. Little known or understood when he took office, despite a substantial public record written during his sixty-one years, his character and political philosophy are unlikely to be fully revealed by four weeks in the Presidency. Nevertheless, there have been portents. They deserve examination, even though the conclusions to be drawn from them can be no more than tentative.

In judging President Truman during the initial period of shock after Mr. Roosevelt's death, people tended publicly to hope for the best and privately to fear the worst. Published prognostications reflected, in the main, the wishes of their authors. They had the effect, consequently, of representing the new President to an extraordinary degree as being all things to all men.

Representative Clare Hoffman, for example, after describing Mr. Truman as "just an ordinary American with the background of a Lincoln," said, "That is why so many believe he may prove to be in some respects another Calvin Coolidge"—the logic of this inference may possibly seem obscure. Max Lerner, writing in PM, on the other hand, observed that "the Republicans . . . finally are coming to the disillusioning conclusion that the President who succeeded Roosevelt is not a Republican."

Raymond Moley offered this assurance to his readers: "There will certainly be no disposition in Mr. Truman to create a new kind of economic life out of the necessary controls of war. That is why conservatism will be the major drift. . . ." Frank Kent promised even more: "Naturally, Mr. Truman starts off with declarations of deepest devotion to Mr. Roosevelt personally and a dedication to carry out his war and peace policies. The country expects that.

Anything else at this time would be bad taste as well as bad judgment. Naturally, too, Mr. Truman wants to proceed slowly. But, soon or late, he is bound to get rid of a very large number of the advanced New Dealers who, one way or another, have become entrenched here in Washington." But Margaret Marshall said in The Nation that "if the right expects any spectacular overturn of the New Deal it will probably be disappointed." And I. F. Stone expressed a feeling which I think was prevalent among good New Dealers: "I hate to confess it, but I think Mr. Roosevelt was astute and farsighted in picking Mr. Truman rather than Mr. Wallace as his successor. . . . I think Mr. Truman will carry on Mr. Roosevelt's work."

Plainly it would have been, as Mr. Kent so delicately suggested, bad judgment on the part of the new President to disappoint any of these glowing expectations out of hand. They constituted a semblance of national unity at a moment when unity was desperately needed. They gave him a respite from attack, a chance to take hold of his overwhelming new responsibilities.

But political honeymoons are of notoriously short duration. Already President Truman is being confronted by what William James called "forced options"—choices in which delay is a form of decision and in which inaction is equivalent to negation. Their urgency has been accented by the advent of V-E Day.

Reconversion, for instance, is ceasing to be a theory and is becoming a condition. He must either accept or attempt to broaden and humanize a law which his predecessor considered altogether inadequate in its treatment of war workers. He must put his shoulder to, or turn his back upon, the Murray full-employment bill. He must show where he stands on regional authorities for river-valley developments—and, if he is for them, choose between the Ickes and Lillienthal philosophies. Unless Mr. Truman gives it real indorsement,

Harry S. Truman

the Fair Employment Practice Committee is probably doomed. By his action on such issues, rather than by his protestations of fealty to Mr. Roosevelt, the new President will be judged. Either the liberals or the conservatives, or both, can be expected to start screaming soon.

In point of fact, President Truman has shown little disposition to dodge decisions. Indeed, decisiveness has been his outstanding quality since he assumed the Presidency, and it has had a wonderfully tonic effect upon the whole governmental hierarchy. He makes choices, and he does not seem to bleed over them once they have been made. Apparently he meant what he said when he told the members of the Roosevelt Cabinet that he wanted them to stay on. The exceptions to this—Postmaster General Walker and perhaps Secretary Perkins, who has long wanted to leave—are special cases. The other members of the Cabinet have come to believe in his sincerity and, what is more important, in his confidence in them. As a result, they have given him their loyalty and accepted him as "the boss" to a rather remarkable degree. At the very least, it can certainly be said that the resentment which they might have felt quite naturally over his accidental elevation to the place of their revered commander, Mr. Roosevelt, has been transformed into sympathy for his position and a genuine desire to help him.

The appointments to office which Mr. Truman has so far made are straws in the wind, although of somewhat doubtful significance. His selection of John W. Snyder for the vital job of Federal Loan Administrator, which eluded Henry Wallace, was accepted hopefully on both sides of the political fence. Conservatives remembered that Snyder was a banker, and liberals that he had defied Jesse Jones. There is little to be learned from his choice of other World War I companions, such as Edward McKim and Colonel Harry Vaughn, save that he likes to have his friends around him. Almost everyone acclaims Charles G. Ross of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch as his press secretary.

The one really disheartening act of Mr. Truman's Administration to date has been the appointment of Edward W. Pauley, California oil man and treasurer of the Democratic National Committee, to serve as American member of the Allied Reparations Commission in Moscow. It is hard to understand this in any save political terms; and it is made the more distasteful by the subordination of Dr. Isador Lubin, named to the post by Mr. Roosevelt and brilliantly qualified to fill it. For the philosophical, however, there is the consideration that Mr. Truman might have seen fit to reward Pauley with a place in the Cabinet.

As an offset to this political move, moreover, there is the renomination of David Lilienthal as chairman of the TVA. It remains to be seen, of course, whether the President will use his influence to keep the TVA out of Senator McKellar's clutches; but he has certainly taken the first essential step toward that end. He took it, characteristically, without alienating the rambunctious presiding officer of the Senate. Indeed, I am informed, he very nearly managed to make McKellar like it.

President Truman seems to have something of a knack for getting people to like, rather than lump, the things he does. It is a peculiarly useful knack in a time like the present. He will placate, but the chances are that he will not equivocate. In all probability he will not for long be content to wear the mantle of Roosevelt. He has a style of his own; and no doubt he will have policies of his own to fit the events which will confront him. And this, after all, is the most hopeful portent of his month's incumbency. He has shown, from the first difficult day when he was called upon to take over, that he is, in fact, a President.

Back to Grandfather

BY STUART CHASE

I PROFESSOR HAYEK is an Austrian who went to England with other German and Austrian scholar exiles in the early 1930's. They were welcomed by the London School of Economics, and began an evangelical revival of the doctrine of free competition as formulated a century and a half ago by Adam Smith. For a dozen years books and articles have been flowing from the energetic pens of Professors Hayek, von Mises, and others of the so-called Vienna School. Until the publication of "The Road to Serfdom" last fall, nobody paid much attention except the academic economists, who have tossed the ball of dialectic to and fro in their learned journals.

All of us who took Economics 1 know Professor Hayek's story. The basic assumption is that economic affairs are best taken care of if individuals are left free to pursue their own personal gain. Neither the state nor private monopolies should interfere. This assumption depends in turn upon an optimistic view of the nature of the universe, where a "natural order" brings about a benign system of economic harmonies in the absence of outside regulation. A complete separation of economic from political power is cardinal to the doctrine, an "essential guaranty of freedom."

This metaphysic can be traced back to various European economists of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and finds its culmination in the work of Cobden and Bright, in early nineteenth-century Britain. Professor Hayek, indeed, traces it back to the ancient Greeks, while carefully avoiding Plato—whose "Republic," of course, is one of the most ferocious exhibits in totalitarian planning ever put on parchment.

An invisible hand, the story goes, will transform individual self-seeking into the greatest good for the greatest number. The free play of goods and services in an all-inclusive market will automatically reward individuals according to their deserts, while insuring social progress. The structure of harmonies, however, is in delicate balance. Any conscious or thoughtful planning for the general welfare will destroy its automaticity and fruitfulness. A pious obedience to the dictates of the natural order is mandatory. Professor Hayek is rigorous on this point. He says: "Thus the more we try to provide full security by interfering with the market system, the greater the insecurity becomes." And again:

It was men's submission to the impersonal forces of the market that in the past has made possible the growth of civilization . . . it is by thus submitting that we are every day helping to build something that is greater than any one of us can fully comprehend. . . . They are mistaken when . . . they argue that we must learn to master the forces of society in the same manner in which we have learned to master the forces of nature. This is the path to totalitarianism.

Thus men must resist any impulse to tinker with their destiny, and bow their heads before the mystery of the market as good Christians bow their heads before the mystery of God. But the world has taken a sad turn since the Golden Age when Cobden and Bright repealed the Corn Laws. The forces of evil secured a foothold about 1870, especially in Germany, and ever since, owing to the follies of collectivism, government interference, monopoly, and economic planning, we have been falling deeper into sin. In ringing terms our author bids us return to the ways, not of our fathers, but of our grandfathers. Back, he cries, before it is too late. "We have little right," he says, "to feel . . . superior to our grandfathers; and we should never forget that it is we, the twentieth century, and not they, who have made a mess of things." We cannot perhaps recreate the England of 1840, but "we have the opportunity to realize its ideals."

One reason for the current success of "The Road to Serfdom" is clear from these quotations. Here is the true faith we have lost, the fundamentalist doctrine that those of us beyond fifty were brought up on. When we are confused by the trend of events, frightened by the New Deal, appalled at our war economy with its astronomical debts and taxes, worried about Russia, uncertain about the British and their unorthodox White Papers—in short, when the world of 1945 is too much for us—we long to return to the old simple faiths.

Professor Hayek thus answers a deep spiritual need in American men of affairs. He also vigorously attacks "Socialists," "Communists," "planners," "bureaucrats," and thus warms the hearts of the executives again. At this particular point in history, while profit margins are widened by war orders, and before the post-war world falls down on us, the Vienna School revival might easily go like Technocracy in 1933—which also, in its day, filled a spiritual need. Technocracy, however, jumped us a century forward, while Vienna jumps us a century back. Middle-of-the-roads like your reviewer get a little dizzy as the band-wagons rush fore and aft.

II

Our author's logic is as simple as his theology. He subscribes to the two-valued school: the philosophy of either-or. An event is either black or white; there is no room for shades of gray. Yet in the real world of space and time nearly every event is a shade of gray, with absolutes almost unknown.

In two-valued logic we must choose between "planning" and "freedom," between complete collectivism and complete laissez faire; there is no middle ground. Once the virus of planning is admitted, we are assured, it will spread like typhus until the whole economy is riddled with the disease. By the same token, free competition cannot tolerate any restrictions whatsoever, whether by government, labor unions, private monopolies, or pressure groups. We must have the pure, unadulterated article if we are to live as free men.

At this point practical men are forced to part company with two-valued logic. It bears no relation to the world they have to deal with day by day. In the real world the honest observer notes that Sweden and New Zealand, among others, have planned certain areas of their economic life for decades; yet nowhere does one find more upstanding individuals or more devotion to civil liberties.

An even more dramatic case is that of the United States at this very moment. The federal government, in a total war economy, has taken over the direction of the bulk of our activities, is buying about 60 per cent of everything produced, while the "law" of supply and demand has been laid away for the duration. On our author's logic we should be serfs, yet the Bill of Rights, with its freedoms of speech, press, assembly, religion, habeas corpus, stands foursquare. Listen any day to Colonel McCormick thunder in the Tribune. Freedom of civilians to choose jobs and goods has been only slightly restricted. Freedom of movement is unaffected—provided you can find a place in the train to stand. We are not quite so free as we shall be when the war is over; yet I should not advise Professor Hayek to begin calling Americans serfs in, say, Times Square.

For Germany he may be quite correct in holding that total war has reduced citizens to a kind of serfdom. For the United States, Britain, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, he is wildly incorrect. This is the kind of pickle two-valued logic gets one into. Another pickle is the identification of "collectivism" with "socialism" with "communism" with "planning" with "Hitler." They are all synonymous in this logic. So one can reduce it to syllogisms like the following:

Hitler plans
Lord Keynes plans
Therefore Lord Keynes equals Hitler.

Yet it would be just as fair to say:

Hitler uses tanks
General Eisenhower uses tanks
Therefore General Eisenhower equals Hitler.

At one place in the book, I even found myself identified with Hitler, a logical simplification which I resent.

A curious corollary of our author's logic is to deny the possibility of an abundance economy. "Whoever talks about potential plenty is either dishonest or does not know what he is talking about. . . . It is this false hope as much as anything which drives us along the road to planning." Frankly, this shocks me. Doesn't the Professor ever look at current statistics? His book was published in 1944. In that year, according to all reliable sources, the gross national output of the United States was close to 200 billion dollars' worth of goods and services, or more than twice the prosperity peak of 1929. The "potential plenty" that "planners" used to talk about was around $100 billion. Is it dishonest to point out that the war has actually doubled the estimates of those crackpots and dreamers? Is it dishonest to believe that what America has done once it can do again—with tractors instead of tanks coming off the assembly line?

III

Two-valued logic can be readily exorcised by asking the concrete question: Planning for what? If one is planning just for the sake of "planning" one is a proper target for Professor Hayek's blunderbuss. This breed of planners, however, is practically extinct in America. There is no special virtue in planning for economic goods which free competition can adequately supply. Check this with any member of the National Planning Association, from Beardsley Ruml down. A man with a head on his shoulders calls for plans when something specific is breaking loose or threatens to break loose.

When Model T's began to choke the roads in the early 1920's, for example, somebody had to plan the traffic before the hospitals overflowed. When I hear the word "planning" in a vacuum, I usually think of the traffic cop at Twelfth and Main. If readers of "The Road to Serfdom" did the same, they would not find much left to read. In 200 pages of high-order abstractions there is hardly a single concrete case.

The book does contain one glaring inconsistency and one useful warning. The inconsistency occurs when Professor Hayek, by some strange lapse, holds out a kind of olive branch to the planners in the form of social security and guaranteed minimums of food and shelter for the population. We had best forget this lapse, for it interferes with the logical perfection of the rest of the treatise. In fact, it removes the whole underpinning from the argument. One cannot both deny and admit the welfare state.

The warning, which every "planner" should paste under the glass top of his desk, is this: If citizens surrender all responsibility for economic action to a centralized government, as in Germany and Russia, citizens will lose their civil liberties, their freedoms to choose jobs and goods. For Americans this would indeed be a kind of serfdom. For Russians, however, having been in Russia, I am not so sure. Russians do not look at you in the street the way a serf should look. They do not fight like serfs. Perhaps Russians just have a different set of habits about civil liberties.

In a democracy in the power age it is manifest that two general areas must be consciously directed: First, the government must plan to keep the market economy afloat. Otherwise monopolies, cartels, trade unions, farm blocs will torpedo it from one side, and catastrophic depressions torpedo it from the other. Second, the government, or the foundations, or the cooperatives, or somebody, has got to provide those economic goods and services which citizens must have and which business men are not interested in providing. They include the public-school system, public health and nutrition, social security, the national defense, the highways, conservation, housing for the lower income groups, municipal utilities, and so on.

In addition, the end of the war will require plans for such special tasks as these: to rehabilitate and reemploy fifteen million veterans; to transfer twenty million war workers to peace-time jobs; to dispatch great stores of food and medicines abroad; to dispose fairly of some 2,000 government war plants and some $100 billion of government inventories; to carry out agreements like those made at Dumbarton Oaks, Bretton Woods, and other international conferences, in the interests of world peace.

Can any of the matters listed above be settled by higgling in the market? Not one. They must be consciously directed or they will not be settled at all.

IV

Finally, let us look at Professor Hayek's account of the decline of free competition. He admits that all the trends are running in the opposite direction, but he says the planners are responsible—personally. They began their hatchet work in Germany, we are told, and now have spread all over the planet. This is flatly contradictory to the historical record in America, where laissez faire was undermined first by the monopolies and trusts of the business men, second by the collective bargaining of the unions, third by agricultural blocs, and last by the state—forced into the picture when the economy literally broke down. The oil trust was formed not long after the Civil War, the A. F. of L. was formed in the 1890's, the farm bloc in the 1920's, while powerful government action came only with the great depression of the 1930's.

The virgin free market was not violated by planners and collectivists in Germany or anywhere else but by the Standard Oil Company, the United States Steel Corporation, the Big Five Chicago packers, the A. F. of L., the Farm Bureau Federation, the protective tariff, the Aluminum Company of America, I. G. Farben, Imperial Chemical Industries, and the scores of other powerful monopolies, here and abroad, which for one reason or another—some of them pretty good reasons—could no longer tolerate the unimpeded "law" of supply and demand.

If all the planners, from Alexander Hamilton to Lord Keynes, had never written a line, the market would be in much the same state as we find it today, and the prospect of returning to the era of Jeremy Bentham would be equally bleak. We have no more warrant to go back to it than to go back to the medical practice of bleeding for all diseases.

The Golden Age of 1840—when little girls worked a fourteen-hour day underground in British coal mines—has been displaced chiefly by the gentlemen who are now acclaiming Professor Hayek's book. A return to free competition, in all its two-valued absolutism, which he celebrates, would break up most of the organized industry of the United States, every labor union, every farm organization concerned with economic action.

There is no road back to grandfather's bosom. We have to deal with the world as it is. The only way is forward. We are out on the darkling plain in this fateful year of 1945. We have lost a great leader, and an ominous journey lies before us. There is no escape to an economic fairyland where invisible hands put us to bed and rock us to sleep. We have only our naked intelligence to save us from looming disaster. We have got to stand on our own feet and act and dare—yes, and plan! Or mankind will be overwhelmed.

If enough Americans escape into Professor Hayek's wonderland to become a solid pressure group against all intelligent programs to solve specific post-war problems, then our task becomes far more difficult. Furthermore, those areas of private enterprise which "planners" honestly desire to keep open may be swept away. As the count of the unemployed goes up from ten to fifteen to twenty million, under a policy of drift and deadlock, the man on horseback will surely have his chance. Then we shall really taste serfdom.

Criminals and War Criminals

BY RUSTEM VAMBERY

IN 1474 the magistrate of Bâle sentenced a rooster to be burned for the "heinous and unnatural crime" of laying an egg. Three centuries later Racine in "Les Plaideurs" ridiculed the trial and sentencing of a dog for having devoured a capon; the counsel for the dog brought in a litter of puppies and asked clemency for the "pauvres enfants, qu'on veut rendre orphelins." Until finally the psychological origin of the crime became the basis of legal prosecution, all kinds of domestic animals and vermin were tried for harmful deeds. However, there is no record of man-eating tigers, lions, or other wild animals being brought to trial. They were always killed without legal formalities.

There is no reason why wild beasts in human form like the Nazis should be dealt with differently. No one need be a better Christian than the Archbishop of York or a better statesman than Anthony Eden, who said in the House of Commons that if an Allied soldier should meet Hitler he would know what to do with him. But it is not only Hitler and other Nazi leaders who raise the problem of war criminals; there are hundreds of thousands of lesser men who, during the war, either as principals or as accessories, perpetrated murder, pillage, and brutality to a degree hitherto unknown in the history of warfare.

Unfortunately the terms "crime" and "criminal" are ambiguous. Crime, from the legal point of view, is any act prohibited by law and punishable in a judicial proceeding initiated in the name of the state (Sheldon Glueck). But any severe offense against morality is also called a crime, and those Nazis whose misdeeds have aroused our indignation are called criminals whether their atrocious behavior is a crime or not in the legal sense of the word. If we use the term "war crime," we introduce new legal complications. War crimes, in the proper sense, are infringements of martial law. Their number is indefinite and depends on the acts ordered or forbidden in the proclamation of martial law or the regulations of the invading or occupying commander (Wheaton's "Elements of International Law," Vol. II, p. 787). In another sense war crimes are violations of the American Rules of Land Warfare or of the rules of international law. These are, in I. W. Garner's view ("International Law and the World War II," p. 475), assimilable to ordinary crimes and punishable as such, and according to French authorities (Renault, Pic, Garçon) either belligerent may take jurisdiction. All this refers to what is known as international law.

No textbook of the criminal law of any country contains the terms "war crime" or "war criminal." There is, indeed, no such thing as war crime, meaning a special class of crime. In stressing this, I am not indulging in legalistic hairsplitting or attempting to deny the necessity of retribution for crimes committed during the war. In public opinion as reflected in the press war crimes are either just ordinary crimes, such as murder, robbery, arson, assault and battery, committed in an extraordinary measure by enemy citizens and punishable under the penal law of every civilized country, or acts of which we violently disapprove and which we call crimes because we want to have them punished. Dealing with the ordinary crimes offers no difficulty except for the unprecedented number of criminals. The trial of hundreds of thousands of Nazis and Fascists with all the rules of procedure duly observed would require so much time that in all probability neither the defendants nor the judge nor the jury would live to see the outcome. On the other hand, if the rules of law were disregarded and the trial became just a formality confirming the preconceived judgment of the political authorities, the justice meted out would offer no better guaranty that the innocent would be spared than if the military or political authorities disposed of the suspects.

As for the acts which we wish to see punished as crimes, neither aggressive war nor support for the Nazi doctrines which instigated the horrors that have appalled civilized mankind is listed as a crime in any criminal code of the world. It is idle to theorize whether Hitler was the head of a state or a common criminal—or both, as Dr. Lemkin concluded (The Nation, February 24). After all, the Western powers did accept and legalize Hitler's government by carrying on diplomatic relations with it. What really matters is whether those acts which have put into practice "the repugnant philosophy of National Socialism" can be considered crimes in the legal sense of the word, even if they were not explicitly prohibited and punishable by law.

Not only Article IX of the Déclaration des Droits de l'Homme but Section 9 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States declares that "no . . . ex post facto law shall be passed." This principle of nullum crimen sine lege is one of the most important achievements of the French Revolution. It is not simply one of the legalistic niceties but, as George W. Kirchwey put it, the foremost of general principles in the limitation of arbitrary power, from which there appears no warranted deviation in any modern state. A view similar to that of the great American liberal savant was expressed by the greatest German authority on pre-Hitler criminal law, Rudolf von Hippel, when he said that by admitting arbitrariness in the application of punishment the cultural standard of criminal law would be set back 150 years. This is exactly what happened in Germany ten years ago when Hitlerian "law" substituted "sound popular feeling" for legal prohibition. In his scholarly work "Axis Rule in Occupied Europe" Dr. Lemkin expressed the opinion that this "encroachment upon the rights of the individual . . . destroys the feeling of legal security and creates an atmosphere of constant fear and terror." It is surprising, therefore, that he considers mere membership in the Gestapo or the S. S. or other "such groups" an offense because "they constitute an association having as its purpose the commission of crimes in genere." That the hundreds of thousands of men in the S. S. and the political police were conscious of joining an unlawful conspiracy for crime is an entirely unwarranted assumption regardless of how many crimes they actually committed.

Joseph Bornstein's mordant satire in The Nation of April 28 forecasting the possible trial of the Nazi leaders reinforces the argument of Supreme Court Justice Jackson, who has said that to avoid "the risk of creating a 'myth of martyrdom' among countrymen of those criminals they should be executed. But such decisions should be military and political, not reached through forms of judicial procedure." All who are not blinded by the emotional desire for revenge must agree with Samuel Grafton, writing in the New York Post, that "the problem of what to do with the Germans cannot be solved on the narrow scale of reprisal and criminal punishment." The solution of the Mussolini problem was fortunate either way, as a substitute for a judicial settlement or for an interminable chain of revenge. It is understandable that the Holy See, based as it is on tradition and ceremonial institutions, deplored the summary execution of Mussolini and his henchmen, but it is doubtful whether a more elaborate trial ending in execution arte legis would have been more satisfactory either as justice or as retribution.

Whatever the solution, we have to keep in mind that law should not be made the charwoman hired to clear away the debris of history. Nazism and Fascism are revolutionary movements, and law, the static force of society, is not an adequate means of dealing with these passing events. Recognition of this inadequacy is neither judicial quibbling nor an attempt to help Nazi and Fascist monsters to escape the consequences of their misdeeds. On the contrary. If the problem is looked at from a practical angle, Dr. Lemkin's assertion that "it is difficult to see how political 'disposition' has a firmer legality than the judicial process" is begging the question. What civilized humanity, shocked by the unheard-of atrocities, demands is not legality or, still less, the misuse of the law to keep up appearances, but swift and merciless retribution. It is regrettable but unavoidable that bombs dropped on military objectives occasionally hit innocent civilians.

Satisfaction of all the bitterness that has accumulated as a result of the unspeakable cruelties of the Nazis and Fascists is not consistent with true justice based on law and order. And it makes no difference that those who fear revolution and civil war want a non-existent international tribunal to apply a non-existent natural law, or "law of humanity," instead of the existent rules of law. That would by no means remove the insurmountable difficulties but would increase the hypocrisy which becomes manifest when we use the form of justice to cloak the lack of its essence.

War and law are incompatible—even though this most terrible of all wars was fought to restore the rule of that law and morality which developed under the influence of Graeco-Roman-Christian civilization. This war was fought against aggressors whose caveman ethics delivered everybody to an arbitrary judge. We want to reestablish pre-Hitlerian law and morality. Can we do it by arranging "swift" trials whose procedure would disregard the elementary principles of the very law which we want to restore? When the dust of history has covered the ephemeral notoriety of the Nazi gangsters, law and morality will still be the indispensable powers of balance in every human community.

In the Wind

DR. FRIEDRICH A. HAYEK, author of "The Road to Serfdom," really should do something to keep his name from being bandied about by the less reputable elements of the right. An organization called America's Future, Inc., with the same address and phone number as Frank Gannett's Committee for Constitutional Government, is currently referring to its most prolific hack writer, Samuel B. Pettengill, as "the American Hayek." . . . Incidentally, Hayek's influence on North American thought is indicated by the following statement of John Bracken, leader of Canada's Progressive Conservative Party: "Planned economy, whatever its auspices, leads inevitably to socialism and, as we have all witnessed in Europe—to totalitarianism."

GOVERNOR SIMEON WILLIS of Kentucky has announced that he will appoint a Negro to the State Board of Education and will ask Attorney General Eldon S. Dummit to appoint another as an assistant attorney general.

IN DEMOCRATIC COUNTRIES civil rights have always been won by years of struggle. Franco has once more demonstrated the greater efficiency of dictatorship by handing down to his people a ready-made bill of rights. It grants them freedom of speech, provided they don't disparage fascism, and freedom of religion, provided they are Catholics. All they need now is a bill of rights.

SOME THREE HUNDRED NAZIS in Mexico's Perote prison have petitioned Miguel Alaman, Secretary of the Interior, to release them, as they "no longer believe in Nazism."

M. J. COLDWELL, leader of Canada's Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, was the only Canadian delegate to San Francisco who voted against admitting Argentina to the conference. He said Argentina should first "remove the police censorship on news, restore freedom in universities and schools, and empty the concentration camps where democrats are incarcerated."

NORTH CAROLINA will have the nation's first permanent state recreation commission. The bill authorizing it, recently passed, provides for seven full-time commissioners, of whom one shall be a woman and one a Negro.

THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA will open a school of foreign service and international affairs on July 2.

LEGISLATIVE MEMO: The renegotiation act expires June 30. The House Ways and Means Committee, now considering an extension to December 31, has under advisement nine amendments, proposed by the United States Chamber of Commerce, which would seriously hamper the government in renegotiation proceedings.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Fascism Without Mussolini—II

BY MARIO ROSSI

THE PARTISANS

WHILE the royal family and the army generals, thinking only of their own safety, were deserting Italy and seeking refuge behind the Allied lines, a determined band of patriots took up the fight for their country and for the Allied cause. They were not men who had served Fascism until they saw it about to fall, nor were they men who paid only lip service to the ideal of freedom. For twenty years they had opposed Mussolini and all he stood for. Their integrity gave them the necessary authority in the eyes of the people, whereas the behavior of the King had completely discredited the monarchy. Under their leadership a popular army came into being, many hundreds of thousands strong. On May 11, General Mark Clark, in an order of the day, announced that this partisan army had liberated more than two hundred towns, including Milan, Turin, Genoa, Spezia, and Venice.

When the Allied troops entered these great cities, they found an amazing degree of order and the partisans' administration working smoothly. The C. B. S. correspondent Winston Burdett reported from Milan that the Italian partisans were the best-disciplined popular army he had ever seen.

When our first troops got into Milan [he said] the partisans had had it under control for three days. They had the lights on and the street-cars going, and today they opened the banks. They saved the gas and water works and kept the electric-power plant intact by a fast job of demining. . . . Milan liberated itself. It did not wait for the Allies or for the lumbering Italian government in Rome to judge and sentence Fascist war criminals. It is impossible to get an accurate estimate of the number of Fascists, militiamen, and secret police who have been executed during the five days since the partisans took over, but no partisan with whom I spoke put the figure at less than 1,000 and most estimated that it was much higher.

General Clark referred to the Genoa Committee of Liberation as "an example of able administration." Venice, he said, had been liberated "from the interior by the armed forces of the freedom volunteers with the support and the encouragement of the entire population. . . . The port area and public services are intact, and the enemy has been unable to touch the many superb monuments of culture and civilization. When the forces of the Fifteenth Army Group entered your city everything had gone back to normal." And in another proclamation he declared: "The world must have no fear that Italy will not be able to produce men to guide her in the future. On the contrary, there are men in Italy who are more than fit to take an active part in the great work of reconstruction staged by the Allies."

These results were not achieved without a long and bitter struggle. The Allies' slow progress in Italy gave the Fascists and the Germans time to make many large-scale attacks upon the partisans. According to Marshal Alexander, 250,000 Italians died in the fight for liberation.

Italian patriots have also been fighting beyond the frontiers of the country. Many thousands joined Marshal Tito after September 8, 1943, and won his warm commendation. Of the 15,000 soldiers of the Garibaldi Division in Yugoslavia, only a little over 3,000 survived. Before the liberation of France there was close contact between the Italian and French guerrillas fighting in the Haute Savoie.

In September, 1943, the first Committee of National Liberation was organized, with branches in the most important cities. All groups of the population were represented. The workers cooperated either by fighting with the partisans or by striking. Many units of the army, particularly the Alpine troops, went over to the anti-Fascists. In Turin, on September 10, while the King and his generals were running away from Rome, the people fought an epic battle against the Germans. Kesselring had to introduce a reign of terror to master the situation. According to German sources, 50,000 Italians from the Turin region escaped to join the maquis.

In March, 1944, the German-controlled Radio Rome said 208,549 workers were on strike, but the Swiss press placed the number closer to three million. Radio Rome admitted that "the strike was meant to give concrete proof of the workers' solidarity with the Anglo-Americans and Russians by restricting war production." The New York Times commented editorially, "As a mass demonstration nothing has occurred in Europe to compare in scale with the revolt of the workers in Italy."

The Committee of National Liberation was recognized by the Bonomi government as its official representative in northern Italy in December, 1944. From then on it bore the responsibility not only of directing the fighting but also of solving serious political problems. It had to settle differences among the various political parties represented on it and set up administrations in the places liberated. Needing for this task the support not only of the partisans but of the population, it had to interpret and realize the aspirations of the masses. A Florentine paper described the local committees of liberation as follows:

Drawing by Lilly Rossi

[They] were the embodiment not only of existing authority but of a new factor in Italian history. They were not merely an expedient, a temporary grouping of parties to facilitate a common effort; . . . they were in fact and in spirit true local governments, completely autonomous, the first foundation of that new political structure that is the result of the people's collaboration and not of an arbitrary coup d'état.

The choice before the Allies in northern Italy is to recognize the new political situation created by the strength of the partisans, or to impose a regime that, in spite of all the efforts of Allied propaganda, finds supporters only among those who hate or fear an Italian democratic republic. At this writing it looks as if the Allies would have to acknowledge that to continue the same policy in the political-minded north that they pursued in the south would lead to disaster. The aim of the Allies in the south has been to prop up the monarchy and to discourage the committees of liberation from taking any political initiative. In Florence, during the period of German occupation, the local Committee of Liberation directed a struggle against the enemy in which more than a thousand partisans died. After the liberation of the city the people expected to see the committee recognized as the local administrative body. Instead, the Allies nominated a monarchist prefetto who did everything possible to sabotage the work of the committee. In Siena prior to the entry of Allied troops the Committee of Liberation cleared the city's administration of Fascists. The AMG not only refused at first to deal with the committee, but disarmed the patriot forces and called back to service the Fascist police authorities.

There is a reason for this. The monarchy is extremely unpopular and cannot stay in power without British support. Great Britain can therefore control the King, and by keeping him in power it can control Italy.

THE HOUSE OF SAVOY

The history of the House of Savoy is the history of a dynasty which never hesitated to sacrifice the interest of the nation to its own. "The House of Savoy," wrote the historian Giuseppe Ferrari, "has constantly shifted from the Jesuits to the Carbonari, from Austria to France, from ambition to fear." This was written in the middle of the last century. If you substitute the word democracy for Carbonari, the statement is still true.

The apologists of Victor Emmanuel have said that he was a prisoner of Mussolini and had to carry out his orders. To this it may be retorted that the King himself brought Mussolini to power and did everything that was necessary to consolidate the Fascist dictatorship. The King always did as Mussolini wanted until the day came when this unholy alliance menaced the future of the dynasty. Ample proof of his submission was given when the Duce started his long series of aggressions. On March 7, 1936, as a reward for making him Emperor of Ethiopia, the King conferred on Mussolini the highest military decoration, the Grand Cross of the Military Order of Savoy. The citation stated that "the Duce, as minister of the armed forces, had planned, conducted, and won the greatest colonial battle in all the history which he, as head of His Majesty's government, had conceived and desired for the prestige, the life, and the greatness of the Fascist motherland." Great publicity was given during the Ethiopian campaign to a picture showing the Queen offering her wedding ring for the collection of gold to pay for the war. Two years later the King received Adolf Hitler in Rome. Shortly afterward, accompanied by the Crown Prince and several Fascist ministers, he went to Naples to review the Italian "volunteers" who fought for Franco in Spain.

On June 10, 1940, the Italian ambassadors in London and Paris presented to the British and French governments the following declaration: "His Majesty the King Emperor announces that beginning tomorrow, June 11, Italy considers herself to be in a state of war with France and England." The monarchy must share with Fascism the responsibility for this declaration. Had the King wished to keep out of the war, he could have dismissed Mussolini at that moment. Not only did he follow Mussolini's lead, but he transferred to him the king's constitutional rights as supreme commander of the armed forces.

On May 22, 1943, on the occasion of the anniversary of the Tripartite Pact, the King sent a message to Hitler expressing his best wishes "for the prosperity and greatness of the German people, in the certainty that victory will not fail our arms." This was after the collapse in Africa and but a few months before the armistice with the Allies was signed.

The Prince of Piedmont, now Lieutenant General of the Realm, has been no less Fascist than his father. He has, of course, been practically helpless since 1925, when the Grand Council of Fascism took upon itself the power to determine the succession to the throne. That meant that, on the death of the King, Mussolini would allow the Prince of Piedmont to ascend the throne only if he had given proof of being a good Fascist. Umberto tried his very best. In 1936 he decided to dedicate himself to military life and asked, though in vain, to be sent to fight in Ethiopia. On May 23, 1938, he telegraphed Mussolini: "Duce . . . I want you to know that the Italian grenadiers, as citizens and as soldiers, are ever ready to obey your orders, in peace time as in a glorious war for the imperial greatness of the Fascist motherland." (The Prince, like the King, always spoke of the "Fascist" motherland or "Fascist" Italy.) By 1940 the Prince was in command of the Northern Army Group, and it was left to him to carry out the "stab in the back" against France. On that occasion he sent another telegram to Mussolini: "While moving toward certain victory, the troops of the western armies renew their solemn pledge to the untiring leader who molds the glorious destinies of the fatherland, and promise to dare anything in order to march in the footsteps of the Roman legions."

When Mussolini fell, in July, 1943, all the Prince was able to do, before his flight, was to warn his soldiers against anti-German demonstrations. In a secret order he reminded them that the war must go on, and that it was "not only inadmissible but inconceivable that Italian soldiers should fail in their duty of comradeship toward the ally which, with absolute loyalty, fights on our side for the defense of the sacred soil of our fatherland."

But Umberto seems to be a fellow who likes everybody. Did he not declare to Michael Chinigo of the I. N. S. on April 14, 1944, that "America and Americans have always been very close to my heart, even when I could not say so"?

The other members of the House of Savoy have also given their support to Fascism. Two princes of royal blood—the Duke of Pistoia and the Duke of Bergamo—fought in Africa during the Ethiopian war. Another, the Duke of Spoleto, consented to become the King of Croatia but never dared to set foot in his kingdom. During the campaign for the liberation of Ethiopia in this war, the Italian army was led by the Duke of Aosta, who had been named viceroy of Ethiopia by Mussolini.

ALLIED PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE

Officially, Allied policy with respect to Italy was defined two months after the armistice at the Moscow conference. On November 1, 1943, the Foreign Secretaries of America, Russia, and England issued a special declaration stating that the "Allied policy toward Italy must be based upon the fundamental principle that Fascism and all its evil influences and emanations shall be utterly destroyed and that the Italian people shall be given every opportunity to establish governmental and other institutions based upon democratic principles." The declaration added that "it is further understood that nothing in this resolution is to operate against the right of the Italian people ultimately to choose their own form of government." The Foreign Secretaries of the United States and Great Britain affirmed that "the action of their governments from the inception of the invasion of Italian territory, in so far as paramount military requirements have permitted, has been based upon this policy."

These principles have been repeatedly reaffirmed, though always theoretically, by the Allied leaders. In practice the Allies have consistently strengthened the monarchy's political machine.

Secret directives from the Minister of the Navy, the super-monarchist De Courten, request all officers to watch closely sailors suspected of being members of "radical" parties, to use agents provocateurs to identify such sailors, to neutralize efficiently and firmly all anti-monarchist ideas spread among the crews by newspapers and pamphlets, to convince all sailors that the King has saved Italy and that if there were no king the Americans would not give Italy any money or raw materials. No purge of the navy has been allowed. The ministry's special commission for the purge is headed by Admiral Giuseppe Fioravanzo, a former ardent Fascist who in August, 1943—after Mussolini's fall, when the Allied armies were in Sicily—wrote, "We are fighting to demolish the British empire and to prevent American gangsterism and Soviet banditry from taking its place."

On February 20, 1945, fifty sailors invaded the premises of the Socialist paper Avanti in protest against an article criticizing the officers and the administration of the naval ordnance unit in Rome. The demonstration was organized by a certain Commander Zanardi, and some two hundred sailors received special leave to take part in it.

Most of the professional army officers are also props for the monarchy. A democratic Italy would have no use for men who instead of defending their country against the Germans fled from Rome with the King after the armistice.

For this reason their careers depend upon the existence of the monarchy. It is not hard to imagine how the soldiers feel about being commanded by Mussolini's generals. General Arnaldo Azzi, who was expelled from the army when he advocated its complete overhauling, told Edward Johnson of the Chicago Sun that it had not been possible to reorganize the army "because they tried to reorganize it on the old basis—as a personal army of the monarchy—whereas the sentiments of the soldiers and the people are against the monarchy. The men are reluctant to answer the call-ups because they are required to swear allegiance to the King." Many of the King's generals who were held as prisoners of war in Africa, India, America, and Great Britain were sent back to Italy, not to fight against the Germans but simply to bolster the monarchy. When genuine anti-Fascists in exile ask to be repatriated, they are told that there is no shipping space available.

Army as well as navy officers have repeatedly allowed their men to commit acts of violence against anti-monarchist elements. In Avelino a major of the Italian army, followed by soldiers, entered the offices of a paper which had dared to demand the immediate abdication of the King and smashed furniture, destroyed type faces, and abused the editor" (Associated Press, November 18, 1943).

Almost every day the Italian press reports incidents in which the Carabinieri have intervened against republican elements. Just recently the Carabinieri went to the headquarters of the Republican Party in Grosseto, smashed windows where anti-monarchist manifestos were displayed and destroyed everything. The passers-by protested vigorously against this violation of democratic freedom, and the Carabinieri, threatening to use their submachine-guns, retreated to their barracks followed by the crowd. Only the energetic intervention of democratic leaders and of some AMG officials prevented bloodshed. I could cite many similar occurrences.

The provincial governors (prefetti) with their almost dictatorial powers are an important part of the monarchist machine. The prefetto names the mayors, the members of the city councils, and all the commissioners of the towns and villages in his province. He controls the police. The entire economic administration of the province is in his hands. He appoints all local committees for the purge of Fascists. In all provinces still under Allied administration the prefetto controls activities outside his jurisdiction on the ground that the approval of the AMG gives legality to his acts.

Should Fascism really be eliminated in Italy, the monarchy would go with it. That explains why the purge in southern Italy has been such a mockery. The trial of persons responsible for the fall of Rome has been categorically forbidden by the Allies in order not to indict the King and his generals. Even the trial of General Mario Roatta and other accomplices of Fascism was limited to their activities prior to the declaration of war. If General Roatta had told what he knew about the flight from Rome, the monarchy would have been irreparably compromised; his silence was assured by letting him escape. Up to the present twenty-nine persons have been brought before the High Court of Justice, and on only one has the death sentence been passed. It has been officially revealed that the High Commission for the Purging of Fascist Crimes has investigated 4,854 cases, of which 4,451 have been referred to the judicial authorities, regular or military; only 138 of these cases have been completed. It was because the partisans in the north were perfectly aware of this policy that they hurried to deal with many thousand Fascists before the arrival of the Allies.

Drawing by Lilly Ross
Prince Umberto

Great Britain wishes to have the monarchy well entrenched before the Constituent Assembly is elected. The monarchists have never liked the idea of referring the institutional question to the decision of a Constituent Assembly. They would prefer a plebiscite, which is so much easier to manipulate. Unfortunately a Constituent Assembly can also be manipulated, although the matter is not quite so simple. If all the organs of local government are in the hands of the monarchists, nobody can guarantee that the elections will be conducted without compulsion and that the returns will be respected. Furthermore, under the present conditions of misery, it would be easy for the Fascists in the south, most of whom have not been purged, to buy the votes of the hungry people. Let us not forget that the Fascists made a lot of money under Mussolini.

The people cannot choose the form of government they prefer when the monarchy controls all the political machinery. A compromise is what Britain offers the Italian people. A revolution may be the answer.

AMG CONTROL

It has been easy for the Allies to enforce their Italian policy through the Allied Control Commission and the Allied Military Government. The situation that prevailed up to February, 1945, was described as follows by Anne O'Hare McCormick in a dispatch from Rome to the New York Times (August 23, 1944):

There is no doubt we are ruling Italy. Somewhere in the picture is an Italian government. . . . [The ministers'] chief desire is to be allowed to share responsibility with the Allies in administering their country. So far they are pretty helpless. The armistice terms provide that no decision can be made by Italian authorities without Allied permission. A consul cannot be transferred or a bureau head appointed unless the proposed action is referred to the Control Commission. This is true in the economic as well as in the political field. We froze the stockpiles remaining in the country after the German withdrawal, and no factory can be reopened and no goods released without an Allied permit.

In February, 1945, the British Resident Minister for the Central Mediterranean, Harold MacMillan, announced that the Allied Commission was to become an organ of "consultation and advice" and that the government would be left free to carry on its functions except for matters related to military operations. Britain could well afford this gesture, for the monarchist machine was dependent on its support.

As for the policy followed from the very beginning by the AMG, Sir Richard Acland, addressing the House of Commons on May 24, 1944, said:

There is not one man in any influential position in AMG whose past record shows that he understood and opposed Fascism before September, 1939. The supreme disqualification for the work of restoring order to the peoples who have been saved from Fascism appears to be the fact that you understood what Fascism meant when a good many honorable members opposite were hobnobbing with it. How do these people behave? The first thing they do is to get hold of the Carabinieri Reali, who of all Italian organized bodies have the highest record of complete collaboration not merely with Mussolini but with Hitler and the Nazis. They then parade in front of the representatives of the Carabinieri Reali those prisoners who were released by the front-line troops, and these agents of Nazidom decide which of the political prisoners shall go back to jail. The complete administration of the whole district is then handed over to the nominee of the Carabinieri Reali, and the result is that the civil administration of Sicily and now of southern Italy has fallen into the hands of the most disreputable Fascist gangsters.

LINE-UP OF POLITICAL PARTIES

In spite of their efforts the Allies have not succeeded in selling the monarchy to the Italian people—not even in those parts of Italy which the Allied armies have occupied for more than a year. In southern and central Italy, from Sicily to Florence, the main Italian parties are the Socialists, Christian Democrats, Communists, Democracy of Labor, Liberal Party, Action Party, and Republicans. Of these the Socialists, the Action Party, the Communists, and the Republicans are outspoken anti-monarchists; the Christian Democrats are divided between monarchists and anti-monarchists. Only Bonomi's Democracy of Labor and Croce's Liberal Party favor a compromise with the monarchy. The Socialists, under the leadership of Pietro Nenni, and the Communists, under the leadership of Palmiro Togliatti, differ only on the method of opposing the monarchy as an institution. The Communist Party is at present the less radical, favoring a postponement of the question until some time after the war, while the Socialists, who did not join the second Bonomi government, are violently opposed to the King and his henchmen. The Christian Democrats, the Socialists, and the Communists have the greatest number of followers. The Action Party does not claim mass support but is very active. It is a continuation of the Giustizia e Libertà movement created in France by Carlo Rosselli and derives its strength mainly from the intellectual bourgeoisie. The Italian Republican Party, which does not belong to the Committee of Liberation, has always kept alive the institutional question even when other leftist parties were mainly interested in the amelioration of economic and social conditions. Among its leaders is Colonel Randolfo Pacciardi, who led the Italian volunteers against Franco in the Spanish civil war. The monarchists are organized in a so-called Party of Italian Democracy, sponsored by army officers, the aristocrats, the Catholic high clergy, and of course the British.

[The concluding section of this article will appear next week.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

Ernie Pyle

BY RANDALL JARRELL

HE WROTE like none of the rest. The official, press-agent, advertising-agency writing that fills the newspapers, magazines, and radio with its hearty reassuring lies, its mechanical and heartless superlatives; the rhetorical, sensational, and professional pieces of ordinary Time-Life journalism—the same no matter what the subject, who the writer; the condescending, preoccupied work of “real writers” officially pretending to be correspondents for the duration: all this writing about the war that by its quality denies the nature and even the existence of the war, he neither competed with nor was affected by. He was affected by, obsessed with, one thing—the real war: that is, the people in it, all those private wars the imaginary sum of which is the public war; and he knew that his private war, his compulsive obligation, was to write what he had seen and heard and felt so that neither those who had felt it nor those who had not could ever again believe that it was necessary for anyone to be ignorant of it. He was their witness; and he looked not to find evidence for his own theories or desires, to condemn, to explain away, to justify, but only to see, and to tell what he saw. What he cared about was the facts. But facts are only facts as we see them, as we feel them; and he knew to what a degree experience—especially in war—is “seeing only faintly and not wanting to see at all.” The exactly incongruous, the crazily prosaic, the finally convincing fact—that must be true because no one could have made it up, that must be Pyle because no one else would have noticed it—was his technical obsession, because he knew it was only by means of it that he could make us understand his moral obsession: what happens to men in our war. (A few reporters cared almost as much and tried almost as hard; but their work is hurt by emotional forcing, self-consciousness, the hopeless strain between their material and their technique. To the reporter’s trained consciousness there is something incidental, merely personal, almost meretricious, about his exact emotions or perceptions or moral judgments; these things are not part of “the facts,” and he professionally supplies only as much of their generalized, familiar equivalents as his readers immediately demand and immediately accept. These things, for many years, had been the only facts for Pyle.) Pyle did not care how he told it if he could make us feel it; there is neither self-protectiveness nor self-exploitation in his style. What he saw and what he felt he said. He used for ordinary narration a plain, transparent, but oddly personal style—a style that could convince anybody of anything; but when his perceptions or emotions were complex, far-reaching, and profound, he did his utmost to express their quality fully—at his best with the most exact intensity, at his worst with a rather appealingly old-fashioned spaciousness of rhetoric. It is easy to be critical of some of these last passages, and of the flat homeliness of others: he possessed few of the unessential qualities of the accomplished writer but—at his rare best—many of the essential qualities of the great writer. It was puzzling and disheartening to read some of the reviews of his books: the insistence that this was not “great” reporting, the work of a “real” writer, but only a good reporter, a good man—nobody missed that—reproducing what the “G. I. Joes” felt and said. (Some writers seemed compelled to use about him, as they do about all soldiers who are at the same time enlisted men, the words simple, plain, or little—so disquieting in their revelation of the writers’ knowledge and values.) And yet all of us knew better. We felt most the moral qualities of his work and life; but we could not help realizing that his work was, in our time, an unprecedented aesthetic triumph: because of it most of the people of a country felt, in the fullest moral and emotional sense, something that had never happened to them, that they could never have imagined without it—a war.

In war the contradictions of our world, latent or overt, are fantastically exaggerated; and what in peace struggles below consciousness in the mind of an economist, in war wipes out a division on atolls on the other side of a planet. So in Pyle war is the nest of all contradictions; the incongruous is the commonplace homogeneous texture of all life. All of them know it: a cannoneer, playing poker by two candles in a silent battery, says to him “as though talking in his sleep,” “War is the craziest thing I ever heard of.” A man builds a raft to float on the water of his foxhole; another goes to sleep, falls over in the water, and wakes up, until he finally ties himself by a rope to a tree; four officers of a tank company fix themselves a dugout with electric lights, a pink stove, an overstuffed chair, and “a big white dog, slightly shell-shocked, to lie on the hearth.” Men in shallow foxholes, under severe strafing, try to dig deeper with their fingernails, are commonly “hit in the behind by flying fragments from shells. The medics there on the battlefield would either cut the seats out of their trousers or else slide their pants down, to treat the wounds, and they were put on the stretchers that way, lying face down. It was almost funny to see so many men coming down the hill with the white skin of their backsides gleaming against the dark background of brown uniforms and green grass.” Pyle “couldn’t help feeling funny about” fighter pilots who had just strafed a truck convoy, and who, “so full of laughter . . . talked about their flighis and killing and being killed exactly as they would discuss girls or their school lessons.” Soldiers pile out of their jeeps for an approaching bird, thinking it a Stuka (“I knew one American outfit that was attacked by Stukas twenty-three times in one day. A little of that stuff goes a long way”); and a digger testifies, with utter magnificence: “Five years ago you couldn't have got me to dig a ditch for five dollars an hour. Now look at me. You can't stop me digging ditches. I don't even want pay for it; I just dig for love. And I sure do hope this digging today is all wasted effort, I never wanted to do useless work so bad in all my life. Any time I get fifty feet from my home ditch you'll find me digging a new ditch and, brother, I ain't joking. I love to dig ditches." And yet it is a war where "few ever saw the enemy, ever shot at him, or were shot at by him"; where "physical discomfort becomes a more dominant thing in life than danger itself"; where everything is so scarce that passing soldiers stop Pyle six times in a day to borrow a pair of scissors to cut their nails—"if somebody had offered me a bottle of castor oil I would have accepted it and hidden it away."

Pyle is always conscious of the shocking disparity of actor and circumstance, of the little men and their big war, their big world: riding in a truck in the middle of the night, so cold he has to take off his shoes and hold his toes in his hands before he can go to sleep, he feels shiveringly "the immensity of the catastrophe that had put men all over the world, millions of us, to moving in machine-like precision through long nights—men who should have been comfortably asleep in their warm beds at home. War makes strange giant creatures out of us little routine men that inhabit the earth." And, flying from the Anzio beachhead to D-Day in the Channel, passing at sunset over the peaks of the Atlas, he thinks longingly of the worlds inside the world: "Down below lived sheep men—obscure mountain men who had never heard of a Nebelwerfer or a bazooka, men at home at the end of the day in the poor, narrow, beautiful security of their own walls." His column describing the apotheosis of another world, the debris of the Normandy beachhead, is so extraordinary in its sensitivity, observation, and imagination that I wish I could quote all of it; but, taken at random from "this long thin line of personal anguish": from the sleeping, dead, and floating men; from the water "full of squishy little jellyfish . . . in the center of each of them a green design exactly like a four-leaf clover"; from the ruined tanks, trucks, bulldozers, half-tracks, typewriters, office files, steel matting, and oranges—a banjo and a tennis racket; from the dogs, Bibles, mirrors, cigarette cartons (each soldier was given a carton of cigarettes before embarking), and writing-paper of that universe where "anything and everything is expendable," here are two objects:

I stooped over the form of one youngster whom I thought dead. But when I looked down I saw that he was only sleeping. He was very young, and very tired. He lay on one elbow, his hand suspended in the air about six inches from the ground. And in the palm of his hand he held a large, smooth rock.

I stood and looked at him for a long time. He seemed in his sleep to hold that rock lovingly, as though it were his last link with a vanishing world. . . .

As I plowed out over the wet sand, I walked around what seemed to be a couple of pieces of driftwood sticking out of the sand. But they weren't driftwood. They were a soldier's two feet. He was completely covered except for his feet; the toes of his G. I. shoes pointed toward the land he had come so far to see, and which he saw so briefly.

Yet their war's grotesque unnaturalness finally becomes for them a grotesque naturalness, all that they have known or done—except for that endlessly dwelt-on fantasy that was before and may be after the war, their civilian lives and families and home. Pyle one night—back in one world after weeks in the other—"never wide awake, never deeply asleep," thinks fitfully: "One world was a beautiful dream and the other a horrible nightmare, and I was a little bit in each of them. As I lay on the straw in the darkness they became mixed up, and I was not quite sure which was which." From his long experience of front-line troops, divisions used steadily for months or years, he creates calmly and objectively and prosaically—under their jokes and addresses and grammatical errors, the speech of the farms and garages of America—their extraordinary suffering: the "endlessness of everything," their "state of exhaustion that is incomprehensible . . . past the point of known human weariness . . . one dull, dead pattern—yesterday is tomorrow and Troino is Randazzo and when will we ever stop and, God, I'm so tired." He and an officer look at some muddy, exhausted troops and decide "they haven't been up in the line at all." They don't have "that stare" of front-line troops. Pyle continues: "It's a look of dulness, eyes that look without seeing, eyes that see without conveying any image to the mind. It's a look that is the display room for what lies behind it—exhaustion, lack of sleep, tension for too long, weariness that is too great, fear beyond fear, misery to the point of numbness, a look of surpassing indifference to anything anybody can do." Nobody else makes you feel so their long dreary suffering, everything going on past not only their own lives but the lives of their replacements, until a whole division is "only a numbered mechanism through which men pass"; you remember Mauldin's bearded and filthy soldier, so exhausted he looks middle-aged, staring at his rifle and saying to it slowly: "I've given you the best years of my life."

And these are not professional soldiers but only ordinary people: we feel behind every word the ironic pathos of what they are doing and what they are, of the threadbare shiny scraps that are all that remain to them of the old life they hope their way back to, from this dream where they lie "shooting at the darkness from out of the dark." These scraps—jobs, families, and states—repeated with the same perpetual heart-breaking plainness to the listening Pyle, are a bridge pushed back shakily to their real lives; and he understands and puts down what they tell him, always; and the foolish think it a silly habit of his. Even his generals seem human, as he tells how one is waked: the sentry kneeling beside the general, asleep on the ground in his long underwear, repeating softly, "General, sir, general, sir." The desperate antinomies of war are held together by their common ground, the people who endure them: in the foreground, overshadowing the great convulsions, the appalling strengths, are always "the individual cells of that strength"—their stubbornly and precariously stable commonplaceness, their wonderful pathetic persistence in all they can keep of their old understanding and lives and world. If there are few of the regular heroes, there are many of Pyle's: men chosen by chance, sent out "across the ageless and indifferent sea," doing determinedly and unwillingly what they have to do, heroic if they have to be, and not for a public cause but for their own private moral obligations—fighting “for . . . for . . . well, at least for each other.” So Pyle stays with them year after year and finally dies with them, because of them—the lives that, with their pets, their dreams of after and before, their pictures of their children and wives and girls, their intermittent unending exhaustion and suffering and despair, inch out their marginal existence under the 88’s.

Nobody else in the world but Pyle makes you feel so intensely sorry for them, makes you feel how entirely against their will and aside from their understanding it all happens. The terrible particulars of their misery, of this catastrophe beyond anything they could have deserved or even imagined, drive home to anybody who can understand anything the final moral contradiction of such a war: that though from it come, along with suffering and brutality and death, courage and stubborn endurance and sacrifice, people’s real love for one another—all these things have their price; and this price is so much too great that it is absolutely incommensurable. Though our victory in this war is better than our defeat, though there is a difference between the two sides that is essential, still what has to be done, the actual substance of the war, is almost entirely evil. The sergeant says to Pyle about the replacements: “I know it ain’t my fault they get killed, and I do the best I can for them. But I’ve got so I feel like it’s me killing ‘em instead of a German. I’ve got so I feel like a murderer.” For Pyle, to the end, killing was murder: but he saw the murderers die themselves.

His condemnation of war seems to the reader more nearly final than any other, because in him there is no exaggeration, no hysteria, no selection to make out a case, no merely personal emotion unrecognized as such; he has nothing to prove. He has written down all that is favorable or indifferent—his readers have noticed this most, the commonplace courage and endurance and affection of his soldiers; but after all this his condemnation is so complete, detailed, brought home to us so absolutely, that it is unforgettable and unarguable. This proper evaluation of things, his calm, detachment, and objectivity (some of his most humorous and equable columns were written while he himself was in the depths of frustration and revulsion) help to give his work its serious truth.

Here are the soldiers of this war:

I was sitting among clumps of sword grass on a steep and rocky hillside that we had just taken, looking out over a vast rolling country to the rear. A narrow path wound like a ribbon over a hill miles away, down a long slope, across a creek, up a slope, and over another hill. All along the length of that ribbon there was a thin line of men. For four days and nights they had fought hard, eaten little, washed none, and slept hardly at all. Their nights had been violent with attack, fright, butchery, their days sleepless and miserable with the crash of artillery.

The men were walking. They were fifty feet apart for dispersal. Their walk was slow, for they were dead weary, as a person could tell even when looking at them from behind. Every line and sag of their bodies spoke their inhuman exhaustion. On their shoulders and backs they carried heavy steel tripods, machine-gun barrels, leaden boxes of ammunition. Their feet seemed to sink into the ground from the overload they were bearing.

They didn’t slouch. It was the terrible deliberation of each step that spelled out their appalling tiredness. Their faces were black and unshaved. They were young men, but the grime and whiskers and exhaustion made them look middle-aged. In their eyes as they passed was no hatred, no excitement, no despair, no tonic of their victory—there was just a simple expression of being there as if they had been there doing that forever, and nothing else.

This is how they die:

When a man was almost gone, the surgeons would put a piece of gauze over his face. He could breathe through it but we couldn’t see his face well.

Twice within five minutes chaplains came running. One of those occasions haunted me for hours. The wounded man was still semi-conscious. The chaplain knelt down beside him and two ward boys squatted nearby. The chaplain said, “John, I’m going to say a prayer for you.”

Somehow this stark announcement hit me like a hammer. He didn’t say, “I’m going to pray for you to get well”; he just said he was going to say a prayer, and it was obvious to me that he meant the final prayer. It was as though he had said, “Brother, you may not know it, but your goose is cooked.” Anyhow, he voiced the prayer, and the weak, gasping man tried vainly to repeat the words after him. When he had finished, the chaplain added, “John, you’re doing fine, you’re doing fine.” Then he rose and dashed off on some other call, and the ward boys went about their duties.

The dying man was left utterly alone, just lying there on his litter on the ground, lying in an aisle, because the tent was full.

There are many passages in Pyle that, in their extraordinary intensity and exactness of observation and presentation, seem to the reader to have reached a pure truth of statement. (When we read his famous column about the dead Captain Waskow we are no longer separated from the actual event by anything at all.) In the hospital tent he sees that all the wounded and dying look alike, their faces reduced to a “common denominator” by dirt and suffering and exhaustion—except for any extremely fair soldier, who looks like “a flower in a row of weeds.” As the bombs from hundreds of our heavy bombers were falling toward Pyle (by that mistake that killed General McNair and hundreds of other Americans), he heard how “the universe became filled with a gigantic rattling as of huge ripe seeds in a mammoth dry gourd”; he and a stranger wriggled desperately under a farm wagon, and waiting for the bombs already exploding around them, he saw that “we lay with our heads slightly up—like two snakes—staring at each other.” Is there any imaginable way in which the next quotation could be altered?

Our fighters moved on after the enemy, and those who did not fight, but moved in the wake of the battles, would not catch up for hours. There was nothing left behind but the remains—the lifeless debris, the sunshine and the flowers, and utter silence. An amateur who wandered in this vacuum at the rear of a battle had a terrible sense of loneliness. Everything was dead—the men, the machines, the animals—and he alone was left alive.

I do not need to write about Pyle's humor and honesty and understanding, all the precious and "human" qualities—this use of human seems an inexorable rationalization, a part of the permanent false consciousness of humanity—that no reader has missed. Along with them there is the charm of those frailties which he insisted on so much. He told beautifully, and often, how scared he was (Lord, but I felt lonely out there); but his extraordinary courage—no, his ordinary courage, the courage which, as he showed endlessly, had to be ordinary for millions of men—his readers could only guess, from the long voluntary succession of those situations he was so scared in. His steady humility and self-forgetfulness—without any of the usual veneration of the self for what it is forgetting—were reinforced by his peculiarly objective amusement at his own relation to the world. (When he landed on Okinawa he borrowed a combat jacket with U. S. Navy on the back. Later a marine told him: "You know, when you first showed up, we saw that big Navy stenciled on your back, and after you passed I said to the others: 'That guy's an admiral. Look at the old gray-haired bastard. He's been in the navy all his life. He'll get a medal out of this sure as hell.'") His affectionate amused understanding and acceptance of all sorts and levels of people come from his imaginative and undeviating interest in, observation of, these people; he is as unwilling to look away from them because they do not fit his understanding of them as he is to reject them because they do not satisfy the exacting standards he keeps for himself.

He was very much more complex than most people suppose; and his tragedy—a plain fatality hung over the last of his life, and one is harrowed by his unresigned I've used up my chances—was not at all that of the simple homogeneous nature destroyed by circumstances it is superior to. People notice how well he got along with people and the world, and talk as if he were the extrovert who naturally does so; actually he was precisely, detailedly, and unremittingly introspective, and the calm objectivity of his columns is a classical device—his own confused and powerful spiritual life always underlies it, and gives it much of its effect. This contradictory struggle between his public and private selves, between the controlled, objective selectivity of the pieces and his own intense inner life, one must guess from fragments or the remarks of those who knew him best; it is partly because this one side of him is incompletely represented in his work that one regrets his death so much.

His writing, like his life, is a victory of the deepest moral feeling, of sympathy and understanding and affection, over circumstances as terrible as any men have created and endured. By the veneration and real love many millions of people felt for him, their unexplained certainty that he was different from all the rest, and theirs, they showed their need and gratitude for the qualities of his nature, and seemed almost to share in them. He was a bitter personal loss for these people. Most of his readers could not escape the illusion that he was a personal friend of theirs; actually he was—we meet only a few people in our lives whom we ever know as well or love as much. There are many men whose profession it is to speak for us—political and military and literary representatives of that unwithering estate which has told us all our lives what we feel and what we think, how to live and when to die; he wrote what he had seen and heard and felt himself, and truly represented us. Before his last landing in the Ryukyus, he felt not only fear and revulsion, but an overwhelming premonition that he would die there: "repeatedly he said he knew he would be killed if he hit another beachhead. Before he finally settled the question of whether or not to go ashore in his own mind, he spent three sleepless days and nights. Then on the fourth day he made up his mind." He told a good friend, "Now I feel all right again"; to other people he said merely that he didn't want to go there, but he guessed the others didn't either. He had to an extraordinary degree the sense of responsibility to the others, the knowledge of his own real duty, that special inescapable demand that is made—if it is made—to each of us alone. In one sense he died freely, for others; in another he died of necessity and for himself. He had said after visiting the lepers in the Hawaiian Islands: "I felt a kind of unrighteousness at being whole and 'clean.' I experienced an acute feeling of spiritual need to be no better off than the leper."

After he died I saw, as most people did, a newsreel of him taken in the Pacific. He is surrounded by marines trying to get his autograph, and steadies on the cropped head of one of them the paper he is signing. He seems unconscious of himself and the camera; his face is humorous, natural, and kindly, but molded by the underlying seriousness, almost severity, of private understanding and judgment. I remembered what the girl in "The Woodlanders" says over another grave: "You were a good man, and did good things." But it is hard to say what he was or what we felt about him. He filled a place in our lives that we hardly knew existed, until he was there; and now that he is gone it is empty.

BRIEFER COMMENT

A New Spirit

RICARDO ROJAS'S turgid and uneven book, "San Martín, Knight of the Andes," (Doubleday, Doran, $3.50), has a fourfold importance. It is one of the few biographies of this great South American liberator which is available in English. Written by the dean of Argentine letters a dozen years ago, it tells us almost as much about the mirror as about the mirrored. Third, it comes at a time when the process of fighting to free peoples from tyranny is again honored and to be understood. And, fourth, it sheds light on happenings in Spain and Spanish America today, when men again write as they did in 1792, "Spain is become ripe for freedom. It is necessary to make this revolution both in European and American Spain."

José de San Martín, "Generalissimo of the Republic of Peru and founder of her liberty, Captain General of Chile and Brigadier of the Argentine Confederation," was born of Spanish parents in Argentina in 1778. Taken back to Spain at seven, he was at eleven enrolled as a cadet in the Murcia regiment. For twenty years he fought Spain's battles. At thirty-three, a colonel, he left the moribund monarchy, in disguise, went back to Argentina, and put his great

MISS JULIE AND MISS TESSIE were two vigorous and eccentric old ladies who lived in Charleston, S. C., in 1910. The story of their troubles and adventures is "delightful, a gentle satire on Charleston's pride of social position giving a wise, mellow coherence to what would be, otherwise, just an amusing and entertaining genre picture... of an extraordinarily real American family."—Book-of-the-Month Club News. $2.75

Over half a million copies in print, including the Literary Guild.

The autobiography of a great American

The center of many controversies and crusades, the late Senator Norris was an outstanding figure on the American scene. With characteristic warmth, simplicity, and honesty, he has set down the record of his beginnings, his active years, his accomplishments and beliefs. His first-hand story sums up the history of our immediate past and throws light on many problems of today and tomorrow. $3.50

An important problem of our times—the paralysis of creative power which war brings to many intellectuals—is treated in this mature and thoughtful novel of contemporary Australia. It is about a writer, his brilliant sister, his neurotic wife, his two daughters, and a disturbing girl who lived in a dreamland she had created from the scenes of his own childhood. $2.75

The MACMILLAN COMPANY

Here is an arresting book which explains contemporary Argentina in terms of her history, with complete honesty and detachment. "Illuminating and remarkably well-written... it accurately portrays beneath the current of various political differences, the deep waters of industrial and economic conflict."—Philadelphia Inquirer. $4.00 military skill at the service of people revolting against Spanish rule.

Just what it was that converted him to the cause of liberty the author does not sufficiently examine. "Bourbon regalism, French encyclopedism, and British liberalism created a new spirit," says Señor Rojas, and lets it go at that. His real interest lies in San Martín's later life.

For North American readers, many of them meeting San Martín in these pages for the first time, the book takes far too many things for granted. It is highly subjective, very much concerned with its hero's illnesses, his fidelity to his child wife, his austerity of life and saintliness of soul. That San Martín managed to equip and lead a native army over the high passes of the Andes and defeat larger Spanish forces in Chile seems out of character. Perhaps he was, as this author pictures him, a melancholy mystic, a "saint of the sword" afflicted with stomach ulcers. Or perhaps the distemper of romanticism has lingered too long in modern Argentina, and stained the image with green mold.

The translators, Heschel Brickell and Carlos Videla, are to be congratulated on their skill in quieting purple passages and rendering tortuous prose into readable English.

MILDRED ADAMS

Back to Manchester

LOUIS MARLIO has combined the careers of successful business man, scholar, statesman, and teacher to an extent which is rare in Europe, almost non-existent in the United States. And while it might not be wholly unexpected in these days to find that a man who was for thirteen years chairman of the International Aluminum Cartel is now associated with the Brookings Institution in Washington, it is still surprising that he has deserved his present position because he was also formerly professor of economics at the Paris École des Sciences Politiques.

He is the author of a number of books, the first of which, "German Policy and International Waterways," was published in 1907. His latest, "Can Democracy Recover?" (Doubleday, Doran, $2), was printed in French in 1943 under the title of "La Révolution d'hier, d'aujourd'hui et de demain." The primary emphasis, however, is on the French Revolution of 1789.

The author's cure for democracy's present plight is a combination of return to the principles of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, and economic liberalism of the Manchester

School. His diagnosis of the ways in which not only France but all the other nations that make up Western civilization strayed from the original revolutionary principles is scholarly, persuasive, and illuminating. But although he is far less extreme than Friedrich Hayek in his devotion to economic orthodoxy, his book is no more convincing than "The Road to Serfdom" in its thesis that a slightly modified laissez faire economy, plus the social good-will represented by the revolutionary slogan, would bring out all that is best in the best of possible worlds.

One of the most insidious arguments of the defenders of nineteenth-century capitalism is that its defects should be cured by moral suasion rather than by political action. Marlio presents this argument with considerable brilliance, and many of his comments are well worth reading, but he still fails to demonstrate that if all business men were made completely free to pursue their own selfish interests, their combined efforts would automatically produce the greatest good for the greatest number.

CHARLES E. NOYES

Minorities in America

MORE THAN HALF of "One America," edited by Francis J. Brown and Joseph Slabey Roucek (Prentice-Hall, $5), deals with "contributions" of minority peoples to American civilization as evaluated by scholars of uneven abilities. They grant nodding recognition to the newest approach which stresses minority "participation" when they use such subheadings as cultural differentiation, assimilation, and acculturation. Although space limitations do not permit full treatment of these significant themes, the various contributors take less than full advantage of the scope afforded them. Important aspects of the social and economic history of minority peoples are omitted, and the best sources are not always utilized. Some of the contributors adopt a filio-pietistic tone. Writing of the Irish, A. J. Reilly refers to various aspects of "Celtic genius," very unjustifiably denies a distinct Scotch-Irish contribution (apparently the editors agree—shades of Andrew Jackson!), ignores such a study as Oscar Handlin's "Boston's Immigrants," while affording full scope to the views of the jingoes of the American-Irish Historical Society. A. B. Faust, whose historical work has won the approbation of the Steuben Society, contributes a comparable article on the German element. On the other hand, the reader will be interested in what information there is on such minorities as Estonian, Hindu, Turkish, and Armenian Americans.

Somewhat better is the section dealing with Activities of Minority Groups. Stressing recent and even contemporary developments, the editors are sure that the war has had a unifying effect upon the American peoples. "We have become and will remain one America!" Such a conclusion is borne out neither by these chapters nor by events not covered by them. The last two sections comprise for the most part routine discussions of the origin and nature of group conflict and methods of combating it. The complacent tone of some of these surveys would belie the need of the present moment, which is a new methodology of combating prejudice.

Because of its comprehensiveness "One America" is a convenient and in many respects a useful volume. It could have been a better one.

EDWARD N. SAVETH

THE JEFFERSON SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE Invites you to attend a FORUM

"SAN FRANCISCO...AND AFTER"

What the International Organization for World Peace and Progress will mean . . .

TO INDUSTRY: CHARLES PACK, Vice-President, Doehler-Jarvis Corp.

TO LABOR: JAMES McLEISH, General Vice-President, U.E.R.M.W.A.

TO MINORITIES: DR. LAURENCE D. REDDICK, Curator, Schomburg Collection, New York Public Library

TO COMMUNISTS: EARL BROWDER, President, Communist Political Association

TO LIBERALS: DR. J. MAX WEIS, Director of Research—World Peaceways

FRIDAY, MAY 25th — 8:30 P.M.

TOWN HALL, 113 West Forty-third Street

ADMISSION 90c TO $1.20 • ALL SEATS RESERVED

TICKETS AVAILABLE NOW AT:

Jefferson School, 6th Avenue at 10th Street, N. Y. C. 11
Town Hall Box Office, 113 West 43rd Street, N. Y. C. 18.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

ART lovers yearn now for the Terrible. If any art is going to be allowed to take such liberties with nature as modern art does, then it ought to repay us with emotion—shake and scare us the way titans like Michelangelo do. What is involved is really the Sublime, but the term is a little ashamed of itself by now and is excluded from the careful cant of contemporary writing on art and literature. Nevertheless, the Terrible of our time (it is even better form to call it the "disquieting") proves just as hollow in the end as the Sublime of the romantics.

The same taste that feels the cubists to have sacrificed "emotional content" to "intellectualism" and "technique" discovers a latter-day titan in Rouault and is overcome by his "volcanic force." No one who visits Rouault's large show at the Museum of Modern Art (through June 3) can fail to discern a remarkable painter, see several very effective pictures, and recognize a quantity of genius. Yet that remarkable painter is not a great or a major artist. The quietness that unfailingly characterizes great painting does not enter here as it enters into some of the most agitated of Tintoretto's and Delacroix's works—where, as elsewhere, it testifies to the artist's triumph over the medium, and the medium's final acquiescence.

The fault with Rouault does not lie precisely in the extruded emotion or in the bombast, but rather in a lack of deference. He refuses to let his intentions be shaped by the etiquette and physical conditions of his art; histrionic impatience, the anxiety to express, makes him try to rape the medium and anticipate the spectator's emotions by presenting a fait accompli before the fact—there the spectator's emotion is in the picture before he has had time to feel it. He gets a portrait of the way he ought to feel. And so many of us feel guilty about emotional impotence that we hurry to assent.

Rouault cultivates a style that seems the essence of spontaneity, yet whose repetitiousness stamps it as almost a formula. He takes few chances with color and invariably plays one complementary tone against another; his main reliance is black—or raw umber—to which he relates every other color, and this, as most painters know, is one of the safest tricks in the game. His design tends usually to be dead-centered and, too frequently, symmetrical. At the same time his control of three-dimensional depth is unsure; here and there in his earlier works high lights pop out or spots of shadow retreat too far or submerge too much. In one and the same picture he will handle space now in the modern way, as a question primarily of surface, and now in the Renaissance way, as a question of fictive depth. The influence of Daumier, one of the last great painters to conform to the Renaissance conception of pictorial space, struggles with that of the post-impressionists—and maybe that of Munch too. Daumier's precept gets the upper hand in Rouault's black-and-white work, however, and the result is an increase of calm and also the revelation of how much more conventional his art is than it at first seems to be.

Rouault did not embrace his expressionism until he was over thirty and had undergone a religious conversion. For the first six or seven years thereafter he appears to have restricted himself largely to water color, oil on paper, and similarly direct media, which best registered his fougue without forcing him to abandon certain vestiges of academicism. (One must remember that though Matisse, who was taught by Gustave Moreau, began as an impressionist, Rouault remained a disciple of Moreau until he was thirty.) In the beginning he organized his pictures chiefly by darks and lights in depth and paid little heed to surface design. Some of the nudes Rouault executed at this time are quite strong, especially when they stay close to nature, but lack a certain incisiveness. Unlike Degas, whose influence may have touched him just then, Rouault could not integrate the two-dimensional pattern of the literal surface with the illusion of the third dimension underneath.

Some time around 1913 Rouault began to devote more attention to oil proper. With this came a greater interest in surface and texture, while his color range widened considerably and he ceased to rely mainly on values. As James Thrall Soby—who seems to have an obsessional affinity with "morbid" modern art—points out in his very informative catalogue note, Rouault's heavy contour lines first appeared now, sectioning off the human figure into anatomical compartments—perhaps in answer, as Mr. Soby suggests, to the then all-persuasive influence of cubism. Thick, molten-lava surfaces were gained from layers of paint in different colors, brushed on with little medium, one over the other, so that they interpenetrate. The emphasis on color and texture is intense and sudden—but after that there

U.S.A.—U.S.S.R.
United for Victory and Peace
THURSDAY, MAY 31st
7:30 P.M.
MADISON SQUARE GARDEN

★
SALUTE TO THE GI'S
OF THE UNITED NATIONS

★
Program:

GEN. JOS. W. STILWELL
Commanding General, United States Army
Ground Forces

MAJ.-GEN. I. SARAIEV
Military Attaché of the U.S.S.R.

PAUL ROBESON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducting the
INFANTRY COMBAT BAND
TICKETS:

$3.60 - $2.40 - $1.80 - $1.20 - $.85 - $.60

Available at: Leblang-Grey's, 1476 Broadway;
Workers Bookshop, 30 E. 13th Street; Music
Room, 129 W. 44th Street; Book Fair, 133 W.
44th Street; National Council, 114 E. 32nd Street.

Auspices:

National Council of
American-Soviet Friendship
114 East 32nd Street • New York 16, N. Y.
Murray Hill 3-2087

NOW OPEN
FREE GOLF
TO JUNE 16

500 MEDICAL TERMS EXPLAINED

A brief medical dictionary, compiled from anatomical dictionaries, medical tomes, surgical books and charts.

This book—compiled by Lawrence A. Barrett, B. S., M. S., Ph. D.—explains the common terms our doctors use when, instead of telling us we have a busted collar-bone, they say we have a fracture of the clavicle.

The price of this new book, 500 MEDICAL TERMS EXPLAINED (5 1/2 x 8 1/2 inches in size), is 25¢ per copy, prepaid. Send orders to:

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, Box 460, Girard, Kansas

military skill at the service of people revolting against Spanish rule.

Just what it was that converted him to the cause of liberty the author does not sufficiently examine. "Bourbon regalism, French encyclopedism, and British liberalism created a new spirit," says Señor Rojas, and lets it go at that. His real interest lies in San Martín's later life.

For North American readers, many of them meeting San Martín in these pages for the first time, the book takes far too many things for granted. It is highly subjective, very much concerned with its hero's illnesses, his fidelity to his child wife, his austerity of life and saintliness of soul. That San Martín managed to equip and lead a native army over the high passes of the Andes and defeat larger Spanish forces in Chile seems out of character. Perhaps he was, as this author pictures him, a melancholy mystic, a "saint of the sword" afflicted with stomach ulcers. Or perhaps the distemper of romanticism has lingered too long in modern Argentina, and stained the image with green mold.

The translators, Heschel Brickell and Carlos Videla, are to be congratulated on their skill in quieting purple passages and rendering tortuous prose into readable English.

MILDRED ADAMS

Back to Manchester

LOUIS MARLIO has combined the careers of successful business man, scholar, statesman, and teacher to an extent which is rare in Europe, almost non-existent in the United States. And while it might not be wholly unexpected in these days to find that a man who was for thirteen years chairman of the International Aluminum Cartel is now associated with the Brookings Institution in Washington, it is still surprising that he has deserved his present position because he was also formerly professor of economics at the Paris Ecole des Sciences Politiques.

He is the author of a number of books, the first of which, "German Policy and International Waterways," was published in 1907. His latest, "Can Democracy Recover?" (Doubleday, Doran, $2), was printed in French in 1943 under the title of "La Révolution d'hier, d'aujourd'hui et de demain." The primary emphasis, however, is on the French Revolution of 1789.

The author's cure for democracy's present plight is a combination of return to the principles of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity, and economic liberalism of the Manchester

School. His diagnosis of the ways in which not only France but all the other nations that make up Western civilization strayed from the original revolutionary principles is scholarly, persuasive, and illuminating. But although he is far less extreme than Friedrich Hayek in his devotion to economic orthodoxy, his book is no more convincing than "The Road to Serfdom" in its thesis that a slightly modified and laissez faire economy, plus the social good-will represented by the revolutionary slogan, would bring out all that is better in the best of possible worlds.

One of the most insidious arguments of the defenders of nineteenth-century capitalism is that its defects should be cured by moral suasion rather than by political action. Marlio presents this argument with considerable brilliance, and many of his comments are well worth reading, but he still fails to demonstrate that if all business men were made completely free to pursue their own selfish interests, their combined efforts would automatically produce the greatest good for the greatest number.

CHARLES E. NOYES

Minorities in America

MORE THAN HALF of "One America," edited by Francis J. Brown and Joseph Slabey Roucek (Prentice-Hall, $5), deals with "contributions" of minority peoples to American civilization as evaluated by scholars of uneven abilities. They grant nodding recognition to the newest approach which stresses minority "participation" when they use such subheadings as cultural differentiation, assimilation, and acculturation. Although space limitations do not permit full treatment of these significant themes, the various contributors take less than full advantage of the scope afforded them. Important aspects of the social and economic history of minority peoples are omitted, and the best sources are not always utilized. Some of the contributors adopt a filio-pietistic tone. Writing of the Irish, A. J. Reilly refers to various aspects of "Celtic genius," very unjustifiably denies a distinct Scotch-Irish contribution (apparently the editors agree—shades of Andrew Jackson!), ignores such a study as Oscar Handlin's "Boston's Immigrants," while affording full scope to the views of the jingoes of the American-Irish Historical Society. A. B. Faust, whose historical work has won the approbation of the Steuben Society, contributes a comparable article on the German element. On the other hand, the reader will be interested in what information there is on such minorities as Estonian, Hindu, Turkish, and Armenian Americans.

Somewhat better is the section dealing with Activities of Minority Groups. Stressing recent and even contemporary developments, the editors are sure that the war has had a unifying effect upon the American peoples. "We have become and will remain one America!" Such a conclusion is borne out neither by these chapters nor by events not covered by them. The last two sections comprise for the most part routine discussions of the origin and nature of group conflict and methods of combating it. The complacent tone of some of these surveys would belie the need of the present moment, which is a new methodology of combating prejudice.

Because of its comprehensiveness "One America" is a convenient and in many respects a useful volume. It could have been a better one.

EDWARD N. SAVETH

THE JEFFERSON SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE Invites you to attend a FORUM

"SAN FRANCISCO...AND AFTER"

What the International Organization for World Peace and Progress will mean . . .

TO INDUSTRY: CHARLES PACK, Vice-President, Duellier-Jarvis Corp.

TO LABOR: JAMES McLEISH, General Vice-President, U.E.R.M.W.A.

TO MINORITIES: DR. LAURENCE D. REDDICK, Curator, Schomburg Collection, New York Public Library

TO COMMUNISTS: EARL BROWDER, President, Communist Political Association

TO LIBERALS: DR. J. MAX WEIS, Director of Research—World Peaceways

FRIDAY, MAY 25th — 8:30 P.M.

TOWN HALL, 113 West Forty-third Street

ADMISSION 90c to $1.20 • ALL SEATS RESERVED

TICKETS AVAILABLE NOW AT:

Jefferson School, 6th Avenue at 10th Street, N. Y. C. 11.
Town Hall Box Office, 113 West 43rd Street, N. Y. C. 18.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

ART lovers yearn now for the Terrible. If any art is going to be allowed to take such liberties with nature as modern art does, then it ought to repay us with emotion—shake and scare us the way titans like Michelangelo do. What is involved is really the Sublime, but the term is a little ashamed of itself by now and is excluded from the careful cant of contemporary writing on art and literature. Nevertheless, the Terrible of our time (it is even better form to call it the "disquieting") proves just as hollow in the end as the Sublime of the romantics.

The same taste that feels the cubists to have sacrificed "emotional content" to "intellectualism" and "technique" discovers a latter-day titan in Rouault and is overcome by his "volcanic force." No one who visits Rouault's large show at the Museum of Modern Art (through June 3) can fail to discern a remarkable painter, see several very effective pictures, and recognize a quantity of genius. Yet that remarkable painter is not a great or a major artist. The quietness that unfailingly characterizes great painting does not enter here as it enters into some of the most agitated of Tintoretto's and Delacroix's works—where, as elsewhere, it testifies to the artist's triumph over the medium, and the medium's final acquiescence.

The fault with Rouault does not lie precisely in the extruded emotion or in the bombast, but rather in a lack of deference. He refuses to let his intentions be shaped by the etiquette and physical conditions of his art; histrionic impatience, the anxiety to express, makes him try to rape the medium and anticipate the spectator's emotions by presenting a fait accompli before the fact—there the spectator's emotion is in the picture before he has had time to feel it. He gets a portrait of the way he ought to feel. And so many of us feel guilty about emotional impotence that we hurry to assent.

* Rouault cultivates a style that seems the essence of spontaneity, yet whose repetitiousness stamps it as almost a formula. He takes few chances with color and invariably plays one complementary tone against another; his main reliance is black—or raw umber—to which he relates every other color, and this, as most painters know, is one of the safest tricks in the game. His design tends

usually to be dead-centered and, too frequently, symmetrical. At the same time his control of three-dimensional depth is unsure; here and there in his earlier works high lights pop out or spots of shadow retreat too far or submerge too much. In one and the same picture he will handle space now in the modern way, as a question primarily of surface, and now in the Renaissance way, as a question of fictive depth. The influence of Daumier, one of the last great painters to conform to the Renaissance conception of pictorial space, struggles with that of the post-impressionists—and maybe that of Munch too. Daumier's precept gets the upper hand in Rouault's black-and-white work, however, and the result is an increase of calm and also the revelation of how much more conventional his art is than it at first seems to be.

Rouault did not embrace his expressionism until he was over thirty and had undergone a religious conversion. For the first six or seven years thereafter he appears to have restricted himself largely to water color, oil on paper, and similarly direct media, which best registered his forgue without forcing him to abandon certain vestiges of academicism. (One must remember that though Matisse, who was taught by Gustave Moreau, began as an impressionist, Rouault remained a disciple of Moreau until he was thirty.) In the beginning he organized his pictures chiefly by darks and lights in depth and paid little heed to surface design. Some of the nudes Rouault executed at this time are quite strong, especially when they stay close to nature, but lack a certain incisiveness. Unlike Degas, whose influence may have touched him just then, Rouault could not integrate the two-dimensional pattern of the literal surface with the illusion of the third dimension underneath.

Some time around 1913 Rouault began to devote more attention to oil proper. With this came a greater interest in surface and texture, while his color range widened considerably and he ceased to rely mainly on values. As James Thrall Soby—who seems to have an obsessional affinity with "morbid" modern art—points out in his very informative catalogue note, Rouault's heavy contour lines first appeared now, sectioning off the human figure into anatomical compartments—perhaps in answer, as Mr. Soby suggests, to the then all-persuasive influence of cubism. Thick, molten-lava surfaces were gained from layers of paint in different colors, brushed on with little medium, one over the other, so that they interpenetrate. The emphasis on color and texture is intense and sudden—but after that there

U.S.A.—U.S.S.R.

United for Victory and Peace

THURSDAY, MAY 31st

7:30 P.M.

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN

★

SALUTE TO THE GI'S
OF THE UNITED NATIONS

★

Program:

GEN. JOS. W. STILWELL
Commanding General, United States Army
Ground ForcesMAJ.-GEN. I. SARAEV
Military Attaché of the U.S.S.R.

PAUL ROBESON

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducting the

INFANTRY COMBAT BAND

TICKETS:

$3.60 - $2.40 - $1.80 - $1.20 - $.85 - $.60

Available at: Leblang-Grey's, 1476 Broadway;
Workers Bookshop, 50 E. 13th Street; Music
Room, 129 W. 44th Street; Book Fair, 133 W.
44th Street; National Council, 114 E. 32nd Street.

Sponsors:

National Council of
American-Soviet Friendship
114 East 32nd Street • New York 16, N. Y.
MUrray Hill 3-2087NOW OPEN
FREE GOLF
TO JUNE 16SCAROON
MANOR HOTEL
671 SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

500 MEDICAL TERMS EXPLAINED

A brief medical dictionary, compiled from anatomical dictionaries, medical tomes, surgical books and charts.

This book—compiled by Lawrence A. Barrett, B. S., M. S., Ph. D.—explains the common terms our doctors use when, instead of telling us we have a busted collar-bone, they say we have a fracture of the clavicle.

The price of this new book, 500 MEDICAL TERMS EXPLAINED (5 1/2 x 8 1/2 inches in size), is 25¢ per copy, prepaid. Send orders to:

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, Box 460, Girard, Kansas

seems to have been little real evolution in Rouault's art.

It is as if, conscious of the faulty integration of his painting, he tried to resolve the problem by draining everything off into immediate sensuous effect. But a separateness, a disparity between the literal surface and the picture "within," persists. Rouault turned out some remarkable paintings from 1916 on—especially the Three Clowns (1917), the Portrait of Henri Lebasque, the Crucifixion of 1918, Self Portrait (1929), the Last Romantic, the Wounded Clown, and also the tapestry of the Wounded Clown—but all, except perhaps the tapestry, reveal on repeated view a curious fissure between technique and the whole picture—as if the Ding an sich had failed to manifest the appropriate phenomenal evidence. The style runs off by itself; we come away remembering colors and textures but not complete works of art. Whence it dawns on us that this passionate religious painter is really a kind of narrow virtuoso, maintaining content in order to exploit a style—unlike Matisse and Picasso, who work at and change style in order to achieve content. And the content of Rouault's art has to be explicit and emphatic in order to support a style whose intensity does not compensate its limited range, and which down at bottom lies sick with academicism.

It is ironic that Rouault, the up-to-date exponent of pornographic, sado-masochistic, avant-garde Catholicism, should be set forth as the only great religious artist of our time. A painter with real gifts, he fails to fulfil them because, among other things, he goes precisely to religion to find a pretext and justification for venting his abhorrence, not only of the epoch, but of humanity and himself. Perhaps this hatred and this desire to suffer lie profoundly at the heart of our epoch. But as the German philosopher Husserl said, profundity is chaos.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

REVIEWS of books sometimes provide performances that are interesting or amusing to watch. Thus, Virgil Thomson's "Musical Scene" being condensed to, in the Times, by Mark Schubart, and Mr. Schubart reminding the reader to take the book's contents as only the opinions of Mr. Thomson—that is something to hug one's sides over. Some may think I am condescending to Mr. Schubart's youth and status; but I am thinking only of his critical opinions. It was the writing of another youthful fourth-string critic, Gama Gilbert, that gave the Times's reviewing of music its brief glimmer of distinction and value a few years ago. And it is the traditions, attitudes, and methods of older men that Mr. Schubart is carrying on. Some things are learned quickly, others take time: already Mr. Schubart, in his record reviews, can use even more words to say even less; but he will need additional journalistic experience to produce those book reviews in which an intimate knowledge of the jacket-blurb, the preface, and the first pages of a few of the chapters has been conveyed with expansively leaden sententiousness.

The performances on Einstein's "Mozart" have been staggering; but Virgil Thomson, whose reviews of books have usually been poor, came through this time with the only comment I have seen that goes to the heart of what is wrong with Einstein's book. In connection with the vagueness of the descriptive analyses of particular works Thomson wrote: "Perhaps what bothers me all through is the author's assumption that his undoubted familiarity with the facts of Mozart's life, including his working habits gives him automatically a true insight into the meaning of Mozart's works. Time after time we are asked to take on faith ex-cathedra statements like the following about a piano piece that has always so bothered everybody that many editions omit it entirely: 'And the "Little Sonata" in B flat major (K.570), dating from February, 1789—perhaps the most completely rounded of them all, the ideal of his piano sonata—also contains counterpoint used humorously in the finale as if in open reference to the secrets of which the work is full.' I must say that here I find Mr. Einstein far more secretive than the piece he is talking about. This kind of pontifical obscurity (and the book is full of it) is unacceptable . . ." I cannot help noting the irony of Thomson's using the words "pontifical obscurity" which so well describe the method and result of some of his own articles. But what is important about those words here is their correctness as applied to Einstein's statement, and to countless statements which tell us as little about other works; and the fact that Einstein, like all the musicologists, knows everything about a work of Mozart except what it says and means.

What is also important, let me add—since Thomson doesn't—is that there is the same "pontifical obscurity" in Einstein's writing about Mozart's life, and that here he appears to assume that having provided factual documentation at certain points he may at other points make vast and cloudy pronouncements without any documented factual basis at all. On p. 93 of the chapter on Mozart's education is the statement that "his deep intuition pierced the cultural tendencies of his time, without the help of a single lecture on aesthetics." But immediately, and with no awareness that it largely negates what has just been said, there is the statement that "although he had no eye for . . . architecture, sculpture, or painting, he had as a dramatist the finest sense of poetry, both lyric and dramatic. Then, 'he must have read a great deal'; and apparently in justification of this, 'his library contained books on travel, history, and philosophy; poetical works such as those of Metastasio and Salomon Gessner; Molière's comedies . . . ; Wieland's 'Oberon'; and the lyrics of Gellert and Weisse." But no: "whether he actually read all this, nobody knows." But yes: "we do know that he read Metastasio and Gellert. He also knew Fénelon's 'Télémaque' and Tasso's 'Aminta'; he found amusement in the tales of 'The Thousand and One Nights'; and above

A Book of "Isms"

Here We Have Joseph McCabe at His Best!

Joseph McCabe's new 60,000-word book, "A Book of 'Isms'" is ready. In a statement accompanying his Ms., Joseph McCabe wrote:

"The Book of 'Isms' is complete and gives the titles in alphabetical order, which makes it a little encyclopedic dictionary. This book explains carefully the meanings of the following important 'Isms':

"Capitalism, Socialism, Communism, Imperialism, Militarism, Bolshevism, Fascism, Nazism, Liberalism, Individualism, Totalitarianism, Authoritarianism, Syndicalism, Anarchism, Pacifism, Rationalism, Materialism, Skepticism, Agnosticism, Atheism, Clericalism, Zionism, Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Catholicism, Protestantism, Judaism, and so forth.

"I worked hard to make this book a 'must' with all persons who seek to understand the important currents of thought that are influencing our generation. I consider this book one of the most important I've ever done. In writing it, I kept my audience always in mind—the Man in the Street who wants the facts in simple, candid speech. I hope this volume will reach a wide audience. If we are to rebuild this sorry world we will have to get our facts straight. That is the foundation on which we must build. 'A Book of 'Isms'' gives the intelligent reader the facts, first and always, for I approached this big field in a thoroughly objective mood. I know you will promote the distribution of this book with your usual energy and initiative."

This 60,000-word, 96-page book (3½ x 8½ inches in size) costs 75¢ per copy, prepaid. Address orders to:

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS
BOX 425 GIRARD, KANSAS

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for mailing. Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books OLD & NEW. Lowest Price-Paid.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION

22 East 17th Street, New York City

all he knew a large part of the boundless Italian libretto literature." There is, then, documentation for a qualified statement about Mozart's literary interests, but none for the pronouncement about his deep intuition into the cultural tendencies of his time. And there is also great confusion in the progression of thought.

A far worse example of all this is the passage on the next page about Mozart's independence in regard to the new currents that heralded the approach of the nineteenth century, the period of Romanticism whose full flowering he might well have lived to witness. Anything that belonged simply to change or transition did not concern him. He was completely a child of the eighteenth century, perhaps, but also of the twentieth; which is another way of saying that he belonged to the eternity of art, and was in no sense a "forerunner." Beethoven found a great deal in Haydn that he could take as a point of departure, but very little in Mozart. How should one try to continue Mozart's work? It was possible to strive for perfection on another level, and perhaps even to achieve it; but Mozart's perfection could not be surpassed on its own level. With Haydn, on the other hand, one could in many respects compete on his own terms. Now, Mozart lived in the middle of the period of Sturm und Drang, the age of "sensitivity," the age of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Mozart never mentions Rousseau, although he composed a Singspiel on Rousseau's "Devin du Village," and he must have heard Rousseau's name often enough in Paris. Presumably he would have had no use for the philosopher and musical amateur of Geneva, whose call "Back to Nature" would have meant very little to him. Mozart was on the side of Voltaire, in spite of the ill-tempered words he pronounced upon the sage of Ferney as an obituary. Voltaire, too, belongs to the eighteenth century and to eternity; and he has the same power of dry and pitiless observation, the same irony, the same fierce satire, and the same profound fatalism. Between "Candide" and the G minor Symphony there is a real kinship.

If you have read this passage, as I have, for continuous sense from one sentence to the next, you will agree that Einstein is using his subject to display the extensiveness of his background of knowledge and culture in a confusedly tangential gabble of pontifical generalizations and allusions which can impress only minds as confused or pretentious as his own.

CHILDREN'S CAMPS

Camp CHI-WAN-DA

FOR BOYS and GIRLS
ULSTER PARK, N.Y.
On the Mountain Lake
Esopus overlooking the Beautiful Hudson River

We present a modern cultural environment for your children. All cabins with latest improvements. All activities. For full information, write or call for booklet.

JACOB I. DOROSHCHIN, Director
645-5th Ave., MU. 2-4217 MA. 2-5546 DI. 8-3849

Camp Allegro

Beautifully Equipped Modern Camp, 118 Miles from N. Y. 350 Acres. Private Lake. Elevation 2400 ft. All Land-Water Sports. Complete Cultural Program. Stressing Educational-Character Growth.
SOPHIE JANOV, Director
1223 COLGATE AVENUE, BRONX, N. Y. TE. 2-0073.
After 5 P.M. and Sat. & Sun. Phone JE 7-8768.
BROOKLYN PHONE NA 8-0740

SUMMER RENTALS

HIGHLAND, N. Y., Fieldstone house, all modern conveniences, electric kitchen, 7 rooms, small pool, enclosed porch. Garage. 6½ acres. $900. WHITEHALL 3-9720.

CONGENIAL WOMAN wanted to rent room or share lakeside Westchester apartment. Bathing, boating privileges. Box 1923 c/o The Nation.

CAMPS—EDUCATIONAL

WITHOUT SPECIAL TALENT OR TRAINING
YOU CAN FULLY ENJOY

A Holiday of Music-Making
With the World-Famous

TRAPP FAMILY SINGERS

at the
Trapp Family Music Camp
Stowe, Vermont

Five 10-day "Sing Weeks"—June 25 thru Aug. 30.
$50 fee incl. room, board, complete program.
Write Trapp Family Singers, Stowe, Vermont.

LAKE GEORGE WORKSHOP

An inspirational vacation in a beautiful setting at Lake George Workshop. Ideal summer camp life, drama, music, arts and crafts, combined with seminars on democracy, civil liberties, education for the task ahead, under distinguished educators. Youth and adult sessions, co-educational, international. Write now for information and reservations.
Room 912, 2 West 40th St., N. Y. C. LO. 1A 4-2554

FARMS, ACREAGE

DUE TO EXTREME AGE of few remaining members the famous Mt. Lebanon Shaker community property is now offered for sale. 250 acres; 3-acre lake; ski run; woods; unsurpassed Berkshire view; near Tanglewood; several dormitories; 3 smaller houses; barn. Ideal for summer theatre; school; convalescent home; boarding. Asking only $15,000. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

RESORTS

50 MI. FROM NEW YORK
MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
Ridgely, Conn. Phone 820
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, hiking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplace. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

Birdland

Year-Round Resort. Only 45 miles from N. Y.
TENNIS, GOLF, PING-PONG, BICYCLES
DECORATION DAY SPECIAL - $35 for 5 Days
Rates from $40 Phone: Highland Mills 7395
Under Ownership-Management of DIANA & ABE DERMAN

Tall Pines

75 miles from N.Y.C.
100 acres of beautiful rolling country.
Ideal modern resort for enjoyable family vacations. Supervised child play. Swimming, tennis, ping-pong. Train, boat or car to Poughkeepsie.

MAY SAKOW, Dir.
Pleasant Valley, Dutchess Co., N. Y. Phone 2741.

BREEZEMONT PARK

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dined. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 803

ZINDOREST PARK

MONROE, NEW YORK
Telephone Monroe 4421
A resort for Adults only
Exclusive location, 150 acres of unusual beauty, HAND-SPORTS. Delicious food, relaxing atmosphere, recorded concert music, dancing, modern accommodations.

INVITATION TO RELAX

Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, outdoor activities, delicious food—and fun.
Only 55 miles from New York
MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY

plum point
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel. Newburgh 4279

ARCADIA

Fishkill, N. Y.
Tel. Beacon 727
ALL SPORTS, including tennis, volley ball, handball, ping-pong, swimming in spacious pool, etc. Recordings. Informal social surroundings, delicious food.

Reservations for Limited Number of Families for Extended Stay Now Accepted
N. Y. Tel.: WAD. 3-6686, before 11 a.m., after 9 p.m.
R.R. Station, Beacon, N. Y., 60 miles from city.

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoe. Interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails. Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riddle, croquet, ping-pong, square dancing.
$45 & $50 WEEKLY.

OLIVE H. G. BARON, Director

SHADYBROOK

MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 1113
50 miles from N. Y. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Sports, Movies.
RESERVE EARLY FOR
DECORATION DAY WEEK-END
SPECIAL JUNE RATES

BUY WAR BONDS

Crossword Puzzle No. 116

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Creeps
- 5 Septicemia always starts with this
- 9 One kind of palm
- 11 Three-horse Russian vehicle
- 12 Overlook this
- 13 Fools' journeys, sometimes
- 14 Bone of the arm
- 17 Looks like the start of a Bronx cheer
- 19 The art of paying the coal bill, as it were
- 22 Distinctly feline
- 23 Dressmaker's triangular insertions
- 25 Hot bug (anag.)
- 26 Made for me mostly
- 27 Alias Spud Murphy
- 29 Island that was snatched out of the air
- 31 He communicates with his sweetheart by notes
- 34 Are sometimes even in betting
- 36 Commotion
- 37 Travelers' tales may be (two words, 3 and 4)
- 39 Strangely enough quite a peaceful spot in England
- 40 Testify at trial
- 41 Not Nature's work (hyphen, 3-4)
- 42 "The brazen ----- of war" (Milton)
- 43 Senseless state

DOWN

- 1 Adds relish to a meal
- 2 "Anti? No!" (anag.)
- 3 Less than love but similar, as every golfer knows
- 4 Astronomical figures are illuminating in this
- 5 In the vernacular, a shark

- 6 Don't put them all in one basket
- 7 Mrs. Spry never complained of meat being this (two words, 3 & 3)
- 8 It hardly describes the Ghost Train
- 10 Give her a beer for the doctor
- 15 London's "bank street"
- 16 Kidnap
- 17 Black eye poultice (two words, 3 and 4)
- 18 "Heaven's ebon vault ----- with stars unutterably bright" (Shelley)
- 20 N. African tree whose fruit made strangers forget their home
- 21 It could have been freer
- 24 Politicians who didn't get what was coming to them
- 28 A veritable madhouse
- 29 "An engagement of no great magnitude" (dictionary)
- 30 He should be able to tell a good story
- 32 All in (two words, 4 and 2)
- 33 "I've got a little list . . . ." (Mikado)
- 35 Form of eclat useful on shipboard
- 37 Mater appears after this battle in the old school
- 38 Let it stand, Mr. Printer

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 115

ACROSS: 1 DANIEL WEBSTER; 10 EPHRAIM; 11 DERVISH; 12 PAIRING; 13 WASHTUB; 14 OUTLETS; 15 DESTROY; 16 HOSTAGE; 20 PARABLE; 23 LA SALLE; 24 LEVERET; 25 FOILING; 26 RELEASE; 27 LEVEL CROSSING.

DOWN: 2 ATHEIST; 3 IMAGINE; 4 LILMOSES; 5 ENDOWED; 6 SERONIS; 7 EVICTOR; 8 KEEP TO THE LEFT; 9 SHABBY GENTLE; 17 SISTINE; 18 ALL-WISE; 19 ENERGETIC; 20 PALESTMO; 21 REVOLTS; 22 BARGAIN.

MEETING

THE GROUP

Seymour A. Seligson, Chairman
Meets at Clubhouse, 150 West 55th Street
SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 19, 8:45 P. M.
PROF. H. W. LONGFELLOW DANA speaks on
"The Drama of Russia at War"
(Illustrated)

SUNDAY EVENING, MAY 20, 8:45 P. M.
PROF. MURRAY BANKS speaks on
"Quest for Happiness"
Social Hour and Refreshments
Admission 50c—Notices Mailed on Request
Attend 45 evenings for $5

LANGUAGES

LANGUAGE SERVICE, Box 6, Cambridge, Mass. Phonograph Courses. All makes. Books. All Languages. Established 1936. Booklet N. State language.

HELP WANTED

SECRETARY-STENOGRAPHER, experienced, $35, 5-day week. Postwar position, national women's Zionist organization. 24th floor, 1819 Broadway, N. Y. C.

ORGANIZATIONS

SCIENTIFIC SOCIALISM SOCIETY. If interested in the spread of socialism, won't you join our non-party society and aid this cause? Box 40, Imboden, Ark.

LEAGUE FOR SOCIALIZED MEDICINE being formed. Members, suggestions, support, volunteer workers needed. Cobb, 887 West End Avenue, N. Y. C.

POSITIONS WANTED

SECRETARY, 29, eight years with high-tension Executive, desires change to congenial, permanent, interesting work. Five days, $40-$45 minimum. Available September. Box 1724 c/o The Nation.

EXPERIENCED COPYREADER, make-up, research, writing. Part, full time. Capable turning out complete job, small publication. Box 1525 c/o The Nation.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

CLASSIFIED

ADVERTISING RATES

62c a line (six words)

Minimum 3 lines

$6.16 per inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Barclay 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MAY 26, 1945

NUMBER 21

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 585

EDITORIALS

A Conference in the Doldrums 588
Shall America Help Russia Rebuild? 588

ARTICLES

Trieste and San Francisco by I. F. Stone 589
Austria: Test for the Coalition by Ernst Karl Winter 591
The Anatomy of Full Employment by Leo Barnes 593
Chicago's Un-American Guests by Milburn P. Akers 597
In the Wind 598

POLITICAL WAR

France at This Moment
Its Role at the Conference by J. Alvarez del Vayo 599
The Elections Interpreted by Jules Moch 600

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 602
Democratic Faith and Puritan Piety by Sidney Hook 603
Verse Chronicle by F. W. Dupee 605
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 606
Films by James Agee 608
Music by B. H. Haggin 609

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 611

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 117 by Jack Barrett 612

TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE:

Your sons, husbands and brothers who are standing today upon the battlefronts are fighting for more than victory in war. They are fighting for a new world of freedom and peace.

We, upon whom has been placed the responsibility of leading the American forces, appeal to you with all possible earnestness to invest in War Bonds to the fullest extent of your capacity.

Give us not only the needed implements of war, but the assurance and backing of a united people so necessary to hasten the victory and speed the return of your fighting men.

William L. Leahy
Franklin D. Roosevelt
Charles E. Hughes
Walter Dill Scott
Alfred A. Knapp

The Shape of Things

BITTER JAPANESE RESISTANCE HAS DELAYED American occupation of southern Okinawa and thus prevented its full exploitation in the aerial blockade of the Japanese islands. Advancing toward Shuri through rugged and heavily fortified country, and in the face of repeated Japanese counter-attacks, the Americans have had to measure their gains in terms of yards. But the delay has not slowed down the tempo of the general United Nations offensive. During the last week the B-29 air raids from the Marianas reached a scale beyond that attained in the European war. The great 500-plane raids on Nagoya appear to have inflicted far greater damage than did the 1,000- and 1,200-plane Flying Fortress raids on Berlin. And in an unparalleled demonstration of American air power the first of these B-29 raids occurred simultaneously with a 1,000-plane carrier strike against the airfields of southern Japan. In China limited successes continue in Hunan. In the Philippines more than 90 per cent of the rich island of Mindanao is in American hands. With the approaching end of the Philippine cam-

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. E. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARK

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

paign, speculation naturally turns to the next step in MacArthur's campaign. The recent Chinese operations against Foochow suggest an early landing on the southern Chinese coast, but the conquest of Okinawa will open up the possibility of a landing much farther north.

✱

REPORTS OF A REVOLT IN SINKIANG HAVE called attention again to one of the chief stumbling-blocks in relations between Russia and China. It will be recalled that a Chinese coup d'état in this remote area three years ago caused Russia to terminate all its trade with the region and withdraw all its machinery and productive equipment. Thus, in effect, the new Chinese regime inherited an empty shell economically, since China is in no position to absorb the products of its remote dependency. The Moslem tribesmen, who constitute the bulk of the population of Sinkiang, are reported to have risen in revolt against the new Chinese regime and to have gained control of several important centers. A New York Times dispatch from London quotes local diplomatic quarters as indicating that Moscow had offered to help quell the revolt if Chungking would agree to a return of the pre-1941 arrangement. Ambassador Hurley is said to have discussed this proposal during his recent visit to Moscow. No final settlement is believed to have been reached. While the disturbances have been confirmed in several quarters, interpretations vary substantially, depending on whether the information sifted out through Chungking or Moscow. A basis for settlement undoubtedly exists along the lines of the pre-1941 condominium. Russia's interests in Sinkiang are primarily economic, China's primarily political. An agreement which would recognize Chinese sovereignty and provide special facilities for Russian trade should not only serve the interests of both countries but also contribute to the welfare of the local tribesmen.

✱

RUSSIA'S SUSPICIONS REGARDING THE USE OF German officers such as Doenitz and Krosigk by Supreme Allied Headquarters continue to find vehement expression in the Moscow press, notwithstanding General Eisenhower's order that these men are to be used but not given power or publicity. The distinction is a delicate one, and we can understand Russia's doubts. The record of British-American dealings with assorted pro-Axis generals in North Africa and Italy is not reassuring. Nor is the unforgettable statement by a high American official after the Darlan agreement that when we moved into Germany we would accept Goering himself if he could deliver the Luftwaffe. It would be possible, of course, to employ members of the German general staff purely as vehicles for the transmission of orders, not as men who had been given authority or who were winning immunity from later punishment as Nazi criminals. We believe this should be made plain—and not only to still Russia's fears. Everywhere in Europe people are watching to see what the Allied authorities will do with the terrorists now in their hands. The British have permitted German troops on Crete to retain their arms in order to defend themselves against the vengeance of the population. Such a ruling is fantastic unless it is followed by swift and drastic punishment carried in accordance with the agreement made at Moscow that those guilty of specific crimes will be tried in the countries where such crimes have been committed. Delay and legalistic quibbling in the handling of war criminals will increase the suspicion, already general, that the Western Allies care more for the preservation of order than for the extermination of fascism.

✱

SIXTY MILLION JOBS HAS BECOME A SLOGAN which symbolizes new hope for a secure America after the war, a fighting phrase to rally liberals everywhere against reactionary attempts to hold back the clock. But a slogan, however useful, can be no substitute for solid economic thinking. When the anatomy of full employment is dissected industry by industry, trade by trade, the magnitude and the complexity of America's particular problem become more evident and more alarming. Elsewhere in this issue we carry an article by Leo Barnes, director of economic research for the Research Institute of America, which makes a draft survey of the post-war economic map of the United States. We recommend it to the careful study of our readers. For those who normally shy off economic charts and statistics we suggest that the table on p. 594 is neither complicated nor dull. It tells a story of past achievement and failure and suggests just how big is the job ahead if 60 million Americans are to have jobs when the war is over. We call it to the especial attention of Congressmen.

✱

ONE QUESTION WHICH THE WESTERN ALLIES earnestly hoped to brush off but which forced itself into the discussion at San Francisco is the question of Spain. The collapse of Nazi power has left to Franco the uneasy honor of being the last important focus of fascism on the European continent. He has met the situation by trying to scramble over to the democratic side, but he has discovered, like his confreres in Argentina, that every gesture in the direction of liberty necessitates more severe measures of repression if his regime is not to be overthrown. Last February he shot without trial sixteen political prisoners in reprisal for the killing of two minor Falangist officials during an attack on a Falangist party headquarters in a workers' district in Madrid. Just recently eight others were sentenced to die for complicity in this attack: seven of them were executed. Republicans insist that the incident was a frame-up to provide a plausible excuse for the executions. But the fact remains that political arrests and killings have markedly increased since Franco began issuing his series of amnesty announcements. The lot of the dictator turned democrat is not merely hard, it is hopeless.

✱

BUT THE SPANISH ISSUE HAS BEEN PRECIPITATED at San Francisco less by Franco's recent misdeeds than by the vigorous action of delegates who understand the necessity of insuring in advance that Spain's fascist regime shall not get into the security organization in the guise of a "neutral" and that a place shall be held for a democratic Spain when Franco has been overthrown. That the question is not academic is indicated by the language used in a letter from Edward Stettinius to the Friends of the Spanish Republic, acknowledging a request for a hearing before the committee considering admissions. Mr. Stettinius remarked that while "the United States delegation does not expect to be called upon to take cognizance of a request for admission of Spain, such a request might properly be entertained by the international organization after its formation." That contingency is exactly what the Friends of the Spanish Republic are determined to avoid and they have won the active support of many of the genuinely democratic delegations. At a large and enthusiastic press luncheon held in honor of Spain's last Republican Foreign Minister, J. Alvarez del Vayo, a representative of China made the first public statement calling attention to the pro-Japanese record of Franco and to the Chinese government's refusal to recognize his regime. And the fact that Mr. Molotov, a few days before leaving for Moscow, held a long, off-the-record conference with Mr. Del Vayo had an immediate significance which was not lost either on the delegates or on the press. *

SINCE THEN OTHER DELEGATIONS HAVE MADE their opinions known. Several Latin American countries, eager to atone for their action on Argentina or at least to demonstrate that the Argentine decision was not a sample of their attitude toward fascist states in general, have definitely decided to force consideration of the Spanish question. A most impressive statement by Luis Quintanilla of the Mexican delegation will have been presented to the conference before this issue appears. A few sentences are well worth quoting here:

I speak for the Mexican delegation. My purpose is to make clear that Mexico accepted the text of Article I, Chapter III, with the understanding that membership in the new international organization cannot be claimed by defeated Axis governments or the de facto governments imposed by the military forces of the Axis.

We have in mind not only the puppet government of Manchukuo but, closer to us Spanish-speaking republics, that of Spain. . . .

We can now without endangering the course of European operations speak the whole truth; and the historical truth, Mr. Chairman, is that without the military help of Mussolini's legions and Hitler's air power, the forces of democracy in Spain, represented by the legally elected Republican government, would be seated here, helping us today.

After citing a few of the Spanish dictator's most flagrant protestations of loyalty to the Axis, Mr. Quintanilla ended his remarks with this sharp and uncompromising demand:

Mr. Chairman, the Mexican delegation submits that the voice that spoke those words must never be heard in the international organization which you, gentlemen, are creating.

If anything more were needed to focus and intensify the activities of the anti-Franco elements, the arrival of Dr. Juan Negrín should provide it. As these paragraphs are being written, Dr. Negrín is on his way to the coast where he will meet with his friends in the conference and with fellow Spanish Republicans now in San Francisco. If Spain is a symbol of the underlying meaning of the struggle for a free world, the head of Spain's last legal government symbolizes the undefeated resistance of the Spanish people. The Republican groups, long held apart by geographical dispersion and the political differences that multiply in exile, look hopefully to Dr. Negrín to integrate and lead them in the final battle against the tyranny that strangles their country. It is important that the San Francisco conference contribute to this effort an unequivocal repudiation of Franco and his claim to fellowship in the new society of nations.

*

THE DANGERS FACING THE TRADE-AGREEMENT program were clearly indicated in the narrow margin by which it was indorsed by the House Ways and Means Committee. The bill to extend the reciprocal trade policy for three years squeaked through the committee by a three-vote margin. Every Republican on the committee opposed the measure, and one Democrat—West of Texas—joined the Republican minority. If Republican opposition on the floor is as complete, a few dissident Democrats, representing special sectional interests, would succeed in scuttling the bill. The Republican vote in the committee shows that the party's Congressional representatives have learned nothing from the elections of 1940 and 1944. In those elections the Republican Presidential candidates tried to woo independent votes by adopting a progressive attitude toward the Administration's basic foreign policies. But the inflexible record of the party in opposition to the trade-expansion program in Congress spoke louder than the conciliatory words of the Republican candidates. It is to be hoped that the voters will make their attitude known to their Congressmen before the bill comes up for a vote in the House.

*

NINE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FIVE CANDIDATES are competing for the 245 seats in Canada's federal Parliament. The election will be held on June 11. It will be interesting and significant for liberal forces in the United States to observe whether the results show the leftward trend which has characterized political developments in other parts of the democratic world. Essentially it is a three-way contest among the Liberal Party, the Progressive-Conservative Party, and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Among them they account for 645 nominations. Of the minor parties the most important group is to be found in the province of Quebec, where the issues of the war and conscription have fanned nationalist and anti-government sentiment. Here no fewer than 130 candidates are listed in the column marked "others"; of these, 69 will run as Independents and 35 as Bloc Populaire. Mr. King must win a majority of Quebec's sixty-five seats if he is to come back with a majority. Quebec is therefore a province to watch. The C. C. F., sure of decided gains scattered across the country, is chiefly interested in the western provinces and Ontario. It will almost certainly elect most of the members from Saskatchewan, where a year ago a C. C. F. government was swept into power. It has also shown marked strength in British Columbia. The Ontario vote, however, is of greatest consequence. Eighty-two seats are to be contested, and all three major parties are concentrating their fight in this province. Here one of the factors is the Communist Party—parading under the label of Labor-Progressive. The Communists have in general urged support of Liberals, and the main object of their assault has been the C. C. F. Small numerically, they may split the vote sufficiently in certain crucial industrial districts to elect a Liberal or a Conservative. The Nation expects to give a first-hand analysis of the election situation in an early issue.

A Conference in the Doldrums

BICKERINGS at San Francisco and in other Allied councils have induced a mood of disillusionment in more than one devoted champion of effective international organization. People were startled, not to say shocked, at the opening quarrel over chairmanships. The Polish dispute—a skeleton that keeps emerging from the conference cupboard at unexpected and irrelevant moments—frightens participants and spectators alike, not less as an omen of trouble to come than for its own ugly features. In the last few days it has been joined by a Yugoslav cousin. As for regionalism and universalism, it is hard to say which is more irritating—the united tenacity of our good Latin American neighbors or the forced suspense of the conference while Moscow deliberates. Finally, the small nations, instead of holding their noses and swallowing the great-power veto, keep spitting out bits of it, to the renewed discomfiture of those good liberals who from the first have been a little ashamed of the pill.

The disappointed are not much consoled when diplomatic old hands remind them that conferences are always that way. Their trouble is something more than lack of sophistication. It betrays the fact that despite the strong strain of conservatism and conventionality that distinguished the whole process of preparation for the meeting, people were still hoping for miracles at this first Constituent Assembly of the United Nations. They may well be forgiven a sense of indignation and defeat in the presence of accumulating evidence that even this most immeasurable of wars has not been enough to change the nature or the temper of international politics. It is nevertheless worth insisting that, given the limitations foreshadowed as early as the Moscow Declaration of 1943 and highlighted in the Dumbarton Oaks agreements of 1944, there is no reason yet to write the San Francisco conference off as a failure.

Nothing whatever has occurred to alter the essential character of the organization planned in the Dumbarton text. We still have the prospect of a structure very much like the League of Nations, with somewhat better arrangements for checking aggression provided the great powers can agree, at the moment of actual need, to use them. In some particulars, which may become very important in the process of growth, the conference has brought promise of improvement. Thus the new provisions for future amendment, while they have not removed the great-power veto, will make for easier adaptation to changing conditions. The composition of the council is improved by fuller recognition of the middle powers, while all small states are gaining some satisfaction in the revision of the general assembly's functions. A fuller and more practical plan for the advancement of essential human rights is being worked out. Debate still rages around the relations between the United Nations and regional organizations; but this problem was clearly foreseen, and it is better to tackle all its difficulties now than to have them surprise us later. The business of providing a successor for the League's mandate system—a part entirely missing in the Dumbarton text—is well in hand. These tasks are made hard by the conflicting interests involved. They are nevertheless inevitable; there is reason for gratitude that their thorniness has not become an excuse for shirking or postponing them.

It will be a first-class disaster if idealists, disappointed of exaggerated hopes, turn their backs on San Francisco and wander off into cynicism. The long and hard pull for all of us who want successful organization lies ahead. We are not going to be presented with an automatic mechanism of peace. For some years after the end of hostilities conditions are going to be only less desperate than those of actual war. There will be need for great power swiftly used. The tendency will be to decide the largest issues outside the new League. In those years the United Nations organization will die, unless by patient, untiring pressure we consolidate and expand the nucleus that will be given us and so fit it for an increasing role in pacification, welfare, and long-term security. The battle for effective world organization has not been lost; it is only beginning.

Shall America Help Russia Rebuild?

SOME bad poker is being played with Russia these days. The political aspect of the game is attracting more attention, but the economic is just as important. Recently, for example, when Secretary Grew announced that lend-lease shipments to Russia were being stopped or scaled down because the European war had ended, some of the boys in the back room applauded lustily and waited for the chips to be shoved across to our side of the table. It seemed pretty clear that Russia needed our financial assistance so badly that it would have to make certain political concessions we had been asking for. It may turn out, however, that we have underestimated the strength of Russia's hand, and that Russia may get tired and decide to pull out of the game.

What are the facts? Russia has undoubtedly suffered tremendous physical losses during the war—much greater losses than any other of the United Nations. Moreover, these losses came on top of a long period during which the Russian people had to deny themselves goods that we in the West consider necessities in order to build up their heavy industries and later manufacture armaments to resist the Nazis. To aid its reconstruction and at the same time to speed up the flow of consumer goods Moscow has asked the United States for a twenty-year loan of six billion dollars. Continuing lend-lease aid, even if it were limited to essential military supplies, would further lighten the Soviet's economic burden.

But if we refuse to extend economic aid to Russia, it does not follow that Russia's economic program is completely stymied or that Russia will come to us on bended knee asking what concessions it must make to get credits. Russia has the means to carry out its reconstruction program under its own power even if that involves the continuation of the sacrifices its people have been making for many years. The Soviet economy is crippled, but its prospects of reconstruction are much brighter than they were after the last war, and they are certainly brighter than those of any other European country. In contrast with 1918, Russia has come out of this war with internal stability, with vast experience in large-scale planning, with millions of skilled workers, and with a sizable industrial plant. Moreover, the Russians count on the use of German labor to help them rebuild their cities and on substantial reparations in goods from the parts of Germany occupied by the Red Army. In Upper Silesia the Russians have acquired a potential coal supply almost equal to their entire pre-war production. The zinc deposits near Beuthen are among the largest in the world, and the great Silesian industries, in contrast with those of the Ruhr, are reported to have suffered little damage from bombing. In normal times the Silesian plants are equipped to turn out machine tools, rails, railway locomotives and cars, and automobiles—all of vital importance in Russia's reconstruction.

COMING IN THE NATION

KAY BOYLE, Hotel Behind the Lines

CAREY MCWILLIAMS, Columbia River Epic

Russia, therefore, can be counted on to make a good recovery even if left to its own—and Germany's—resources. Without help from us it will still be able to adopt the policy of self-sufficiency, more or less isolated from the world economy, which it followed with some success during the 1920's and 1930's. This policy paid dividends during the war. It will not contribute either to the cause of international organization or to a rapidly rising standard of living for the Russian people.

Whether Russia continues to emphasize a self-sufficient defense economy depends on certain conditions over which we and Great Britain have some control. First, will an international security organization emerge that offers Russia, as well as Britain and ourselves, genuine protection against war? Second, are Britain and the United States willing to contribute economic aid to Russia that would underpin the political guaranties? It is impossible to separate the security arrangements agreed upon at San Francisco from the economic arrangements which are the tangible expression of continuing international cooperation. During the war the ever-increasing flow of lend-lease material was tangible evidence of American good faith in the coalition war. A long-term loan would provide similar evidence that cooperation would continue in the peace. Under such circumstances and only under such circumstances is Russia likely to feel secure enough to abandon its isolationist policies.

But why, Congress may ask, should the United States buy Russian cooperation to the tune of six billion dollars? Lend-lease was a matter of national survival; peace-time credits are harder to justify. The answer is twofold. First, it is as much to our benefit as to Russia's to have a workable security system rooted in mutual understanding and cooperation. Second, even though the policy of extending lend-lease into peace-time relations could be justified, Russia is asking only that a repayable loan be made. Russia's record for honoring financial obligations is good. Third, a six-billion-dollar export program to Russia might play an important role in maintaining employment in our vastly expanded heavy industries during the next decade. All these advantages will be lost if we attempt to use our strong bargaining position to force political concessions that Russia fears may endanger its security.

Trieste and San Francisco

BY I. F. STONE

San Francisco, May 20

I DO not wish to be alarmist, and I put this down in the utmost sobriety: it is beginning to seem as if the main business of the United Nations Conference on International Organization is not to write a charter for a stable peace but to condition the American people psychologically for war with the Soviet Union. Three weeks ago this was a mere subterranean political tendency. It has developed at a terrifying rate into the major preoccupation of the press and of the conference. The assumption that sooner or later we shall have to fight a third world war against the U. S. S. R. has become the premise of Anglo-American political maneuvering. It seems to me essential to bring this to public attention as sharply and widely as possible before matters get out of hand.

A few weeks ago anti-Soviet propaganda was conspicuous only in the Hearst and similar papers. The hysteria skilfully generated by these sources and by off-the-record poison to favored correspondents has since spread to more respectable quarters. The four-page special conference edition distributed here by the New York Times has shown a steady decline in objectivity, and this morning's issue was largely taken up with one aspect or another of the red menace. The unspeakable William P. Carney, who so distinguished himself during the Spanish civil war, was back with a cock-and-bull story about "reds win control of America's press," while Edwin L. James, the paper's managing editor, attacked the Russians as "welshers." James B. Reston, No. 1 staff man of the Times at the conference and a first-rate reporter, has lapsed into some febrile and feeble anti-Russian editorializing in what are supposed to be news stories. This press atmosphere, for which the American delegation must bear a heavy responsibility, is hardly calculated to improve relations with the U. S. S. R.

Tongues clack at all the better cocktail parties about the terrible danger of letting the Russians into Central Europe. Archbishop John J. Mitty at a solemn mass this morning at St. Mary's Cathedral, "for the cause of Lithuania," denounced "Russian occupation" of that country as a violation of moral law. All the bitter reactionary left-overs of Eastern Europe, from Poland's Matuszewski to Yugoslavia's Fotich, are playing Paul Revere behind the scenes. Let us imagine that Moscow had a free press and free speech like ours and that while we were meeting there to frame a world organization Trotskyite papers set up a din about capitalist duplicity and orthodox archbishops attacked our government for oppressing Puerto Rico. In such circumstances I doubt whether our delegation, even if it didn't pack up angrily and go home, would be willing to trust American security to Russian promises. It is a useful exercise in international understanding to try to put ourselves in the other fellow's place for a change.

The increasing emphasis here on combating the Soviet menace is accompanied by a mounting series of conflicts in Europe. While Mr. Roosevelt was alive, the United States was a kind of middle man between Britain and Russia, but since his death the British have been able to seize the central position and play us off against the Soviets in typical balance-of-power politics. Mr. Churchill's remark about not handing over Europe to new forms of totalitarianism and police government has been supplemented during the week by General Alexander's nasty ultimatum comparing Tito in Trieste to "Hitler, Mussolini, and Japan." Admittedly there are difficult problems involved, but this is the way one talks to an enemy, not an ally. It is the spirit of "come on and fight," not of "let's sit down and talk this over."

The Trieste crisis has the gravest possibilities and over-shadows everything else here tonight, even the reported surrender of Moscow on our desire for a pan-American regional bloc. This last-minute Russian acquiescence may prove another of the costly victories the American delegation has won at San Francisco. For acceptance of regionalism in this form may easily lay the legal basis, from the very beginning of the new organization, for splitting the world into hostile blocs. My own feeling is that the Russians may have decided that the new organization is not important enough to fight about, and that their wisest course would be to help wind up the conference as rapidly as possible before it causes more trouble. If my hunch is correct, we may also see rapid compromises on some of the other remaining issues. Our delegation is reluctant to pledge itself to "full employment." It does not want a promise of eventual independence for colonies. The Soviets, having reaped the political advantages of their progressive stand on these issues, may be content to let us win a psychic victory on both.

San Francisco's wrangles over organizational details are becoming less and less important except as reflections of deep-seated political difficulties which cannot be sidestepped much longer. Stalin's letter on Poland, with its flat denial that the sixteen arrested underground leaders were invited to confer and its refusal to link their cases with the governmental reorganization promised at Yalta, helps to clear the air on that issue. I am convinced that we must recognize that the diehard elements left in the London Polish government in exile cannot safely be included in any new Polish government and that the Anders army in exile cannot be allowed to return as an army without the risk of civil war in Poland. But I am also convinced that the Russians and the Warsaw Poles are prepared to implement the Yalta pact by taking in leaders who have left the London government in protest against its intransigence, and that on this basis a mutually satisfactory settlement is possible.

Trieste is more difficult and more dangerous. Economically and traditionally it is the natural outlet of Yugoslavia, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Austria to the sea. But though the Istrian Peninsula is overwhelmingly Slovene, Trieste itself is overwhelmingly Italian in population. Trieste stirs the deepest nationalist feeling in both Yugoslavia and Italy. It is one of those problems not really soluble within a nationalist framework, and the ideal solution would be the city's internationalization. But this would require a genuinely international organization and spirit, and San Francisco has yet to provide either. On top of the nationalist clash is the clash in viewpoint between British troops wishing to preserve "order" and revolutionary partisan forces eager to purge all fascist influences, including clerical ones—a point which must alarm the Vatican. A third and perhaps the major element in this formidable situation is British concern over the shift in the European balance of power. This is reflected in the desire to stop Soviet influence at what is being referred to as the Hamburg-Trieste line, the fear of Soviet emergence via Trieste into Mediterranean politics, and an apparent determination to have a "test of strength" at Trieste. Historically the Balkans have proved hazardous places for such "tests." Trieste is not so far from Sarajevo.

Britain, hitherto distinctly unfriendly to Italy, seems to have reversed its position and to be exploiting Italian nationalist sentiment for Trieste. The spectacle of Yugoslavia and Italy at loggerheads in the old familiar way over Trieste is most discouraging to those who had hoped for a new world. But Yugoslav desire for Trieste, hatred for Italy, contempt for the weak way in which the Bonomi government has handled war criminals (several of them wanted in Yugoslavia), and the still fresh memory of all that Yugoslavia suffered under the Axis seem too deep to permit an Italian-Yugoslav agreement that might short-circuit British plans. These conclusions are reached on the basis of an off-the-record talk with a leading Yugoslav delegate here. The Yugoslavs feel that Trieste was freed by their partisans, and while they are ready to provide all military facilities to the British, they want to run the civil administration pending a final territorial settlement at the peace conference. After what happened in Greece I do not blame them.

At the moment, however, these are all minor matters compared with the importance of preventing an armed clash which would end big-power unity and bring the threat of a new world war very close indeed. Trieste, which the Yugoslavs tried to discuss with the British as far back as 1941, is the fruit of the familiar and disastrous policy of postponement. Like a number of similar problems, it cannot be kept on ice until the peace conference. A new meeting of the Big Three is made an immediate necessity by the Trieste crisis, but I do not think it can accomplish much unless President Truman is prepared to take up Mr. Roosevelt's role and mediate between the Russians and the British instead of remaining the tail to Mr. Churchill's giddy new kite.

Austria: Test for the Coalition

BY ERNST KARL WINTER

The Nation regards this analysis of the contemporary political situation in Austria as intensely interesting and illuminating. Dr. Winter would not expect us to be in entire agreement with his interpretation of the role of right and left in Austria's past and present. We will say that we have not seen an article which throws as much light on the situation in Central Europe at the point where present lines of force appear to converge. We are particularly interested that an intelligent Austrian Catholic finds good cause for hope that Austria will become a bridge rather than a barrier between Soviet Russia and the Western democracies.

WHEN the Nazis entered Vienna in March, 1938, the shadow of World War II fell across Europe, though the Western world took little notice of it. When the Red Army entered Vienna in April, 1945, the post-war period of reconstruction began, though few people seem to have grasped that fact. The next phase of world history may reveal in Vienna whether Russian pragmatism will evolve an effective scheme of world organization or follow the road of German irrationalism. Vienna, the old capital of Central Europe, is still its pivot. There not only a new European civilization can be born, but the dream of the centuries, an ecumenical age of Christianity, with West and East not only meeting but amalgamating can perhaps be realized.

As an Austrian Catholic I see here one of the greatest opportunities ever granted to a small people. Austrian Catholics who have stood uncompromisingly against Nazism made up their mind long ago that they must side with Russia against Germany instead of persisting in the ridiculous and suicidal position of fighting a "war on two fronts." Even Schuschnigg, who wanted to save Austria by dealing with Hitler, was sure in the fading days of his power in which direction he would turn if he could start all over again. At my last meeting with him, between his trip to Berchtesgaden and his final capitulation, he confided to me—who had advised him to do so for years—that "if he had the choice," he would take Stalin, not Hitler, and that, he added, "would mean Otto Bauer," then the leader of the Social Democrats in exile. There is no doubt today that even the most conservative Austrian Catholics are ready to give Russia, if it wants it, the chance to organize the Central European world, a task in which both Old Austria and Nazi Germany signally failed.

The first product of the new situation in Austria is the Provisional Government of Dr. Karl Renner, which is really the kind of government political realists have wanted for Austria since 1930. It consists of Social Democratic trade unionists and intellectuals, Communist organizers and propagandists, Christian Socialist peasant leaders, representatives of the lower middle classes and the Christian workers, and several non-partisan experts. Although it is as yet only a government of eastern Austria, it embodies the one practical political development conceivable in Austria since 1918—a coalition between the left and the right.

Semi-officially, it has been said that the new Austrian government violates an agreement entered into by Russia and the two Western powers that Austria should be administered for the time being by an inter-Allied commission. Officially, it has been stated that "the whole question is being taken up with the Russian government" and that therefore nothing further will be said at present. The public has no knowledge whatever of any agreement about Austria made by the Big Three. Was it an "international pact" or simply some kind of "diplomatic understanding"; if the latter, as is probable, did it not foresee that circumstances arising in the course of the liberation of the country might make modifications necessary? Let us assume, for instance, that at the time of the agreement all three partners believed that no representative Austrian political leader would have survived the Nazi occupation and that therefore no government would be possible. When the Russians discovered that this was not the case, were they not justified in allowing Austrian internal politics to take their course without outside interference? In other countries, whenever expediency, military or political, required it, the Western Allies have tolerated a lot of what looked to the outside world like unilateral action by the Russians. Why not also in Austria?

It seems, however, that the "diplomatic understanding" about Austria goes back to the Moscow conference. At that time the independence of Austria was made conditional on the efforts of the Austrians themselves to regain their liberty. I pointed out then, in a letter to the New York Times, how little could be accomplished by promising Austria independence as a reward for good behavior if, as all Austrians knew, independence would have to be granted anyway, for the good of everybody. While the Russians, who may have been the author of the idea, obviously interpreted it as what it was, a means of propaganda, Hull and Eden seriously repeated it as if some kind of international servitude might be imposed upon the Austrians by the World Areopagus. Obviously, the "agreement" to administer Austria by a commission instead of a government was only the consequence of this previous "understanding," which in fact seems to have been a big misunderstanding. For when the Russians entered Vienna, they announced at once to the world that the Austrians had saved their national honor and thus proved worthy of independence. Now the propaganda stage was over and the real business could begin. It seems that the Western Allies did not understand this change. At any rate, while the Russians enabled a national government to come into being which is gradually carrying out far-reaching constitutional changes, the Western Allies stick to obsolete formulas which often only cover inactivity. One cannot help feeling that they have let themselves be maneuvered into a corner, where they can do little to advance their interests.

The idea underlying the new coalition government is basically acceptable to the Western powers. It is the first government formed under Russian auspices upon which the bright light of history falls. Numerically, the balance between the left (Social Democrats and Communists) and the right (Christian Socialists and the non-partisan experts) may be kept, or it may be destroyed if the two leftist parties combine against the one rightist party. Yet if the three Christian Socialist representatives of the peasantry, the lower middle classes, and the Christian workers understand their business—which I, knowing them, do not question in the least—they will be able to reorganize their rank and file both economically and politically under the protection of the coalition government. It may prove much more difficult to restore the unity of the labor movement, now consisting of two parties.

Inasmuch as the Red Army is in eastern Austria, the Communists are in charge of the new Austrian army, the police, and the gendarmerie. They have also taken over the Ministry of Public Instruction and Religion. Strange as it may seem, considering their Marxian dogma, they rely upon military power and intellectual propaganda, while the Christian Socialists, quite like Marxists, are satisfied with positions of economic power. The new Minister of Public Instruction and Religion, Ernst Fischer, seems to be the "strong man" of the new government. He has been a Social Democrat with Communist leanings since the early 1930's. When I tried to aid the formation of a coalition regime in 1933 by bringing Schuschnigg and Bauer together—matters went so far that some younger leaders from both parties planned to meet privately—I proposed to Bauer the inclusion, among others, of Fischer, who was then literary editor of the Social Democratic daily. Bauer, with a sovereign wave of his hand, simply said, "A poet!" Fischer's great passion for many years was to criticize from his position farther to the left the ideology and tactics of Bauer's and Renner's so-called Austro-Marxism, which I tried to interpret positively from my position on the right. In analyzing the historical causality of Austro-Marxism, however, we agreed in many respects, although it was certainly easier for me, who was on the outside, to appraise the labor party objectively. Fischer esteemed at least Bauer's ethical qualities, but Renner for him was never anything more than a "reformist petty bourgeois."

It would be very unfair to hold Fischer to account for everything he has said in communistic pamphlets—many of which were published also in this country until 1940. As the Austrian voice on the Moscow radio during recent years, he proved himself an Austrian patriot such as the Austro-Marxists of the old school, with their Anschluss ideology, never dreamed of being. Moreover, the Communists today are more conservative in many matters concerning school and church, matrimony and family, than the Socialists. Thus I do not think that a Kulturkampf is inevitably in the air. A Communist Minister for Public Instruction and Religion might seem to be the least desirable symbol of cooperation if the political coalition between the left and the right in Austria had not already introduced a new system of tripartite administration of all important public posts—each ministry will contain three party officials. If this system is allowed to grow organically, it will be able to cope with all problems rising out of partisan differences.

The Renner government in Vienna is the first step; the amalgamation of eastern and western Austria will be the next. As these lines are written, two of the traditional provincial governments, both under Social Democratic leadership, have been reestablished—one in Graz, sponsored by the Russians, the other in Klagenfurt, where in a somewhat confused situation the British Eighth Army seems not to have objected to it, while the Yugoslav occupying forces obviously disapprove. Similar provincial governments will probably follow in Linz, Salzburg, Innsbruck, and Bregenz under Christian Socialist leadership. The next natural step will then be an understanding between the central government and these provincial governments. This process should be facilitated by the Western Allies. It would be a calamity beyond measure and repair if political antagonism between centralism and federalism, which are backed now by the different occupying forces, should be allowed to grow into a metaphysical war between communism and Catholicism. I cannot see that either Russia or the Western Allies would profit from such a development.

The Austria of the coming months will be the test case of cooperation. And I mean not only cooperation between the left and the right, between labor and peasantry, between socialism and Christianity, within Austria, but also cooperation between the West and the East, between capitalism and Sovietism on a world scale. As far as Austria is concerned, both kinds of cooperation are strictly interdependent. Since the Russians are actually in Vienna, while the Americans, the British, and the French are only in the provincial capitals, I do not hesitate to say that the main opportunity and the main responsibility rest with the Russians, although the Western Allies can do much to facilitate or hamper progress. If cooperation is finally established, it will not mean that the Russians completely lose the upper hand. If the Western Allies wanted a strictly tripartite regime without anybody on top in Vienna, they should have insisted on a joint Balkan campaign and the consequent liberation of Vienna by the arms of the three Allies. By taking the course they did, they agreed to a "Russian age" in Central Europe which will inevitably affect all Austria. But they still have the chance to make this age, in spite of its predominant color, one of cooperation, in which the factor of military power will gradually retire into the background.

If there is cooperation among the world powers, the western and eastern provinces of Austria will grow together again into a pivotal state which will be so closely interwoven with the destiny of the United Nations that it will be worthy of containing their headquarters. If there is not cooperation, the line between the West and the East will cut straight across the body of Austria, perhaps right through the heart of Vienna. In such an event, the gulf between the two hemispheres of mankind would gape in Austria more terribly than anywhere else. Even then only fatalism would hold that the two halves must be swallowed up in a final catastrophe of this planet, but constructive firmness would be needed to prevent the catastrophe. With this prospect in mind, every decent Austrian will work for cooperation with every ounce of his substance.

The Anatomy of Full Employment

BY LEO BARNES

A GOOD deal of recent post-war planning is either dominated by wishful thinking or based on the rather reckless use of large, over-all figures of national income, output, or employment. It is not uncommon to find serious surveys of post-war national income begin with the assumption of full employment, when the likelihood of full employment after the war should be the very thing to be demonstrated. Similarly, grandiose figures like 60 million jobs, $150 billion national income, and $200 billion gross national product are often airily tossed around with little if any effort to specify the particular items presumably adding up to the impressive totals.

Realistic thinking about jobs after the war calls for much more careful nose-counting. To obtain a reasonable answer to the question, "How are we going to employ a post-war labor force of more than 60 million men and women?" it is first necessary to scrutinize each major industry and occupation with the object of determining its employment potentialities. Only such an examination will enable us to make the distinction which is pivotal to clear thinking about post-war jobs—the distinction between what employment could be and what it probably will be.

The road to understanding how full employment can be reached a few years after the war must be paved with the knowledge of what employment is likely to be in the immediate post-war period. This article will try to throw some light on the possibilities by illuminating the probabilities. Based on an industry-by-industry employment survey, the evidence it offers is certainly not as spectacular as the highly optimistic or pessimistic deductions found in much post-war planning that has blossomed forth in print. However, it can be far more useful for effective planning to achieve the "economic equivalent of war."

What does this evidence show?

First, it shows that the immediate post-war period will be one of moderately high but definitely not full employment. For the first "normal" peace-time year, after demobilization and reconversion adjustments, a realistic employment prospect is about 55.5 million jobs of all kinds. This means unemployment of about 5 million, rather than the 1.5 million assumed in optimistic post-war speculation.

Second, the evidence shows that reducing transition unemployment to 5 million will not be the achievement of private enterprise alone, even if it is aided by a strong replenishment demand for goods. The prognosis of 55.5 million jobs includes more than 7 million persons on the civilian and military pay rolls of the federal and local governments, and several million more in private industry whose jobs directly or ultimately depend on government spending.

Third, the long-run implication of the evidence is that, once the post-war replenishment boomlet subsides, maintaining 55 million jobs will require substantial government planning and intervention in the economy. Correspondingly, to raise employment to 60 million jobs and keep it there will demand even more thoroughgoing government direction of our economic life.

I

The nose-counting on which these conclusions are based is summarized in the two tables on the following page. The method by which the counting was done is explained in Part II. The implications of the nose-counting are analyzed in Part III.

The two tables are not as forbidding as they may at first seem to the non-technical reader. They tell a tale worth the small effort that may be required to use them. Both are studies in comparative anatomy—of the structure of American pre-war, war, and post-war employment. Table I indicates job figures for the seventeen main types of occupation in which working Americans earn their livelihood. Table II is a more detailed breakdown of manufacturing—the largest single field of employment—into twenty-one major industry categories. In each table the five columns show the same relationships.

Column A gives employment figures for the various occupations as computed by the 1940 Census, the most reliable estimate of employment yet made in the United States. Column B looks back through the previous forty years to discover the best pre-war peace-time employment record for each occupation. In those cases in which 1940 was a depressed year for a particular type of business activity, this maximum employment figure serves to indicate the pre-war employment peak for that occupation. As a rule, the closer to 1940 the date next to a figure in Column B the more reliable it is as an indicator of possible post-war employment. Column C portrays the impact of World War II on employment in each of the listed occupations. In most cases employment has been significantly expanded over 1940, but a few less essential occupations show a decline. Taken together, Columns A, B, and C reveal what the maximum employment capacity of each occupation or industry has been up to now. They offer standards by which to judge the figures in Columns D and E.

Column D is a breakdown of what full employment would reasonably require in the way of jobs in each occupation. President Roosevelt's and Secretary of Commerce Wallace's objective of 60 million post-war jobs is used as the full employment target because that is the goal in terms of which we are going to be thinking during the next four years. About 11 million more jobs than in 1940 are required to reach this goal. The exact proportion of these 11 million jobs assigned to each type of occupation represents my judgment of the maximum increase in employment in each field under highly optimistic assumptions of post-war business activity. Finally, Column E lists my own "guesstimates" of what average employment in each category will probably be in the first "normal" post-war year. The reasoning on which these estimates are based is explained in Part II.

TABLE I. THE ANATOMY OF AMERICAN EMPLOYMENT

	A March, 1940, Census figures of employment	B Highest pre-war peace-time employment <sup>1</sup>	C Highest employment in World War II <sup>2</sup>	D Hypothetical employment required for 60 million jobs in 1947-48 <sup>3</sup>	E Probable employment in 1947-48 <sup>4</sup>
(Millions of Workers)
Manufacturing <sup>5</sup> .....	10.6	11.2 (1940)	17.2 (1943)	14.7	12.4
Mining .....	.9	1.3 (1918)	.9 (1943)	.9	.8
Construction .....	2.0	3.5 (1926)	2.2 (1942)	3.7	3.2
Transportation .....	2.2	2.6 (1920)	2.8 (1944)	2.8	2.5
Communication .....	.4	.5 (1929)	.4 (1943)	.5	.4
Public Utilities .....	.5	.7 (1929)	.6 (1943)	.6	.5
Wholesale and Retail Trade .....	7.5	7.5 (1940)	7.1 (1944)	8.3	7.8
Finance, Insurance and Real Estate .....	1.5	2.0 (1929)	1.3 (1944)	1.7	1.6
Business and Repair Services .....	.9	.9 (1940)	.8 (1944)	1.0	1.0
Personal Services .....	4.0	4.0 (1940)	3.5 (1944)	4.3	4.1
Amusement, Recreation, and Related Service .....	.4	.4 (1940)	.3 (1944)	.5	.4
Professional, Educational, etc., Services ...	3.3	3.3 (1940)	2.7 (1942)	3.7	3.5
Miscellaneous Private Employment .....	.7	.7 (1940)	.7 (1944)	.7	.7
Agriculture, Forestry, and Fishing .....	9.5 <sup>4</sup>	11.8 (1910) <sup>4</sup>	9.7 (1942) <sup>4</sup>	10.0	9.5
Gov't Employees Not Elsewhere Classified	1.8	1.8 (1940)	3.8 (1943)	2.1	2.0
Total Regular Civilian Employment..	46.2	46.5 (1929)	54.4 (1943)	55.5	50.5
Emergency Public Works, etc.....	2.7	3.6 (1936)	0	2.0	2.5
Total Civilian Employment .....	48.9	48.9 (1940)	54.4 (1943)	57.5	53.0
Armed Forces .....	.3	2.0 (1940)	12.2 (1945)	2.5	2.5
Total Employment .....	49.2	49.2 (1940)	64.0 (1944)	60.0	55.5
Total Unemployment .....	6.2	.5 (1916)	.6 (1944)	1.5	5.0
Total Labor Force .....	55.4	55.4 (1940)	64.8 (1944)	61.5	60.5<sup>4</sup>

TABLE II. DETAILED BREAKDOWN OF MANUFACTURING EMPLOYMENT

Durable Goods .....	5.0	5.6 (1940)	10.3 (1943)	7.8	6.4
Iron and Steel and Their Products...	1.3	1.3 (1937)	1.9 (1943)	1.6	1.4
Electrical Machinery .....	.4	.5 (1929)	.9 (1943)	.8	.6
Machinery Other Than Electrical ....	.7	.7 (1929)	1.6 (1943)	1.0	.8
Automotive Industries .....	.6	.7 (1937)	.9 (1943)	.9	.8
Transportation and Equipment
Other Than Automobiles .....	.3	.3 (1940)	2.6 (1943)	.7	.5
Non-ferrous Metals and Products ....	.3	.3 (1940)	.6 (1943)	.5	.4
Lumber and Timber Basic Products ..	.6	.9 (1923)	.6 (1942)	.8	.7
Furniture and Equipment .....	.4	.4 (1929)	.4 (1942)	.6	.5
Stone, Clay, and Glass Products.....	.3	.4 (1926)	.5 (1943)	.6	.5
Miscellaneous Durable Goods .....	.1	.1 (1940)	.3 (1943)	.3	.2
Non-Durable Goods .....	5.6	5.6 (1937)	6.2 (1943)	6.9	6.0
Textile Mill Products .....	1.2	1.2 (1923)	1.2 (1942)	1.4	1.2
Apparel and Finished Textiles .....	.8	.9 (1937)	.9 (1943)	1.0	.9
Leather and Leather Products .....	.4	.4 (1919)	.4 (1942)	.4	.4
Food and Kindred Products .....	1.1	1.1 (1937)	1.2 (1943)	1.4	1.2
Tobacco Manufactures .....	.1	.2 (1919)	.1 (1942)	.1	.1
Paper and Allied Products .....	.3	.3 (1940)	.3 (1943)	.4	.3
Printing, Publishing, etc. ....	.6	.6 (1937)	.6 (1943)	.7	.6
Chemical and Allied Products .....	.4	.4 (1940)	.8 (1943)	.7	.6
Petroleum and Coal Products .....	.2	.2 (1937)	.1 (1942)	.3	.2
Rubber Products .....	.2	.2 (1928)	.2 (1943)	.2	.2
Miscellaneous Industries .....	.3	.3 (1940)	.4 (1943)	.3	.3
Total Manufacturing .....	10.6	11.2 (1940)	17.2 (1943)	14.7	12.4

<sup>1</sup> Figures in this column are not to be added to each other because they may refer to different dates. Total unemployment figures are minimums.

<sup>2</sup> 1947 or 1948 is assumed to be the first "normal" peace-time year, depending on the length of the war with Japan. Estimates are averages for the year.

<sup>3</sup> See Table II for detailed breakdown of manufacturing employment.

<sup>4</sup> Average for the year is indicated for agriculture because of wide seasonal disparities in employment.

<sup>5</sup> The total post-war labor force is a million less in Column E than it is in Column D since the more jobs there are available, the higher the potential labor force. This is because, when work is easier to get, the normal labor force is augmented by additional people looking for extra earnings.

II

How are the results in Column E of the preceding tables derived? The answer to this question will also be an explanation of why I believe the more optimistic figures in Column D will remain a target to shoot at for a long time after the war.

The estimates for 1947-48 are arrived at largely by balancing the chief factors which create additional employment against those which are likely to create unemployment. Five pairs of opposing factors in the tug-of-war to maintain employment were considered:

Employment Creating	Unemployment Creating
1. Increase in demand for particular products or services.	Decrease in demand for particular products or services.
2. Adequate supply of all necessary factors of production (the five M's—men, machines, materials, money, and management).	"Bottlenecks" in one or more of the factors of production.
3. Unrestricted competition and ease of new entry in an industry.	Monopolistic and semi-monopolistic conditions in an industry.
4. Reduction in average working time in an occupation.	Increase in average working time.
5. Decrease in productivity in an occupation.	Increase in productivity.

Estimating potential demand for particular products and services (Factor 1) is a good starting-point for calculating post-war employment. This is so even though, ordinarily, trying to deduce employment from demand is like a dog chasing its tail. Employment depends on demand, to be sure; but effective demand is also largely determined by the general level of employment. However, because of the huge backlog of demand for many types of both consumers' and producers' goods not available during the war, this approach is, for the immediate post-war period, substantially less fallacious than usual.

Data on prospective post-war demand for different types of goods and services cannot, of course, be immediately translated into employment figures. It is first necessary to answer two other questions: (a) How much of the demand will, in fact, be satisfied—that is, become effective demand? (b) To what extent is this effective demand likely to be satisfied without increasing employment? These questions are answered by weighing the influence of the other four factors listed above in particular industries and occupations. Limitations of space prevent recapitulating this procedure for each of the thirty-seven major categories of employment. However, an analysis of the automobile industry will illustrate the general technique.

There is little doubt, if only because automobile production will have been suspended for at least four years, that the prospective demand for cars after the war will be unprecedented. Some observers calculate a backlog of demand as high as 23 million automobiles. To be quite conservative, let us say that it is only half that, or about 12 million cars. As now constituted, the industry just does not have the physical capacity to produce that many cars a year (Factor 2). Moreover, members of the industry undoubtedly are not too interested in expanding capacity to make that many vehicles a year. Their motive is simple: why kill off an excellent post-war market in one year?

This brings up Factor 3, the state of competition. The more competitive the relationship among firms in an industry, and the easier it is for new firms to come into it, the more closely will production usually approach the output permitted by theoretical capacity. On the other hand, where internal competition is restricted, or where it is hard, because of technological, financial, or patent difficulties, for newcomers to enter an industry, production is usually kept down—and prices kept up—without technically running afoul of the anti-trust laws. If it were as easy to go into automobile manufacturing as, for instance, into radio manufacturing—for which little more than a soldering iron and a work bench is required—many more automobiles would be produced in 1947-48 than actually will be.

Accordingly, as a result of these two factors—limited capacity and lack of industry enthusiasm for expansion—automobile production immediately after the war will probably not be much more than 6,000,000 cars and 1,500,000 trucks a year.

The next problem is: to what extent can this effective demand be satisfied without increasing employment in the automobile industry? The answer is determined by the adequacy and efficiency of the automobile industry's labor force and productive machinery (Factors 4 and 5). The fact that approximately 600,000 workers could turn out 3,700,000 cars, about 800,000 trucks, and related automobile equipment in 1940, does not mean that 6,000,000 cars, 1,500,000 trucks, and corresponding related equipment would require almost twice that many workers. It is on as simple an error as this that many optimistic forecasts of post-war employment seem to be based.

In the first place, many of the 600,000 workers were not on the job full time in 1940, either on a weekly or on a yearly basis. Probably 4,000,000 to 4,300,000 cars and 1,000,000 trucks could be turned out by about the same labor force just by having everybody work five eight-hour days a week, fifty weeks in the year. In the second place, as output approaches optimum capacity, productivity per worker also rises, even without startling technological innovations. This might account for another 100,000 cars and 50,000 trucks. Finally, technological improvements between 1940 and 1947 will certainly increase output per man-hour. Normally, this type of productivity increase is figured at about 2 per cent per year and would therefore be from 14 to 16 per cent for the period from 1940 to 1947-48. However, because of the interruption in automobile production during the war and the consequent loss of both management and labor "know how," let us be more conservative and assume only about a 10 per cent rise in productivity over the pre-war period.

The interplay of these factors results in totals of between 4,500,000 and 4,800,000 cars and between 1,000,000 and 1,200,000 trucks that can be produced in 1947 or 1948 by approximately the same number of workers that produced 3,700,000 cars and 800,000 trucks in 1940. On the same basis, to turn out 6,000,000 cars, 1,500,000 trucks, and the related equipment in 1947 or 1948, only about one-quarter more workers would be needed than in 1940—or fewer than 800,000.*

III

What does all this painstaking nose-counting add up to? What are its implications for post-war thinking?

1. The size of the probable immediate post-war achievement. While the estimate of 55.5 millions as the probable total of all types of employment, including public works and the armed forces, in the first "normal" peace-time year is 4.5 million less than 60 million jobs, it is decidedly not pessimistic—for 1947-48. It represents about 6 million more jobs than were ever before available in this country in time of peace. Of course, about one-third of this 6-million-job gain is accounted for by the anticipated growth of the regular armed forces from .3 to 2.5 millions. None the less, the figure of 53 million civilian jobs is about 4 million more than in 1940, our best pre-war employment year, and compares favorably with the war-time peak of 54.4 million civilian workers reached in the winter of 1943.

How is this anticipated advance of 4 million in civilian employment over pre-war levels distributed among various occupations? More than one-quarter of the increase, or about 1.2 million jobs, is attributed to a substantial expansion of construction and housing activity. Expansion of manufacturing industries also accounts for an increase of more than 1 million jobs; but in percentage terms the expected total for 1947-48 is only about 10 per cent more than the 1940 peak, or a much smaller gain than the projected 60 per cent jump in construction employment over 1940. Practically all the rest of the increase in jobs is traced to moderate expansion in trade, transportation, and professional and government employment.

2. The economic compulsives of 60 million jobs. The size of our probable post-war initial accomplishment compared to the pre-war record highlights the boldness of the Roosevelt-Wallace target of 60 million jobs. This goal requires 11 million more jobs of all kinds, and about 8.5 million more civilian jobs, than we had in 1940. It calls for at least 3 million more civilian jobs than we had at top war employment in 1943.

To be sure, in terms of over-all percentages, providing 60 million jobs may not seem too tremendous a task; 8.5 million more civilian jobs than the 48.9 millions of 1940 is less than a 20 per cent increase. However, our survey shows that, barring resort to work-sharing through a compulsory and substantial cut in the standard work-week, many types of occupation cannot be expected to contribute this much of an increase. Practically no additional jobs are to be looked for from agriculture, forestry, fishing, or mining. Similarly, only negligible increases are to be expected from public utilities, communications, finance and insurance, and personal and other non-professional services.

The overwhelming bulk of the necessary 8.5 million additional civilian jobs must therefore come from manufacturing, construction, trade, the professions, and government service. These occupations employed about 28 million persons in 1940: They would have to employ at least 36 million to furnish 60 million jobs for the economy as a whole. To the extent that certain of these selected occupations failed to achieve this average increase of about 30 per cent, others would have to make up the deficit. Even if, as the National Association of Manufacturers has predicted, manufacturing employment should for a time jump 25 per cent above pre-war levels, there seems little likelihood that other occupations, except construction, will be able to equal or maintain this pace.

3. What level of employment could be sustained without government control over the economy? The implication of the preceding analysis is not defeatism. It is rather that providing 60 million jobs requires considerable government intervention in economic life. Aware of this, both liberal and conservative post-war planners have claimed that a less ambitious goal—ambiguously called "high-level employment"—might be achieved and maintained without such intervention. The evidence of the present survey casts doubt upon even this more modest possibility.

Those who are hopeful about the job-making capacity of private enterprise after the war usually emphasize the role that more than $100 billion in war savings will play in stimulating business. Doubtless the existence of many kinds of demand frustrated by war shortages and partly represented by these billions in war savings will exert strong upward pressure on output and income after the war. However, this pressure will be offset by reconversion and demobilization unemployment, by technological innovations spurred by higher labor costs, and by business reluctance to expand output and thus "kill the goose that lays the golden eggs." Accordingly, while the probabilities point to somewhat higher post-war production and employment figures in most lines than corresponding pre-war peaks, the totals are likely to be well below some of the sensational amounts proclaimed by optimistic economists and business spokesmen.

Of course, replenishment spending after the war will undoubtedly bring ample profits to business and a sort of spotty prosperity to many workers. If the comparatively moderate unemployment that is to be expected in this period can be rotated among enough persons, and if unemployment benefits are more widely available than before the war, the dangerous illusion of the possibility of a smoothly functioning, uncontrolled private-enterprise economy might well prevail again.

4. What happens after the post-war replenishment boomlet? This article does not pretend to furnish any clue either to the duration of the replenishment boomlet or to the level of employment in the years following its collapse. However, it is for this more remote period that the author reserves his gravest doubts about the job-creating abilities of the private-enterprise system. Temporarily achieving a high level of employment after five years of durable-goods starvation is no great economic accomplishment. Permanently sustaining that level of employment would be. In the coming replenishment spree our chief intellectual danger will be confusing these two very different goals. Thereby we may forget the basic economic lesson of our generation—that a huge and complicated economy like ours cannot be run successfully on the laissez faire philosophy of the nineteenth century.

*In addition to the specific factors examined in the analysis above, there are, of course, other more general conditions which help determine employment through their influence on the economy as a whole. It has not been possible to consider them here. However, such over-all influences as the current political atmosphere, the prevailing level of wages and prices, the length of the average working day and week, and the impact of taxes on business initiative and investment are not expected to change so markedly that their combined effect will substantially increase or decrease employment by 1947-48.

To achieve and maintain full employment in a free society is the challenge confronting the post-war world. Henry Wallace has jestingly remarked that since war brings full employment, America ought to declare a permanent state of war against the Pacific Ocean. This is a grimly humorous way of saying that we must find the full economic equivalent of war if our social system is to survive. In that quest both wishful optimism and unwarranted pessimism—against both of which this article has been directed—are psychological obstacles that must be overcome.

Sustained full employment is neither certain nor impossible in a free society. But it will require far more cooperation among management, labor, and government than we have ever had except in war. The economic equivalent of war will require some, at least, of the economic organization of war. Management and labor in Great Britain, France, and other democracies seem to have learned this lesson. It is to be hoped that their American counterparts will not need another depression to teach them.

Chicago's Un-American Guests

BY MILBURN P. AKERS

Chicago, May 17

GERALD L. K. SMITH, the somewhat shopworn rabble-rouser from the Middle West, is now seeking to practice on the delegates to the United Nations conference at San Francisco the art he learned in Louisiana's canebrakes as a disciple of Huey Long. The ebullient Mr. Smith, who has ridden a number of different horses in his various attempts to be the man on horseback, is not, however, the only one of his coterie at present kibitzing the conference; he is, as is his wont, merely the loudest. The conference has largely rid Chicago of the nationalists, anti-Semites, and others of like breed who make it their headquarters. If it were not for the Chicago Tribune's daily dose of poison, the old town would not seem the same.

The trek of the hate-mongers to San Francisco, there to advise the assembled delegates to cease and desist, has delayed the investigation by a committee of the Illinois Senate into the mail-order business they conduct on a national scale. The delay, however, will not be more than temporary, and while it is awaiting the return of the principals, the committee intends to put in its time examining a few of the small fry who didn't have the price of a ticket to 'Frisco.

Smith's ultimatum to Senator Vandenberg, who he says will be retired from public life if he returns to Michigan next year with a record "of having approved the savagery of Russia, the imperialism of Britain, and the secret deals of Yalta," is old stuff. Smith has been delivering ultimatums right and left for some time. Both the Democratic and the Republican National Convention received them last summer, but neither paid much attention. In fact, Smith didn't expect them to, any more than he expects conference delegates to take time to listen to him. He's too smart for that. But it goes over big with his followers. His presence at the conference, his ultimatum to Vandenberg, his invitation to the delegates to hear him speak are but material for his next series of speeches. His old theme, largely a philippic against President Roosevelt, no longer serves.

If the investigation ordered by the Illinois Senate without a dissenting vote goes through according to schedule, it will be the first exposé by a public agency of the many anti-Semitic, anti-Negro, anti-United Nations groups which have flooded the country for so long with the product of their poison pens and psychopathic minds. One Ainslee E. Horney of Chicago brought about the Senate's action by sending to the legislators a pamphlet attacking a pending bill for a state Fair Employment Practice Commission as "a Jewish conspiracy to force employers to employ Jews and Jew refugees." Signed "The Hoosier Patriot," the pamphlet gave no indication of its source except for the statement that it had been printed by "The Hoosier Press, P. O. Box 32, Hammond, Ind." The Chicago Sun promptly exposed "The Hoosier Patriot" as none other than Horney, a North Side Chicagoan with a long record of anti-Semitism. So far as the newspaper could discover, Horney makes his living, which appears to be a pretty good one, dispensing hate in one form or another.

After the Sun had published its findings, the Senate determined to go into the matter more comprehensively. A resolution presented by Senator Richard J. Daley, Democratic minority leader, and adopted unanimously authorizes an investigation into anything and everything un-American in the state of Illinois and gives the investigating committee the power of subpoena. Lieutenant Governor Hugh Cross, a Republican, promptly appointed a committee of five, three Republicans and two Democrats. The committee chose Senator Daley, a minority member, as chairman.

If the Daley committee goes all the way down the line, it has a big job cut out, one that may expose to public view not only the scores of small fry who purvey hate and scurrilities but also the Thyssens who provide the cash for their sordid activities. It may also demonstrate what many have long suspected—an interlocking directorate of racial agitators, extreme isolationists, and some subversive groups.

Powerful influences are already at work to keep the committee from doing more than merely scratch the surface. Daley, however, a young Irishman from back o' the yards, as the Chicagoans say, is not one to be easily scared. He is a lawyer who grew up in the rough and tumble of politics in the stockyards district. He is a fighter. And he appears to be honestly concerned over the damage done by the "lunatic fringe" not only in aggravating racial problems in America but in fanning the isolationist elements now poised for an attack upon the results of the San Francisco conference.

By following Horney's trail the committee will come across many another agitator small and big. The Hoosier Patriot, for example, is an associate of Mrs. Elizabeth Dilling, author of "The Red Network," and of other defendants in the recent Washington sedition trial. He is an associate of Charles Hudson, who contributes to the Gentile News, a monthly tabloid of hate and innuendo published at 30 North LaSalle Street, Chicago, by Eugene R. Flitcraft, whose nefarious Gentile Cooperative Association recently lost its state charter. The court, in revoking the charter, described the association as similar to the Ku Klux Klan, the Silver Shirts, and "other subversive groups." The Gentile News, which features the recently inaugurated "Nationalistic News Service" of Gerald L. K. Smith, also carries advertisements for Horney's Hoosier Press, which has produced several virulent anti-Semitic works.

The Horney trail leads also to Earl Southard, secretary of the Citizens' U. S. A. Committee, a rabidly isolationist outfit headed by Captain William J. Grace. Southard, it is known, aided Horney in establishing the "blind" at Hammond, Indiana, the supposed headquarters of the Hoosier Press. An investigation disclosed that the only tangible evidence of the press in that city is Post Office Box 32. Inevitably Mrs. Lyril Van Hynning, president of the hysterical "We, the Mothers" group, will be brought into the investigation. Her organization countered the Big Three's demands for unconditional surrender of the Axis with pleas for a negotiated peace.

Many similar organizations have made Chicago their headquarters—anti-Semitic, anti-Negro, anti-United Nations, or all three. For it is a peculiarity of these groups that while they specialize in one particular form of hate, they exclude few prejudices of any kind. At a meeting of one of the better-organized groups, you can usually obtain the literature of several others. With diatribes against the Jews are distributed copies of Gerald L. K. Smith's The Cross and the Flag, of Charles Hudson's America in Danger, or perhaps of We, the Mothers' publication, the Women's Voice. The Broom, an anti-Semitic sheet published at San Diego, California, is given out with the National Record, the literary effort of former Senator Robert Reynolds.

Though it has been described as the "Munich of America" because it harbors so many hate-mongering groups, Chicago is not strongly affected by them: the city gave President Roosevelt an overwhelming plurality last November, one sufficiently large to overcome the adverse vote in other parts of the state. The organizations in question simply use Chicago as headquarters; they pour their literature chiefly into the hinterland of America, where it seems to be more potent. That is why the investigation the Daley committee has embarked on has national significance. If it can uncover the sources of the funds used by these groups, if it can demonstrate the interlocking directorate, and if it can bring the Führers, the real ones, not the noisy ones, into public view, it may succeed in purging American life of some of its most unwholesome elements.

In the Wind

JOHN O'DONNELL, Washington columnist of the New York Daily News, on April 25 defended the acquittal of three drunken men, two of them privates A.W.O.L., who set fire to the packing shed of an American farmer of Japanese descent, on the ground that "this is a white man's country." The acquittal, said O'Donnell, reflects "the honest thought of the people." The editors of the News, however, apparently didn't think so; for after the first edition that paragraph disappeared from the column and was replaced by a picture of Sir Anthony Eden and Sir Alexander Cadogan.

THIRTY-FOUR BILLS for tax-supported health-insurance programs have been introduced in the legislatures of twenty states thus far this year. Only sixty-six such bills were introduced in the ten-year period 1935-44.

ARGENTINE MOTORISTS, the only ones in the Western Hemisphere who still drive on the left side of the road, will move to the right June 10. Does this represent another triumph for our State Department?

"WHAT GOOD," asks the London New Statesman and Nation of April 21, "can come of a non-fraternization order which is said to have been defined by an American commander who told his troops that they might spend the night with a German girl but must not stay for breakfast?"

PRINTERS' INK, an advertising trade publication, reports in its issue of May 11 that Northwestern newspapers are now carrying twice the usual number of war-time ads offering homes for sale. It estimates that 15,000 war workers have left the region within the last three months.

WHY WE FIGHT—from the Charlotte, North Carolina, Observer of May 13: "The three billion Russians a year who used to see movies before the war don't know Van Johnson. Or Ruth Hussey, Betty Hutton, or June Allyson, for that matter. Why, it's enough to make a movie fan wonder what in the world Russia is fighting for!"

TAMMANY HALL has retained the public-relations firm of Russell H. Potter Associates, not only for the coming mayoralty campaign but on a continuing basis. The old Tammany regulars are said to be greatly disturbed by the fact that Mr. Potter is a Republican and a resident of Connecticut. He will try to erase the word "Tammany" from the public consciousness—he wants people to call it the "New York County Democratic Committee."

LEGISLATIVE MEMO: The House Appropriations Committee is seriously considering a $500,000 cut in the appropriation of the National Labor Relations Board for 1946. Also three riders which would protect collusive contracts with company unions and prohibit the use of NLRB funds in cases involving foremen or food-processing workers.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.]

France at This Moment

Its Role at the Conference

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

San Francisco, May 17

THE fourth week of the conference has formally re-established France as a great power. The "Big Four" has become the "Big Five," and the "in due course" clause of the Dumbarton Oaks draft, which might have delayed the seating of France as a permanent member of the Security Council, was deleted "amid the enthusiastic applause of the committee in charge of constructing the World Charter"—according to the committee's own communiqué. Those who grieved with France in its years of trial will join in the applause.

But once that has been said, an objective analysis of the role played by France in the conference seems indispensable. France is far too important for future developments in Europe to limit comment to a simple statement of congratulation.

The position of France at the conference was not easy. Right or wrong, it had refused to become a sponsoring power. And from the day its delegation arrived, it was evident that it did not wish to seek a position which it had declined of its own free will. Not being a sponsoring power, it did not feel like taking the initiative on any of the controversial issues arising out of the Yalta meeting. The delegation hinted in a passing remark that had France been taken into the confidence of the Big Three at the Crimea parley, it might have provided a solution for the difficult Polish question. It was not stated what the French proposal might have been. With the primary objective of becoming, as rapidly as possible, a member of the "Big Five," the French delegation firmly adopted a course that would not antagonize the United States, Great Britain, or Russia. China, the remaining big power, had taken a similar attitude. France gave battle, therefore, on a problem of secondary importance having no explosive content. The question of making the French language an official language of the conference could not be resented by anyone. After all, those delegates who might not wish to sit through the monotony of translations were perfectly free to leave the room. It was a small easy victory, but it apparently made the French delegation very happy.

All would have proceeded smoothly if the question of the admission of Argentina had not come up to shake the delegation's decision not to take sides on matters which did not affect France directly. But Molotov's opposition to the admission of a fascist Argentina, before the charges against it, beginning with those of the United States, had been cleared up, did upset the program of the French. In the meeting of the steering committee M. Bidault sat by in discreet silence as the discussion became heated until a direct question put by the Russian first delegate, "Has the Foreign Minister of France nothing to say?" forced him to speak a few hesitating words. His hesitation became more evident and even more painful in the public session. M. Bidault abstained from voting on Mr. Molotov's motion for a delay in the invitation to Argentina. But once the motion had been turned down, M. Bidault voted for admission. It was a bad moment for all of us who had been spiritually on the side of the French during the magnificent epic of the resistance.

Among those who deeply regretted this scene was surely M. Bidault himself. Of all the delegation chiefs seated at the conference, he was the only one who had come directly from the resistance. From 1941 to 1944 Georges Bidault had been one of the most courageous fighters against the Nazis. He undertook missions of extreme risk and inspired such confidence that he was named chief of the National Resistance Council of France. He was no last-minute antifascist. In his newspaper l'Aube (the Dawn), during the Spanish war, he had attacked the policy of non-intervention and had denounced Munich as the suicide of the Western democracies. His group of Catholic Democrats had a more courageous and consistent foreign policy than the Radical Socialists. He has not changed. Before he left San Francisco I talked to him at length, and enjoyed the subtlety of his thinking, his sincerity when he warned against the belief that fascism is dead and the fascist threat a bad dream of the past. He is as intelligent as he is honest. But he follows a policy that was decided upon in Paris, and he carries it forward with the loyalty natural in a man of his stature, without giving any sign of dissent. That policy, as I have said, has as its supreme goal the assurance for France of the position of a great power. The key to the whole situation is found in that policy.

Wherever the French delegation could take a progressive position without embarrassing the Anglo-Saxon powers, it has done so. The delegation expressed disapproval of the steering committee's decision not to permit the World Trade Union Congress to participate in an advisory capacity in the work of the conference. It used that opportunity to point out that France was in favor of inviting to the conference not only inter-governmental organizations but also those great international organizations which speak for the people.

In the third committee, the one charged with the formulation of measures to insure the decisions of the Security Council, Paul Boncour vigorously pressed his old demand for the organization of an international force which, if it had been authorized at Geneva in 1932 by the Disarmament Conference, might have stopped the aggressors in time. On several other questions the French delegates have taken a genuinely progressive stand. But as soon as they realized the British position on colonies, they put back into their pockets the only really revolutionary idea they had brought to San Francisco—the plan for a federal empire. Under this plan a French Union would replace the French empire, and millions of French colonials would gain French citizenship. Each colony would be given a considerable degree of autonomy and have its own parliament. The presentation of this new colonial policy at San Francisco would have been sensational. An impressive document of more than twenty pages was ready to be published. But the contrast between this plan and the farce presented at the conference, beginning with the silly trick of calling mandates trusteeships, would have been too extreme; and René Plevin, French Minister of Finance and National Economy, decided that its submission at this moment would be inopportune.

Talking intimately and off the record, French delegates explain that France has no alternative but to try to get along with the two big Anglo-Saxon powers until its international position becomes stronger. They point out that while nominally since the Crimea parley France has been one of the Big Five, all the problems of the occupation of Germany were decided without it. Only at the last moment Bidault received assurances from Secretary Stettinius in regard to its claim to occupy the left bank of the Rhine and its demand for a ban on the reconstruction of the Krupp factories, which have armed all German armies of the past. The same holds true for the Pacific. The French have four divisions ready to go to the Pacific, but their repeated requests have been turned down by the Allied combined chiefs of staff. This may be merely a consequence of the ambiguity still prevailing as to the geographical limits of the respective commands of Admiral Lord Louis Mountbatten, Allied commander-in-chief in Southwest Asia, and General Albert C. Wedemeyer, American commander in China, since Indo-China lies in a doubtful area between the two. But the French are sensitive and easily attribute a suspicious motive to any obstacle imposed by the other great powers. It was difficult for the American delegation to convince the French that Indo-China was considered a part of the French empire, and that the United States did not dream of appropriating this territory. The mere fact that Marshal Smuts, about a year and a half ago, questioned the capacity of France to become a great power again has made him, in the eyes of the French, the most hated man after the Germans. We thought then that the Marshal was wrong, but the French reaction seems a little exaggerated.

Our French friends should keep in mind that today France is great in the eyes of the world not because of the empire, or its place in the Security Council, but because of its splendid rebirth after Nazi occupation, its repudiation of Vichy treason, and its leadership in the struggle for liberation. Jean-Jacques Mayoux was right when, in the middle of the battle, while still in North Africa, he wrote in Franc Tireur of the "Jacobin greatness" of France. The real greatness of France speaks in the voice of the resistance, and it is that voice we missed in San Francisco. We do not ask France to become the enfant terrible, the trouble-maker, of the conference, the leader of a bloc of small nations, as some wanted. But we had hoped that what has happened in France in the last four terrible years would find some form of expression in San Francisco. If the delegation had spoken for the French resistance, it would have spoken at the same time for all the liberated peoples of Europe.

Paul Boncour said to me, "We are a devastated country." René Plevin let figures speak: "The war damage in France amounts to twenty billion work hours, representing two million men working for four full years." But the reconstruction can also be accomplished under the banner of resistance, with the spirit which inspired the struggle and made France rise again with unbelievable rapidity. The French people understood it that way. While the resistance is not heard in San Francisco, in France itself the people voted in its favor. Eighty-five per cent of the municipal council posts went to the resistance. Among those most surprised were many of the French delegates themselves. But at least one of them, the Communist Minister François Billoux, knew better. He had expressed to me his certainty that the left would win by a strong margin. More surprised and surely more disappointed must have been the distinguished gentlemen of the Quai d'Orsay who hurry through the lobby of the St. Francis Hotel. They were supposed to have been swept away in the tremendous political upheaval of 1939, but they have reappeared, aggressive and complacent, speaking as they did eight years ago of "political realism." Do they mean perhaps the political realism of the Daladier government, which led to the débâcle of 1940?

In their elections the people of France have said what their foreign policy must be. They have corrected the mistake made at San Francisco. Some people will say these were only municipal elections. But in Spain it was the municipal elections of 1931 that brought about the fall of the monarchy and the formation of a republic. General de Gaulle at least has understood. In his speech of May 15, two days after the second balloting, he did not end with the habitual, "Long Live France." He added, "Long live the Republic! Long live the Resistance!"

The Elections Interpreted

BY JULES MOCH

Paris, April 22

THE men and women of France have voted. No woman, and no man under twenty-nine, had ever cast a vote before—younger men were not yet twenty-one at the time of the last elections. Taking into account the million men in the armed forces, who in France have no vote, and the more than two million prisoners and political and Jewish deportees still to be liberated, that means that three-quarters of the electoral body came to the polls without previous voting experience. It seemed scarcely possible that this large number of novices, voting under unusual and difficult conditions, could get the democratic machine in motion again after eight years of disuse. Everything went smoothly, however, and no incidents were reported.

Certain groups had feared that the women, far more than the men, would be influenced by the Catholic church or swayed by emotional appeals. Their fears were groundless. There was no increase in the proportion of clerical votes. In some communities special ballot boxes were set up for the women, and there it was seen that they voted much like the men. French women voted not as women but according to their class and environment.

The whole electoral body displayed the political maturity of the old French democracy; four years of Nazi propaganda had had no effect.

With the exception of Paris, where proportional representation was tried out for the first time, the municipal elections were conducted by the old double-balloting system; unless a candidate received a clear majority on the first ballot, a second was taken. The number of candidates varied from ten to thirty-six depending on the size of the commune. In former elections if the first balloting was indecisive two friendly parties would join forces and present a combined slate for the second. This year a strong sense of unity prevailed from the outset as the result of the common underground struggle. The Communist Party astutely seized on this fact to propose that in advance of the first balloting common resistance slates be drawn up, known as the "Listes d'Union Patriotique, Républicaine, et anti-Fasciste," or U. P. R. A., which would include representatives of all the parties and movements belonging to the National Council of Resistance. Its aim was threefold: to symbolize and cement the unity of the resistance forces, to present a strong united front against any fascist or reactionary offensive, and to gain seats in municipalities where it had no chance to win under its own banner.

The Socialist Party, on the other hand, recommended that wherever possible its various local groups run a straight Socialist ticket. It had no fears about the reactionary threat and felt that the party should go before the electorate under its own name at the first balloting, basing its appeal on a program more concrete and revolutionary than the minimum common plan first proposed by the National Council of Resistance in March, 1944, when France was still occupied by the Germans.

This divergence of views produced an infinite number of combinations. In most cities the Socialists presented straight party tickets; and in many places so did the Radicals and the Mouvement Républicain Populaire (a new Catholic party which includes both reformist progressives and social conservatives). In these cases, the U. P. R. A. slate consisted almost entirely of Communists or representatives of various pro-Communist organizations—Front National, Union des Femmes, Secours Populaire, Forces Unies de la Jeunesse Patriotique, etc.—or, here and there, of Communist-line trade unionists. Elsewhere very strange alliances were observed, the U.P.R.A. list containing, in addition to Communist candidates, Radicals, Catholics, and moderates; these represented a real anti-Socialist coalition.

In some regions, particularly in the villages, Socialists ran on the U. P. R. A. ticket. In others they allied themselves with various resistance groups—either Radical or, in rare instances, Catholic—against the Communists and their sympathizers. In still others Socialists and Communists formed a common extreme-left slate against the Radicals, Catholics, and moderates.

In the six Paris districts, where proportional representation and a single ballot were initiated, all parties offered straight tickets, determined to stand or fall on party lines.

Despite this confused welter of candidacies, the voters gave a clear expression of their will.

1. A tremendous majority voted left. The Popular Front of 1935-36 won an incontestable victory, with this single reservation—its Socialist and Communist elements were increased at the expense of the Radicals.

2. The conservative right, led by Louis Marin, and the moderates of the center, represented by Paul Reynaud, showed a marked loss of strength and in certain regions actually disappeared, many of their members voting for the new Mouvement Républicain Populaire. The M. R. P. gained a number of seats and appears on the way to becoming the big moderate party, despite the fact that certain of its leaders incline toward extremist solutions of social issues.

3. The Radicals, as I have said, lost ground, except at Lyon, where the strong personality of Herriot maintains the party's prestige. The voting made it clear that the Socialists have gained power at their expense in the rural communes, which formerly were radical strongholds.

4. In several industrial cities, notably in the coal basin of the Pas-de-Calais, the Communists cut into the Socialist vote slightly, but the Socialists made up this loss in the industrial regions of the Midi, formerly Radical.

5. The non-political resistance movements were defeated where they opposed candidates of political parties. The Frenchman remains true to his old party ties. None the less, the elections were a victory for the resistance on two counts: first, almost all the political candidates were at the same time members of the resistance; and second, wherever the political parties and the resistance movement had drawn up a common ticket, the ticket was victorious, with the result that many mayors named by the resistance at the time of liberation were returned to office by a unanimous vote.

6. The elections were actually a vote of confidence for De Gaulle, whose popularity has not diminished. But the vote was more a vote of gratitude to "the first resistant of France" than of approval for the work of the Provisional Government. It indicated the country's desire for a ruthless purge, a bold and rigorous policy toward big business, and the socialization of banking and basic industries. The temper of France is openly revolutionary. Let the government take notice. Logically the first consequence of the elections should be an increase in the number of left Ministers and the swift start of social reforms.

These are not the conclusions of a partisan. Except for Nice and St. Etienne, where the results are not yet known, all the large cities of France voted left. Paris turned in Communist and Socialist majorities. Marseille, Bordeaux, and Toulouse went Socialist. Lille has a Socialist Council. Nantes voted for a U. P. R. A. ticket predominantly Communist; Lyon for a U. P. R. A. ticket with a Radical slant.

The people of France have spoken. The government must adjust its policies to conform to their will.

Foreign Minister Bidault

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

A CORRESPONDENT who found satisfaction in my dissection of "The Robe" went on to say that the movie "Music for the Millions" needed the same sort of "biting review." A bit later, under duress, I saw it and wondered again how anyone could stop holding his nose long enough to produce, take part in, or do the camera work on such a picture. In particular I wondered how José Iturbi, who might be presumed to have some respect for music and for symphony orchestras, could collaborate in a venture which makes a travesty of both. His is a truly shocking performance. Margaret O'Brien is not to be held responsible, I suppose, considering her age. One can only groan at the sickening misuse of an extraordinary child with an extraordinary talent. As for the strong infusion of religious propaganda, that is no doubt to be set down as another triumph for the Society for the Propagation of the Faith.

And what of the public that takes such trash lying down? As I say, I went under duress—from a thirteen-year-old. She was very angry with me when I expressed my disgust. Yet her own passive acceptance was shattered by three or four elementary questions which movie-goers apparently do not ask. At least not out loud.

The passivity of American movie audiences, and of American crowds in general, is to me a very depressing thing. On the afternoon of V-E Day I made my way to Times Square. After all, I found myself thinking, victory comes but once every twenty-five years. It was anything but gay—but of course by that time a sound truck was circulating with the announcement that this was not V-E Day. The paper scraps had been thrown hours before and now were dirty underfoot. The light of the sun breaking through the overcast sky was pale and wan and very unbecoming to the milling faces of a crowd which had brought, one felt, a burden of inertness which it hoped to have lifted. Street-cleaners were closing in; bored policemen were directing people to keep to the sidewalk and being obeyed. When a photographer appeared on the roof of the Astor marquee, a crowd gathered and looked up at him hopefully as if asking for the excitement they had come to find and had somehow missed. When it was not forthcoming, they went limp again. I can't help feeling that the inertness of most city crowds—and perhaps rural ones too—must be related to the fact that more and more people are becoming more and more dependent on having their fun made for them by mass-entertainment industries. Those passive, amorphous faces in Times Square might have been composition faces made of the same processed stuff as the gadgets and the movies and the magazines and the books of mass production.

IF WE ARE GOING to be technical about what you saw on the Capitol grounds," writes Mary W. Janes from Washington, "they were Allium canadense (wild garlic), not wild onions (Allium tricoccum). And the bulb is lovely garlic."

A PUBLISHER called me the other day to inquire about a likely translator, and we exchanged a few remarks on the whole sorry question of translations. A good translator is as rare as hen's teeth. He must be thoroughly at home in two languages and he must know how to write himself. But few people who qualify wish to spend their time on other people's books at any price, and the market rate for translation is ridiculously low.

And there are other hazards. A publisher reads a translation which seems to him excellent. When he has a job to be done, he calls in the translator whose work he has admired. He gets a script so badly written that one of his own editors has to rewrite it. Later on he meets the editor who rewrote the first translation, and they have a good cry together. But meanwhile the so-called translator, on the strength of a second excellent rendering, is busy concocting another mess for another publisher.

Some time ago I got a reprint of an amusing article on The Way of the Translator by Max Nomad, in the American Mercury, which touches on this point, among others. "A phony in the literary translation game," he writes, "can go on undiscovered for years; his victims are even less expert bilingually than he, and the notoriously docile average reader, finding himself baffled by a passage, will blame his own ignorance rather than suspect . . . the translator. . . ." Mr. Nomad then cites some of the great boners of translation history. The most amusing is the one contained in this famous passage: "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." I quote Mr. Nomad:

The idea of a camel going through the eye of a needle was incongruous and striking. There was, however, no reference to that animal in the Greek original of the Gospel, which merely spoke of the difficulty a rope would have in passing through the eye of a needle. The Greek equivalent of rope is kamilos. But it so happens that another Greek word, spelled kamelos, means camel.

I RECENTLY RECEIVED, for the first time in many months, an issue of the Countryman, the little green English magazine which "comes from the country." It has lost weight. It is only a quarter as thick as it used to be, but it has not changed otherwise. It contains the usual pot-pourri of lore, ancient and modern, and gives the same delightful impression of having been thrown together willy-nilly between trips to the pasture or the stable to attend to matters more important than editing. It opens with an item entitled simply Goose by D. B. Wyndham Lewis. And it really is about geese, Mr. Lewis's own flock.

Anybody can look up the form of the Embden-Toulouse goose in the textbooks [he writes]. They give you facts about incubation, plumage, depth of breast, diet, egg-power, and so forth; they do not touch on the essential goose. It is rather as if you looked up Dante in the encyclopedia and found "Mediterranean type, Florentine (Alighieri) breed and markings; 5 ft. 9 in., weight 13 st. 9 lb.; features aquiline and complexion sallow; addicted to politics and poetry," and nothing more. The Embden-Toulouse . . . is a goose of rich personality, charm, and a certain moral force.

Here are a few of the other titles: Oldest Inhabited House, (with photographs), The Ministry of Food's Neglect, Winter Caravanning, Cormorants and Shags, Straw Boots. There is also a piece on The Burning of Margaret Og which gives some statistics on the cost of disposing of witches:

The cost of burning two persons included twenty loads of peats 40s., "ane Boill of Coillis" (a boll of coals) 23s., four tar barrels 26s. 8d., "fire and iron" barrels 16s. 8d., "a staik and dressing of it" 16s., four fathom of tow 4s., carriage of the foregoing 13s. 4d., and to the executioner another 13s. 4d.

NOTES ON THE AMERICAN LANGUAGE (continued): When General Eisenhower responded to an ovation in a London theater he said: "I wonder if you people realize what it means to me to be back among friends, among people whose language I can almost speak."

Democratic Faith and Puritan Piety

PURITANISM AND DEMOCRACY. By Ralph Barton Perry. The Vanguard Press. $5.

EVIDENCES are multiplying of a healthy reaction against over-simple historical interpretations of ideas. By the latter I refer to those interpretations which explain a great many things about ideas except what it is in their meanings that enables one set of ideas, rather than another, to exercise historical influence. Any social interpretation of an intellectual movement should at least exhibit an analytic grasp of its central ideas. For only then can assertions that these ideas "express" the interest of this group or that be intelligible.

None the less, there are certain dangers to be guarded against in approaching ideas in history primarily from the standpoint of their logical nexus. Ideas play a role in history not by virtue of their logical implications but by virtue of our perception of implications. What is implied is always broader than what is perceived. Selective interest quickens perception and reinforces the willingness of human carriers to act upon ideas. We may see certain connections between ideas which those who uttered them were unaware of; they may have understood them in a way which a purely logical analysis will not reveal. When we read back our current analysis and interpretation into the past and make a plausible logical case in the present for a view propounded long ago, we may unconsciously be distorting the actual historical and psychological significance the ideas in question had. By using the theory of relativity a great contemporary philosopher has even argued that Galileo and his persecutors were both scientifically justified.

Professor Perry's "Puritanism and Democracy" is a good illustration of the virtues and defects of a primarily logical analysis of historical ideas. The book is an impressive, full-bodied study of the influence and interplay of the ideas of puritanism and democracy in American life. It defends the thesis that we owe what is most distinctive in our culture today to continuing traditions derived from the moral and religious ideas of seventeenth-century puritanism and the social and political ideas of eighteenth-century democracy. At the same time it is an essay in vindication of their essential meaning as enduringly valid against all known alternatives. It presents an illuminating analysis of the theoretical conceptions central to these two intellectual movements. In effect, therefore, Professor Perry has written a history of certain ideological currents in American life and a philosophical treatise in defense of democracy, which toward the end suddenly blossoms forth as "Christian democracy."

The book possesses very substantial merits. It is written with clarity and a certain verve that sustain the reader through almost seven hundred pages of close print. The material reflects a wide, if not very discriminating, reading. Since Professor Perry's gifts are primarily philosophical, he is at his best in dealing with ideas as theorems related to other theorems. But he has many shrewd things to say about people and what moves them as they seek their way in affairs that are not ideal. Some of his insights into the human heart are very penetrating. Although without the genius and sparkle, they are in the spirit of William James. There is a kindness in his judgments of men and movements—even those of which he is most critical—which betokens a will to understand. The analysis of the nature and presuppositions of democracy will take high rank in the literature of the subject. The author has an authentic feeling for what democracy involves, not only as a scheme of political arrangements, but in the relationships of human beings to each other. He takes his stand uncompromisingly on democracy as a moral ideal.

The basic limitation of Professor Perry's work lies in a profound methodological error of historical interpretation. This consists in dissolving what is historically specific about a doctrine into its more general elements, evaluating the latter without reference to the former, and then identifying the essence of the doctrine with the general elements. The specific elements then become extrinsic historical expressions of the underlying general ones. It is a fallacy, as Professor Perry notes, to identify the nature of a thing with its specific or distinctive character. A man is not merely rational. But surely it is just as fallacious to overlook or play down the distinguishing character which sent us on the quest for explanation. This is precisely what Professor Perry does when he evaluates puritanism. It is dissolved into a form of Protestantism, Protestantism into Christianity, and Christianity into a species of ethical culture. This makes an embarrassingly large number of people essentially Puritans.

Professor Perry is aware of all the evils and errors in Puritan theory and practice, but they are transformed into historical idiosyncrasies of essential qualities. Thus, the Puritan's rigorism and fanaticism are deplored because of their historical effects; but after all they express recognition of the abiding importance of moral principles. The Puritan's hatred of the body was injurious and unaesthetic, but for all its excesses this attitude represents the discovery that deadly evil may lurk in apparent good, that the indulgence of the senses may actually be a form of imprudence. Historically, Puritan piety sanctifies the values of capitalism; the essential truth embodied here is that every well-organized society requires thrift, industry, sobriety, and self-discipline. "It is indispensable to any society that men should keep their promises." In practice, puritanism was a theocracy, but the Puritan theocracy "exemplified the truth that a community requires some form of moral cohesiveness."

Not a single feature of Puritan ruthlessness, cruelty, and superstition is blinked by Professor Perry; it is simply transmuted into a limited historical expression of the life of reason. Even Cotton Mather's spiritual prescription for the cure of toothache is not immune to this treatment. Cotton Mather, racked by toothache, regards his pain as divine punishment for having sinned with his teeth, "by sinful, graceless, excessive Eating, and by evil Speeches." He resolves upon repentance, prayer, and discipline to cure himself. The only disease the Puritans could treat, Professor Perry reminds us, was sin. Consequently physical evils like toothache were translated into "symptoms" of sin. This, he admits, historically hindered the quest for effective remedies. None the less, "the Puritan is to be credited with a recognition, however misapplied, of the broad principle that the first and sometimes the last step in the correction of evil is sound diagnosis." He got in the way of scientific medicine, but that was a historical blunder. He really was on its side. By the time Professor Perry is through refining the ideal or essential form of Puritanism from its historical dross, we cannot help concluding that Aristotle, Epicurus, and Professor Perry himself were much better Puritans than the Puritans of the seventeenth century. The latter tried their best, but the historical circumstances were too much for them.

This technique of reinterpretation is masterly: the trouble with it is that it can vindicate ideas, institutions, and movements hostile to the enlightened secularism in whose behalf Professor Perry uses it. M. Maritain, for example, has argued that when we punish a man for criminal political actions, we are doing in our own way what the Inquisition did in its day when it burned and tortured a heretic merely because of his ideas. Both represent essentially an effort to preserve necessary order and unity in the community! How they did it and what they regarded as "order" are not essential differences.

Professor Perry's interpretation of puritanism is a piece of sincere but completely unnecessary apologetics in a good cause. The good cause is democracy. We are exhorted to embrace a refined puritanism as a symbol of democratic piety because of the kinship of essential doctrines between them and the ties of historical influence. As to the actual historical effects of puritanism on the growth of democracy, Professor Perry admits that the question is complicated. He does not settle it on the basis of empirical historical data but reverts once again to the coincidences and sympathies of doctrine. On the historical side, a few good case studies would seem to me to be much more decisive than reams of dialectical exegesis in helping us to determine whether those who were markedly under the influence of Puritan thought helped or obstructed the development of democratic institutions and practices in America. For example, who led and who opposed the movement for the Bill of Rights amendments to the Constitution, and what were their doctrinal affiliations? Surely, in answering questions of historical connection the actual behavior of social groups is more important than their ritualistic talk, significant as that may be.

As for doctrine—the deepest and most fundamental bond between puritanism and democracy, according to Professor

Perry, was "their common respect for the human individual" and their common belief in "the dignity of man." There is as much warrant for coupling puritanism and democracy on these grounds as for coupling Mormonism or Catholicism with democracy. It overlooks the tremendous difference between a theological doctrine which referred to men's supernatural souls and a secular democratic attitude to men as natural human beings. From the theological doctrine of the dignity and eternal worth of human souls, and their equality before God, nothing necessarily followed, in logic or fact, about their democratic status in this world. This doctrine was compatible with different types of social order and with different modes of treatment of Indians and Negroes, baptized or not. The democratic philosophy, on the other hand, in prescribing equal treatment in relevant respects for all men, pointed unmistakably to the political and social paths that had to be taken by those who seriously professed it. Both doctrines in a sense may be called doctrines of salvation. But the first sought only to save men from the corruption of sin; the second from the corruptions of ignorance, poverty, and tormenting pain which unfortunately may still be present when sin is absent. To treat them as Professor Perry does is to confuse two different universes of discourse.

Moving on an entirely different plane is Professor Perry's analysis of the meaning of democracy. Here eloquence is the voice of reason. Distinctions have relevance and point. Many sentences have epigrammatic wisdom. "A democracy of opportunity must be at the same time a democracy of personal esteem." He shows convincingly that the logic of democracy is pledged to a just and humane international order, that it is based on no metaphysical or religious dogmas, that it must "permit and protect" all religions which are not actively intolerant of other cults, religious or secular. After doing this, he calls it "Christian democracy"! Why not Confucian democracy?

The weaknesses of this last part are primarily those of omission. But they do not mar the brilliance of the analysis. As it stands it is a persuasive statement of the validity of democracy as against its rivals and alternatives. It would have been strengthened by a detailed reply to modern critics of democracy like Michels and Pareto, who argue that democrats may be victorious but democracy never, to others who argue that democracy is too good for men, and to those who affirm, from Plato to Santayana, that expert knowledge alone gives a right to rule. Allied to this omission is the failure to consider the chief problem of modern democracy—the relation between economic planning and political freedom. But perhaps this is just as well. For whenever Professor Perry dwells on concrete material, his touch is uncertain. He has an unerring eye for the democratic implications of words and documents; but he is blind to the fact that they are sometimes used to conceal historical actualities rather than to report them. I shall not discuss his few remarks on Soviet Russia, of which he says that it has gathered strength "from a growth of liberality (!) and industrial freedom (!)." From a naivete—perhaps one should use a stronger word—so complete as this the only charitable thing to do is to turn one's eyes away. Let us hope he will not try to prove that Russia, too, is a "Christian democracy."

In conclusion, Professor Perry's book is important, challinging, and uneven. No one will be satisfied with all of it. But it has something for everybody. It is both a thesaurus of democratic thought and an arsenal of democratic defense. It shows not only a love of ideas but a recognition that they count in history. But it does not adequately explain why they count and how.

SIDNEY HOOK

VERSE CHRONICLE

Auden and Others

IT APPEARS that Auden is trying to purge himself of the literary play boy, the too willing collaborator, the adventurer in shady forms of modernism, indeed all the ingratiating but facile alter egos which once prompted John Crowe Ransom to declare him—if I remember the phrase—"the wit-tiest and most far gone of modern poets." As "For the Time Being" recently showed, Auden is now at pains to curtail the vaudevillian extravagance of his long poems. And in a preface to his "Collected Poetry" (Random House, $3.75) he modestly classifies his past work as, first, "the pure rubbish" which he "regrets ever having conceived"; second, "the good ideas" which "incompetence or impatience prevented from coming to much"; third, the pieces he has "nothing against except their lack of importance"; and last, the few poems for which "he is honestly grateful."

To judge by the contents of the "Collected Poetry," Auden regards as rubbish, or something like it, the longer works of his early period. Without exception he bans from this book the fantastic dramas of his youth; and of "The Orators" he retains only a few fragments. (I doubt that "Paid on Both Sides" and "The Dance of Death" quite deserve this oblivion.) He includes, however, most of the long poems of recent date—"The Quest," "New Year Letter," "In Time of War," "The Sea and the Mirror," and "For the Time Being." And on the other hand, the shorter pieces of all periods are liberally represented. This emphasis in favor of brevity seems to me right; for in Auden, I think, the heart that perceives is superior to the mind that formulates, the rhetoric is better than the architecture; and he is at his best in works requiring a minimum of organization. For the rest, this collection certainly confirms Auden's great reputation. Rich in the imagery of disaster as befits the terrible age that produced it, but rich also in humor and learning, in song, in the sense of place and of time, in the kindly gestures of friendship and love and homage, it is one of the great literary records of our day.

From Auden and Spender, Jon Beck Shank ("Poems," Knopf, $2) has acquired an easy way with language, a candid way of talking about himself, a light way of saying portentous things about history:

The age is older, rich in color,
Spirited, will kiss and tell;
Is up and doing, uniformed,
At times coherent, but not well.

But Shank is still uncertain who he is and what he wants and whether he even wants to be a serious poet. "The final escape," he writes, "is that gardenias smell white." On the

Woodrow Wilson

SELECTIONS FOR TODAY

Edited by Arthur B. Tourtellot

This inspiring collection of the public papers and presidential addresses of the man who fathered the League of Nations twenty-five years ago has direct bearing on America and the world today. $2.75

DUELL, SLOAN AND PEARCE

PREDICTING

New World Bill of Rights . . .
Regional and World Organization . . .
Pan-American Union . . .
San Francisco and Chapultepec Developments . . .
New Constitutions of Europe.

Read NEW WORLD CONSTITUTIONAL
HARMONY and NEW WORLD CONSTITUTIONS
by George Jaffin

Send $1 with order to DEPT. N
COLUMBIA LAW REVIEW, New York 27, N. Y.

THE JEFFERSON SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE
invites you to attend a FORUM

"SAN FRANCISCO...AND AFTER"

What the International Organization for World Peace and Progress will mean . . .

TO INDUSTRY: CHARLES PACK, Vice-President, Doehler-Jarvis Corp.
TO LABOR: JAMES McLEISH, General Vice-President, U.E.R.M.W.A.
TO MINORITIES: DR. LAURENCE D. REDDICK, Curator, Schomburg Collection, New York Public Library

TO COMMUNISTS: EARL BROWDER, President, Communist Political Association

TO LIBERALS: DR. J. MAX WEIS, Director of Research—World Peaceways
FRIDAY, MAY 25th — 8:30 P.M.

TOWN HALL, 113 West Forty-third Street
ADMISSION 90¢ TO $1.20 • ALL SEATS RESERVED

TICKETS AVAILABLE NOW AT:
Jefferson School, 614 Avenue at 10th Street, N. Y. C. 11.
Town Hall Box Office, 113 West 43rd Street, N. Y. C. 18.

other hand, William Everson, Jacob Sloan, and Charles E. Butler, all young and unheard-of poets like Shank, are very serious but have no style, not even an inherited one. Out of their experience as conscientious objectors, Everson and Sloan write bitterly of the war; their volumes are called, respectively, "War Elegies" and "Generation of Journey" and are handsomely published in illustrated pamphlets by the Untide Press, Waldport, Oregon (25 cents each). Sloan blends Jewish themes with narratives of life in the C. O. camps. Everson records in his elegies what he calls "the phases of my relationship with the world at war."

In his foreword to Butler's "Cut Is the Branch" (Yale Series of Younger Poets, $2) Archibald MacLeish observes that "it is not easy to say which of the many possible reactions to the war will seem most truthful to those who took part in it." But he knows that Butler's reaction is one of uncompromising negation, and it is curious to find this official of a war government and former scourge of the "irresponsibles" commending a poet who once more proclaims the old doubts and disgusts. For Butler consents to know nothing of war except that it destroys life. The honest statement of this radical knowledge is the merit of his poetry.

There will be room for them: there will always be room.
The earth is deep and wide, and the seas are deep,
And the earth and sea will take them and consume
Whatever pain they know, falling to sleep.
There will be room for them in the dust and foam
Of all the wild and quiet ranks that run
Through time as in some half-remembered dream,
Falling eternally to spear and gun.

Upon their grief, as on the tears of those Whose lives break with their dying, the seas will close.
Spacious, unquestioning, the earth will fold
Upon them now, as on the men of old
Who fought for Helen's beauty or some king
Whose name spelled honor, or for anything.

F. W. DUPEE

FICTION IN REVIEW

WITH no new novels that press for review, I have the opportunity to return briefly to John Hersey's "A Bell for Adano," which has just been announced as the Pulitzer prize-winner for fiction. I have been rereading Mr. Hersey's book, to find it even more primitive than I had remembered. This much-admired story of the American occupation of an Italian village is written in a prose redolent of the primer; it defines political good and evil in terms that make good and evil unmistakable to a school child. There is Major Joppolo, who stands for democracy: he is the kind of man who sees to it that simple Italian villagers are given a bell; and there is General Marvin, who stands for a possible American fascism: he is the kind of man who has a mule shot because it blocks his arrogant path. The squeeze of lemon in a concoction that would otherwise be too smooth for even our present childish tastes is the temporary victory, at the end of the book, of the Marvin force over the Joppolo force; but this triumph of evil, we feel sure, is only momentary; we put down "A Bell for Adano" with the comfortable conviction that although democracy has been momentarily deprived of its job, its good deeds live after it and its eventual victory is inevitable. Mr. Hersey's fears, that is, are more of a filip than a warning. They never suggest any true complication of either ideas or feelings.

Of course we are not surprised that the Pulitzer committee has again chosen a novel that can scarcely give pleasure to people who take literature seriously; one has only to look back over the fiction awards in other years to realize that what would be really surprising would be to see the award go to a work of distinction. But this year's choice seems to me to be particularly striking for what it tells us both about the political direction of our present-day literary thought and about the quality of our political thought. For not only the general success but the critical prestige of "A Bell for Adano" indicates to what extent our literary judgment serves our political partisanship: it is evident that a novel need only agree with our politics to be a good novel. And nothing, I think, could better prove than the success of Mr. Hersey's novel that in the very degree that we are disturbed by the confusions and contradictions of actual events we deny or discourage any complication of our political ideas and emotions. In her Notes by the Way last week Margaret Marshall quoted the lesson Yeats's father taught him, that ideas rob a man of his nature and make the blood thin; and surely a large part of the anemia of our current fiction must be due to the soft political idealism which is its major inspiration. There is even the anomaly that it is our literature of affirmation and fortification that is fast becoming our new escape literature. It seems to me that a not too perverse case could be made for the thesis that the detective story, the romantic love story, all the fiction that we commonly think of as an evasion of reality actually if unconsciously bring us into closer connection with reality than our "healthy" didactic literature. In any event, at worst our old-fashioned escape reading frankly substituted for reality instead of befuddling us about reality itself.

Yet obviously, when I condemn "A Bell for Adano" as an oversimplification, it is not because I do not consider it as much a proper function of art to simplify complexity as to raise us to the level where we can more adequately cope with contradictions and confusions and despair. The occasional simple formulation of our popular emotions is a requirement not only of simple people but of all sections of society. Roosevelt, for instance, was notable for the ability to fulfil this general need, and on V-E Day we must all of us have missed the release and climax and coherence which he would have been able to give to our national sentiment. But the difference between a good art of simplification and a bad one lies, of course, in the sincerity, the naturalness, of the performance. One does not become the spokesman for mass feelings by an act of will, and to assume such a role, either because one wishes to influence large numbers of people or because one wishes to rid oneself of the responsibilities of sophistication, is to traffic in a dangerous condescension—dangerous because it makes not only for bad art but for bad politics. Condescension may be the antithesis of mule-shooting; and it is certainly harder to recognize as a menace. But it is still, I think, as potential a threat to the democratic spirit.

DIANA TRILLING

CONTRIBUTORS

ERNST KARL WINTER is an Austrian Catholic writer who from 1934 to 1937 was deputy mayor of Vienna. In "The Social Metaphysics of Scholasticism" and "Plato's Sociology" he has advanced a criticism of Thomistic scholasticism from the Platonic point of view. From 1938 to 1942 he taught sociology and social philosophy at the New School for Social Research in New York.

LEO BARNES is director of economic research for the Research Institute of America.

MILBURN P. AKERS travels through the Middle West as a political reporter for the Chicago Sun.

JULES MOCH, a Socialist deputy before the war, played a prominent part in the resistance movement. He is now a member of the French Constituent Assembly.

SIDNEY HOOK, chairman of the Department of Philosophy at New York University, is the author of "Reason, Social Myths, and Democracy" and "The Hero in History."

STAGE PLAYS

"A SWEET AND HAPPY HIT."—Garland, Journal-American.
Rodgers and Hammerstein present
MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account" with JOAN TETZEL
49th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4836
Even. 6:35 Sharp. Mat. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Dorothy Fields Music by Sigmund Romberg
& DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 59th Street, Matinee Wed. & Sat.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

- ☐ 1 Year $5    ☐ 2 Years $8    ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Introductory Offer: 10 Weeks for $1
☐ Remittance is inclosed    ☐ Bill me

Servicemen's rate, $3.00 a year

Canada $1 a year extra.

Foreign $1 a year extra.

Pan American Union requires no extra postage.

NAME .....

ADDRESS ..... 5-26-45

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM

81st St.
86th St.
58th St.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th St.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd St.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"Touches the Heart
Strings."—N. Y. Post    ... "One of the Best."
—N. Y. Times

"MR. EMMANUEL"

Starring FELIX AYLME

With GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA
Based on LOUIS GOLDING'S Famous Novel

— and —
MARY O'HARA'S

THUNDERHEAD

"SON OF FLICKA"—in Technicolor

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYON
Queens Island
Coney
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
Manhattan
COLONIAL

"Thrilling, Heartwarming, Inspiring!"
—N. Y. Post.

ROSALIND RUSSELL
with JACK CARSON

ROUGHLY SPEAKING

Adapted from LOUISE RANDALL PIERSON'S Best-Seller

—Plus—

"HOUSE OF FEAR" BASIL RATHBONE
NIGEL BRUCE

Paramount presents

ALAN LADD • GAIL RUSSELL

SALTY O'ROURKE

Big In-Person Stage Show

Charlie SPIVAK and His Orchestra

JO STAFFORD • DEAN MURPHY
TIP, TAP & TOE

TIMES SQUARE PARAMOUNT BUY BONDS

"ABSORBING! NOTABLE!"—Time Magazine

COLUMBIA PICTURES presents

COUNTER-ATTACK

Starring PAUL MUNI

Directed by ZOLTAN KORDA

Loew's CRITERION B'way & 45 St.

Paramount presents

DOROTHY LAMOUR and ARTURO DE CORDOVA in

"A MEDAL FOR BENNY"

From the story by JOHN STEINBECK and JACK WAGNER

Now Playing RIVOLI B'way & 49th St.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

SAN PIETRO is the record of the part which one regiment of infantrymen took in one of several fights which resulted in the capture of one village, the key to an Italian valley. At the end of the fight the seven-hundred-year-old village was chaos, and the regiment required 1,100 replacements. "San Pietro" runs only half an hour, and still leaves much of a world open to the most highly imaginative use of its kind of material. But it is in every way as good a war film as I have seen; in some ways it is the best.

It was made by six Signal Corps camera men under the command of Major John Huston, who also designed the scenario and wrote and spoke the narration. Most of these men were veterans. That fact presumably helps to explain a number of things: how they all lived through the shooting of the film; how deep inside the fighting some of it was made; how well they evidently understood what to expect, how to shoot it, what it was good for, and its weight and meaning in the whole picture. But remarkable as the camera men evidently were, it is fairly clear that the main credit for the picture goes to Major Huston. He moved continually from one of his men to the next, showing them what he wanted and where to go for it; he kept planning and revising his scenario and his narration in spare time during the days and nights of fighting; he had to work blind, for the film was developed and printed in Washington and he saw nothing he had—or had lost—until he got back to this country. Yet Huston and his camera men understood so well what they were after that when he did return, to assemble the film, he had to make very few changes in his narration.

The attitudes which have pervaded most of our combat films are seldom questionable and usually something to be proud of; but there is a major advance here. It is clear that Huston understood what he was recording, and how to record it, with a wonderfully vigorous and whole maturity, at once as a soldier and an artist and a man. No war film I have seen has been quite so attentive to the heaviness of casualties, and to the number of yards gained or lost, in such an action; none has so levelly watched and implied what it meant, in such full and complex terms—in military terms; in terms of the men who were doing the fighting; in terms of the villagers; and of their village; and of the surrounding country; and of the natural world; and of human existence and hope.

Huston's narration is a slightly simplified technical prose, at once exact and beautifully toned and subtly parodistic; it is spoken with finely shaded irony, equally free of pompousness and optimism and mawkish generalizations and cheap bitterness. Against the images he has chosen, their always satisfying arrangement, and their beautiful over-all plan and implication, this text points itself so richly and flexibly that for once wordiness in a film more than earns its way. As for the over-all plan and implication, I don't see how that of any post-war film is going to improve on it, and I rather doubt that any will come quite up to it. For at one and the same time, without one slip along the line, from the most ticklish fringes of taste to the depths of a sane mind and heart, it accepts the facts and treats them as materials relevant to anger, tenderness, pride, veneration, and beauty. Somewhere close to the essence of the power of moving pictures is the fact that they can give you things to look at, clear of urging or comment, and so ordered that they are radiant with illimitable suggestions of meaning and mystery. Huston's simple, wordless use of children, toward the end of this film, does that, and seems to me the first great passage of war poetry that has got on the screen. In emphatic agreement with some recent comments by Bernard Haggin, however, I do want to object to one thing: music can only vitiate this kind of film. Here, with all words and irony at last withdrawn, as you watch the faces of the children, each one unimaginably beautiful and portentous, and ordered and timed into their culmination as nobly as the words in a great tragic line, it is as infuriating to have to fight off the emotional sales pressure of the Mormon Choir as it would be if all the honored watches and nasal aphrodisiacs insisted on marketing themselves against a Toscanini broadcast.

Music can be well used in movies. It was wonderfully used in Dovschenko's "Frontier," for instance; for another kind I like the naive, excitable, perfectly appropriate score of the soundtracked version of "The Birth of a Nation"; and indeed I think the greatest possibilities have hardly yet been touched. But music is just as damaging to nearly all fiction films as to nearly all fact films, as it is generally used in both today. Its ability to bind together a succession of images, or to make transitions between blocks of them—not to mention "transitional" and "special-effect" and "montage" passages—inevitably makes for laziness or for slackened imagination in making the images and setting them in order, and in watching them. Still worse, it weakens the emotional imagination both of maker and onlooker, and makes it virtually impossible to communicate or receive ideas. It sells too cheaply and far too sensually all the things it is the business of the screen itself to present. The rough equivalent might be a poet who could dare to read aloud from his own work only if the lights were dimmed and some Debussy was on, very low.

One of the best scenes in Vincente Minelli's new picture, "The Clock," is a good example. In this scene a soldier (Robert Walker) and a girl (Judy Garland) walk, as if hypnotized, into their first embrace. A kind of sentimental mysticism is tried for here, and more than achieved; moreover, the timing of their walk and of the several shots is boldly and successfully unrealistic; the increasingly large close-ups and the gravity, the suggestion of death, which grows in the soldier's face achieve at once a remarkably deep and pure power of the moment and of the individuals, and a kind of generic pity and majesty. But all this time, with the dirtiest and most merciless kind of efficiency, a full orchestra and hyped-up soprano are working at you, below the belt. How much better the same scene would play silent, or at least without music, I cannot gauge; but I am reasonably sure of two things. It would play much better; and if Minelli had not been assuming soft-salty horn-choirs and other questionable kinds of assistance—he was anyhow well content with them once they were glued on—he would have exerted himself to make the scene still more powerful. (A sudden reduction of the sounds of the city, to which they had just been listening, would have been good enough; but those sounds are as unimaginatively worked out as the music itself.)

The whole of "The Clock" suffers in every field from equivalent kinds of softness. It is strictly a romance, and in every essential respect a safe one, safely told, disappointing and angering in the thought of the great film it might have been. (The very simple story of a soldier's two days in New York, it had every right to be as good in its own very different way as "San Pietro.") But within its softly chosen terms it is also quite charmingly and sometimes beautifully told. Emotionally, it is perceptive, detailed, and sweet, and there is more ability, life, resource, and achievement in it than in any fiction film I have seen for a long time. The script by Robert Nathan and Joseph Schranck is very shrewd; but the man who pours it so full of gifts is Minelli. Considering the breadth and variety of his talents, his eye and feeling for the city itself are surprisingly dull; but his extras and their gaits and groupings and clothes, and their stammering collisions and multiplicities of purpose and aimlessness, beat anything I can remember out of Hollywood; and while I don't wholly care for his passion for elastic boom-shots and for the curiously pelvic rhythm he gives this picture, I can certainly respect the achievement. Minelli appears, too, to know better than most directors just how to use his individual players: to turn the show over to Keenan Wynn for his alcoholic cadenza; to retract slightly James Gleason and to leave his wife Lucille a long tether; to develop in Robert Walker his singular gentleness and pathos and to rid him of infantile mannerisms; and to prove for the first time beyond anybody's doubt that Judy Garland can be a very sensitive actress. In this film Miss Garland can handle every emotion in sight, in any size and shape, and the audience along with it. Incidentally, the dress she wears during most of the film is about the most appropriate prop I can remember since McTeague's checked cap in "Greed."

By what I can see in the film, and have heard, Minelli does not discriminate very clearly between the good in his work and the not-so-good or the downright bad which in part he puts into it and which in part is forced on him. Much as I regret that, it may on the whole be just as well. If he knew better, he might be either much more of an artist or much less of one; in either case he would have a much harder time working in Hollywood. I suspect I may overrate this best of his films; but I also suspect that twenty and fifty years from now, however embarrassing a lot of it is, it will be remembered.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

VICTOR has issued its first record (11-8761; $1) of the Detroit Symphony conducted by Karl Krueger—a somewhat over-muscular performance of Offenbach's Overture to "Orpheus in Hades," which seems to have been recorded with a too limited frequency-range, since the sound, though marvelously clear and faithful to timbre, is heavy and lacking in brightness even on a wide-range machine.

One of Victor's new "showpiece albums," entitled "Music to Remember" after the film of that name (SP-4; $1.75), offers two little records with Iturbi's vulgarly affected and poorly recorded performances of Chopin's Mazurka Opus 7 No. 1, his Waltzes Opus 64 Nos. 1 and 2, and the Fantaisie-Improvisation Opus 66. Victor is charging twenty-five cents above the price of the two records for an "album" which is nothing but a double-pocket of heavy paper with gaudy pictorial decoration and slushy verbal material that can be of use to Victor in selling the records but of none to the buyer in storing them. That is, the paper does not protect them against breakage, and there is no room for corrugated pads; so the buyer will have to take the records out of this album and put them into a normal one.

For the rest, Victor is featuring an older set (605; $2.00) of the superb Toscanini-N. B. C. Symphony performance of Rossini's Overture to "William Tell." The new pressing produces a sound that is less strident but that retains its original Studio 8H hardness. And combined on a single disc (11-8727; $1) are two Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony recordings which formerly filled in the last sides of album sets: the charming waltz from Tchaikovsky's Serenade for strings, and Grieg's "Last Spring," which are performed well but recorded with harshness and stridency.

Tudor's creative mind continues to be obsessed with sexual frustration; in his new ballet "Undertow" he carries it to a psychopathological extreme which ends in murder of the love-object. I would have said that a ballet of this kind stands or falls not by its idea but by the dance-terms in which the idea is realized; after seeing "Undertow" I must add that even when the detail is good the ballet may fall by its idea. "Fancy Free" succeeds not only because of the excellence of the movement in which its idea is realized but because the movement carries out an idea which is itself acceptable. In "Undertow" much of the stylized movement and pantomime into which Tudor has translated his observation of behavior and his insight into motivation—the elderly respectable citizen slithering surreptitiously about the prostitute, the young newlyweds ecstatically flinging themselves into each other's arms, the vicious young girl hovering provocatively about the four young toughs until they seize her and drag her off—is the most brilliantly imaginative, the clearest and sharpest in conception and execution, that Tudor has done. But with those details one sees what is done in relation to them by the central male character, and one is made aware of the distorted, unacceptable idea which his behavior represents; and one's continuing objection to what is distorted and unacceptable finally outweighs one's enjoyment of what is brilliantly imaginative.

For once Tudor has no help from the music, which this time is one of William Schuman's ranting horrors. But Raymond Breinin's scenery and costumes are excellent. And the piece is danced superbly by the Ballet Theater company, with especially brilliant performances by Alicia Alonso and Nana Gollner.

Argentinita's "Cafe de Chinitas,"

NOW OPEN
FREE GOLF
TO JUNE 16

SCAROON
MANOR HOTEL
ON SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.

BOOKS FOUND FREE/00

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating. Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books. OLD or NEW. mailed. POST-PAYED.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language. MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ♦ 29 LANGUAGES

Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration
LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

RESORTS

SPRING TONIC!
Fishing through the woodland trails...
fishing on a 7 1/2-mile lake...
fishing on a 1,600-acre estate... golf... tennis... Nature's vitamins! Then to delicious,
well served food... and
dry, comfortable rooms...
enjoying entertainment.

The Glenmere

Only 51 miles from New York

CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RB2-5047

Live YOUR HOLIDAY AT CAMP MILFORD
KENT, CONN.

A camp for adults only
-on beautiful Spectacle Lake - 1/2 hours
from N. Y. The ideal spot for a glorious vacation - famous for its cleanliness and gay informality and social charm. Every zestful and athletic activity.

OPENS
JUNE
15th

Write for booklet
MICKY MICHAELS, Dir.
11 W. 42 N. Y. PE 6-7917

THE COUNTRY CLUB HOUSE

TANNERSVILLE NEW YORK

Private estate in beautiful surroundings. Golf course. Continental atmosphere. European cuisine.

For information call: ENdcott 2-1115

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477

Delightful boating on our private lake.
Different... the colonial atmosphere.
Delicious... our unexcelled cuisine.
Diversions... recordings for listening & dancing.

All this only 53 miles from New York City

Resort for Adults Only

HATHAWAY LODGE

Formerly the palatial 593 acre Mary estate in the beautiful "Falls of the Big" Lake. Luxurious rooms, most of which have open fireplaces and private porches.
Tennis, Hunt, fishing, swimming pool, Horseback Riding, also Golf nearby. Marvellous food. Open all year.
Specially low pre-summer rates.

For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

SHADYBROOK

MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 2320

50 miles from N. Y. 146 acres rustic country scenery, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Sports, Movies.

RESERVE EARLY FOR
DECORATION DAY WEEK-END
SPECIAL JUNE RATES

WALTELL HOUSE
On FRANKEL FARM
MT. BETHEL PENNSYLVANIA

"The Only Modern Farm Hotel Combined with a Children's Day Camp"

Meats, Poultry, Eggs & Produce right from our own farm. All Rooms with Private Bath. 75 miles from New York. All Sports. ELLA FRANKEL
Phone Bangor 8273, or N. Y. LEA 2-5584.

JUNE ACCOMMODATIONS ONLY

CHILDREN'S CAMPS

Camp CHI-WAN-DA

FOR BOYS and GIRLS
ULSTER PARK, N. Y.

On the Mountain Lake
Esopus overlooking the
Beautiful Hudson River

We present a modern cultural environment for your children. All cabins with latest improvements. All activities. For full information, write or call for booklet.

JACOB I. BOROSHIKIN, Director
545-5th Ave., MU. 2-4217 MA. 2-5546 DI. 6-3849

Camp Allegro BOYS GIRLS
ALABAMA, N. Y.

Beautifully Equipped Modern Camp, 118 Miles
from N. Y. 350 Acres. Private Lake. Elevation
2400 ft. All Land-Water Sports. Complete Cultural Program. Stressing Educational-Character Growth.

SOPHIE JANOV, Director
1225 COLGATE AVENUE, BRONX, N. Y. 10473
After 5 P.M. and Sat. & Sun. Phone JE 7-9768.
BROOKLYN PHONE NA 8-9740

RESORTS

"YOURS FOR HEALTH AND BEAUTY!"

BONA VISTA HEALTH FARM
For Adults

COCOBANA CAMP
For Children

On Orange Lake - 1 1/2 Hours N. Y. C.
...rolling meadows... sports... concerts... and thru our scientific nutrition develop a perfect body. Only resort serving vegetables grown naturally—without animal fertilizers... and tropical fruits.

H. EIGER, Manager
545-5th Ave. - MU 2-4217

SCHROON CREST

In the Adirondacks—Pottersville, N. Y.

On Schroon Lake - SPECIAL JUNE RATES
RUSTIC BEAUTY - SPORTS - RECORDINGS
Booklet - N. Y. Office: 142 Montague Street,
Brooklyn 2, N. Y. Phone: MAin 4-8670

Leah Okun - lrv. Schoenberg

YOURS, TO ENJOY . . .

A unique mountain resort in an artists' and musicians' colony • Outdoor orchestras • Sunday concerts
by known artists • Beautiful surroundings • Cultured environment • Novel cuisine • Reasonable rates.

TANGLEWOOD

Woodstock, N. Y. • Write, or phone Woodstock 14F 13

SUMMER RENTALS

BEAUTIFUL HOME, Lake Mohegan,
(Amazon Road, Mohegan Colony), hour
New York. Private beach, commutation, shopping. Nine rooms, two baths, two kitchens, $2,000. Five rooms, $1,000.
Write Esther Kalick, Crompond, N. Y.

85 MILES N. Y. C. Roomy rustic converted mill, all improvements, splendid swimming on premises, 23 acres woods, streams. Bus close. $650, include utilities.
HA 6-7423.

MANHATTAN BEACH, attractive 5 1/2-room lower floor, entire place or part, outdoor fireplace, ping-pong table. SH
3-5182.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic:
One year $5; Two years $9; Three years $11.
Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1;
Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers'
Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review
Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs
Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

FARMS, ACREAGE

DUE TO EXTREME AGE of few remaining members the famous Mt. Lebanon Shaker community property is now offered for sale. 250 acres; 3-acre lake; ski run;
woods; unsurpassed Berkshire view; near Tanglewood; several dormitories; 3 smaller houses; barn. Ideal for summer theatre; school; convalescent home; boarding. Asking only $15,000. Berkshire Farm Agency,
Chatham, N. Y.

HELP WANTED

ADMINISTRATIVE ASSISTANT—secretary; for Palestine department, women's Zionist organization; primarily concerned with health services in Palestine. Essential:
expert stenography, handle correspondence, supervise own department, arrange meetings, experience and ability, write promotion articles, summarize and prepare reports, write minutes of meetings, interview and appraise personnel for Palestine; good public relations manner. Desirable: familarity with Palestine, knowledge Hebrew.
Good salary commensurate with experience and ability. Box 1526, c/o The Nation.

LANGUAGES

LANGUAGE SERVICE, Box 6, Cambridge, Mass. Phonograph Courses. All makes. Books. All Languages. Established
1936. Booklet N. State language.

POSITIONS WANTED

SECRETARY, 29, eight years with high-tension Executive, desires change to congenial, permanent, interesting work. Five days, $40-$45 minimum. Available September. Box 1524, c/o The Nation.

SECRETARY - STENOGRAPHER, college, experienced, efficient, rapid, seeks interesting permanent part-time work, 5 days weekly. Phone UNiversity 4-0271.

SUMMER RENTAL

WANTED: Writer-artist-architect, preferably with family, to share isolated, ancient house, 125 acres, with young widowed mother of two children. Very reasonable.
References exchanged. Mrs. Fritz Lund,
Lebanon, Conn.

VOCATIONAL GUIDANCE

CHANGING JOBS SOON? Beginning graduate study? Graduating? Discover special abilities, I. Q., personality strengths.
Let psychologists advise suitable jobs, courses, future. Free information. Write:
Guidance Clinic, Box 86A, Highland Park, N. J.

WANTED

WANTED TO BUY. Phonograph Language Courses. LANGUAGE SERVICE,
Established 1936, Box 6, Cambridge, Mass.

Classified Advertisements

62 cents a line (six words)

MINIMUM — 3 lines

$6.16 per inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions.

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

BARclay 7-1066

which she first put on a couple of years ago, is the best of her present productions because it presents the dances in their normal context—except for the fact that normally they would not have to fight off a Dali setting. "Dances from Capriccio Espagnol" turned out to be not dances from Massine's ballet but Argentinita's dances to Rimsky-Korsakov's score—enjoyable enough, but no substitute for Massine's wonderful work. As for his "Moonlight Sonata," I was willing to take a reliable witness's word that it was something worth missing.

Since I was critical of Ballet Theater's performances of classic ballet I should mention a beautiful performance of "Les Sylphides" with Toumanova, Alonso, Hightower, and Eglevsky. Toumanova danced with restraint; Eglevsky with the continuity of impetus and phrase that he has acquired this season; and Hightower with her lovely fluency and suppleness; but it was Alonso who made the greatest impression with the way she did the Prelude—a way very much like Markova's in the delicacy, lightness, and sharp definition of the movement, the quiet and repose of its continuous flow.

Which brings me to the outstanding events of Ballet Theater's season—Markova's guest appearances in "Romeo and Juliet," "Pas de Quatre," and "Giselle." And for comment which expresses certain images of Markova's dancing that I have, in my own previous comments, been able to express only approximately and inadequately, I will turn this column over to its occasional guest. After describing, in the Herald-Tribune, the technical characteristics of her dancing that are extraordinary, Mr. Denby wrote: "But her dancing is based on a rarer virtue. It is the quiet which she moves in, an instinct for the melody of movement as it deploys and subsides in the silence of time that is the most refined of rhythmic delights. The sense of serenity in animation she creates is as touching as that of a Mozart melody. And like Mozart . . . she is a completely objective artist. Who Markova is, nobody knows. What you see on the stage is the piece she performs, the character she acts." And describing her Juliet as "a miracle of acting," in which "every nuance of pantomime is poignantly clear and every movement is a different aspect of the cumulative tragedy," he added: "And the restraint of them all, the slow-motion continuum from which they each arise as dance gestures and which flows so steadily through the whole hour-long ballet are wonders to have seen."

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Individual Equality

Dear Sirs: There has been much discussion of the voting procedure in the Security Council on an accusation of aggression. But there should be no voting procedure at all on aggression or on any other breach of international law as established by the council in its proper and legislative function. It has long been recognized that the use of one body both to legislate and then to judge cases under its own statutes means no law at all but simply arbitrary action on each case.

Let the Big Three, the Big Five, or whatever we arrive at, hold permanent seats on the council while lesser nations have smaller voices. This is a rough substitute for a representative formula, which it might be impossible to establish in so varied a world. But let us make all nations juridically equal before a high court established by the Security Council. Let this be a true court which will interpret the world security treaty and the statutory law of the Security Council. Adequate means for enforcing the court's decisions should be created by the council, and the absurdity of voting council members judging themselves should be dropped.

ROBERT J. ULLMAN

New York, March 10

"Long Live the E. L. A. S."

Dear Sirs: A copy of the Volo Anayenisi of January 6, 1945, when fighting between the British and E. L. A. S. was still going on in Athens, has come into my possession, and I have translated the following item:

Moses Simeon Pesah, chief rabbi of Volo, who with other Israelitish citizens fled to Free Greece during the period of the occupation, after the liberation sent a warm letter of thanks to the National Headquarters of the E. L. A. S., to the 54th Regiment, to the Directing Committee of Thessaly, and to the Volo Provincial Committee, in which he expressed deep appreciation to the E. L. A. S. and the other organizations of the E. A. M. for the assistance which they had furnished him and all Israelites. The Chief Rabbi closes his letter as follows:

"The universal history of Judaism will devote a special chapter to the noteworthy event of the salvation of the Hebrews of Greece who took refuge with the E. L. A. S. and from them received adequate assistance and protection from the hard persecution of the barbarous Germans. We Israelites of Greece will never forget the great kindness and the warm reception which we all received without discrimination at the hands of the heroic national army of the E. L. A. S. and of other groups of the liberating organization of the E. A. M., namely, the Ethniki Allilengyi (Welfare Organization), which supported the victims of fascism and fed the poor; the peace-loving Poliofilaki (Civil Police); and the E. P. O. N. (Youth Organization). We shall transmit commemoration of these deeds as a sacred usage from generation to generation as our meed of appreciation to the liberating army of the E. L. A. S. and its related bodies.

"May the blessings of the Most High attend your deeds—folk-saving deeds for humanity, nation-saving deeds for Greeks. May He guard you from every danger and misfortune, to the advantage of all. Your path be the path of victory.

"Long live the E. L. A. S.! Long live Hellas!

"(Signed) Moses Simeon Pesah,
"Chief Rabbi of Volo."

ELI CHAMBERLAIN

New York, February 23

Prejudice Marches On

Dear Sirs: I recently took a copy of The Cross and the Flag, published by rabble-rouser Gerald L. K. Smith, to the FBI and asked why they permitted it to be sold on the streets of Pittsburgh. I brought two articles to their special attention, Ickes and Franco and Argentine Episode, and I also expressed my views against Franco. The special agent to whom I spoke wanted to know what was wrong with Franco and subjected me to a "Spanish Inquisition," asking who the Loyalists were, etc. When I asked why he was questioning me he said he wanted to find out how much I knew about it.

When I asked why Coughlin was not taken in, I was told that they had nothing on him. When I suggested that the Catholic church might be protecting him, I was accused of being prejudiced. Indeed, I am prejudiced against a religious organization that has accepted

FULL TEXT OF DEBATE BETWEEN DR. JENKINS AND E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS

A stenographic report of the debate, "Is There a Logical Philosophy?" between the Rev. Dr. Burris Jenkins and E. Haldeaman-Julius, is available in pamphlet form, 25¢, prepaid. Send orders to: E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, Box 350, Girard, Kansas

Crossword Puzzle No. 117

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 A ministering angel
- 5 Savage and deformed slave of Prospero in Shakespeare's Tempest
- 9 "The ----- who praises in enthusiastic tone, All centuries but this and every country but his own" (The Mikado)
- 10 Enclosures
- 11 This kind of cataract won't hurt your eyes
- 12 The gilt on the gingerbread, in a manner of speaking
- 13 Frenchman who is part German
- 15 Thick and sticky
- 17 He likes to put his oar in
- 19 What ships weigh (no, not "anchors")
- 21 Spill — but not the sort you light up with
- 23 Can provide you with a shakedown on the table
- 25 The things 'round the hotel are what the gardener has pulled up
- 26 American town in nautical guise
- 27 Stretch in all directions
- 28 ----- Todd, the Demon Barber of Fleet Street

DOWN

- 1 Irascible old gentleman in Oliver Twist, always ready to "eat his head" if his opinions were proved wrong
- 2 Bert's idle (anag.)
- 3 An interesting start
- 4 A cat tale would naturally be concerned with milk

- 5 Parish in Somerset, England (now called "Queen's Camel"), where King Arthur held his court
- 6 Might load ice on an ancient who is lukewarm
- 7 Australia's famous surf-bathing beach
- 8 A bit large for a buttonhole
- 14 Suddenly (three words, 3, 2 and 4)
- 16 Open country you get to via Cork?
- 17 Rose by another name
- 18 A red pine undergoes a slight transformation
- 19 They don't mind being dictated to
- 20 Only tidal rivers have one
- 22 Take one, and you have a pastry shop; two, an inn; three, a Grand Hotel
- 24 A test for the musician

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 116

ACROSS:—1 CRAWLS; 5 SEPTIC; 9 ITCHING; 11 TROIKA; 12 IGNORE; 13 ERRANDS; 14 FLNA; 17 RASP; 19 POT-BOILER; 22 CATTY; 23 GORES; 25 BOUGHT; 26 FORMED; 27 TUBER; 29 CRETE; 31 SERENADER; 34 ODDS; 36 TODD; 37 ALL LIES; 39 BATTLE; 40 ATTEST; 41 MAN-MADE; 42 THROAT; 43 STUPOR.

DOWN:—1 CATSUP; 2 ANOINT; 3 LIKE; 4 STARLIGHT; 5 SNIDE; 6 EGGS; 7 TOO FAT; 8 CREEPY; 10 HEALER; 15 LOMBARD; 16 ABDUCTS; 17 RAW MEAT; 18 STUDDIED; 20 LOTUS; 21 REFER; 24 SORREHEADS; 25 BEDLAM; 26 COMBAT; 30 EDITOR; 32 DONE UP; 33 ROSTER; 35 CLEAT; 37 ALMA; 38 STET.

money from Mussolini and aided fascist organization in Europe, that meddles in our political affairs and uses its influence in Latin America.

I wonder what Biddle's attitude is. Why is Coughlin still at large? Whose money supports The Cross and the Flag? Pittsburgh citizens should find out.

IRENE STANFORD

Beaver, Pa., April 3

Dear Sirs: I recently had the misfortune to meet a high-ranking American officer who boasted that he had been "transferred" from three commands because of his openly expressed anti-Semitic views. This officer has not been dismissed from the service; he has merely been transferred. By its "attitude of non-intervention" the army has helped perpetuate existing prejudices. Prejudice is not instinctive; anti-Semitic and anti-Negro attitudes are developed in growing citizens by the deliberate anti-democratic propaganda of an adult minority. Incidents involving racial prejudice should be reported to the proper authorities whenever possible, and should be widely publicized. Attempts should be made to educate the guilty toward a more democratic way of life.

SERVICE MAN

April 27

We Were Wrong

Dear Sirs: If you paid a dollar for the information that Les Lettres Françaises uses the cap and bells of a court jester to designate the bishop in its chess problems (In the Wind, April 28), you were had. This symbol is always used in France to designate the piece known in English as the bishop but in French as the jester, le fou.

WAVERLY ROOT

Rockport, Mass., May 1

Saintsbury Memorial

Dear Sirs: To mark the centenary of the late Professor George Saintsbury's birth, a memorial volume is being prepared for publication. This is being compiled by a number of us who were Professor Saintsbury's students. The volume will include, among other things, a selection made from those of Saintsbury's writings which have appeared only in the pages of periodicals. Any information which your readers could give me about such contributions would help materially the work which is now in progress.

AUGUSTUS MUIR

Berden, Hertfordshire, England,

February 7

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 2, 1945

NUMBER 22

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

613

EDITORIALS

The British Elections

615

Rankin and Veterans

616

The Cabinet Changes

616

Conference Notes by J. A. del V.

617

ARTICLES

Canada's Post-War Election by J. King Gordon

618

The British People Must Choose by Michael Foot

619

Trouble Brews in China by T. A. Bisson

621

The Northwest Needs a CVA by Carey McWilliams

622

POLITICAL WAR

Fascism Without Mussolini—III by Mario Rossi

624

Franco Skulduggety

625

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Paris Regained by Cyril Connolly

626

Briefer Comment

627

Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling

628

Music by B. H. Haggin

630

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

631

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 118 by Jack Barrett

632

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Shape of Things

THE CHINESE CAPTURE OF THE TREATY PORT OF Nanning, following the recent victories at Foochow and in the provinces of Kwangsi, Hunan, and Honan, suggests a major Japanese retreat from these areas in order to strengthen their defenses in vital areas along the coast and in North China. It seems probable, too, that the enemy is moving troops from the interior of China to Manchuria to meet a possible Russian attack. But new Japanese landings north of Foochow indicate that there will be no abandonment of the China coast. Meanwhile, the speeding up of the Okinawa offensive and the virtual completion of the campaigns in the Philippines and Burma have led the Japanese to predict new United Nations operations at a number of widely scattered points. These are, of course, largely fishing expeditions designed to elicit some information from this side of the Pacific. But it is quite clear that sooner or later there will be a landing or landings somewhere on the China coast. Admiral Nimitz and several other high Navy officers have informed the Japanese that we are coming. The basic nature of American strategy will not be revealed, however, until these landings have been completed. The seizure of isolated ports such as Foochow or Swatow would be useful chiefly to strengthen the blockade against Japan. Landings at Canton, Shanghai, or in Shantung, on the other hand, would clearly forecast major land operations against the Japanese on the continent. Once the Okinawa campaign is finished, the Japanese will probably learn our intentions—the hard way.

★

JUST TWO MONTHS AGO, EARL BROWDER, writing in the New Masses, attacked J. Alvarez del Vayo for his article V-Day and Revolution, published in The Nation for March 17. Del Vayo had criticized the Communists for their policy of political coalition with the right and of cooperation with big business. Browder accused Del Vayo of "defeatism" and advised him to "think more profoundly on these problems." But apparently it is Mr. Browder who is going to do some thinking. The American Communist position has been exhaustively analyzed and sharply assailed by the leading theorist in the French Communist Party, Jacques Duclos, a man who stands well with Moscow. Duclos insists that nothing going on in the world or in America justified the party's decision to convert itself into a "political association" and to support free enterprise and a truce with business, even to the point of refraining from asking for any "drastic curbs on monopoly capital" after the war. He comments ironically on the attempt to solve "the problem of national unity with the good will of the men of the trusts, and under quasi-idyllic conditions, as if the capitalist regime had been able to change its nature by some unknown miracle." Duclos's long article also reveals for the first time the fierce debate that raged in the political bureau of the American Communist Party over the policy advocated and finally forced through by Browder. William Foster led the opposition and fought to the end but then announced that he did not intend to make his differences with Browder known outside the central committee.

✱

THE ATTACK BY DUCLOS, PRINTED IN FULL IN the Daily Worker, undoubtedly heralds a new line; Browder's comment, obsequious in tone, "welcomes" the criticism and urges a full discussion of the issue raised. But if the Communists follow the course indicated by the French leader they will merely swing closer to the position already held by most of their European comrades. In Europe, Communist support of reactionary governments or groups has become more and more a matter of form rather than fact. The ingredients of revolution are everywhere too near the surface and the demands of the people too urgent to permit a consistent policy of collaboration. In order to maintain the strength built up during the period of underground and guerrilla fighting, the Communists in Europe have had to temper their demands for national unity to the more clamorous needs of the masses. The attitude of the American Communists has been such a travesty on a working-class program that to maintain it after the fighting ended would have meant certain political suicide. It takes at least total war to sell cooperation with the Chamber of Commerce and the National Association of Manufacturers to American workers. But it is wrong to expect, as most newspaper comments appear to, a violent reversion to full-fledged class-war tactics. Russia still wants the coalition with Britain and the United States and still needs financial and other material help from us. The Communists will, we believe, adopt a more progressive but not a revolutionary line. It is no accident that M. Duclos spoke approvingly of the more liberal wing of the American Administration and twice quoted Henry Wallace.

✱

HOW MUCH LONGER CAN BRITAIN AND THE United States keep Franco poised on the top of a thin jet of American oil? It's a neat trick while it lasts but it can't go on indefinitely. A good push from any direction will knock him off, and several pushes seem to be in the making. The other day the Foreign Affairs Committee of the French Consultative Assembly proposed that the Allies jointly request Franco to abdicate in favor of a democratic government, and, if he refused, to break off relations with him immediately. The Committee asked the French government to put the plan up to the Allies without delay. It based its demand on security requirements, emphasizing Franco's pro-Axis behavior during the war and his present refusal to hand over Pierre Laval, Vichy's Chief of Government who fled to Spain from Germany. This move is obviously of immense political importance. If the French government acts, the British and Americans will be faced with the necessity of an immediate decision which they have been maneuvering by every means to avoid. Meanwhile anti-Franco pressure is still rising in San Francisco. Negrin's brief visit created much interest, and although Molotov and Eden had left when he arrived, he had talks with the heads of almost every important delegation. He refused to hold a press conference but in private conversations he was able to give a clear idea of his conception of how the change from fascism to democracy in Spain should be brought about. Negrin left San Francisco for a few days in Washington en route to Mexico, where he will consult with the leaders of all the Republican parties and organizations. The moment an agreement is reached among these groups, the only remaining pretext on which the British and American governments could base a refusal of the French demand will have vanished.

✱

THE TRUMAN ADMINISTRATION'S FIRST MAJOR test in the House has ended with a victory that should raise hopes abroad of America's dependability in the sphere of international cooperation. The passage of the Reciprocal Trade Treaty Bill by 239 to 153 was a personal triumph for the President, a demonstration of Democratic Party strength and discipline in the House, an indication that substantial forces in this country can be mustered to support a liberal trade and foreign policy. Thirty-one Republicans, including Clare Luce of Connecticut, Baldwin and Bennett of New York, Bolton of Ohio, and Wolverton of New Jersey, defied party leadership to vote for the bill, while the one "Progressive," Hull of Wisconsin, stood pat with the G. O. P. Speaker Rayburn is to be commended on his able leadership, and we also applaud Chairman Doughton of the Ways and Means Committee, Ranking Majority Member Cooper of Tennessee, and Robertson of Virginia for the aid they gave Rayburn and the President. We urge labor and liberal organizations to get busy and muster all the strength they can for the coming fight over the bill in the Senate. Final passage is the first necessary step toward a stable world peace.

✱

CARTELS WILL FACE HARD TIMES IF CONGRESS acts favorably on the O'Mahoney and Voorhis bills. O'Mahoney's proposed Foreign Contracts Act would require the registration of foreign contracts made by domestic and foreign companies doing business with the United States. But Congress must act quickly, for as former Attorney General Biddle pointed out when he recently testified in favor of the bill, cartel arrangements disrupted by the war are already being resumed. Biddle urged Congress to force American cartel partners to throw their international agreements open to the public, although he warned that publicity alone would not destroy the cartel system. He told of a telephone conversation between the former head of an American chemical company and the head of I. G. Farben just before we entered the war, in which the former said, "Have no fear, whatever I do will be in your interest." The fact that cartel loyalties supersede and are often inimical to the national interest was amply demonstrated by Representative Voorhis, who a few days after Biddle testified addressed the House on his resolution calling on the government to prevent the enemy nations of World War II from rebuilding their war potential in neutral or other nations and to prevent citizens, organizations, or corporations of the United States from contributing to the future war potential of such enemy nations through cartel agreements. Military victory has not destroyed German economic penetration. Germany was defeated before and rose to fight again largely through the help of cartel partners in the now victorious and neutral countries. They are ready to repeat the performance.

✱

HITLER SAVED AN AMERICAN CITIZEN, DANIEL Heineman, when Brussels was liberated, by providing him with a special guard and enabling him to leave the city with important documents. Voorhis charged in his address in Congress. Heineman, of course, isn't an ordinary American. He is the chief representative in the United States of the Sofina Company, a huge public-utility holding company organized in Brussels and now registered in Panama. Its managerial offices are in New York, its technical staff is in Lisbon, and it keeps its books in Cuba. Heineman was one of the chief figures behind the Sofina meeting in Lisbon last year when representatives of manufacturers of warring and neutral countries met to facilitate the protection of German interests in neutral and Allied countries. The spotlight was thrown on Heineman and the Lisbon meeting by Voorhis in a facts-and-figures speech on the cartel international. Voorhis said that he had just received evidence that representatives of the Spanish subsidiary of the German Schering Corporation recently walked into the American embassy at Madrid with a proposal for merging the Spanish subsidiary of Schering of Berlin with the American Schering Company of Bloomfield, New Jersey, so that relations with the German company might be closer. Germans, Voorhis asserted, control 40 per cent of Spain's entire industry; I. G. Farben alone has fourteen subsidiaries there. Further, German industry owns or controls some five hundred subsidiaries and affiliates in Portugal, Spain, Sweden, and Switzerland.

✱

THE OPENING GUN WAS FIRED IN THE FIGHT to assure health, security, and jobs in post-war America with the introduction of a broadened social-security program under the sponsorship of Senators Wagner and Murray and Representative Dingell. The new bill contains many of the proposals found in the Wagner-Murray-Dingell measure introduced in the last Congress and many of the revisions suggested in recent years by the Social Security Board. The plan for health and hospital insurance has been strengthened, on the basis of recommendations in the report of the Senate Subcommittee on Wartime Health and Education. In addition to bringing adequate medical care within the means of most of the American people, this bill would strengthen our public-health service, standardize unemployment insurance under federal auspices, and extend the coverage of this broadened program to some 15,000,000 workers who are denied its protection. This extension of protection to the least secure portion of our population should aid materially in sustaining consumer buying power and thus assure a higher level of employment. Although the C. I. O., the A. F. of L., and most authorities in the field of social insurance and public health strongly support the bill, it faces a stubborn fight in Congress. The groups which defeated the Murray-Kilgore bill last autumn will most certainly gang up on this far more comprehensive measure, and it can be pushed through only by an impressive demonstration of public support.

The British Elections

THE resignation of the Churchill government marks the end of a long era. No election has been held since 1935; the Parliament now dissolved survived Mussolini's Ethiopian adventure, the Spanish War, Munich, and the total war that followed. Deaths and resignations aside, it was still a Baldwin Parliament. It had long outlived its day. The government itself, remade by Mr. Churchill in May, 1940, when the incapacity of Mr. Chamberlain became obvious, was a different matter; it was a war coalition and a strong one. Created at the most critical hour of Britain's history, it brought the country through to a great triumph. Its strength lay in part in the courage and capacity of its leader, Winston Churchill. But credit must also go in large measure to the British people as a whole, who gladly subordinated group and party interests to work for the common goal of victory. When the Nazi aggression was crushed, the end of the coalition became inevitable. That Mr. Churchill precipitated the issue by resigning now instead of postponing the elections until autumn, as Mr. Attlee asked, was a bit of political ruthlessness. But a long delay would have been out of the question in any event. Mr. Churchill's proposal that the coalition should continue until the end of the war with Japan was totally unrealistic in the face of crowding domestic and foreign problems which neither Parliament nor government was chosen to meet.

As Michael Foot points out elsewhere in this issue, Labor is badly handicapped by having to launch a campaign against Mr. Churchill only a few weeks after his government's triumph in the war. Yet many of the qualities that made Churchill an unequalled war leader render him unfit for constructive post-war leadership. The doggedness with which he held out against the possibility that his country could go down is matched by a similar determination that the England and empire of tomorrow shall not differ in essentials from the England and empire of his youth. In its fight against Churchill Labor has two powerful domestic issues—jobs and homes—to set against the Prime Minister's tremendous prestige. Undoubtedly the British people are desperately concerned with post-war employment and housing. But Churchill is a master campaigner, and he may try to keep a foot in each camp by adopting a Tory-reformist line, claiming credit for the Beveridge plan, the various housing projects, and the educational schemes which were formulated by the more liberal members of the war-time coalition. If he follows this strategy he will be hard to beat.

Churchill is more vulnerable to a determined Labor attack on foreign policy. Already the outlines of this attack may be seen in the pre-campaign statements of Clement Attlee, Ernest Bevin, and Hugh Dalton. In view of the immense sympathy for Russia that exists throughout England, Labor can be expected to hammer home its well-founded contention that a Socialist government is more likely to succeed in removing the existing suspicion between London and Moscow than an all-Tory government. Its position on Poland, in particular, is both reasonable and conciliatory. Moreover, Labor can make effective use of Churchill's bitter opposition to the rise of popular governments in the liberated countries and his persistent support of reaction in Spain. The responsibility for these policies rests clearly with the Prime Minister, although Labor will undoubtedly have occasion to regret the Citrine whitewash of British action in Greece. But in spite of its undeniable complicity in the political mistakes of the coalition, Labor can and should wage a strong campaign on the need of a democratic foreign policy. The British people want peace even more than houses and jobs.

Rankin and Veterans

FOR many months grave charges against the Veterans Administration have issued in an unending stream from a variety of independent and responsible sources, including the New York Times and the Journal of the American Medical Association. The truth or falsity of these charges is of the utmost importance to the future health and welfare of our 12,000,000 returning servicemen. Representative Rankin, however, is not concerned. Having previously killed a House resolution that would have provided for an impartial inquiry, he has now proceeded to the major task of intimidating and discrediting all sincere critics of the Veterans Administration.

The first victim was Representative Philip P. Philbin of Massachusetts, who vainly tried to present several hundred letters of complaint against the agency. The one question which exercised the committee was how Mr. Philbin had secured a large number of copies of a magazine containing an exposé of the Veterans Administration which he had distributed to members of Congress.

Albert Deutsch, medical reporter for PM, who was the next witness, fared even worse. The low medical standards of the Veterans Administration and, in particular, its deplorable lack of mental-hygiene facilities, concerning which Mr. Deutsch has prepared a careful report, were subjects of no apparent interest to the committee. At any rate it did not permit him to testify. Instead, at Rankin's insistence, it cited Deutsch for contempt because he refused to name five doctors with the Veterans Administration who had given him information in confidence. Albert Q. Maisel of Hearst's Cosmopolitan, is in the pillory as we go to press. Thus far the committee's interest has centered on topics so germane to veteran welfare as the rate which Cosmopolitan pays for feature articles, and whether Mr. Maisel imputes an anti-New York bias to the committee.

The nation-wide editorial protest which greeted Rankin's high-handed treatment of Deutsch indicates that the right of newspaper reporters to receive information in confidence is solidly established. It is clear that the House will not sustain Rankin in his action against Deutsch.

Rankin has now come up smiling with two new bills. One is allegedly designed to improve the caliber of medical personnel in the Veterans Administration by removing civil-service restrictions. Under the present set-up this would probably mean an increase in patronage and further deterioration of the medical service. The other bill would guarantee $20 a week for a full year to every returning veteran, whether employed or not. According to Rankin, the present law, which restricts payment of this sum to unemployed veterans, "encourages idleness and loafing." This is as bad an argument against social security as has been advanced, and it certainly does not answer any of the charges that have been brought against the Veterans Administration. The investigation of these charges cannot be left to the Veterans Committee, which has too intimate a relationship with the Veterans Administration. It certainly cannot be entrusted to the chairmanship of Representative Rankin, who, apart from his other conspicuous qualifications, is believed to have received powerful support from General Hines, head of the Veterans Administration, in his early fight for renewal of the Dies committee. The job is one for an independent Congressional committee that is not afraid to dig for the facts.

The Cabinet Changes

MR. TRUMAN means to be President of the United States. Leaving out of account his chance of reelection, he is slated to sit in the White House for a bit more than three and a half years. And it is now quite clear that he does not intend to pass that time as an interim President or even as a substitute for a deceased President.

He has his own rather definite ideas about administration. In the Cabinet changes announced last week he has given these ideas their first important expression. The changes indicate not so much a swing to the right or to the left as an insistence upon orderly and effective organization of the government.

Mr. Truman struck at the weakest spots, at the political liabilities, in the Cabinet he inherited. Frances Perkins has been Secretary of Labor for twelve years, and for about a decade of that span there has been a widespread demand that she be replaced. It is much to her credit that she herself joined in this demand and was prevailed upon to remain in office only because of her devotion to President Roosevelt. Among farmers Claude Wickard was almost as complete a political cipher as Miss Perkins was among union workers. Frances Biddle, too, was without any grass-roots political support and had become a handy target for criticism of the Administration.

The nomination of Lewis Schwellenbach to head the Department of Labor clearly portends a reorganization of federal activities in the labor field. As chairman of the Senate committee investigating the war effort, Mr. Truman was sharply critical of "conflicting authority over and responsibility for" various war programs. Judge Schwellenbach can be expected to effect the kind of coordinated control in which the President believes. If there are protests against him from labor on the ground that he is not a union man, they will probably be entirely pro forma. He was a liberal judge and a vigorous New Deal Senator. A good many persons now applauding his appointment have forgotten that he was one of the leaders in Mr. Roosevelt's fight for reorganization of the Supreme Court.

The President's predilection for centralized authority was also expressed in his choice of Clinton Anderson to take over both the Department of Agriculture and the War Food Administration. As chairman of the House Committee on Elections, Anderson did a fair, forthright, and extremely skilful job last fall. Under difficult circumstances he defended the right of organized workers to share effectively in the political life of the nation through the P. A. C. He put a stop to witch-hunting, and he turned a spotlight on the antics of O'Daniel in Texas. As chairman of the House food-investigating committee, he has been at least an exponent of full production, and his reports have been in the main constructive. How soundly he will administer what he has thus far only criticized is still to be seen.

Tom Clark for Attorney General is the most puzzling and most uncertain of the President's choices—a choice explicable only in political terms. With all Biddle's vacillations and hesitations, he undoubtedly had a fine record in respect to civil liberties. The Department of Justice has been wholly free from hysteria and has dealt decently with aliens and minority groups—in particular with the unfortunate citizens of Japanese descent. That this record will be maintained under Clark is not entirely certain. Carey McWilliams has revealed he was one of General DeWitt's advisers before the mass-exclusion order was issued on the West Coast. We can only hope that he will stand firm in the trying period of reconversion and national reorientation.

There is nothing in these choices to suggest an abandonment of New Deal policies. President Truman is wise to bolster his Administration with persons who possess political strength. And he is certainly entitled to have around him men of his own choosing on whose personal devotion he can rely. That he was by no means trying to clear out of office the close friends of his predecessors is amply attested by his retention of Morgenthau and Ickes and by his designation of Harry Hopkins and Joseph Davies as his special diplomatic emissaries.

Conference Notes

San Francisco, May 25

I HAVE met the colorful Arab delegation at almost every party I have gone to. Historical processes are rapidly eliminating the princes of royal blood, and when an Otto of Hapsburg is no longer available to recall the romantic days of imperial Vienna, an Oriental Royal Highness is decidedly welcome. The Arab delegation is making the most of this upper-class weakness. Among its members are highly intelligent diplomats, politicians, and business men. They speak with equal competence of poetry and petroleum.

The creation of a League of Arab States was in itself an extremely shrewd move. In order to be able to represent Christian as well as Moslem elements the League includes Lebanon, which is historically a Christian state, although only about 58 per cent of its actual population is Christian. In this way the League can work both ends, calling on the Moslems when necessary and on Christian sentiment when that is advisable. The Arab League is well adapted to various types of political intrigue as, for example, the attempt to oust French influence from Syria and Lebanon. But Professor Yahuda of the New School for Social Research charged in a press conference here that the main objective of those who wanted the five Arab states in the conference was to liquidate the Balfour Declaration and avoid the obligation of making Palestine the Jewish national home.

Business goes hand in hand with politics. American oil magnates joined in the enthusiastic reception accorded the Saudi Arabians, in whom they see a source of compensation for their difficulties in Mexico and elsewhere. As a result of all this, the Arabian delegation is being treated as one of the most important factors in building peace and collective security. Both these objectives are strangely symbolized on the green flag waving with the other United Nations flags above the entrance of the Fairmont Hotel. On it an Arabic inscription proclaims that there is no other God than Allah and no other prophet than his "messenger" Mohammed—and it bears the sword as an emblem. Undoubtedly, among the various talents represented in the Arab delegation, there is at least one jurist who can reconcile the cult of the sword with the aims of the organization for international security!

It is believed that San Francisco is only the first of a series of international conferences that will alternate with conversations among the Big Three and, eventually, the Big Five. Rather tardily, as is usual among the democracies, it is now being admitted that some kind of inter-Allied council should have been created two years ago to pave the way for the present meeting. Since this was not done, a number of conferences will have to be held during the next two years. It is useless to try to exclude political problems, as has been attempted here. Political problems enter the meeting rooms despite all efforts to bar them. It is interesting that the statements of various delegations regretting that the political policy of the United Nations had not been better formulated in advance are exactly those set forth week after week in The Nation. Nobody learns until the damage is done, and those who have learned least are the diplomats who failed so tragically in 1938 and are directly responsible for the millions of dead in 1945. The old diplomacy is again in evidence in San Francisco, exhibiting an arrogance that Talleyrand might have inspired.

Up to now no fewer than six cities have been suggested as the seat of the new international organization—Philadelphia, Ottawa, Vienna, Monte Carlo, Tangier, and Geneva.

Philadelphia finds few supporters among the Europeans, not because of any general anti-American sentiment but because of a more than mild distrust of the influence of American diplomacy.

Ottawa has definite advantages because it is near the United States without being in the United States.

Vienna, it is said, is favored by the Russians.

Monte Carlo was the proposal, serious or otherwise, of Mr. Masaryk, Czechoslovakia's amiable Foreign Minister. Certainly the little state of Monaco offers suitable neutral territory, and nobody can deny the material attractions of the place.

Tangier is a French idea. This odd proposal makes some sense. For Tangier is not only a beautiful and well-situated city. It is also, under normal conditions, an international city. Once chosen as the seat of the world organization, Tangier would only have to be retrieved from the violent hands of Franco and restored to its proper legal status.

Geneva had at the beginning few partisans despite a plan to create a "free zone," embracing the city, between Switzerland and France and thus to by-pass Russia's long-standing objections to Switzerland. Those who favor Geneva argue that the old League buildings costing millions are already there with archives, library, texts of treaties, and all the paraphernalia needed to carry on the work started at San Francisco. Today it looks as though this argument, plus the "free zone," might win the decision for Geneva. But the memories of the League weigh heavily against it.

J. A. del V.

Canada's Post-War Election

BY J. KING GORDON

Toronto, May 29

CANADA faces a national election immediately after the close of the European war. The vote on June 11 will reflect attitudes and sentiments induced by Canada's five and a half years of strenuous war effort. It will also reflect to some extent divisions of opinion on post-war policies.

The present Liberal government of Prime Minister W. L. MacKenzie King goes to the people on its war record and on its program for post-war reconstruction. Few people to whom I spoke during the last few days in eastern Canada had much doubt that after June 11 Mr. King would embark upon his sixth term. The main question is whether he will have a clear majority. The second question is which will be the second party and official opposition—the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation led by M. J. Coldwell, M. P., or the Progressive Conservative party led by John Bracken?

Six months ago very few Canadians would have given Mr. King any odds on his chances of re-election. The wartime crisis over conscription had reached its most acute stage. The Minister of National Defense had resigned in protest over the continuation of the policy of voluntary enlistment for overseas service, the Cabinet was badly split, the pressure in all parts of Canada outside of Quebec had risen to irresistible proportions. Mr. King appointed a new Minister of National Defense, General McNaughton, and then adopted a limited policy of overseas conscription. This shift was interpreted in Quebec as a betrayal of Mr. King's anti-conscription pledge: elsewhere in Canada it was held to be too little and too late. The defeat of General McNaughton in a by-election and the elimination of the Liberal government in the province of Quebec were taken to be omens of the fate that awaited Mr. King when he went to the polls.

Now Mr. King goes to the polls and he will probably be returned. What has happened to change the picture? The first important happening is obviously the end of the war in Europe. Conscription has become an issue in retrospect. True, Mr. King has declared that there will be no conscription for the war in the Pacific but since only a small proportion of Canada's land, sea, and air forces will be wanted it is difficult to awaken much protest about a voluntary system which has raised nearly a million men in all branches of the service. In the second place, with the war over, the government's total war effort comes in for cooler appraisal.

Even leaders in the opposition parties are compelled to admit that for a country of twelve millions Canada has achieved goals in military mobilization, war production and civilian controls that have measured up to the best efforts of the other Allied powers. In the third place the Progressive Conservatives' preoccupation with conscription has emphasized the barrenness of the party in political ideas and the incapacity of top Conservative leadership. In the fourth place, the anti-conscriptionist, anti-King sentiment in Quebec has become weak and diffuse. The Bloc Populaire, which had led a passionate French nationalist movement against Mr. King has petered out to a shadow of its former menace. The most famous of French Canadian comedians recently brought the house down with a skit entitled "Le Bloc Flop."

An interesting illustration of the confusion of the present Canadian political picture is to be found in the role of the Progressive Conservatives in Quebec. Throughout the rest of Canada they are flailing Mr. King on conscription for reasons precisely opposite to those raised by the Bloc. In Quebec, they are using a devious tactic. Their organizer announced that the Progressive-Conservative party would run 27 candidates, it would back 33 "Independent" candidates, and it would not oppose 5 others including Mayor Camilien Houde, the violent and colorful anti-conscriptionist who was released from internment camp just in time to be elected mayor of Montreal. The Independents are almost all nationalists who have opposed the government's war policy. In 1911, as the Winnipeg Free Press pointed out in an unanswerable editorial on May 23, the Conservative Party followed similar tactics of playing both ends against the middle. To this day the maneuver is referred to in Quebec as "the Great Betrayal." The general impression seems to be that Mr. King will take at least forty of Quebec's sixty-five seats.

With this solid bloc of Quebec seats it is generally agreed that the King government will gain sufficient seats throughout the rest of Canada to return him to office: it is very doubtful, however, that he will receive enough to give him an over-all majority. The western provinces, led by Saskatchewan, are showing a strong leaning toward the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Throughout the whole country the C. C. F. has been urging the necessity of a planned economy with the nationalization of basic utilities and industries to meet the post-war needs of the Canadian people. The outstanding exception in the western picture is Alberta where the Social Crediters will likely send back their usual quota. The Maritime provinces may show slight C. C. F. and Progressive Conservative gains. Ontario with its eighty-two seats is, therefore, the crucial province.

Ontario is particularly interesting because it is holding its provincial election just one week to the day before the Federal election. The issues generally discussed are provincial issues. In the last election the C. C. F. made spectacular gains increasing its representation in the legislature from nothing to thirty-four, just four seats less than those held by the Progressive Conservatives under George Drew. During the session of the legislature two developments occurred to complicate the political picture. Mitchell Hepburn, former arch-enemy of the C. I. O. and of Mr. King, returned to the leadership of the Ontario Liberals. The Communist Party re-emerged in the guise of the Labor Progressives. Their leader in the legislature, A. A. McLeod, urging a Labor-Liberal coalition, established himself as Mr. Hepburn's guide, counsellor and friend. For a time, this strange political marriage caused some confusion in the industrial districts of Ontario and perhaps harmed the C. C. F. But organized labor is strongly back of the C. C. F. The Canadian Congress of Labor has endorsed its program and local C. I. O. unions are solid in their support. The same applies to many A. F. of L. locals although right-wing labor and communist influence at top levels of the Trades and Labor Congress has swung that body toward the Liberal Party.

During the last week the basic programmatic debate was swept aside by the blast from a political bomb dropped fairly in the camp of Premier Drew by C. C. F. leader Ted Jolliffe, a serious-minded young lawyer whom no one has ever thought of as extreme or irresponsible. The C. C. F. group as a whole have shown great forbearance in the face of an unscrupulous and heavily financed campaign of defamation. When in a full-length radio address, Jolliffe accused Premier Drew of maintaining a secret police, a "Gestapo" for prying into the affairs of political opponents, and affirmed that he had full affidavits to support the accusation, all other issues were for the moment forgotten. Drew replied with an absolute denial, admitting, however, that there was in existence a "special department" of the provincial police devoted to the task of investigating "sabotage." He announced that a Royal Commission would be appointed to probe the charges.

The outcome in the federal election depends to a great extent on the Ontario vote. Should Jolliffe's charge convince the voters, Drew will suffer defeat: nobody likes a Gestapo. But such a charge is powerful dynamite and the blast goes in all directions. Many people may suspend judgment until after the Royal Commission reports. In that case Drew may hold his own or even gain. An important gain for Drew would strengthen the Progressive Conservatives across Canada but not sufficiently to give them the edge on Mr. King; it would also weaken seriously the chances of the C. C. F. becoming the official opposition in Ottawa. If the C. C. F. can hold its own or gain in Ontario, then it would become the second party in Ottawa. In that position, while it would on no account enter into any coalition with the Liberals, it would certainly back the government in any progressive post-war legislation and would even be in a position to force the adoption of a program more advanced than the government would otherwise inaugurate.

The British People Must Choose

BY MICHAEL FOOT

BRITAIN'S forthcoming election will be the most baffling for the prophet of any held in this century.

No appeal to the polls has been made for ten years; masses of electors have been shifted from their homes by the circumstances of war; the party machines are rusty; several million young men and women in the services who have never voted before in their lives will be deprived of the chance of participating in the controversy although provision has been made for them to vote; finally, some of the issues are blurred owing to the fact that all the leaders of all the major parties have been members of a Coalition which has not only won the war but has produced jointly several projects for post-war policy.

These are formidable obstacles to the presentation of a clear choice. But the alternative—a postponement of the election until after the Japanese war—was intolerable. Mr. Churchill can hardly have advanced this as a serious suggestion; it was more a device for branding the Labor Party with the responsibility of forcing the issue and disrupting "national unity." During the campaign several smaller crocodiles than Mr. Churchill will weep tears over "the unpatriotic course which the misguided party politicians have chosen to follow against the advice of the great war leader." Such lamentations will not be taken very seriously. The present Parliament was returned in 1935 on a pledge that the most effective sanctions would be applied against Mussolini in Abyssinia. Mr. Chamberlain, now deceased, even assured those who gave him their confidence that a failure of the League policy in Abyssinia would entitle us to be held up to shame before our children and our children's children; four years later he was in Rome toasting the new Emperor of Ethiopia, King Victor Emmanuel. These memories, and they could be multiplied a hundred-fold, explain the undercurrent of bitterness in British politics, which only the headlong tides of war could submerge. They explain also why an election could not be decently postponed much longer.

The present Parliament, "the Long Parliament," is old and incapable. Indeed, several dozens of its number have mercifully passed away owing to hardening of the arteries, water on the brain, and other ailments. Increasingly in the past few months the consequent by-elections have revealed how eager the people were to try something new even in constituencies once regarded as impregnable Conservative. There is also a suspicion that in the past few months, in order to avoid these awkward contests, the corpses of a few defunct Tory M. P.'s have been dumped in the cellars of St. Stephen's just near the place where Guy Fawkes stored his dynamite.

If the results of these by-elections were to be taken as a final and accurate guide, the obvious prophecy would be a sweeping victory for Labor and a reversal of the present situation, where the Tories control some 400 seats and the Labor Party 170. The Labor Party, of course, has not contested these elections on its own account; according to the political truce any vacancies were to be filled by the nomination of the party in possession. However, left-wing voters chafed under the yoke. A series of independent or Common Wealth candidates challenged the Coalition. They could not fight formally on Labor's platform; but the green gills of any Tory M. P. on the morrow of one of these smashing victories testified to the discomfort of the Tory machine. No one can doubt that it is genuinely scared. By-election returns, Gallup polls, reports from the services, have all shown the same tendency. There has been no sign of a positive mass enthusiasm for the Labor Party; there have been plentiful signs of disgust with the Tories and sure evidence that the rock of apathy and quiescence which was the chief Tory bulwark in the days of Chamberlain is finally splintered. As often before in history, war has broken the fetters on men's minds and made them eager to experiment with new social forms.

However, a General Election is something vastly different from a by-election. This is the fact that soothes the fevered nightmares of the Tories. A vote against the Tories at a by-election did not involve the displacement of Mr. Churchill; it merely made him irritable for a few days. A vote for Labor at the coming General Election may remove him from office, and the Tories, of course—including the vast majority of their number who condemned and ostracized him as a man of "no judgment" ten years ago when he was talking sense about the Nazis—know well enough that Mr. Churchill is their only asset. Without him they are naked and shameless ex-Munichites and appeasers. With him they are the bold champions of the Man Who Won the War, outraged by the insolence of Labor, which dares to dissent from so matchless a leader.

The Churchill card is the only winning one in the Tory pack with the possible exception of Mr. Eden, who masquerades as a modest queen; the other knaves and jokers, the Beaverbrooks, Brackens, Hudsons, and such, will be kept up Tory sleeves and out of sight until the game is over. Churchill is certainly a high trump. He will command the radio with an eloquence none of his rivals can attempt, with a voice already known and widely revered throughout the land. By one of the strangest ironies in history the whole future of the Conservative Party rests in the hands of a man who could not muster six Tory votes in the House of Commons a dozen years ago.

Labor has no personality to set against Churchill's. Attlee, the leader of the party and almost certainly Premier if Labor is returned, is effective in committee but unable to impress the public. Ernest Bevin and Herbert Morrison have both performed huge tasks in the war. Stafford Cripps has a great reputation for integrity and administrative ability, and his return to the party is a big addition of strength. Outside the ranks of the official leadership Labor's campaign will be led by men like Aneurin Bevan and Emmanuel Shinwell, the two best platform speakers in the country. Altogether Labor could form an administration quite as competent as the Tories', although of course none would possess the world prestige of Churchill.

There are big issues to be fought out altogether apart from personalities, and here the running is made by Labor. The Tory campaign, which has hitherto been largely in the hands of men like Beaverbrook and Bracken and the diehards of the party, has concentrated on attacking war-time controls and the restraints on private enterprise. The Younger Tories would have preferred a greater emphasis on promises of social reform, full employment, and housing. Perhaps Mr. Churchill, a skilful electioneer, will contrive a delicate blend of the two appeals. There is nothing like a bet both ways, especially when safe jobs and good homes are the two needs uppermost in the minds of the British people.

Jobs and homes are, of course, the two chief items in Labor's program. Labor claims that they can be secured only by a program which goes far beyond the modest plans for an expansionist finance policy and a Town and Country Planning Act agreed upon by the Coalition in its halcyon days. The Labor Party is committed to a full-blooded program of nationalization, including coal mines, electricity, steel, and transport, together with a considerable measure of nationalization of finance and land. The leaders, and the rank and file of the party somewhat more vocally, appeal for the foundation of "a Socialist Commonwealth." The word may sound startling in American ears. After forty years of Labor propaganda and five years of war which have left Britain with no assets but the skill and energy of its people, plus the potentialities of leadership among its statesmen, the phrase does not really sound so frightening.

Even if Labor should win, it would be no easy task to build a Socialist Commonwealth in a war-ravaged land, and no Labor spokesmen will promise a simple road to paradise. But descending for one moment from the lofty altitudes of impartiality hitherto so painfully scaled in this article, it may be said in conclusion that there is a very real choice the British people have to make.

To reconstruct Britain after the most devastating experience in its history, to rebuild its broken cities, to recover its trade, to reequip its industries, and at the same time to provide all those social amenities which its people now demand will call for an unexampled burst of communal energy. The nation will hardly be able to do it on the old cutthroat pattern, and it would be wise not to dally with the old-fashioned methods which seemed to spell the decline of British industry in the twenties and thirties. If Labor in Britain could do the task while jealously protecting the civil liberties so justly prized by Western nations, it would have conducted an experiment in social democracy to amaze and lead the world.

The British people must begin to make their choice in July.

Trouble Brews in China

BY T. A. BISSON

ON MAY 17 an apparently routine announcement under a Chungking date line stated that the Sixth National Kuomintang Congress had definitely set November 12, 1945, as the date for convening a National Assembly to approve the draft constitution. Ironically enough, this decision is being publicized in the United States as a progressive move inaugurating "constitutional government," whereas in fact it represents a desperate maneuver that may well foreclose any possibility of a constructive settlement of China's internal problems.

The current Kuomintang effort to introduce a constitution under its own auspices by unilateral action has already precipitated in China the most ominous political crisis of the past decade. For most of this period the constitutional issue has remained dormant. It has now been raised in a fashion which threatens to split China into two states, each with its own formally organized government. Once this development has taken place, the task of restoring even nominal unity will be virtually hopeless and the danger of eventual civil war in China will be sharply accentuated.

The Chinese News Service dispatch of May 17 declared that all questions concerning the membership and powers of the new National Assembly would be "left to the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang or its standing committee to decide." Opinions of elements outside the Kuomintang, it was stated, would receive "careful consideration" in the People's Political Council, scheduled to meet in July.

On the membership issue, however, it is clear that the essential decision has been taken by the present Kuomintang Congress. The "consensus" of the Kuomintang delegates was phrased as "recognition of the validity of delegates elected before the war generally, and the holding of supplementary elections to make the Assembly more fully representative." This decision means that a considerable group in the National Assembly will consist of delegates chosen by the Kuomintang in 1936-37, and that the remainder will be "elected" in the coming months under Kuomintang procedures and from Kuomintang territory. A National Assembly thus constituted will be wholly unrepresentative of the Chinese people.

This National Assembly, moreover, is not a true constituent assembly. Its members are not meeting to frame a constitution. They are being summoned to give formal sanction to a draft constitution which has been carefully prepared by the Kuomintang leadership. Such "powers" as may be conferred upon the Assembly by the Central Executive Committee will be rendered illusory by this document, even though innocuous textual changes may be inserted by the hand-picked delegates. Their deliberations, so different from the strenuous sessions of the Philadelphia convention in 1787, will be a travesty of the constitution-making process.

The authoritarian character of the draft constitution has evoked criticism from virtually all sectors of Chinese political life except the Kuomintang's inner group. Under its provisions, vast substantive and appointive powers are vested in the President, who holds office for six years and may be reelected for a second term. He is chosen not by popular vote but by an elected National Assembly. He is also responsible to this National Assembly, which, however, he convenes for but one month once every three years, except in emergencies. He appoints all members of the Executive Yuan, which in turn submits budgetary and statutory measures to the Legislative Yuan. A bill of rights is inserted, but it is doubly restricted. As in the Japanese constitution, each right is specifically qualified by the phrase "except in accordance with law." In addition, Article 25 blankets the issue by providing that "laws imperative for safeguarding national security, averting national crisis, maintaining public peace and order, or promoting public interest may restrict the citizens' liberties and rights." Instead of establishing the federalism which Chinese conditions require, the draft constitution makes the provinces mere agents of the central authorities by providing that governors be appointed by the central government.

All details of the draft constitution are painstakingly framed so as to ease the transition of the Kuomintang into the snug trappings of the new regime, through which it may continue to exercise its dictatorial powers with "constitutional" sanction. The war and post-war destiny of China may turn on whether the Kuomintang seriously determines to execute this political maneuver. A change of heart can still take place at the session of the People's Political Council in July. Very probably the Kuomintang wished to leave this possible avenue of compromise open.

At the moment, and this is the major weakness of its position, the Kuomintang is playing a lone hand on the constitutional issue. The Democratic League, composed of the political parties and groups in Kuomintang China which have yet to receive legal status, has registered no support for the Assembly now scheduled to meet in November. On the contrary, the Democratic League and the Chinese Communists are joining in a demand for establishment of a coalition government, formed by an all parties' conference. They maintain that the organization of such a government and the legalization of all Chinese parties are the necessary condition for the free elections which can alone create a National Assembly with the authority to adopt a constitution. In principle, however, they are not in favor of adopting a constitution until after the war, when all Chinese territory will have been liberated and the elections to an Assembly can be nation wide. The immediate need, in their opinion, is for a coalition government that can unify the country and prosecute the war with full popular support.

The Democratic League, at present cooperating with the Chinese Communists in a loose "united front," will occupy a strategic position of considerable significance during the next few months. If the parties and groups in the League were given legal status, there can be little doubt that they would be able to rally behind them the progressive political sentiment of Kuomintang China. The Kuomintang's political tactics are to detach the League from its alliance with the Communists and enrol it in the drive to push the draft constitution through the Assembly in November, while at the same time refusing to give legal status to the groups included in it. Once the Kuomintang has entrenched itself in the provisions of the draft constitution, opposition parties will become a necessity, but they will have little possibility of shaking loose the dictatorship's grip. It would be awkward if the Democratic League refused to grace the new constitutional regime by nominating candidates for election and taking at least some government posts. There is already evidence that the Chungking government is seeking to manufacture one or two new parties in order to have some recourse in case the Democratic League remains obdurate.

The Chinese Communists, of course, are not expected to participate in the coming National Assembly. The move is in fact directed against them. With the draft constitution in operation, the Chungking authorities will have gained a position from which they can move openly toward civil war with a show of legal authority. They must first be certain that the present American support will continue. Assured of this, they can declare the Chinese Communists outlawed and invoke the crisis powers set forth in Article 44 of the draft constitution.

The first Chungking announcement of its constitutional intentions, early in March, was greeted in Yen-an as a declaration of political war, which indeed it was. Yen-an's rejoinder warned Chiang Kai-shek that he was taking the dictatorial course followed by Yuan Shih-kai, and that the end of that road would turn out to be the same—political extinction. Since then the Chinese Communist Party has held its Seventh Congress at Yen-an, matching the Sixth Kuomintang Congress just concluded at Chungking. At this meeting preliminary steps were taken to assemble at Yen-an next autumn a body of elected representatives from the Border Region and each of the guerrilla base areas now established in more than half the provinces of China, mainly north of the Yellow River. The group of elected representatives will presumably be meeting at about the time that the National Assembly convenes at Chungking. It will constitute, in all but name, a government representing close to 100,000,000 Chinese people. At the appropriate moment, gauged by the steps taken in Chungking, the name can be assumed.

These developments have not yet gone so far that there can be no turning back. At San Francisco the Chinese delegation includes one Communist and two leaders of the Democratic League—an indication that political cooperation has not yet been entirely disrupted. Conciliatory forces may still be able to exercise some influence at the People's Political Council in July.

The issues in China are of such dimensions that they transcend the bounds of domestic Chinese affairs and require a new approach at the highest international level. No settlement is possible without frank and full diplomatic consultation between Washington and Moscow. The diplomatic initiative rests with the United States. Current developments in China are a direct result of the recent shift in American policy from the mediator's role, encouraging political agreement, to that of exclusive support for Chungking. It is still possible to retrieve the situation, but the time is growing short. The brief span of a few months may be all that is given.

The Northwest Needs a CVA

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

AT THE end of the war the people of the Pacific Northwest face not a problem but an emergency of major proportions. In this region "post-war adjustment" will require a redistribution of population, a rapid development of resources, and a general reorganization of the economy. Other war-industry centers are concerned with shifting war workers to peace-time jobs; in the Northwest the problem is to create the jobs. The talk here is not of "re-conversion" but of possible "new industries," not of "adjustment" but of "regional development."

Before the war the Northwest was one of our newest and brightest domestic colonies. Since it was a new colony, it did not show the outward evidences of exploitation. The average per capita income was relatively high. The inventory of untapped resources was impressive. The signs of blight were negligible. Yet to a large extent the region was living on its capital. The basic resources from which much of its income was derived were in some cases being rapidly depleted. It was not a "problem area," but it had many serious problems. It lacked balance. It had too much water in some sections and not enough in others, power going to waste in some places and a lack of power in others. Its industries lacked diversity, its pay rolls stability. The situation was made worse by the fact that powerful interests, profiting from the region's undeveloped colonial status, were opposed to industrial expansion. Only after a bitter fight with these interests was the expansion obtained that the war emergency demanded.

Since the beginning of the war the labor force of the region has increased 50 per cent, its income 100 per cent, and its population 10 per cent—the interior areas have been drained of man-power by the war industries on the coast. The chief war industries are shipbuilding, aircraft manufacture, and light metals, in all of which severe cut-backs are clearly foreseeable. New jobs must somehow be found for 500,000 war workers and veterans. That means that the region will have to produce goods and services worth $8 billion a year and provide around 2,300,000 jobs of one kind or another. Since its resources are largely undeveloped, an enormous investment program will be required. And since the economy is already out of balance, there must be unified regional development. Both requirements demand a plan and a planning agency.

The immediate problem, of course, is to cushion the effects of the cut-back period. Plans for this transitional period already exist. The governors of the Northwest states, through the Northwest States Development Association, have approved blueprints for fifty large-scale post-war projects requiring an investment of $600,000,000 and providing employment for perhaps 100,000 workers. Fortunately these plans are all related, directly or indirectly, to the development of the Columbia River basin. If the projects can be constructed quickly and as a single planned development, they will greatly accelerate the general industrial and agricultural expansion needed to provide permanent jobs. For example, developments and installations necessary to open up 1,000,000 acres of Columbia Basin lands for the settlement of an estimated 50,000 farm families, previously projected over a period of fifteen or twenty years, might be completed in half the time if intelligently planned and efficiently carried out by a regional development corporation. Such a project cannot be accomplished through the cumbersome device of interstate compacts or by agencies directed from 3,000 miles away.

Plans for the larger task are also in existence—on paper and in broad outline. The seven-point program calls for (1) preparing some two and a half million acres of land for development; (2) developing a river transportation system to provide the Inland Empire with cheap and easy access to the sea; (3) harnessing the region's vast sources of hydroelectric power; (4) exploring its untapped mineral wealth; (5) creating, in the Northwest, a power technology region in which the electro-chemical and electro-metallurgical industries of the West would be concentrated; (6) protecting and stabilizing the fishing and lumbering industries; and (7) exploiting the unlimited possibilities of the region as a tourist and recreational area. Each and every phase of this plan depends upon the unified development of the Columbia River and its tributaries; power is the key to the entire accomplishment. As Dr. Paul J. Raver, administrator of the Bonneville Power Administration, has said, the task is "one of unification—involving the unified, balanced development of a river basin and its resources, envisioned in their entirety."

Plans and planners are not lacking in the Northwest, but at the present time there is no organization responsible for the prompt and efficient execution of either the transitional or the long-range part of this program. Existing agencies cannot undertake the task; it requires a single regional authority with broad powers and a high degree of autonomy. The Bonneville Power Administration is not such an authority. It is an administration and a power-marketing agency, not a development corporation. It was created by Congress in 1937, within the Department of Interior, for the sole purpose of transmitting and wholesaling power generated at Bonneville. Three years later it was given, by executive order, the function of selling the power generated at Grand Coulee. While it is empowered to construct and operate a transmission system, it has no authority over unified stream development or control. Even as a power-marketing agency, it lacks authority to acquire existing private generating and distributing facilities. Nor are its functions in any way related to industrial research or economic progress.

As a great river system, the Columbia calls for unified, organic development. All of the uses to which the river can be put should be considered in relation to the development of the region as a whole. A planning function of this kind cannot be laddled out, a little to this agency, a little to that. Yet the federal agencies that are interested in some phase of the Columbia River are too numerous to mention. The aims of these agencies are not identical; their functions overlap; and with the exception of the BPA they are operated from Washington as straight-line government agencies. It is fantastic to assume that these various agencies, with a little gentle compulsion, can prepare a master-plan for the region or that they could jointly execute a plan if one were prepared. The matter of soils, for example, is of interest to several agencies within the Department of Agriculture; but it is also of interest to the Bureau of Reclamation, the General Land Office, the Geological Survey, the Grazing Service, the National Park Service, the Bureau of Indian Affairs. River development concerns the Bureau of Reclamation, the Geological Survey, the Bonneville Power Administration, the Army Engineers, the Fish and Wildlife Service. Water and minerals concern a host of agencies. Underlying the whole problem, moreover, is the important question of enlisting the cooperation of state and local agencies. With whom are these agencies to cooperate?

To meet this general situation, Senator Hugh Mitchell of Washington, on February 4, 1945, introduced Senate Bill No. 460 to create a public corporation to be known as the Columbia Valley Authority. The corporation would be governed by a board of three directors to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Within two years after its establishment the authority would be required to submit a master-plan for the development of the region within certain policy objectives set forth in the act. The functions, facilities, and personnel of the Bonneville Power Administration would be completely absorbed in the new organization, and other federal agencies would be authorized to participate in CVA activities on mutually agreeable terms. The CVA would have the right to acquire private power facilities, but it would be obliged to sell the distribution facilities so acquired as rapidly as possible to local public agencies. It could obtain the transfer, upon request, of other water-controlled projects. It would be authorized to dispose of surplus electric energy in accordance with established federal policies. It would have broad powers in relation to power development, flood control, reclamation, and navigation. Whether Senator Mitchell's bill is preferable to the Murray bill or the Rankin bill may be debatable; that it can be improved and clarified is altogether probable; but that some such authority is needed is indisputable. It is needed not only to ease the shocks of the cut-back period and to unlock the resources of the Northwest but to protect the more than $325,000,000 which the federal government has already invested in public projects on the Columbia and the $110,000,000 it has invested in war plants in the region.

[This is the first of three articles on the development of the Columbia River valley.]

Fascism Without Mussolini—III

BY MARIO ROSSI

IN A short while, perhaps even as this is being written, a new government may be formed to replace the present Bonomi provisional government in Italy. On the Italian political scene two forces are striving for full recognition—the British-sponsored monarchy, the real force behind a government whose members, while they may be fundamentally honest men, are weak and have no right of final decision, and the vigorous Committee of National Liberation now in control in northern Italy.

In the south today, where the situation is dominated by a monarchist bureaucracy supported by the Allies, there is economic chaos—even bare necessities can be bought only on the black market—and a deep feeling of frustration prevails. In contrast, the north is ready to face the task of bringing about economic and political recovery. Before the arrival of the Allies the partisans had named new provincial governors (prefetti), mayors, chiefs of police, and members of the municipal councils. A Central Economic Commission, composed of representatives of the five parties of the Committee of Liberation and of two workers' organizations, had been appointed to coordinate the economic activity of all northern Italy. This commission is divided into four sub-commissions—for finance and credit, industry and trade, agriculture, and transport—whose members are working hard to salvage the machinery and materials which the Germans had no time to destroy, and to start the great task of industrial reconstruction. There can be no doubt that the spirit of initiative shown by both management and labor in northern Italy will find a solution for the many grave industrial problems once the necessary supplies of coal and raw materials are obtained.

The Committee of Liberation has undertaken a complete reorganization of the Fascist judiciary to make possible the punishment of political criminals. There will be no repetition of the judicial farce seen in the south, where top Fascists were allowed to go free so that they might support the monarchist movement. Strict discipline is enforced to maintain law and order. Colonel Charles Poletti, Allied military governor for Lombardy, has stated that "there were no violations of the law or looting, and mopping-up operations of the Fascists and their followers proceeded in orderly fashion." The local administrations set up by the Committee can function because they have the confidence of the population. For example, when the provincial governor of Turin took office, the city had only a three days' supply of flour. Fifteen days later, although there had been no lack of bread, flour stocks had increased. The prefetto explained that the peasants used to hide their wheat from the Fascists but now voluntarily bring it in to the pools.

The Allies were forced by the exigencies of the situation in the north, as they were not in the south, to allow officially appointed by the Committee of National Liberation to remain in power. Otherwise the administration of the whole region would have been disrupted and very serious trouble would have followed. The problem now is whether north and south will join together against reaction, and if so, how. The anti-Fascists hope that a new government may be able to unify the country; they consider the Bonomi Cabinet incapable of doing so. "The Bonomi Cabinet," declared Rodolfo Morandi, president of the Committee of National Liberation, "is weak in composition, feeble in determination, and without a clear policy. Besides the persons directly responsible for appointments, there is a certain something which we are at a loss to understand, and we wonder whether it should be tolerated in the new democracy which we intend to set up. This 'something' is the atmosphere of the government, a sleep-inducing vapor which kills the determination to get things done. It weakens all serious efforts to deal with current affairs with the necessary energy." Even more outspoken was a broadcast by Radio Milan, which is controlled by the Committee of Liberation: "Woe to us if we follow the example of the south. Victory would be crippled, the fifth column would raise its head, and chaos would return everywhere. No, the north, which found the energy to expel the enemy, will also find the energy to frustrate all tricks, from whatever source, designed to save the ruins of a regime which no longer represents Italy."

After such a clear statement members of the government went to northern Italy to try to reach an agreement with the Liberation leaders. At this writing the consultations are still proceeding. The Committee of National Liberation has laid down the following conditions:

1. That a new government be nominated by the Central Committee of National Liberation, acting as the body replacing Parliament in conformity with the fundamental pact of unity among the anti-Fascist parties and with the still valid legality of the constitution.
2. That the National Liberation movement of the north, which organized, directed, and carried out the uprising, be granted representation befitting it as the interpreter of that part of the Italian people which fought for the defeat of Germany and the destruction of Fascism.
3. That the legislation of the Italian state be complemented, with suitable modifications, by legislation enacted and applied by the Committee of National Liberation in the north as the delegate of the Italian government, especially as regards the purge. The purge must be carried out with speed, severity, and firmness, in accordance with legal principles and social legislation.
4. That the heroic Freedom Volunteers be received into the Italian army and into the police forces, which must form the main part of the armed forces of the country.
5. That the new government proceed immediately, in agreement with the National Committee of Liberation, to set up a provisional Representative Assembly for the purpose of preparing the electoral laws for the election of the Constituent Assembly.

6. That the president of the Council of Ministers (Premier) and those in the government give concrete guarantees that the aforesaid principles will be applied.

If these conditions are accepted, the monarchy will not be able to exert unfair influence in the elections.

There is evidence that the southern anti-Fascists are just as eager to reach a solution. Pietro Nenni, the Socialist leader, has emphasized the "close connection between the problem of the republic and that of agrarian reforms and between the socialization of big industrial combines and Italy's democratic rebirth." And the Communist leader, Palmiro Togliatti, who has too often indulged in compromises, now declares that Italy must obtain "within a few months, by means of a freely elected Constituent Assembly, a new democratic and progressive republican political organization." Even the Christian Democrats, through their official organ Il Popolo, say that Italy "must break entirely with the past, with methods now dead and buried, with the privileges, the egotism, and the obtuseness of former leading classes which are now bankrupt." Thus all the anti-Fascist parties with a mass following agree with their brothers of the north in demanding a speedy solution of the government crisis; they all insist that Bonomi must go, that a new government must be formed, and that a Constituent Assembly must be called as soon as possible so that they can legally express their intention of living under a republican form of government.

Naturally Italians are puzzled by the delay in revealing the Allied armistice terms. If the terms are honorable, every future Italian government will make it its duty to fulfil them, but if the courage, sacrifices, and democratic intentions of the Italian people have made them no longer applicable, the Allies had better modify them—for the sake of justice and of friendly relations in the future.

The present divergence between north and south, which has been artificially created by Allied support of the monarchy, will persist as long as the British continue their present policies and the Allied armies remain in Italy. The more the Allies build up the conservative elements in the south, the more violent will be the process of unification. It is time England stopped bolstering reaction, a policy it used to defend by alleging military necessity, but can now justify only as political expediency. It is time to recall that Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin declared on October 13, 1943: "The three governments . . . pledge to submit to the will of the Italian people after the Germans have been driven from Italy, and it is understood that nothing can detract from the absolute and untrammelled right of the people of Italy by constitutional means to decide on the democratic form of government they will eventually have."

Italy is now facing a decisive period. The new government will have the task of conducting the elections for the Constituent Assembly, which will decide the form of government Italy will live under. The Allies apparently hope to pit the hungry and politically immature masses of the south against the north and thus to give the monarchy a chance to survive. There is no real split in Italy today; the south also has its great liberal leaders. If the Allies will only refrain from interfering, Italy will struggle toward a solution. And it will be an Italian solution.

[This is the last of three articles by Mr. Rossi on political conditions in Italy since Mussolini's fall.]

Franco Skulduggery

ON February 25 two minor Falangist officials were killed at the party's headquarters in Cuatro Caminos, a workers' section of Madrid. There were strong suspicions that the men were assassinated by the Falangists themselves, as an excuse for a huge demonstration. That night sixteen political prisoners were put to death in reprisal. A day of mourning for the murdered officials was ordered, and there were street parades of Falangists, many of them wearing the insignia of the Blue Division. A number of workers were beaten up by Falangist bullies. The funeral cortege was in the most flamboyant Nazi-Fascist tradition.

On April 24 ten men and a woman were brought to trial for the murder of the two Falangists. It was a "public" trial, but only a limited number of newsmen and others, all admitted by card, were allowed to attend. The accused were not permitted to testify or to make any statements but were "represented" by a military officer; five military judges presided over the trial. Confessions alleged to have been made by all the eleven defendants were read. After six hours the judges pronounced sentence: eight to die (one by the garrote), two to be imprisoned for thirty years, the woman to be imprisoned for twelve years. Subsequently one of the death sentences was commuted to thirty years, and the woman was pardoned. It is not clear whether the garrote sentence was changed to death by shooting.

One of the men condemned to death was José Vitini, a high officer in the F. F. I. When the news of his arrest reached Paris, the resistance groups asked the government of General de Gaulle to intercede, and several notes were exchanged between Paris and Madrid, the French government requesting clemency for Vitini because of his services to the "cause of democracy." He was executed, however, accused of being the brains of the murders and also of the bombing of the pro-German newspaper Informaciones and of the German Tourists' Bureau (both of these bombings are believed to have been arranged by the Falangists).

On May 3 Ambassador Armour cabled Washington that the "Communist" leader of the gang, Vitini, had received a fair trial with counsel, and that the United States should avoid involvement in the matter.

No bigger bluff has been attempted anywhere in recent months than Franco's efforts to whitewash his regime through phony "amnesties" and the "restoration" of civil rights. Spanish propaganda is now stressing the Bolshevik bogey and the airport concessions to the United States—both imaginary. Meanwhile thousands of Nazis who have fled from Germany with their capital and cartels are comfortably established in Spain out of reach of the Allied occupation authorities.

BOOKS and the ARTS

PARIS REGAINED

BY CYRIL CONNOLLY

Or l'heure actuelle comporte cette question capitale: l'Europe va-t-elle garder sa prééminence dans tous les genres?

L'Europe deviendra-t-elle ce qu'elle est en réalité, c'est-à-dire: un petit cap du continent asiatique? Ou bien l'Europe restera-t-elle ce qu'elle paraît, c'est-à-dire: la partie précieuse de l'univers terrestre, la perle de la sphère, le cerveau d'un vaste corps? —VALÉRY: "La Crise de l'Esprit."

I

A VISIT of three weeks is not long enough to estimate the political situation in any country. In this article I confine myself to the literary life of Paris, for that is what I know. But some kind of political foreword is necessary. Here are one or two rough, unready observations. In France the right are very right, the left are very left—there is no shading off via a sentiment of national unity. The rich are very rich, the poor are very hungry, and rich and poor, left and right, have all suffered equally from the cold. There are four political groups—the right (mostly ex-Pétainists, but not necessarily collaborators), the De Gaullists (mostly of the right, but spirited and patriotic), the resistance (mostly of the left, but including many progressive Catholics), and the Communists (once of the resistance, but now operating as a separate party). The right, which once supported the Marshal, now supports De Gaulle but sees in him a bulwark of property and religion. It includes many ex-Vichy civil servants who are said by the left to obstruct De Gaullist measures which are at all revolutionary, and even to sabotage them so as to provoke a left-wing rising which will swing the government ever more to the right.

The De Gaullist government includes some very able people and shows every sign of knowing how to increase its prestige and its hold. De Gaulle himself is regarded as being above politics: he is the symbol of the new France and is held universally in the greatest respect. There is nothing to support liberal apprehensions that he seeks a military dictatorship or a coup d'état; on the contrary he has shown genuine republican statesmanship. He is, however, obsessed with the question of French prestige and determined to obtain recognition for France as a great power. He is more concerned with the occupation of Germany, the retention of Syria in the French empire, and the representation of France at the peace conference than with internal affairs.

The resistance movement is suffering from erosion. It has to keep together Socialists, Catholics, liberals, patriots, and utopians, and resist indirect pressure from both the right and the Communists. Its popularity is still immense; its powers less so. The Communists are pursuing a long-time policy. They are the best-organized of the political parties; they have ministers in the government and newspapers in which to attack it; they play up their resistance record as the parti des fusillés and wrap themselves in the tricolor. They are as nationalistic, or as patriotic, as De Gaulle himself, and will stand for revolution, if at all, only in their own time and in their own way. So far France has avoided a civil war (which no European country can afford) in spite of the crucial nature of its internal problems—food, fuel, transport, unemployment, returned prisoners, nationalization. There is every likelihood that it will continue to avoid one and be steered by De Gaulle through a general election.

This election will certainly lead to a great victory of the left, for the right, in spite of its power and its money and its publicity, has somehow lost its hold. It is too compromised. On the other hand, no one party is likely to have a complete victory, and the pattern for the future is likely to be on the lines of the Front Populaire, with De Gaulle presiding over a government of Socialists, Communists, Radicals, progressive Catholics, and generous-minded young patriots, all tinged with the ideals of the resistance. When France's prestige has been reestablished, nationalism may abate, and this new France will then be a very pleasant place to live in and desperately in need of its tourist trade to build up the pre-war standard of living. Paris is more beautiful than ever, and comparatively little of the country has been spoilt—except most of Normandy, Marseille, Toulon; otherwise nothing has changed. France is luckily able to feed itself, when transport becomes normal. The black market is still a universal necessity; it cannot disappear until an efficient system of rationing is introduced, and that presents enormous problems in a country where the peasant and the farmer have learned to blackmail the towns. The most striking absence in Paris, besides that of the tourists, is of the large rich Champs Elysées middle class, with their roadsters and dogs and mistresses and noisy wives in all the big expensive cafes. They have vanished from the dowdy, beautiful city much as their counterparts have vanished from London, and Paris is nicer without them. Everyone you meet there now is nice—warm, friendly, intelligent, and exciting. And that is what civilization should mean.

There have been three "literatures" in France since the war began: the literature of collaboration (Giono, Céline, Montherlant, Drieu, etc.); the literature of occupation, that is, of those researches into the human spirit, the meaning of words, myths, and symbols, the fate of man, at a level sufficiently deep to evade the political censorship—such are the writings of Sartre, Camus, Paulhan, Ponge, Valéry, Blanchot, Brice-Parrain, Queneau, Michaux and most of the poetry of 1940-44; and lastly the literature of resistance—literature of indignation and revolt which could only be published clandestinely and which has a political end in view—such are the brochures of the Editions de Minuit, Lettres

Françaises, l'Eternelle and the poems of Aragon and Eluard.

In Paris now no one reads the collaborators. The literature of the occupation, however, is widely commented on and discussed, while the literature of the resistance, which had of necessity been unduly inflated, is now finding its proper level. These distinctions are not absolute, for nearly all the "occupation" writers were also in the resistance movement. One might say that Aragon and Eluard remain "resistance" writers, and continue to fight the battle—which for them has become the policy of the Communist Party; so, but not as Communists, do Camus, Vercors, and Debu-Bridel.

When I went to Paris in January, these groups were just beginning to confront each other. The heavy snow and the emptiness made the city resemble Vienna or Petrograd; it was so unlike the Paris of 1939, or the Paris of the Liberation, as to awaken no nostalgic memories of civic exaltation, and yet the visit made me indescribably happy. London seemed utterly remote—a gray, sick wilderness on another planet, for in Paris the civilian virtues triumph—personal relations, adult-minded seriousness, aliveness, love of the arts. Literature is enormously important there, and one sees how pervasive, though impalpable, have become the irritable lassitude, brain fatigue, apathy, and humdrumery of English writers. At that time the presence of the Germans could still be felt; in the café chair where one sat they had sat not so long before. The three familiar waiters of the Flore, the same as in 1939, had tales to tell of them. There were even people who wanted them back. We were taken to see one of the worst of their torture chambers, the shooting gallery at Issy, a closed shed where not one survivor had been found to explain the meaning of the innumerable impressions of hands on the asbestos walls, or the huge furnace for blowing in hot air—only the bullet-torn posts at the end with the blood-stained rags attached to them told a clear story. The sensation of utter evil and misery which emanates from these human abattoirs, as from the dungeons of the Montjuig in Barcelona, still impresses on the visitor something of the ghastly atmosphere of occupied Paris; as do those streets, the rue des Saussaies, du Cherche-midi, de Lauriston, where the Gestapo had headquarters.

It is by bearing such an impression in mind that one can best appreciate the literature of the resistance, and the wonderful courage and resource of those who wrote, printed, and distributed its flaming broadsheets. Some of these are outstanding. There is Jean Tardieu's beautiful lament on Oradour, which begins:

Oradour n'a plus de femmes
Oradour n'a plus un homme
Oradour n'a plus de feuilles
Oradour n'a plus de pierres
Oradour n'a plus d'église
Oradour n'a plus d'enfants
Plus de fumée plus de rires plus de toits plus de greniers plus de meules plus d'amour plus de vin plus de chansons . . .

Then there are Cassou's sonnets written in prison at Toulouse—where Malraux was also interned and where his resistance manuscripts were destroyed. There are accounts of the horrible effects of imprisonment—Cévennes, "Dans la prison," Minerois, "Le Temps mort," an account by Claude Aveline of a woman's life in prison—and "La Vie des martyrs," the appalling document issued by the doctors in the resistance movement, pathologie des prisons allemandes en France, which gives a bald and scientific account of the commonest illnesses, disabilities mental and physical, and grave disorders which follow on imprisonment, starvation, and the various kinds of torture inflicted by the Gestapo and Vichy police on their victims.

The finest words on the movement, apart from the poems of Eluard and Aragon, are perhaps the conclusion of Paulhan's little essay, "L'Abeille."

When I was a child [he writes] I was surprised, like all children, to find so many more deaths than births chronicled in the newspapers. (The explanation—which comes to one later—is obviously that it is rare, except for kings, to be very well known at birth, while for a famous man there is nothing left but to die.) I had also the feeling that all that was going to change, the world was for the new-born, and we would all die much less.

It was an absurd sentiment, yet I think a common one, and it renders more bitter the tragedy of an age when we learn every month of the death of a friend. One was in the maquis; his body, already swollen, has been found in a field. Another wrote pamphlets, another delivered messages. They were riddled with bullets while they sang. Others before their death underwent tortures more horrible than the sufferings of cancer or lockjaw.

And I know there are people who say they died for very little. A single piece of information, not always very accurate, wasn't worth that—nor a pamphlet, nor an underground newspaper even, not always very well edited. To those we must make reply: "It's because they were on the side of life. It is because they loved things as insignificant as a song, a flip of the finger, a smile. You can squeeze a bee in your hand till it suffocates. You will be stung before it smothers." "It's not much," you may say. No, it isn't much. But if it didn't sting you, for a long time now there wouldn't have been any more bees.

[To be continued]

BRIEFER COMMENT

Advice on Japan

THE BEST TRIBUTE that can be paid to John M. Maki's book, "Japanese Militarism: Its Cause and Cure" (Knopf, $3), is that it represents a "grown-up" study of Japan. It is written by an American of Japanese descent who knows his way around in Japanese source materials and uses them to good purpose. It will not please those who would whittle down post-war policy to curbing "militarists" and tinkering with Diet reforms. Maki poses the problem in its true dimensions. He gives a full-length portrait, for the past and for the present, of the economic oligarchy that has always gone hand in hand with the political oligarchy in Japan. In the early centuries the two were identical; in modern times their common interests have fused them into a single oligarchy, despite surface indications to the contrary. Never have the people of Japan, its ordinary working men and women, been able to throw off the crushing weight of this regime "of the few, by the few, and for the few." In defeat their chance may come. Maki's prescription is quite clear: to give the Japanese people a helping hand when their revolt against the oligarchy breaks out. One sentence should be placed at the head of every AMG textbook: "It will be a test of statesmanship of the victorious United Nations to allow Japan to pass through a period of disorder and dislocation that is necessary if she is to be really defeated and if she is to rebuild herself along sane and orderly lines in the future." This is the book to be read by those who feel instinctively that we shall not create a decent Japan or peace in Asia by hastily restoring to power a regime headed by the Emperor and dominated by the monopolists, the landlords, and the court bureaucrats.

T. A. BISSON

Fiscal Policy and Social Welfare

THE THESIS that national fiscal policies can and should contribute to social welfare is making more rapid progress among economists than with the general public. No one has yet succeeded in presenting the subject in such a way as to capture the popular imagination.

In "Taxes Without Tears" (The Jaques Cattell Press, $2.50) Dr. Donald Bailey Marsh of Barnard College has obviously chosen a title which he hopes will have popular appeal, but he has not fully lived up to it. After an excellent and smoothly written introduction, the book shifts rapidly into the style of a good economics textbook.

Even so, Dr. Marsh provides as good an introduction as any to the trends in economic theory initiated by Lord Keynes, Sir William Beveridge, and Professor Alvin Hansen. He has made some real contributions of his own, especially in separating from current ideas about full employment a number which are irrelevant and others which are related but not inherent in the basic problems.

The third part of the book, dealing with inequalities in the distribution of wealth, deserves special attention for its clear distinction between the social and the purely economic aspects of this question.

The author explicitly recognizes that the function of an economist as a professional man is to devise and explain techniques of finance, production, and distribution through which social ends can be achieved, rather than to be an advocate of particular social objectives. For the most part, he has kept within this limitation, and has therefore dealt somewhat sketchily with the political action which is necessary before improved economic techniques can be put into practice.

CHARLES E. NOYES

Smollett as Traveler

TRAVEL BOOKS are as old as literature, and their history is filled with the illustrious from Xenophon to Lawrence. George M. Kahl, in "Tobias Smollett: Traveler-Novelist" (University of Chicago Press, $2.75), presents us with an entertaining study of Smollett in the light of this tradition. Like most of the early English novelists, Smollett combined the travel book with fiction and a satiric insight into persons, places, and society. Mr. Kahl is concerned with all three and their invigorating interdependence.

"To understand Smollett the novelist it is essential to know something about Smollett the traveler. His biography sheds light on his prose fiction, but his prose fiction only confuses and distorts his biography." Aided by Thomas Rowlandson's wonderful pictures of Captain Weazel, Rod Ransom, Humphry Clinker, and their friends, Mr. Kahl proceeds to disentangle the confusion with a gusto worthy of his subject.

JOHN SENIOR

FICTION IN REVIEW

SINCE all I knew of Marianne Roane's first novel, "Years Before the Flood" (Scribner's, $2.50), was that it had won an Avery Hopwood Award—scarcely a recommendation, in my experience—I took up Miss Roane's book from the random pile of new novels on my desk with little hope of pleasure. After a bad opening page, however, it began to grow upon me that here was one of the most charming and gifted novels, certainly the most charming and gifted first novel, I had come across as a reviewer. Warm, witty, lively, resourceful, with an admirably relaxed taste and intelligence, this story of life in a small German town in the year 1927 is the sort of surprise I had almost stopped looking for—a novel which is not at all great nor was for a moment intended to be (a matter I bring up only to forestall the disappointment of those readers who in their search for greatness are always being taken in by the pretensions of the profoundly mediocre), but which introduces a new and beginning writer in a modest, thoroughly enjoyable literary performance. That it is an unfashionable performance is, for me, a large part of its merit. Nowadays, when writers are as intelligent as Miss Roane their novels are almost invariably bookish, derivative, introspective, over-sensitive, self-regarding—any of these things or all of them. Remarkably, Miss Roane's novel is none of them.

Miss Roane works on a limited canvas: her subject is the Rant family and a few of their friends and neighbors. The Rants get up in the morning, they eat their meals, Mr. Rant works in his toy factory, Mrs. Rant shops and fusses, their daughter Magdelone goes to school, a cousin comes from America, the Rants entertain at coffee in the garden, the town celebrates the Pentecost festival. The period of time covered by the narrative is a few months in a year when Nazism was only beginning to crystallize a threat; Hitler's name is never mentioned. Yet in purely novelistic terms—that is, in human terms—"Years Before the Flood" conveys more of a sense of past and impending German catastrophe than almost any other novel I have read. Compared, for instance, to Katherine Anne Porter's "The Leaning Tower," Miss Roane's story, while it makes no attempt at the formal, almost regal, art of Miss Porter's novelette, communicates rather better, it seems to me, the juicy, commonplace fact of life in even a bitterly frustrated, self-pitying country. The Rant family and its circle are muddled and various, fine and awful, like any family group in whatever political circumstances. Because she refuses to see people as political principles, Miss Roane sacrifices a certain easy grandeur; she also sacrifices the moral superiority to her characters which, ironically enough, has become the stamp of literary art in our recent democratic culture. Instead, Miss Roane writes out of a free and equal creativeness. Except for the one character, the Nazi Dr. Steinhuber—and even he is far more created than the usual stereotype—she is fond of all her people, sound or unsound, strong or weak, simply because she found them worth writing about. Nor are there any surrogates for its author in "Years Before the Flood," not even the child Magdelone, who may be Miss Roane as a little girl. Not afraid of being judged by the fictional company she keeps—and what courage that would seem to take these days!—Miss Roane produces a company so vividly human that it can only do credit to her mind and heart.

Similarly off the modern style is Miss Roane's willingness to waste time on scenes and dialogue which have no apparent purpose in the narrative plan. "Years Before the Flood" is not a long book, but it gives a nice impression of prodigality; it knows that no less interesting than the central design of life is the detail of its decoration. The descriptions of the toys in Mr. Rant's factory, the conversations over the Rant coffee table, a passage like the discussion of Mrs. Rant's headaches—these are unnecessary, if you will, to Miss Roane's basic dramatic theme, but their wit and friendliness are the very stuff of fictional life. Perhaps it is because the modern novel refuses us this casual amplex and instead feeds us only what it thinks good for us that it is losing its power truly to nourish our spirits.

I have no idea what we can look forward to from Miss Roane as a novelist in the future. It is always chancy to prognosticate from a first novel, and in the case of "Years Before the Flood" there is a circumstance in the book's manner of publication which makes a forecast even more difficult. I refer to the fact that I do not know whether Miss Roane's novel is wholly invented or autobiographical—and therefore do not know whether she set herself a very large task which she solved successfully or a smaller task which she solved successfully; and obviously there is much surer "promise" in a novelist of proved powers of imagination than in a novelist who may be dependent upon personal experience. The biography on the dust-jacket of the book clearly implies that Miss Roane was born and bred in Michigan: "Marianne Roane started writing in the spring of 1943, when she was doing graduate work in English at the University of Michigan. Before then she had attended Jackson Junior College in her home town, Jackson, Michigan, and had planned a career as a painter . . ."; and this implication is strengthened by the unusual wording of the conventional flyleaf formulation: "The characters and incidents of this narrative derive solely from the author's imagination and have no counterpart in life." At the end of the story, however, when the Rant family emigrates to America—Magdelone is then thirteen—it occurred to me that I might have been misled in my assumption that this was entirely, and therefore amazingly, a work of the imagination. A telephone call to Scribner's did not clarify the situation to my satisfaction, and I can only hope that if Miss Roane did spend her early years in Germany the information was not suppressed, by either Miss Roane or her publishers, out of the unpleasant and unfounded belief that this would be prejudicial to her novel. Novels by German-born authors have appeared in this country all through the war, and I have no slightest recollection of any discrimination against them. Indeed, our attitude toward German-born writers and artists is one of the happier aspects of our war-time culture.

DIANA TRILLING

MOTION PICTURES

Paramount presents

ALAN LADD • GAIL RUSSELL

SALTY O'ROURKE

Big In-Person Stage Show

Charlie SPIVAK and His Orchestra

JO STAFFORD • DEAN MURPHY,
TIP, TAP & TOETIMES SQUARE PARAMOUNT BUY BONDS"Compelling! Vivid! David Niven superb!"
—Look Magazine.

G. C. F. presents

DAVID NIVEN in
THE WAY AHEAD

A Two Cities Film released by 20th Century-Fox

Now Playing VICTORIA

Paramount presents

DOROTHY LAMOUR and ARTURO
DECORDOVA in

"A MEDAL FOR BENNY"

From the story by JOHN STEINBECK and JACK WAGNER
Now Playing RIVOLI B'way & 49th St.

STAGE PLAYS

"A SWEET AND HAPPY HIT."—Garland, Journal-American.
Rodgers and Hammerstein presentMADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA

from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account" with JOAN TEITZEL
MUSIC BOX 45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636
Evns. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Masic by
& DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 56th Street, Matinee Wed. & Sat.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11☐ Introductory Offer: 10 Weeks for $1☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill ☐

Servicemen's rate, $3.00 a year

Canada $1 a year extra. Foreign $1 a year extra.

Pan American Union requires no extra postage.

NAME .....

ADDRESS ..... 6-2-45

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

MY MIND has kept reverting to Virgil Thomson's remark, in his review of Dr. Alfred Einstein's "Mozart," that he was bothered by Dr. Einstein's "assumption that his undoubted familiarity with the facts of Mozart's life, including his working habits, gives him automatically a true insight into the meaning of Mozart's works," when Dr. Einstein's actual statements about the works, as Thomson demonstrated by quotation, showed no such insight but rather a "pontifical obscurity." For Thomson was dealing effectively with a very important contention of the musicologists.

The German musicologists now among us exhibit a consciousness of having conferred on the American musical public great benefactions for which it has not shown itself sufficiently grateful. As they see it, they brought the light of knowledge to a land dark with ignorance. There was music here; but there was not the understanding of music possible only with the Musikwissenschaft which they brought. And among their benefactions, then, have been the books—Leichten-tritt's "Music, History, and Ideas"; Lång's "Music in Western Civilization"; Einstein's "Greatness in Music" and "Mozart: His Character, His Work"—which have provided the public with that knowledge indispensable for understanding: the knowledge of the historical development of music as part of all history; the knowledge, then, of the place of a particular piece of music in the development of musical forms and styles, of its relation to all that was involved in its creation—the personal character of its composer, the social and cultural events, forces, and tendencies of the period by which he was moulded as human being and artist.

The first thing to say about this is what Thomson points out about Dr. Einstein, and what is true of the other musicologists: they claim that knowledge is necessary for understanding, but their own knowledge about the relation of the style and form of a piece of music to all that was involved in its creation does not enable them to say anything about the piece that reveals any insight into its nature and effect as a work of art. If their knowledge is necessary for understanding it certainly is not sufficient. But the second thing to say is that the knowledge can be interesting and valuable in and for itself, but it is not necessary for understanding of the music. And, indeed, the third thing to say is that in practice it impedes understanding.

E. M. Forster has made some pertinent observations on what he calls the "pseudo-scholar's" treatment of literature. Forster writes: "Everything he says may be accurate but all is useless because he is moving around books instead of through them, he either has not read them or cannot read them properly. Books have to be read (worse luck, for it takes a long time); it is the only way of discovering what they contain. A few savage tribes eat them, but reading is the only method of assimilation revealed to the west. The reader must sit down alone and struggle with the writer, and this the pseudo-scholar will not do. He would rather relate a book to the history of its time, to events in the life of the author, to the events it describes, above all to some tendency."

In line with these are some of Balanchine's observations in the February-March issue of Dance Index that I mentioned a while ago. A ballet, he says, like a symphony, can be understood without any verbal introduction or explanation; it is not something to read in a program-note but something to see, as the symphony is something to hear. "The important thing in ballet is the movement itself, as it is sound which is important in a symphony. A ballet may contain a story, but the visual spectacle, not the story, is the essential element. The choreographer and the dancer must remember that they reach the audience through the eye—and the audience, in its turn, must train itself to see what is performed on the stage. . . . Dance is continually in motion, and any single position of a ballet is before the audience's eye for only a fleeting moment . . . but memory combines each new image with the preceding image, and the ballet is created by the relation of each of the positions or movements to those which precede and follow it." And while Balanchine does not state it, the musical analogy is obvious: the audience must train itself to hear each new sound, which memory combines with the ones that preceded it, building up the impression of the entire work.

When I say that the knowledge the musicologists consider necessary prevents understanding of music I mean that it interposes itself between people's minds and the music, and substitutes itself for the music in their minds. Look around at a concert: you will see people not listening to a piece of music but reading about it—about its meaning, its style, its relation "to the history of its time . . . to some tendency." Talk to people who have heard a piece of music: you will find that what they listened for and got from it is its relation to period and tendencies. Read an announcement of a summer music institute: you will discover that it is going to be concerned with music in relation to periods and tendencies: "The music of the nineteenth century was dominated by the virtuoso and the mass orchestra. Seen as an expression of its time the worship of the virtuoso on the concert stage was a part of the hero-worship of this age. The development of the mass orchestra coincided with the process of industrialization and mass production. . . . The amazing return of contemporary music and musical practice to polyphony and to the smaller ensembles of chamber music may be understood as a reflection of the awareness of the fundamental task that confronts our generation: the reconciliation between individual and society."

And that brings me to the fourth thing to say. The musicologists have done the public a disservice not only by distracting its mind from the music, but by distracting it with material as bad as what I have just quoted, or what I

Alcoholics ARE Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.

Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist

JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL

(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)

Book Dealers' Agents

REMINGTON PUTNAM CO.

Baltimore 1, Md.

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS

2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.

☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound

Name.....

Address.....

quoted from Einstein's "Mozart" recently, or what I quoted from Leichtenritt's "Music, History, and Ideas" a few years ago: "There seems to have been something fateful in the circumstance that Mozart died in 1791 just as the French Revolution reached the height of its frenzy. Haydn, robust and masculine, could still profit from the tremendous changes that were brought about by the French Revolution. Mozart, more delicate, extremely sensitive, with an almost feminine susceptibility, was so thoroughly a child of the dying rococo age that the rude shocks of the French Revolution were a fatal blow to him." Or, finally, what there wouldn't be space to quote from Lång's torrential "Music in Western Civilization."

Mr. Agee's film column will appear as usual next week.

CONTRIBUTORS

MICHAEL FOOT, formerly acting editor of the London Evening Standard, is now on the staff of the London Daily Herald, for which he reported the San Francisco conference. He has just left for England, where he will stand for Parliament in the constituency now represented by Leslie Hore-Belisha.

T. A. BISSON lived in China for four years. He is the author of "Japan in China."

CAREY McWILLIAMS is the author of "Factories in the Field" and "Prejudice: Japanese Americans."

CYRIL CONNOLLY, editor of the English literary monthly Horizon, sent us advance proofs of his report for that magazine of his visit to Paris. He has added, for American publication, the introductory section on the political situation in France.

"HEAVEN AND HELL"

The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of famed scientist, philosopher, theologian and statesman. His book on HEAVEN and HELL, FROM THINGS SEEN AND HEARD, may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG

SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, Inc.
Room 1636, 51 East 42nd St. New York 17

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE. SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Louis Fischer Resigns

Dear Sirs: For over a year I have noted a steady deterioration in the quality of the political matter printed in The Nation. Many months ago I talked to the editors about this. In several conversations I gave specific instances of situations misinterpreted, facts omitted or distorted, and opportunities missed. Since then I have read The Nation with great care, and I now find its presentation of current events so misleading that I cannot continue as its contributing editor. I therefore ask you to remove my name from the masthead.

I have been associated with The Nation for twenty-two years, and I take this step reluctantly. In past months I have gone to my typewriter several times to write a letter of resignation. Each time I deferred the act partly out of my personal regard for you and partly because I hoped the magazine would change for the better. But week after week The Nation has failed to assess correctly or reflect adequately the crucial period through which the world is passing.

The Nation now has a "line" and omits whatever does not fit the "line." It seems to have lost its zeal for conscientious reporting. I had learned to expect better things from The Nation. There were years when you rose up to smite any power that wronged the weak, when your words rang out against every injustice and against the suppression of small, weak states by mighty neighbors. You used to enter the lists against all forms of expediency and appeasement. Now it depends on who is appeased. Now you devote a casual half-sentence to key world problems which expediency impels you to ignore.

Emotions and ideology can be partisan; reporting and interpreting should not be. We owe it to our readers to tell them the truth.

It is a long, long time since I have read in The Nation a profound, many-sided, unbiased analysis of the world situation, an analysis uninhibited by consideration for sacred cows or a "line."

The Nation has become very much like a party organ. Its opinions appear to be determined by loyalties to organized groups and to governments rather than to principle. The Nation is playing politics; that distorts its policies.

When I saw, more than a year ago, which way The Nation was going I asked to be invited to editorial conferences. The request was ignored. As contributing editor, I was not once consulted. I never had any responsibility for the policies of the magazine. You know this. But I want your readers to know it. That is why I am resigning as contributing editor and writing this letter.

We have won the war against Nazi Germany. Great tasks face the world. It is a time for bigness. It is a time for courage in criticism and for bravery in leadership. It is a time for penetrating clarity and hard hitting. I miss these qualities in The Nation. What an opportunity you are losing!

LOUIS FISCHER

New York, May 16

[We are sorry to say goodbye to Louis Fischer, sorry he believes The Nation has "deteriorated," sorry he feels we have slighted him. It would be foolish to pretend that we do not differ from him on many important issues; in spite of this we thought there was some common ground left. We are sorry to find there is none.

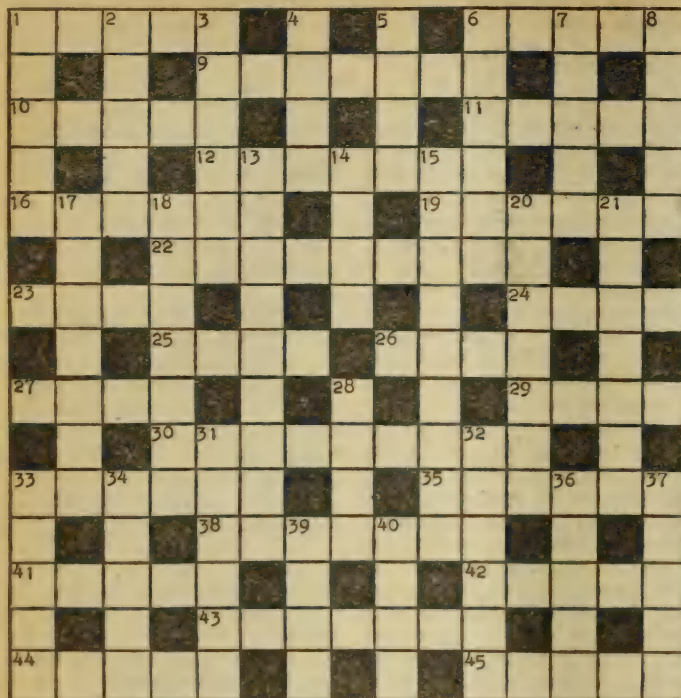

Mr. Fischer's letter would be easier to answer if it were not so resolutely vague. Why he felt it better to insinuate than openly to state the causes of his disapproval, we do not know. Certainly it is not the frank sort of attack one has the right to expect from a person who prides himself, as Louis Fischer does, on being blunt and outspoken.

We assume that he is charging The Nation with bias in favor of Russia and of communism. We suppose he considers that to be our "line." We suppose he is charging us with ignoring, out of "expediency," the bad behavior of the Soviet Union; of failing out of policy to denounce the Soviet power for suppressing "small, weak states." We suppose all this, not out of a vivid imagination or a guilty conscience, but because we have heard Mr. Fischer express these opinions in conversation—frequently and without any literary vagueness.

We can only answer quite flatly that he is wrong. We say what we believe. What we believe is very different from what Mr. Fischer believes. We do him the courtesy of assuming him to be honest.

It is clear that we are more concerned than Mr. Fischer is about the growing hatred and fear of Russia in the United

Crossword Puzzle No. 118 by JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Jacob called him "a lion's whelp"
 6 Doctor with an inside practice
 9 "Flowery" ----- he despised"
 (Coxe on Walpole)
 10 Cars must be when new (two words,
 3 and 2)
 11 Somebody's sweetheart
 12 "Serenely full, the ----- would say, Fate cannot harm me, I have dined today" (Smith)
 16 Re Monday's dinner, better do it again
 19 Lorraine's inseparable companion
 22 A tableau, as the artist sees it
 (two words, 5 and 4)
 23 Feel the lack of a maid
 24 How much ground would you expect a dentist to tackle?
 25 Put upon
 26 The cast may be seen in these 27 Stuff some watch "crystals" are made of
 29 Colorful girl in everybody's eye
 30 Soil that will grow something besides vegetables—but what?
 33 What you must do to the bottle before you can commune with the spirits
 35 Not cap-a-pie, but almost the opposite 38 Don Carlos looked a better bet to him than Queen Isabella 41 A fowl remark
 42 "Little Burr"
 43 The Duchess of Gloucester (Henry VI, Part II)
 44 Bird we tip off to you
 45 Boys and girls

DOWN

- 1 He is expected to swear
 2 Aunt in Sterne's Tristram Shandy

- 3 Diogenes looked for such a man in a barrel (an odd place to look) 4 It looks as though the foreign judge might be acid
 5 The lout, upset, calls for balsam
 6 "Which way I fly is hell; ----- am hell" (Milton)
 7 Famous Milanese opera house
 8 "All hope abandon, ye who enter here," he wrote
 13 Her spring song is famous 14 Common complaint, getting old after a hundred
 15 They are proof against depression
 17 Eli is on (anag.)
 18 Slake
 20 Trippers' summer paradise
 21 Birthplace of the "Little Corporal"
 23 There's nothing in this dye stuff
 31 Necessary even in a quiet game of tennis
 32 Professional witness who always makes an impression
 33 Take off your hat
 34 Indian woman who almost gives a cry of fear
 36 Greek island
 37 Fancy finding the lowest form of wit in London's Charivari!
 39 Regretted not being rude
 40 An "Oil" comes from the burial-place of Scottish kings!

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 117

ACROSS: 1 GABRIEL; 5 CALIBAN; 9
 IDIOT; 10 COMPOUNDS; 11 WATERFALL;
 12 ICING; 13 GERVASE; 15 TREACLE;
 17 MEDDLER; 19 TONNAGE; 21 UPSET;
 23 PEPPERPOT; 25 THINNINGS; 26
 UTICA; 27 DISTEND; 28 SWEENEY.
 DOWN: 1 GRIMWIG; 2 BLISTERED; 3
 INTER; 4 LACTATE; 5 CAMELOT; 6 LAO-
 DICEAN; 7 BOND; 8 NOSEGAT; 14 ALL
 AT ONCE; 16 CHAMPAIGN; 17 MOUNTED;
 18 REPINDED; 19 TYPISTS; 20 ESTUARY;
 22 SWISS; 24 ETUDE.

States. We think those feelings threaten the whole hope of a long peace growing out of this war; by generating similar feelings in Russia they multiply the unilateral and arbitrary defensive acts of the Soviet government. We believe this anti-Russian mood is not justified by Stalin's basic demands and interests, so far as we know them. We believe Russian policy is primarily a security policy, not an imperialist one; it can become dangerous to the world, therefore, only if Russia decides that the other major powers are plotting against it and takes steps, unilateral and aggressive steps, to offset the threat of a new anti-Soviet alliance.

We have not hesitated to criticize Russian—or Communist—policy when it has connived at the support of fascist or reactionary forces, as when Stalin recognized, and the Italian Communists accepted, Badoglio and the King in Italy. But here, too, we made a distinction between acquiescence in a policy for which Britain and the United States were primarily responsible and initiation of such a policy. Russia has not initiated reactionary policies. It has been high-handed; it has intended without any concealment to make sure that governments set up in its area of interest were "friendly." It has not used its power to keep fascist or ex-fascist kings and generals and admirals in office.

It would be dishonest to pretend that we think Russia's foreign policy is as great a threat to the basic purpose of destroying fascism and its political and economic roots as is the foreign policy of Britain and the United States. With all its arrogance and its open contempt for diplomatic procedure, Russia is carrying through an anti-fascist policy. This is so evident that it hardly needs documentation. The fact is, Russia's own national interests demand the extermination of the whole fascist set-up, whereas the Western Allies plainly fear that the revolutionary changes certain to follow a clear victory of the anti-fascist forces in Europe—and in the Far East as well—would endanger their control, economic as well as political. Indeed this is the heart of the matter. Russia can afford to ally itself with the forces of change; it can afford to wipe out the remnants of fascism and pre-fascist feudalism. Because Russia is not defending a crumbling status quo.

To develop fully The Nation's position would take more than this brief space in the letter columns. We shall take the occasion to do it properly in an early issue. Here we can only offer this summary answer to the charges Louis Fischer did not quite make.

—THE EDITORS OF THE NATION.]

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 9, 1945

NUMBER 23

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

633

EDITORIALS

Let's Finish the War

635

The French Case

636

The Threat of Deflation

637

ARTICLES

Truman and the State Department by I. F. Stone

637

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté

639

75 Years Ago in The Nation

640

The New World Court by Bartley C. Crum

641

Hotel Behind the Lines by Kay Boyle

642

Power Is the Banker by Carey McWilliams

645

In the Wind

647

POLITICAL WAR

Good Nazis, Bad Germans by Max Hirschberg

648

Report on Argentina

649

New Hope for India by Uma Shankar

650

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Paris Regained II by Cyril Connolly

651

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

652

The Community of Europe by G. A. Borgese

654

Films by James Agee

657

Art by Clement Greenberg

657

Music by B. H. Haggin

659

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 119 by Jack Barrett

660

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1873, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

TO APPOINT A NEW SECRETARY OF STATE A fortnight before the opening of the San Francisco Conference would have been practically impossible, but it would have been still more harmful to allow any diminution of his prestige while the conference was still under way. President Truman quite properly answered the continuous rumors of changes in the State Department with an energetic and repeated denial. But now that the conference is approaching an end, the early replacement of Mr. Stettinius by a stronger man, stronger in character and in knowledge of international affairs, seems inescapable. Not only the grave incident of Syria but dozens of minor conflicts all over the world, including the mounting difficulties in Argentina, confirm the fears so often expressed in these pages. It was easy enough to predict that the refusal of the major Allies to wage the war as a political war would leave the world at the end of hostilities overcharged with explosives. Yet even the most critical observers could hardly have anticipated that in the third week after V-E Day French and British forces would be on the verge of open conflict. Neither could one have imagined that some irresponsible in the State Department would risk panic in San Francisco by talking "off the record" about war with Russia "in ninety days." As I. F. Stone stresses in his Washington letter this week, the situation demands clear and strong diplomacy such as our State Department is unable now to provide. It is not only a question of replacing Mr. Stettinius. Nothing will be achieved unless, at the same time, the Department is purged of men like James Dunn, who have been directly and personally responsible for the worst maneuvers of appeasement and ultra-reaction. The military war is over in Europe, and the only weapons left in our hands for the political battles ahead are diplomatic competence and a strategic, decent, democratic line. As long as the State Department remains unchanged, we are disarmed and unprepared.

★

A NEW CRISIS DEVELOPED IN SAN FRANCISCO last week-end as a result of Russia's opposition to the formula, worked out by the Big Five, for diminishing the veto right of the major powers. For the third time during the conference it was suggested that the Russians were merely trying to find an excuse to quit the projected world security organization altogether. Other rumors circulated to the effect that the conference might recess and leave the task of ironing out further difficulties to the various technical committees, with the delegates meeting again several months from now under more auspicious circumstances. Both interpretations lack any foundation. Although the Russians may drive the other nations into a state of desperation by delays and objections, they are no less interested in creating a world organization and writing a world charter. Certainly they will never accept responsibility for breaking up the conference. As to the possibility of a recess, nothing more absurd could be suggested. If events continue as they have been going, the atmosphere will be even more charged at the end of 1945 than it is now and the chances of reaching an agreement will be smaller. No matter how imperfect the results of the conference may be, the main thing, as we have so often said, is to create some link among the nations to keep them together in the difficult period ahead. This is the first essential. If the machinery of world organization were in existence today, for example, the conflict in Syria might have been resolved on an international basis instead of developing into an acrimonious dispute between two of the chief Allied powers. Once the world security organization is established, its deficiencies can be corrected on the march.

★

T. V. SOONG'S ELEVATION TO THE POST OF President of the Executive Yuan is rightly being hailed as a favorable development in the troubled Chinese picture. Dr. Soong, a liberal and a moderate, is head of what might be called the pro-United Nations faction of the Kuomintang in counterdistinction to the anti-democratic cliques headed by Ho Ying-chin and Chen Li-fu. Soong's appointment as chief of the executive branch of the government is at the same time a bid for American favor and an effort to mend relations with Russia, for Soong is about to visit Moscow. Some observers have gone farther and interpreted his appointment as preparing the way for an early settlement of the long-standing dispute between Yen-an and Chungking. This interpretation ignores the many signs of deterioration in Kuomintang-communist relations, which were discussed by Mr. Bison in last week's issue of The Nation. While the Hurley-Wedemeyer policies, aided by the opening of the Burma road, have undoubtedly brought about an improvement in relations between Washington and Chungking, this gain has been offset by a growing suspicion of American policies in Yen-an and increased antagonism between Chungking and Yen-an. The new Premier is undoubtedly anxious to find a basis for unity among the rival Chinese factions, but it is doubtful whether his position within the Kuomintang is sufficiently strong to offset the still powerful divisive influence of Ho Ying-chin and the CC clique.

★

IN RELEASING JUDGE VINSON'S LETTER TO Senator Wagner supporting the full-employment bill, the White House has fired the first shot in the most important battle of the domestic front. As a Senator, Mr. Truman joined with Senator Murray last December in indorsing the principles involved in this bill, and as President he is obviously determined to make it a major Administration objective. This public indorsement by Vinson will tend to disarm the Southern Democrats and right wingers in the party, for the Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion carries great prestige among them. Judge Vinson deserves the highest praise for his letter. He wrote that the American people would not be content "to go back to protracted large-scale unemployment," that "given an adequate market" industry would furnish the jobs, that "we cannot, however, leave the creation of that market to chance," and that the direction of this task must be taken over by government. The full-employment bill seems to us to offer the best approach to this problem within the traditional framework of American democratic processes, and we hope all progressive organizations will throw their weight behind it. Wagner, Murray, O'Mahoney, and Thomas of Utah are sponsoring it in the Senate, a bloc of seventy under Patman of Texas in the House. It is no exaggeration to say that the fate of this bill will be decisive for American prosperity and world peace.

★

INSIGHT INTO THE AUSTRALIAN GOVERNMENT'S struggle at San Francisco for a full-employment clause in the United Nations Charter is provided in a White Paper just issued at Canberra. After reviewing the failure of Australia's pre-war employment policies—which were chiefly of a nationalistic character—the White Paper stresses the need for sustaining both domestic and foreign markets. It emphasizes the importance of each country's doing all in its power to maintain employment within its own territory as a contribution to world stability. As the primary means for achieving this, the Australian government underlines the necessity for maintaining spending at a high level in order to stabilize the flow of private capital investment. It points out that public spending is the only effective means known for offsetting variations in private expenditures, and insists that a comprehensive program for public improvement must be ready for implementation whenever private spending and employment show signs of declining. For the immediate post-war reconversion period it proposes a national housing program, a land-settlement plan for ex-service men, a public-works program, and a program for expanding the key industries that have been undermined by the war. Australia's economic position after the war may, in some ways, be more difficult than that of the United States, but basically the problems involved in maintaining full employment will be the same in all the democratic countries. Success or failure will depend chiefly on the wisdom and vigor of government leadership. It is good to know that in at least one country that leadership is already being demonstrated.

★

THE INTRICACIES OF NEW YORK CITY POLITICS have baffled us more than the maze of power relationships in the world of nations. It appears, however, that the plot has been unraveling satisfactorily since Mayor LaGuardia made his dramatic withdrawal from fusion and confusion. The villains and heroes have become distinguishable. The coy Tammany bosses have at last reached the foregone conclusion that a good candidate is needed if they are to elect a mayor in a town that has had LaGuardia for a decade or so. Kelly, Flynn and Company couldn't have done better than pick O'Dwyer: it is too bad that O'Dwyer couldn't have done better than pick Tammany. The A. L. P. backing may modify the taint of machine oil, but it will add its own special brand of flavoring. The Republicans, binding to themselves such allies as the Liberal Party and other independent groups, will, if they are wise, run a candidate of the stamp of McGoldrick, Stanley Isaacs, or Newbold Morris. Any one of them could be counted on to carry on the best of the LaGuardia tradition —without the temperament and without, alas, the color. Which makes us doubt if any candidate now being talked of can hope to fill that spot on WNYC at one o'clock on Sunday. Perhaps, New York would do well to rehire Fiorello as a permanent feature on New York City's own station. He would be above politics, but he would still be free to discuss such favorite themes as the Fulton Fish Market, racetrack and other gamblers, meat racketeers, and the band in Central Park Mall. Before he knew it he would be straying off Manhattan Island itself, out into the great world in which Gabriel Heatter makes his home. Nothing would stop our mayor if he really put his heart into the job of radio commentator. And then perhaps he wouldn't mind if McGoldrick or somebody ran New York.

✱

THE ALUMINUM COMPANY OF CANADA OPENS its post-war books with an order from Franco's Spain for two thousand tons of aluminum. This is what we learn from a reliable Canadian source. The Canadian government has granted a priority for the shipment of the metal. In addition to this initial order the Spanish government has asked for annual deliveries of ten thousand tons, many times the total pre-war consumption of Spain. Even the Aluminum Company is a bit perplexed and is investigating what is behind—and ahead of—these orders. We should like to know too.

✱

A VICIOUS EXAMPLE OF HOME-GROWN RACISM is contained in a report of the California Senate's Committee on Un-American Activities. It has special reference to Japanese problems in the state, and despite an apparent objectivity, its effect is to give covert sanction to individual acts of violence against American citizens of Japanese descent. Under the heading "Subversive Activities" it states in an accusatory tone that the Japanese have rarely entered into the life of American communities and that "little Tokyos" have invariably developed wherever a substantial Japanese population existed. The committee is convinced that the Japanese settled on the West Coast by design. According to its report, Communists are the main defenders of Japanese Americans. Other organizations seeking to defend their rights, says the report, are quasi-religious and pacifist in character, of the type that is also concerned with the welfare of conscientious objectors. The California committee, judging by this report, is following faithfully in the footsteps of its spiritual parent, the Dies committee, which up to now has held the record for un-American activities.

✱

FROM ROME THE STARS AND STRIPES SENDS ITS own answer to those super-patriots of the West Coast. An editorial on June 3 points to the record of American troops of Japanese origin: "Nobody has asked where their grandpapas came from." Reciting the battle log of the much-decorated 100th Battalion of the 442nd Regimental Combat Team—Cassino, Anzio, the Appennines, France—the editorial recalls the occasion when it rescued a battalion of the Thirty-sixth (Texas) Division that had been cut off by the Germans. "That was a pretty tough assignment," the Stars and Stripes says, "a pretty dirty job in the hands of Americans whose families were being beaten up by the families of other American lads."

Let's Finish the War

THE article by Max Hirschberg in this week's Nation gives a timely warning against falling into the same mistakes we committed after the First World War in letting the war-makers survive to plan new crimes against humanity. The article is a fitting sequel to the recent piece by Rustem Vamberg, which suggested that we would involve ourselves in legal tangles of the most inextricable sort—and end by letting top war criminals go scot free—if we attempted to judge war guilt in terms of recognized codes of law. It is better to regard the war as unfinished business until the aggressor is destroyed as well as the aggression checked. For war is a form of international political action. It is used by an aggressor to achieve certain set political aims of conquest or domination. It is used against an aggressor to reestablish a secure international community. We have now stopped aggression in Europe; we have not yet eliminated the aggressor except in those few cases where an individual was removed by accident of battle or suicidal fright. We are now in grave risk not only of letting the aggressor go free but of clothing him in white linen and giving him one of the chief seats at the feast.

Justice Jackson, just back from a European inspection and consultations with the War Crimes Commission in London, assures us that certain well-defined crimes—such as the ruthless killing of American prisoners in the Ardennes counter-offensive—will be quickly brought before tribunals. So too will be the specific crimes committed by Germans in the occupied countries. But these cases are comparatively simple compared with the great crimes of those who actually mapped out Hitler's diabolical schemes for exterminating whole races, destroying democracy itself, and invading neighboring lands. Even today these men think, not in terms of guilt, but of failure. Having failed, they are already planning how to succeed next time. We must make that failure so complete—and so personal—that there can be no third attempt. No German General Staff must be allowed to survive this war: so far generals have been treated as "officers and gentlemen." No Hitler propagandist must be allowed to slip through our fingers. And no industrialist or financier who supported Hitler on his road to power should escape punishment. The sooner Thyssen and Company leave Capri for St. Helena—to suggest the most lenient punishment—the better.

But at this very point we have grave fears that our policy against the aggressors will be compromised by devious international intentions. We don't like to see Robert Murphy in the post of top political adviser in Germany. For one thing, it is an insult to General Eisenhower, who, we suspect, understands something about the political as well as the military objectives of war. Sumner Welles, in a recent article in the New York Herald Tribune, warned that powerful pressure groups in this country, "particularly those which seek to embroil the United States and the Soviet Union and to bring about the resurrection of a 'strong Germany' as a buffer against Russia," will be favorably disposed toward a German "authority" as a bulwark against communism. The same groups will be quite prepared to see Germany's economic power reconstituted under the control of the old gang. They will resist all attempts to encourage left-wing anti-Nazis assuming administrative control, first on local and then on provincial and national levels. We touch on this larger problem simply because the punishment of war criminals is actually more a political than a judicial question. It will be lightly skipped over if a pro-capitalist, anti-Soviet policy is followed: under such a policy top Nazi generals and industrialists would come in mighty useful. It will be carried through with expedition and rigor if we are determined to clinch victory in Europe in a genuine anti-fascist, anti-Nazi finale. Such a course, too, would bring us into the closest working agreement with Russia.

We have always insisted that indiscriminate punishment of the whole German people would be both unjust and senseless. The claim that the whole German people share in the responsibility for Nazism's crimes may be valid, but offers little guide to the effective imposition of punishment. The Russians are both more realistic and more just than our "hard-peace" advocates and our "soft-peace" Soviet haters. They make it quite clear that they are going to permit no one to escape who was directly involved in any atrocities committed against their people or who played an important part in the rise of Nazism. Beyond that their aim appears to be to sponsor the growth of a healthy Germany from which the virus of fascism has been completely eliminated. We could do worse than follow their principles. Perhaps that is what Justice Jackson intends doing if he has his way on the international tribunal. Perhaps that is the policy underlying President Truman's directives on Germany, so far kept secret. (We support Mr. Stone's demand in this week's Nation that they be published.) Certainly we should waste no more time in letting both the Nazis and some of our politicians at home and abroad know that in this war we are playing for keeps.

The French Case

JUDGED by established standards of international behavior, General Charles de Gaulle has made an unanswerable case for France's position in the Levant. It is true, as he says, that under the terms of the French mandate over Syria and Lebanon, and specifically under the terms of the agreement signed in 1941 by himself and Sir Oliver Lyttleton, France is responsible for keeping order in those countries. It is true, too, that French recognition of Lebanese and Syrian independence was conditioned, specifically and in writing, on the negotiation of treaties defining the "reciprocal relations" of those countries and France, a fact the British several times formally acknowledged. It is further true, though General de Gaulle does not directly make the charge, that the British in the Levant supported if they did not instigate the so-called "revolt" in 1943, and forced General Catroux to change his policy at the point of an open ultimatum—deliberately humiliating the French before the entire Arab world. Not only this. The British compounded their offense by censoring the news from Lebanon and Syria so as to make it appear, particularly in America, that General de Gaulle had gone back on his agreements and intended to prevent the Levantine states from enjoying the independence promised them.

It is just as well to keep these facts in the back of one's head while reading the current stories coming out of the Middle East. General de Gaulle is quite within his rights in stressing them since today, as in 1943, the British are presenting the French to the entire world as brutal oppressors of helpless people.

And the Administration in Washington is giving London its full support.

Now none of this is intended to suggest that France is without fault in its dealings with the Levant. It seems, unless the British have again managed to twist the reports out of all semblance to truth, that the French military have been inexcusably violent and brutal in suppressing the recent disorders, particularly in Damascus. It is also questionable whether new French troops, even to the modest total of 500 and even as replacements, should have been sent into the Levant while the treaty negotiations were still going on. This looked like intimidation whether it was so intended or not. And beyond all these minor items of method lies the basic question whether "special interests" of particular nations can continue to be guarded by treaty provisions—in other words, whether the familiar imperialist techniques will still be effective, particularly in the Middle East where nationalist feelings are backed by the ambitions of local politicians and the more and more aggressive Arab League.

But one can say all this without losing sight of the special animus behind Britain's intervention. The British have from the start done everything possible to oust French influence from the Middle East. To this end they have been willing to play with the fire of Arab nationalism and Moslem fanaticism. They are doing so today. Indeed it is hard to see how they can risk so many pious protestations in behalf of independence for the Syrians. For south of Syria lie Palestine and Transjordan, both tightly held by Britain under a mandate backed by substantial armed forces which have not hesitated to act on the first sign of resistance by Jew or Arab. On the southeast lies Iraq, bound to Britain by a treaty similar to the one France seeks with the Levantine republics and, in addition, occupied since the rebellion of 1941 by British troops. Next to Transjordan is Egypt, also tied to Britain by a treaty which provides naval bases and garrisons at strategic points. Indeed, the more one studies the political map of the Middle East the less noble and disinterested appears Britain's intervention on behalf of the Levantines against the French. Put more plainly, the British in the Levant sound like hypocrites and smell of oil. We warmly support General de Gaulle's suggestion that the whole problem of the Arab states be thoroughly canvassed by the Big Five. Such an inquiry would turn up fascinating facts about the techniques of economic and political imperialism as practiced by all the great powers at the close of this war to end exploitation and tyranny.

The Threat of Deflation

THE extent of accumulated savings in the hands of lower-income groups will be a crucial question in forthcoming Congressional and administrative battles over reconversion. It will certainly be prominent in discussions of President Truman's message to Congress asking wider unemployment-compensation coverage during the reconversion period and an increase in maximum benefits to $25 a week for twenty-six weeks. Though no comprehensive survey has yet been made in the field of war savings, it may be useful at this time to bring together whatever figures are available.

The closest approach to an authoritative study was made by the OPA some time ago. This analysis covered 1941 and 1942. It dealt with "consumer units," that is, single individuals or families, depending on the circumstances in each case. The OPA found that 66.4 per cent of all consumer units had incomes of $2,500 a year or less, and that this group accounted for only 11.6 per cent of all savings. That this is still roughly true was indicated by the Department of Commerce survey of current business last September, which said, "There is reason to believe that a relatively high share of cash savings is in the hands of the numerically smaller higher-income groups. . . . For this reason accumulated savings cannot be counted upon as a major determinant of the level of economic activity in the transition period."

Similar conclusions are indicated by Richard A. Lester's "Providing for Unemployed Workers in the Transition," a study published by the Committee for Economic Development. Lester reports that "at least a quarter, and probably a third of the wage-earners' families in this country had by 1944 accumulated little if any savings in spendable form. Such families were for the most part in the lower-income levels . . . the ones most likely to experience severe unemployment in the post-war period." Conversely Lester finds that "the bulk of the war-time savings by workers has occurred in families with an income above $3,000 a year," families "less likely to experience an extended period of unemployment."

These figures support the President's plea that decent employment benefits "would serve as a bulwark against post-war deflation. By assuring workers of a definite income for a definite period of time Congress will help materially to prevent a sharp decline in consumer expenditures, which might otherwise result in a downward spiral of consumption and production." The maximum of twenty-six weeks at $25 a week for workers "with dependents" is little enough for this purpose but would be an improvement over the sixteen-week maximum now in force in one-third of the states and the $15 to $18 a week which is the maximum payment available in most of them. The President's proposal also contrasts favorably with the $20 a week for twenty-six weeks which is the maximum suggested by the Committee for Economic Development.

Mr. Truman's message indicates that he intends to carry on Mr. Roosevelt's domestic economic policies. It invites a real battle in Congress. Many men there speak for interests blind enough to prefer a sharp deflation after the war, in which they can beat down the wages of labor and weaken the trade unions. That this means lowered purchasing power and a smaller domestic market seems to be beyond their ken. We hope not only that progressive labor and farm organizations will support the President's program but that he will also be able to muster some strength among thoughtful business men. A substantial rise in the American standard of living is essential to the health and prosperity of an economic system whose productive capacity has been vastly expanded by the war. Any measures which will help maintain wages and with them the standard of living during the reconversion period are to the benefit of capital as well as labor. Both would suffer from a post-war deflation.

Truman and the State Department

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 3

THREE recent events indicate that President Truman does not see eye to eye with the State Department. The first was the sending of Mr. Davies to London and of Mr. Hopkins to Moscow. Both men are poison ivy to the State Department crowd, and their mission, as did similar ones under Mr. Roosevelt, constituted a serious reflection on it. They implied that in critical situations Mr. Truman, like Mr. Roosevelt before him, feels that he can rely neither on the ambassadors in those two key capitals nor on officials of the department. The situations referred to were created in part by the department's own stupid diplomacy, which has antagonized Moscow while giving a blank check to London. The State Department is fully capable of creating trouble but not of correcting it.

The second event was Mr. Stettinius's radio address from San Francisco after a hurried trip to the White House for consultation. This address, as the New York Herald Tribune pointed out, constituted "a formal and almost point-by-point reversal of course on all those issues of policy concerning which Mr. Stettinius's pilotage has been most severely criticized."

The third was the release by the White House tonight of a letter from War Mobilization Director Vinson to Senator Wagner strongly indorsing the full-employment bill. The letter and the circumstances of its publication indicate that Mr. Truman as President intends to continue the fight he began as Senator, in the Murray-Truman report last December, for a full-employment economy after the war. This is in sharp contrast to the persistent opposition of the State

Secretary Stettinius

Department and the American delegation at San Francisco to the inclusion either of the "right to work" or "full employment" in the new United Nations Charter.

Mr. Stettinius is reported to have come to Washington in great alarm and to have left chastened. Obviously one of the issues on which he was put on the carpet was Argentina. He assured his radio audience last Monday night that our vote for its admission "did not constitute a blanket indorsement of the policies of the Argentine government," but that on the contrary "with many of these policies both the government and the people of the United States have no sympathy." Arnaldo Cortesi's sensational report to the New York Times on Friday added to Mr. Stettinius's discomfiture. That afternoon, following an off-the-record conference with Latin American journalists, Mr. Truman took the unusual step of instructing a secretary to inform the press that when asked his views on the Argentine situation, he had replied, "I am not very happy about it."

Mr. Truman will find himself increasingly unhappy in this and other situations so long as he delays the essential task of naming a new Secretary of State and reorganizing the State Department. The dominant clique is as pro-Perón as it is pro-Franco. While Mr. Stettinius unhappily asserted that we would expect Argentina to fulfil the democratic pledges it made at Chapultepec, "seasoned Foreign Service officers" told the Washington Post "that this country has solemnly pledged not to interfere in the internal affairs of any Latin American country." The department's real attitude was revealed when Nelson Rockefeller told a group of Congressmen privately that Argentina was our best "bulwark against Bolshevism" in this hemisphere. The danger in this Goebbels-like line is indicated by two news items. One is an Allied labor-news dispatch from Montevideo which summarizes a book, "German Capital in Argentina," newly published in Montevideo by Luis Victor Sommi. Sommi charges that German trusts continue to control some two hundred corporations in Argentina. The other is the piece of apologetics on Argentina which leaked out of the American delegation in San Francisco to Russell Porter and was printed in yesterday's New York Times. Among other evidences of Argentina's helpfulness, Porter cited its "announced intention to liquidate any Axis firms not actually producing for the Allies' war effort." This is curious, and would seem to provide Axis firms with an interesting loophole through which to avoid seizure and continue profitably in business. Is it possible that we or the British are giving war contracts to Axis companies in Argentina? Could be.

The Argentine question is not the only one on which Mr. Stettinius's expressions of regret and statement of pious generalities are less than convincing. His discussion of the trusteeship issue is inaccurate. His declaration that "freedom from want encompasses the right to work" may imply a change of heart on full employment or can be a formula for keeping it out of the charter on the ground that it is already implied by the Four Freedoms. Mr. Stettinius had hardly finished saying that "we must mediate" between the other great powers "when their interests conflict among themselves" before the State Department handed Great Britain another blank check in the Syria-Lebanon dispute. The unwillingness of either the United States or Great Britain to make any real concession to colonial aspirations on trusteeship makes our joint indignation over French demands for bases and other rights in Syria-Lebanon the rankest kind of hypocrisy. I would neither disparage just Arab grievances nor defend French colonial policy, but this whole affair has a strong smell of oil imperialism and of an Anglo-American attempt to muscle into a French sphere of influence.

Mr. Davies is said to have been instructed to tell the Foreign Office that Mr. Truman intends to carry on Mr. Roosevelt's policy, that is, presumably, the policy of playing a middle role between Moscow and London. Mr. Stettinius paid lip service to the same conception in his radio speech. But the actuality is that of an Anglo-American alliance with the leadership in London. This has a firm foundation in the system of combined boards, which have always been Anglo-American or Anglo-American-Canadian, and which continue to operate in raw materials, shipping, production, and other fields. There is Anglo-American military coordination through SHAEF, which some British sources would like to continue in the occupation of Germany and in the diplomatic sphere at San Francisco and elsewhere in the world; there is consistent Anglo-American teamwork, whether against De Gaulle, Moscow, or Tito. That is hardly the way to further the big-power "solidarity" of which Mr. Stettinius spoke.

A crucial test is coming in Germany, now that a co-ordinated control body is at last being set up. Mr. Truman has signed excellent directives on reparations, the occupation of the Reich, and war crimes—directives which could be the basis for eliminating both the war-making potential and the trouble-making personnel of the German state. But the influence of the War Department and of the British has succeeded in preventing the publication of these directives. Their disclosure would inform the American and British public on our plans for the future of Germany and provide correspondents abroad with a means of checking the actual policies being applied by our military-control authorities. Private information here and stories seeping into the papers indicate that the military are moving in the direction of rebuilding German industry. This, as I reported some weeks ago, accords with the views of key State Department officials obsessed with the idea that a strong Germany is needed as a bulwark against you-know-what, and a similar idea seems to be favored in British Tory and financial circles. If there were a really joint policy on occupation, our military and diplomatic authorities would find it more difficult quietly to circumvent the Truman directives, and they may therefore do their best to continue separate administrations with separate policies.

Mr. Truman will have to decide whether he intends to run the State Department or to be run by it. The inside crowd is adept at doing things its own way while giving the appearance of carrying out orders. The longer it stays in office the more dearly it may cost us. As for Mr. Stettinius, he represents a special problem because he stands next in line for the Presidency. He is a genuinely nice person who intends no harm and harbors no sinister designs. Had Mr. Roosevelt lived, he would have been the willing instrument of the President's policies. But Mr. Stettinius's limitations of knowledge and capacity were appallingly obvious at San Francisco and created considerable amazement among other delegations. He doesn't have what it takes to be Secretary of State, and if anything happened to Mr. Truman it would be a calamity to have Mr. Stettinius become President. This opinion was shared privately by the overwhelming majority of newsmen and delegates at San Francisco. Mr. Truman owes it to himself and the country to replace him as soon as possible, and to give us that long overdue State Department housecleaning.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

LESS than a month after the unconditional surrender of Germany, the pattern of the final phases of the war against Japan is becoming more and more clear. That war, spread over a vast four-thousand-mile arc in the Pacific, up through the jungles and peninsulas of Southeast Asia, and across the great, disjointed land front in China, has always seemed an uncoordinated jumble of tactical actions: a leap to an island, a jungle offensive, a retreat through mountains, an endless series of air raids on difficult targets. But now, with the closing of the fronts to comparatively lesser distances, and with the increased tempo of blows which are hurting the enemy badly, the strategic pattern emerges. President Truman's message last week on the extent and character of our war effort in the Pacific spells doom for the Japanese.

As they did against Germany, the Allies are moving in upon Japan from several directions. The spearpoint of their advance, and also the spearpoint of America's great industrial and military power, is at present imbedded in the restricted area of Okinawa, where the fighting is at its bloodiest. There is a further extension of that American power over the key cities of Japan, making itself felt in high-explosive and incendiary bombs. Away to the south, in the Southeast Asia Command, Allied ground, sea, and air forces are wearing away the enemy's strength and holdings in Burma, Indo-China, Malaya, Thailand. This region has now apparently been cut off from Japan by the Chinese offensive through Nanning toward the South China Sea. Chinese offensives on other sectors of the great land front are hastening the Japanese retreat to the coast and into the north; and behind all this, in Japan's rear, Russian offensive power is evidently being gathered to reinforce the two Red Banner armies of the Far East which are already poised around the rim of Manchuria. So the steel trap closes.

Causal relationships in this enormous encirclement-and-annihilation strategy are most apparent in the western Pacific; and it is deeply significant that this region is the closest to Japan and the one from which the most damage is now being done to Japan. The island conquests of the past year—Saipan, Tinian, Guam, Iwo—are paying dividends at Okinawa and over Tokyo. From the bases in the Marianas thousands of troops and tons of supplies are carried to Okinawa's beaches, made safe en route by air patrols from the same bases; and from the same bases again, Superfortresses fly out on the mightiest demolition attacks in history, burning whole cities, destroying thousands of tiny sub-assembly workshops in the houses of war workers, and sending Japanese armament industry underground at an ever-increasing pace.

None of this is accomplished without cost. Okinawa continues to be bitter and bloody, marked by desperate hand-to-hand fighting in a muddy and restricted area where free movement, the sweeping maneuver of tank regiments and infantry brigades, is evidently almost impossible. Naha and Shuri will be remembered as terrible and expensive victories, won in the final analysis only by men who went in on foot carrying rifles, grenades, and flame-throwers against a fiercely resisting enemy who continues to learn the more effective employment of artillery and mortar fire, and who continues also not only to defend every position until the last man is dead but to counter-attack aggressively and cleverly.

Life at Okinawa has been more dangerous off shore than it has been on the island. In the first weeks of the battle more sailors were killed in the waters around Okinawa than soldiers and marines in the land fighting. For the first time in the Pacific the fleet has been operating over a long period within easy reach of enemy land-based aircraft which were not previously neutralized. In a less exposed situation during the Philippines landings, the fleet suffered heavily; now, with suicide planes coming down regularly from the home islands, damage and loss of life have reached their highest point to date. An immediate result was seen in the saga of the brave carrier Franklin, which had to steam extra thousands of miles to Brooklyn for repairs because West Coast shipyards had neither space nor personnel for the job. The navy's urgent request last week for 15,000 additional shipyard workers on the Coast is sufficient indication of how acute this problem has become; and as the fleet moves in even closer to the home islands, the need will become greater.

B-29 losses have risen at the same time, another index of the rising fury of the Pacific war as it draws toward a climax. The aerial defense of Tokyo has improved markedly, to the point where nineteen of the big bombers were shot down in one attack last week. If the anti-aircraft barrage and the attacks of fighters were intense enough to produce that result, they were probably heavy enough to damage twice as many more Superfortresses to the point where they were unable to make the long, wearisome flight home again; and men who are forced to ditch in that broad sea cannot often be saved.

So it seems safe, though unpleasant, to say that the cost to Allied men and material will increase in direct proportion as we approach Japan's inner fortress.

That is just where the Japanese now seem to be headed. They withdrew from Nanning, key spot on the Manchuria-Singapore land route, without a fight. They are reportedly moving out of Wenchow, Swatow, and other east-coast ports in large numbers, leaving suicide garrisons behind them in the south to delay Chinese occupation and any American landings. There is a growing conviction in Chungking and at Chennault's Fourteenth Air Force headquarters that this is a real withdrawal, based on the enemy's conviction that he cannot hold Southeast Asia in the face of the successful British offensive in Burma, the complete cutting by Allied planes and submarines of the sea lane between Japan and Indonesia, and the comparative resurgence of Chinese strength at such places as Nanning and Foochow. One interesting development in this theater last week was the heavy bombing by R. A. F. planes of the Kra Isthmus, the narrow neck connecting Lower Burma and Malaya, which would seem to presage a British invasion of Malaya beginning at the isthmus and moving down toward Singapore and the Netherlands East Indies.

The Japanese know they cannot hold this region, and they may have decided to cut their losses, face the inevitable, and retire to their inner fortress for a last-ditch stand—again inviting comparison with the last year of German resistance. The Japanese may now mass between the Yangtze and the Amur, and hole up in the triangular inner defense zone comprising the home islands, Manchuria, and North China. This is a zone of great strength, and reducing it will be a bloody business. But there is no hope of survival for the Japanese if they choose to defend it to the end; we must therefore be prepared for many peace feelers and concerted efforts on their part to split the Allies so that they can escape with a negotiated peace.

NOTICE TO READERS

Since the paper restrictions went into effect in 1942 the circulation of The Nation has risen by almost 50 per cent. In order to stay within our paper quota we have had to make a drastic reduction in our newsstand distribution. Now, in order that new subscriptions may be filled and a further cut on the newsstands prevented, The Nation will appear in 24- instead of 32-page issues every alternate week throughout the summer months. The Nation of June 16 will be 24 pages.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE BILL TO ENFORCE the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, as amended and improved by the conference committee, was adopted by the Senate on Wednesday of last week, and by the House on the following Friday. The Senate has done nothing else of importance.—June 2, 1870.

CONNECTICUT has at last undertaken to amend her laws by giving women the absolute control of their own property; and the "married woman's property" bill has also got through the House of Commons in England, so that if the cause of woman's suffrage does not prosper, the cause of justice to women certainly does. Mrs. [Harriet Beecher] Stowe has written to the Woman's Journal warning the friends of the suffrage against meddling with marriage and divorce, of which they are, justly or unjustly, accused by the public.—June 9, 1870.

DOUBTLESS IN ALL THE WORLD there is no man of letters whose death could cause so widespread and sincere a grief, and a grief that was in very many hearts so profound, as that caused by the death of Mr. Dickens on Thursday last. Not only wherever the English race exists—in the British Islands, in India, at the Antipodes, and round the world again to America, where he has given happiness to millions of readers—but also in almost every country, of whatever race, within the limits of civilization, the creations of his pen have for many years been familiar figures, and have attracted to him the strong liking as well as the high admiration of innumerable men and women and children. Every great author has multitudes of friends whom he has never seen and will never see, but there can none be named, of any tongue, who might not be taken away and leave behind him regret for his loss in fewer households than have been saddened, the world over, by the death of this most beloved of story-tellers.—June 16, 1870.

THE EIGHT-HOUR MOVEMENT is the effort to settle a great social contest. The one thing very apparent in it is the profound dissatisfaction of the laboring classes with their present condition—a dissatisfaction entirely apart from the question of what wages men should earn in a special trade—a dissatisfaction entirely novel in the history of labor contests in the United States. It is a dissatisfaction such as, in a greater degree of intensity, has before now convulsed the social fabric of older nations.—June 23, 1870.

"CONTRIBUTIONS to the Theory of Natural Selection: A Series of Essays," by Alfred Russel Wallace. . . . Nothing shows more clearly the pure spirit which characterizes the general intercourse of scientific men than this work of Mr. Wallace. . . . He says: "I have felt all my life, and I still feel, the most sincere satisfaction that Mr. Darwin had been at work long before me, and that it was not left for me to attempt to write 'The Origin of Species.' I have long since measured my own strength, and know well that it would be quite unequal to the task."—June 30, 1870.

The New World Court

BY BARTLEY C. CRUM

[Mr. Crum was consultant for the American delegation at San Francisco and a leader in the fight for a new World Court. He is vice-president of the National Lawyers' Guild.]

San Francisco, May 30

WE MUST be realistic about the United Nations Security Organization. It is not a world state. It is not an organization to which any human being owes primary allegiance as against his country. It is at present an association of allied nations which have just concluded one desperate war and have determined to maintain their co-operation in peace in order that they may avoid another. The new World Court fits into the framework of the security organization and recognizes the fundamental purposes of that organization. In drafting a statute creating the new court the main goal of the conference was to obtain for it the confidence of the nations of the world. This goal, in my opinion, was attained.

The firm decision to reject the old Permanent Court of International Justice and to set up a new court had of course other consequences. For one thing, it was a rebuff to Franco Spain. It gives us hope that Franco Spain will be excluded from any part in the United Nations organization. After the admission of Argentina rumors were prevalent here that the next step would be to admit Franco. Many were fearful that our government, having suffered a spectacular loss of moral leadership through the Argentina affair, would lose all capacity for climbing out of the groove it was in, and that the groove would become a tunnel leading inexorably to the full admission of fascist Spain, to a new attempt to form a cordon sanitaire around the Soviet Union, in short, to the old merry-go-round. Argentina was the great gaffe of the conference. But it also scared a great many people who needed to be scared. The telegrams of protest from all over the nation against the action of our government will considerably increase the earnings of the Western Union.

Various states were members of the old Permanent Court which are not members of the United Nations. Chapter VII of the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, however, declares (1) that members of the organization (defined elsewhere in the proposals as "peace-loving states") would be ipso facto members of the court, and (2) that states not members of the United Nations are not to be permitted to become members of the new court until they have met conditions which shall "be determined in each case by the General Assembly upon recommendation of the Security Council." The question whether the statute of the present Permanent Court should be retained hinged on the question whether former enemy and neutral states not as yet permitted to join the United Nations were to retain their membership in the World Court.

The view of Judge Manley O. Hudson, the present American representative on the World Court, is that the war has not disturbed the right of a state to be a member in good standing of the World Court. In his book "International Tribunals" Judge Hudson says: "... nor has any state ceased to be a party as a consequence of its participation in the present war. Neither the protocol of signature nor the court's statute creates any special obligations which could be suspended by war, and the history of the Hague Convention on Pacific Settlement, which continued in force during and after the war of 1914, without any specific act of revival, furnishes a precedent for saying that those instruments have not been suspended." Judge Hudson's conclusion is that "in so far as they exist, fifty-one states continue to be parties to the protocol of signature to which the court's statute is annexed."

There was, then, a cleavage of view which required a basic decision by those who were to draft the statute for the new court. To some extent the question of the degree to which the present statute should be modified resembled the problems faced at the Constitutional Convention of 1787, when the Founding Fathers came together to amend the Articles of Confederation. Their decision, like that of our own delegation at San Francisco, was that it was better to substitute an entirely new structure for the old than to attempt to work out thoroughgoing amendments. The Founding Fathers too wished to create confidence in a new governmental organization and to avoid prejudicing the new organization by maintaining governmental bodies which had not gained the respect of the people.

If the old World Court had been taken over by the new United Nations structure, it would have been comparatively simple to oust Germany and Japan but extremely difficult to find a formula which would exclude Franco. This point was not mentioned in the discussions, but it was nevertheless one of the factors which determined the settlement.

There was an extremely respectable body of opinion in favor of the retention of the old court. From December of last year to March of this year the American Bar Association staged twenty-five regional conferences in the United States and Canada under its own auspices and those of the Canadian Bar Association. Claiming unanimity of legal opinion—which is and was far from established—the Journal of the American Bar Association for April, 1945, came out in unequivocal support of "the continuance of the present Court of International Justice as the principal judicial branch of the new international organization." This attempt to force the world of today into the mold of an outmoded yesterday has met signal defeat here in San Francisco, a defeat which will, in my opinion, be confirmed next week in the final plenary sessions of the United Nations Conference.

In spite of pressure from the National Association of Manufacturers and the American Bar Association, the American delegation will support and the conference will accept the proposition that we need a new World Court. It will be a court which may reasonably and properly take over all that was valuable in the old World Court. At the same time it will be entirely freed from the shackles of the past. Commendation for the result should go to Senator Tom Connally, Commander Harold Stassen, and the National Lawyers' Guild.

It showed no lack of respect for the record of the present World Court to suggest that the international adjudication which the world will find necessary in the post-war years can be facilitated by a more efficient statute. The World Court has handed down only thirty-two judgments and twenty-six advisory opinions since 1922. Yet in the same period some fifty thousand justiciable international cases were decided by temporary tribunals, arbitration commissions, and other bodies. A court for the United Nations should be readily available for the settlement of such cases. It would, of course, be as impracticable to take all international cases to the Court of International Justice as it would be to take all federal cases to the Supreme Court of the United States. Still, the new court must be, and will be, continuously available for the solution of the thousands of cases which arise each year involving problems of international law.

The victory on the court issue justifies no great self-congratulations on the part of those who won it. Perhaps it is only a skirmish won in the long fight for international justice and a code of morals which will lift all mankind from the jungle of fascist power politics. At least, though, we may hope that the new World Court can reach a level where justice, decency, and democracy will determine the relations of nation to nation, of man to man.

The fact is that the old World Court was simply the vermi-form appendix of an unsupported organization—the League of Nations. Naturally it failed. The decrees of this new organization will be enforced by the Security Council. The power of the Security Council is based on the policy of unanimity of action by the major powers—stated another way, the veto power.

As Commander Stassen has said again and again to the consultants, it is basic in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals that the Security Council and not the court has the responsibility to settle disputes endangering peace. Reference to the court is only one way of settling such disputes. If the Security Council continues strong and, above all, unified, the new court will inevitably come to interpret social and economic law just as our own Supreme Court has done.

We should note that the new court may, at the discretion of the conference, take over from the Hague Tribunal whatever is valid and worth while in its precedents and formulas but may reject all those safeguards and defenses which reduced that court to something close to impotence during the past twenty-five years. The rulings of the new World Court for the next three or four decades may well reflect the practicality of primitive law enforcement, but they will at least be free from the dead hand of the past.

As I see it, the decision to create a new World Court rather than to revive a moribund old World Court is one of the more significant victories of the conference. It proves that the delegates are convinced that the world growing out of World War II must be quite different from all previous concepts.

Hotel Behind the Lines

BY KAY BOYLE

I STOOD at the window of the hotel room and looked out across the stone balcony's balustrade, and beyond it across the square to where the river flowed, as clear and unbroken as peace itself, and marvelously impervious to demolition. A long way below, a dozen or more people stood waiting on the stones of the Arno's beach, faceless and sexless and scarcely human from the window's height, but more like the black, explicit letters of a caption saying: "Italian workers in blasted Florence waiting on the bank of the Arno to be ferried home at night." The rowboat for which they waited had no oars, but a cable had been strung across from the beach of shingle to the other bank, above which the cypresses stood, and the boatman's hands on the cable wove back and forth, back and forth, delivering the people who crossed with him into the brilliance of the sunset, and then weaving back across the shining surface of the water to the shingled beach again.

The front must be up there ahead, lost in the misty, bluish folds of the Apennines, but I did not believe in it yet. The roar of the airplane's motors had ceased in my ears just a little while before, and I believed now only in this pool of evening quiet that lay, unquivering, in the violent landscape of war. The front must be up there, with men I knew fighting on it; but here there was no echo, no whisper on the water. Outside there was the cable, strung, a delicate vein, through the stillness, and the boatman's hands on it drawing the people home. In the room, on the table behind me, were the daffodils Mario had sent, with a card saying to telephone him as soon as I got in. In a moment I will call him, I thought; in just a moment, when I've stopped looking at Italy. I will call him, and see him tonight, and get the shape and the taste of things from him. He'll have grown up since 1937—he'll be twenty-three-or-four, and as free man and a poet he has somehow managed to survive.

And then the telephone rang quickly on the little table by the bed and I went to it, and lifted the mouthpiece and receiver up.

"This is Colonel Saret," said the Englishman's voice from the other end of the wire. "Stranger to you, I'm afraid. I just bumped into your name on the hotel list downstairs—"

"Oh, yes," I said, and there was silence for a moment.

"Once had a cousin from Dublin by the same name," said the Englishman's voice. "Occurred to me perhaps some member of the family. I thought I'd simply ask."

The family, my part of it, I said, left Ireland three generations back. I added that there wasn't much to say for it as a name, and the Englishman laughed.

"There was always Robert," he said. "Wintered here, you'll remember, studying the works of Galileo. I think it was 1642."

"They had a weakness for Italy," I said. "There was John, the Earl of Cork and Orrery. But probably we're none of us related."

"Oh, doubtless not," said Colonel Sarett. "Right you are. You'll forgive me for calling, won't you? I'm just down from the front for fifteen hours, covered with muck and grime." It might have been that he brushed at his blouse a little as he said it. "Awfully decent of you to have talked to me at all," he said.

After I had put the telephone down, I felt the singularly rebuking silence in the room. You could have gone downstairs, sat five minutes at the bar with him, asked him what part of England he came from, not mentioned Greece, but spoken of the look of London ten days ago, and of England's inarticulated courage. You could have done it for five minutes between the time of arriving here and having dinner with Mario. You could have done it for the sake of the muck and the grime and the fifteen hours he has of absolution. I stood looking out again over the roofs, and I thought of Eden in the House of Commons crying out like a petulant woman to the questions the Labor members put to him, but I laid the thought of that aside. There had been other Englishmen; there had been the quick, good words of the Air Marshal saying to me two weeks ago at lunch, "If the time has come when the common people of the world have found a party that can speak effectively for them, then, for God's sake, let the rest of us rid ourselves of our outdated prejudices—" and then the telephone rang sharply again.

"Damned cheek, I'm quite aware," said Colonel Sarett's voice, "but I've waited a decent interval, and I still want to say it. I want to ask you if you'd indulge in a spot of pity and come down and have a drink with me?"

I said I would. I told him I was in uniform; and in the lobby downstairs there was nothing but the military—the young, the middle-aged, the Americans, the British, the Scotch, the military without relief.

"It won't be easy to find you," I said.

"You'll know me at once," said Colonel Sarett from five flights below. "My hair is going thin—you know, receding from the temples. I'm definitely battle-worn, and there are bags under my eyes."

I said I would put a daffodil in the front of my blouse.

"You mean there are actually flowers blooming?" asked Colonel Sarett. I said there were lots of daffodils—cartloads of them in the streets. "Good God, flowers—flowers blooming in all this mud!" said Colonel Sarett. "I got in half an hour ago. I haven't had time to look around. . . ."

The lobby of the hotel was marble-paved and built tall and dark for Italian summers. It was not made for the military at all. Yet here was the sharp, nervous weariness of men on pass drawn taut as a wire from pillar to pillar, and the nameless hunger, the nameless thirst of tired men and lonely men sunk in the split leather of the armchairs, or pacing back and forth on the marble flags, or grouped in nothing as absolute as hope by the revolving doors. But the man who stood quite alone, and a little nervous, by the central pillar, was watching over the heads of the others who passed him. He was watching the stairway that opened, fanwise, into the crowded place.

He was tall and rather slender, with a high, solid, broad chest—a man of forty-five it might be, standing there with the light, smooth hair receding from the peak of it on his forehead, and a clipped mustache on his lip. In spite of the wash of weariness across his face, his eyes were quick and sharp, and when he saw the daffodil, he came forward, pulling a little uneasily at his cuffs. He had not spoken of the campaign ribbons, the decorations, but they all were there.

"I say, this is sporting of you," he said at once. He must have washed his hands while he waited, for when he shook mine, the palm of it was fresh still. "We can have incredibly bad liquor in there, if you don't mind," he said, and he jerked his chin toward the door of the bar. We went in through the archway, past the uniforms standing, the uniforms seated, the great, featureless, khaki-clad army gathered in simulated ease, which turned its eyes to the sight of a woman coming, even though the look of the women loved and the women wanted had ebbed from the realm of possibility a long time back. We sat down on the only two seats that were left on the cracked, dark leather against the wainscoting. "You don't quite believe it at first—I mean, for the first few hours down from the front, you never quite believe you've got here," he said, and as he ordered the drinks of synthetic fruit juice and Italian gin, his eyes were on me carefully. "You're just beginning to get the feel of it when you have to turn around and go back again. This isn't a complaint," he added quickly, and there was the relentless military eye turned inward in self-interpellation as unflinchingly as it would have censored anyone else.

"Fifteen hours isn't much time," I said, and the drinks came then, and we lifted the short, thick-bottomed glasses, and Colonel Sarett said:

"Cheers." The taste of the drink was bad, and he ran his tongue in quick repugnance along his lip. His face was short-nosed and neat, with none of the soft betrayals of indulgence in it; the mouth was stubborn, exact, tenacious, above the cleft chin. "I could, of course, stay down longer," he said, and his eyes moved quickly to me again. "Twenty-four, thirty-six hours, you know. But I can't bring myself to it. Vanity, possibly. Probably nothing more admirable than that. But I have to get back," he said.

"You mean, the war is being won, and you're here—you're out of it for fifteen hours?" I asked, and he turned his glass in his fingers a moment.

"Lost causes," he said. "Damn it, they get under your skin." He looked up; his eyes, with the drink beginning to fuse in them, were brighter and less weary under his lightish brows. "I remember watching the planes go out over Maidenhead in the evenings—1940 that was," he said. "Old crates scarcely able to make the hop and drop their load. And even if they did get over—Norway and stuff—God knows how many managed to make it back. Isn't the smoke awfully thick in here?" he said.

"After the mountains, it's like that. It always is," I said. "You come down, and rooms seem smaller, and ceilings lower, and you can't breathe the air."

"It's true," said Colonel Sarett, and he ordered the second drinks. "That summer I'd watch them going out at night," he went on saying, "and I'd listen for them to come back at dawn. I was convalescing from a wound I got in the Dunkerque show, and I'd lie there listening for them. When they'd begin to straggle back, I'd start counting the sound of their motors, and they'd be coughing their hearts out as they came. No recent models, no modern gear, just crates that spring and summer, but they kept on going over, and coming back when they could come back—coming back with their tail rudders out, and their landing-gear gone, just to say that they hadn't cracked up in a foreign field—for God's sake, how did I get on to this?" said Colonel Sarett. "This isn't small talk, but I swear I've forgotten how it goes. I ought to be talking about your eyes, or the way you smile, but I've forgotten how to begin. I could tell you that the reason I telephoned the second time to your room was because of the sound of your voice, and that would be true. Or I could tell you that the sound of any woman's voice heard here is like a pain in the heart—not a sharp pain, but a really beastly, nagging pain, provided you have time for that kind of pain," he said. "Perhaps better to tell you about the mountain goats up there in the hills, just born you know, right in the middle of war, sticky as lilac buds. Rupert Brooke was awkward as hell with images—foreign fields and lilacs and all the rot. But still in 1940 those planes kept going out," he said, his stubborn voice jerking back to it again. "Theirs was the lost cause then, absolutely lost, there wasn't a chance. But we had faith in them. We had to, because there wasn't anything else, and, by God, they won—"

It was when the second drinks came that he began to say other things, looking straight down into the evil-tasting and evil-smelling liquor as if the revelation of all that he believed lay there. He said, speaking quickly, that he had his own army, the men of it his own men, his people, who bore their arms in personal loyalty. He had trained these men, he said, and he had armed them, and up there in the Apennines they were fighting their own individual and dogged war.

"Eighteen thousand of them," he said, and as he spoke the fire kindled slowly in his face, and the actual flesh of Lawrence of Arabia's legend seemed to come in its pride and passion to the table and take its place with us there. "They've fought their way up from southern Italy, because they want to be up there, they want to be in the show. They've kept the supply road through the snows open all winter, done it against all the odds the elements had to offer," he said, and his eyes were on me in unflinching estimate. "Two hundred and fifty more came up the pass yesterday, the survivors of a brigade of seven hundred operating in the northern Apennines," he said, "asking to sign up with me—tough, hard men who know there's a job of work to do, and who'll do it." He had been a soldier a long time, and there was nothing of forbearance in him, and the appraisals he made were perhaps nothing more than the soldier's assessment of what functioned adequately and what did not. "I'm talking about the Italians," he said. "Italian partisans."

He said he had begged, borrowed, lied, and stolen to get their paraphernalia for them. He had got them dark blue ski suits from American stock; he had got them shoes, signing chits for them that he had no authority to sign. He had kept them covered, and fed, and armed, and fighting up there all winter. As he talked, he took his drink quickly down. In a minute, he said, in a minute he'd have a hot bath and a change of clothes, but it was not this that mattered. What mattered was that the others, the eighteen thousand of them, were up there in the dark of the mountains without him, wearing the uniform and the shoes of no regulation army, keeping the road clear of landslides, and enemy destruction, and high mountain snow.

He was saying these things at the little table in the smoke-filled crowded bar when the American major walked in and paused beneath the arch for a moment. There he stood, looking, in something not nearly young enough or lost enough for loneliness, for the sight of anyone he knew. When he saw Colonel Sarett's face, the relief came swiftly across the broad, square expanse of his own and lingered, the lines grew easy about his mouth, and he made his way through the uniforms toward us. Then he halted beside the Colonel, and he nodded to me, and he leaned over and stretched his arm across the Colonel's chair.

"I was thinking about you today, Colonel. A matter come up that put me in mind of you," he said. The voice was Middle Western, the features rugged, with wrinkles drawn deep across his heavy brow.

"I say, sit down with us," said the Colonel, coming abruptly back from the front. "This is Miller, Major Miller," he said to me. "A countryman of yours. An agricultural chap from the AMG."

"Call it plain farming. That's what it is," said the Major, and he said, "Pleased t' meet-ya, ma'am," and he sat down. He had narrow, bright, black eyes, and his ears were big, and the hair sprang black and curly and lively on his head. "Ran a farm journal back in Oklahoma. Doing something like it here," he said.

"The Major's draining the marshes out, getting flood walls rebuilt from Marina di Pisa down," said Colonel Sarett, and he raised his hand and snapped his fingers for the drinks.

"The Colonel here's mustering an army of his own," said the Major. His mouth was wide, and when he smiled, the wrinkles scarred deep and crescent-shaped in the flesh of his cheeks. "He speaks the lingo, and they listen to him as if they liked it, the Italians do," said the Major, and he sat there, the jagged crescents of the smile in his face. "I've run into a couple of Englishmen who don't like it quite so well," he said.

"All Lombard Street to a China orange," said the Colonel, "but they'll take it. You can't dispense with a country's population, somehow, not even a liberated country's."

"Floods raising Cain all over the place," Major Miller said, and when he thought of the floods he stopped smiling. "You get floods, and no sewer systems, and then the epidemics get going. Our medics are up there shooting the people full of inoculations." The Italian barman brought the drinks and set them on the table, and the Major raised his glass in his broad, clean hand and said, "Here's looking at you, ma'am," and he took a drink of it. "Jiminy crickets, that's lousy booze! I'm sure you're of the same opinion about it, ma'am," he said politely over his glass.

"There's a lot of future in it, my man," said Colonel Sarett. "It's keeping us here talking together. I think we might have another," he said.

"We'll drink it to Colonel Sarett's army," I said, and the Major stopped smiling abruptly again, and the crescents were blanked out of his cheeks.

"I was coming to Colonel Sarett's army," he said, and he looked at the Colonel. "I heard about thirty thousand Italian soldiers we're holding as prisoners of war. I just heard about them today," he said. "Question come up about disposing of them—thirty thousand of them that we took prisoner when we come in, and by the law of Acquisition, Retention, and Confusion, they're POW's still. Now maybe we'll conscript them into battle, and again maybe we won't," the flat Middle Western voice went on, and the bright black eyes watched Colonel Sarett in sanguine belief. "But if you put in a claim for them, I'll bet they're as good as yours," he said.

The Colonel hesitated a moment, took a swallow of the synthetic juice and gin, and put his glass down. "There's no way of knowing what their politics might be," he said.

"There's nothing to keep you from making Englishmen, or Americans, or even Russians out of them. Nothing on earth," said the Major.

"Thirty thousand," the Colonel said, musing on it. "I wouldn't know where to begin. I wouldn't know what to do with a lot of blokes who don't know by this time which way the wind is blowing. They wouldn't fit in with my blokes up there."

"Colonel, it could very well be that you're just not giving them a break," said the Major, and he shook his head.

"They've had twenty-five years of not acting like themselves, the Italians have, ma'am," he said in explanation, "and now they got to start learning how. You got to help them to get everything new, right from the inside out. It's like draining the marshes first and getting the crops in afterward. You can't do it quick, so you do it slow. And in the end you get it right," he said.

He lifted his glass to drink, but Colonel Sarett spoke almost sharply across the table, and the Major put his glass down again.

"You've forgotten one thing," said Colonel Sarett. "The whole blooming lot of them in this country weren't in it, not by a long shot, Major." He chewed quickly, savagely, at his upper lip a moment, and then the vehemence died from his face. "Thirty thousand POW's," he said, musing on it again. Thirty thousand Italians out of prison, his men to clothe, to feed, to arm, to cherish. "Thirty thousand of them," he said, and the thought of them was alive now, moving up the mountain with him. "By Gad, who should I talk to about it?" he said, and the light of it was shining in his eye.

I remembered Mario then, and I got up from the table, and I gave my hand to Colonel Sarett.

"I have to telephone," I said. "I am having dinner with a man called Mario."

"Blast Mario," said Colonel Sarett, and he got up quickly from his chair. He stood there, tall and straight, his thumbs hooked in his leather belt, his mouth twitching under his clipped mustache. "If I had a bath and a shave and that sort of thing—made a decent job of myself—would you dine with me instead of him?" he said.

[The second part of Miss Boyle's story will appear next week.]

Power Is the Banker

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

BACK in 1918 three residents of the little town of Ephrata, Washington—Rufus Woods, publisher of the Wenatchee World, William M. Clapp, an attorney, and James O'Sullivan, a small contractor—decided that a great dam should be built at Grand Coulee. They had no funds, detailed information, or backing, but they were sure they had a great idea. The idea was given to the world in the Wenatchee World on July 18, 1918, under a banner headline. When a resident read the story, he remarked, "Baron Munchausen, thou art a piker compared with Rufus Woods!"

"And yet there it is—Grand Coulee Dam, 'the biggest thing ever built.'" Former Senator C. C. Dill, who convinced President Roosevelt of the feasibility of the dam after the Great Engineer had vetoed the idea, likes to think that Roosevelt was guided by destiny when, during the depression, he announced, "We'll build that dam!" To the fathers of Grand Coulee the present war was won in the Pacific Northwest. And it must be confessed they have an impressive case.

During the fiscal year 1944 the five aluminum-reduction plants in the Northwest produced 600,000,000 pounds of aluminum, approximately one-third of the nation's output. Part of this aluminum took final form in 30,000 airplanes, again almost one-third of the nation's production. In the same period the shipyards in the Northwest produced one-sixth of the nation's merchant-marine tonnage. Equally important for the war effort was the region's output of magnesium, calcium carbide, and ferro-silicon. Behind this prodigious production was the 1,350,000 kilowatts of power generated at Grand Coulee and Bonneville. Obviously the big dam did have something to do with winning the war.

With the exception of the Yangtze, the Columbia River is the greatest potential source of hydroelectric power in the world. The flow of the river is rapid and continuous; no stand-by steam plants are necessary. Fed by vast glaciers in Canada, the flow of the river actually increases in late summer when that of some of its competing systems has greatly diminished. The power of the Columbia is certainly one of the most valuable and durable assets of the nation.

The crucial question today is who is to control the distribution and utilization of the staggering power potential of the Columbia River system. At the present time Grand Coulee and Bonneville generate 1,350,000 kilowatts of power at the lowest wholesale rate in America—$17.50 per kilowatt-year. With the construction of the additional dams planned, this output will be increased by more than 1,000,000 kilowatts, and the Northwest will then have more hydroelectric power than was produced in the rest of the United States before the war. Whoever controls this power can dictate the economic and industrial future of this great section.

Since the completion of the Bonneville and Grand Coulee dams the private power companies in the Northwest have largely abandoned their quarter-century fight to prevent the development of Columbia River power. What they are fighting for today is the special privilege of purchasing power "at the bus bar," that is, at the dam sites. They would probably not oppose the construction of even more dams on the river, if they were granted this privilege. They are quite willing for the government to produce the power if they can control its distribution. If they should win out, the social potential of Grand Coulee, Bonneville, and the other dams which the government intends to construct on the Columbia would be largely neutralized. As a result of the war the situation in the Northwest is such that they believe they can attain their objective.

Since the availability of Grand Coulee and Bonneville power coincided with the expansion of the defense program, the problem of utilizing this power, the problem of markets, was temporarily solved. Today almost 90 per cent of the power distributed by the Bonneville Power Administration goes directly or indirectly to war industries in the region. Once the war is over, it will be necessary to find other markets. Of 1,300,000 kilowatts of power now being distributed by the Bonneville Power Administration to some eighty customers throughout the region, more than 750,000 kilowatts are subject to cancellation in the immediate post-war period. The cancellation of these contracts will mean that the $24,000,000 of annual revenue now being collected by the BPA will be reduced by $13,000,000. If new markets cannot be found, the private utility companies will contend that the government is "spilling millions of dollars of power over the dams." At the same time they will wave before the eyes of every Congressman photostats of the handsome checks they are willing—and even anxious—to pay for this power. They will want, of course, long-term contracts. In order to confront the BPA with this dilemma, the private utilities are now trying to capture existing markets.

How far they have already gone may be illustrated by a brief account of their dealings with the Vera irrigation district on the outskirts of Spokane. The farms in this district are small. Most of the owners are part-time farmers—teachers, clerks, and industrial workers employed in Spokane. The district's contract for power with the Washington Water Power Company expired in December, 1944. When the company failed to meet the rate offered by the Bonneville Power Administration, the district signed up for Bonneville power. The Bonneville rate is about 57 per cent less than the rate offered by the private utility, and when the power is available, the consumers to whom the district distributes the power will benefit from a 30 per cent net reduction. Under the regulations of the WPB, however, the Bonneville Power Administration cannot obtain priorities for materials to build a substation and connecting lines to the district, although its existing lines are only a short distance away.

Faced with Bonneville competition, the private utility offered every inducement to the district to sign a five-year contract, but since the rate offered failed to meet the Bonneville rate, the district refused. The private utility then notified the district that it would not provide power during the interval that Bonneville was unable to serve the district. In effect, this was a threat of death to a prosperous farming community. Finally local public-health officials intervened to protect the district, and the company backed down.

That cheap Bonneville power will be attractive to municipally operated systems in the Northwest is illustrated by the experience of McMinnville, Oregon, a town of some four thousand people, the center of a prosperous farming community. McMinnville has one of the oldest municipal power systems in Oregon. Since 1924, by using diesel engines, it has been able to produce power more cheaply than it could buy it from the private utilities. It was compelled, however, to set aside 24 cents out of every revenue dollar for new equipment and repairs. When it obtains Bonneville power, the city will not only be relieved of this necessity but will be able to effect a 40 per cent reduction in rates to commercial and a 20 per cent reduction to residential consumers.

For a number of reasons the Bonneville Power Administration is not in a position to organize the municipal markets. Legally it can sell power only to large industrial consumers and public distributing agencies. To meet war demands, a power pool has been formed of all the available power, private and public, in the Northwest. With most of its power being distributed to industrial plants or, under the pool arrangement, to private utilities, Bonneville cannot undertake an immediate campaign for municipal contracts. During the war it is placing no ceiling on the resale rates charged by private utilities, but after the war it will insist on such ceilings. The moment this is done, the power fight will really get under way. The Northwest will then see considerable activity in the promotion of public distributing systems—at the end of 1943 Bonneville had only fifty-two "public-agency" contracts. But this is a slow process under the most favorable circumstances, and it will be bitterly opposed, at every step, by the private utilities. If the Bonneville Power Administration were reorganized along the lines of the TVA, it could buy out the private systems, lock, stock, and barrel. At present it lacks authority to take over existing generating, transmission, and distributing systems.

Other markets exist, however, and can unquestionably be developed. The Northwest has long suffered from a lack of fuel. The development of space heating would find a large market and would greatly stimulate the service industries. Irrigation pumping, the use of electricity to generate steam for industrial processes, railroad electrification, the increased use of electricity in manufacturing and service industries, and the great possibilities of power on the farm, all promise to provide expanding markets. But the prompt and full development of these markets presupposes the existence of an agency equipped with more than the marketing function which is the only one that has been assigned to the BPA.

A rapid development of these markets must be forced, not only to prevent the waste of public power, but to stimulate industrial expansion in the Northwest. The vast supply of cheap government power must be used dynamically, as the key to unlock the resources of the area. Power can be made to pay the bill for improved navigation, for reclamation, for the stimulation of new industries (through pilot-plant operations), for the exploitation of mineral resources. The development of 1,029,000 acres of irrigable land in the Columbia Basin would have involved a prohibitive expense if the full costs properly allocated to irrigation had been actually imposed upon the land. With the exception of $1,000,000 charged off to navigation, however, power is expected to pay three-fourths of the cost of the entire project. In an undeveloped region like the Northwest "power is the banker." But if power is to be used in this manner, it must be controlled by an agency with authority commensurate to the task, such an agency, for example, as that proposed in Senator Hugh Mitchell's bill (Senate Bill No. 460) to create a Columbia Valley Authority.

Since they know that their fight to buy power at the dam sites will be lost if the Bonneville Power Administration is merged in a Columbia Valley Authority, the private utilities can be relied on to make every effort to prevent the establishment of a regional authority. If they succeed they stand a chance of winning the power struggle in the Northwest. For if the BPA is unable to develop new markets rapidly enough to offset the post-war contract cancellations, the bids of the private utilities can be made to appear very attractive to a reactionary Congress.

In support of their "economy argument" the private utility companies will contend that since the rates they charge for power are subject to regulation, it is really immaterial who distributes the power. There are many fallacies in this argument, but it will suffice here to point out that, given their present stock structure and bonded indebtedness, even the most efficiently operated private utilities cannot pass on to the public the benefits arising from an abundance of cheap public power. Nor are cheap rates the only issue. In a region like the Northwest the way in which power is used is probably as important as the rates charged: if properly used, power will act as a magnet to attract a healthy distribution of population and industry. The private utilities will also contend, of course, that lower government rates merely reflect the fact that government agencies enjoy tax exemption. But if the Bonneville Power Administration enjoys tax exemption, the concerns which its power has attracted to the Northwest do not. One site in the Spokane area on which an aluminum plant has been built paid only $42.05 in taxes in 1943; in 1944, with the plant installed, it paid $88,435.21.

The case for the immediate establishment of a regional authority in the Columbia Valley is so compelling that no special anxiety over the fate of the proposal would be justified if two important federal agencies had not surreptitiously aligned themselves with the utilities. In a final article, I shall attempt to explain something of the background of this curious and rather shocking misalliance.

[This is the second of three articles on the development of the Columbia River and the need for a CVA.]

In the Wind

QUEBEC HAS 65 seats out of a total of 245 in the Canadian Parliament, and has nominated 294 candidates for the federal election on June 11; 69 of them are Independent, 58 Liberal, 42 Social Credit, 35 Bloc Populaire, 29 Progressive Conservative, 28 Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, 6 Independent Liberal, 5 Independent Progressive Conservative, 3 Independent Conservative, 2 Independent Bloc Populaire, and 1 each listed as Farmer, National Front, Electors' Candidate, Liberal Independent, Independent Labor, Labor, Anti-Conscriptionist-Liberal, and Anti-Conscriptionist.

HOLLYWOOD NOTE: The Beverly Hills Chamber of Commerce and Civic Association is listed as a sponsor of the Mayor's Community Council on Anti-Racial Discrimination. But a committee of the Chamber, headed by Harold Lloyd, has sent the following letter to residents of Beverly Hills: "This is to inform you that the original deed restrictions which covered your Beverly Hills residential property expired in 1940. Our committee has been formed to renew the original restrictions. This action is necessary to safeguard property values and guarantee the exclusive character of your neighborhood." Recipients of the letter were asked to sign a document stating that they desired lands within the city to be owned and occupied exclusively by persons of the "white or Caucasian race."

IN REPLY TO A PROTEST by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the publishers of "Roget's Thesaurus" have agreed to "clean up" the lists of synonyms for the words "Negro" and "Jew."

ROGER BABSON offers this contribution to economic thought in a statement issued by the National Research Bureau: "Unemployment is a spiritual and educational problem rather than an economic. Congress cannot prevent unemployment. The churches and school committees of each community will determine the unemployment situation."

MONTGOMERY WARD shareholders have no cause to complain about army management. In the first quarter of this year the mail-order house made profits of $4,767,955 after taxes, compared with $3,430,324 in the first quarter of 1944—85 cents per common share against 59 cents.

LEGISLATIVE MEMO: The United States Chamber of Commerce has suggested to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue, now considering revision of corporate taxes, that the excess-profits tax be eliminated after December 31, 1945. "Should the end of the war with Japan not be in sight at that time," says the Chamber's May 21 bulletin, "Congress could continue this levy by a simple resolution, if the need for continuation could be proved."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Good Nazis, Bad Germans

BY MAX HIRSCHBERG

[Mr. Hirschberg practiced law in Munich from 1911 to 1933, after 1919 specializing in political cases against Nazis and other enemies of the republic. He acted as trial lawyer against Hitler, Röhm, and many other Nazis. In February, 1920, Mr. Hirschberg contributed an article to The Nation. It dealt with the activities of extreme nationalist groups in Munich immediately after the end of the First World War.]

WE WERE bold antagonists in the war with the Nazis, but we are uncertain conquerors now that victory has been won. Despite many excellent measures taken by General Eisenhower, over-all Anglo-American policy toward defeated Germany has thus far lacked basic principles, decisiveness, and direction. As a result we are rapidly losing the confidence of the democratic masses everywhere. They no longer trust Great Britain because of Churchill's disastrous policies in Greece and Italy. And if we persist in our present stand they will soon turn to the Soviet Union for leadership and support.

It has been no particular honor to us that high Nazis fled before the Red Army to find secure arrest in our lines. It indicates rather a belief in American disingenuousness in contrast with Russia's hard realism toward the top German criminals. General Eisenhower reprimanded the American officers who greeted Hermann Göring with the "courtesy befitting his military rank." But the incident is unfortunately symptomatic of the spirit of fraternization with which many American officers have treated defeated Nazi generals regardless of their war crimes. Our attitude seems almost calculated to give encouragement to the German military leaders to get on with their preparations for a new attempt at world domination.

The German war lords have never lacked gullible accomplices to help them along their road to success. Did not Ebert, premier of the republic in the closing days of the last war, make a secret pact with von Hindenburg in November, 1918, to destroy the German revolution? (A private telephone wire connecting the headquarters of the General Staff at the front with the Reich Chancellery was installed in furtherance of their joint purpose—a fact which was brought to light in 1925 during my cross-examination of General Gröner, Ludendorff's successor, in the course of the famous trial in which the army accused the civilian government of a stab in the back.) Did not the respectable German industrialists Kirdorf, Vögelers, Thyssen, Krupp, von Borsig, and Aust back Hitler with their millions when, in the late twenties and early thirties he found the going hard? Thyssen and Krupp are now in our safe and comfortable keeping. Did not the financial genius and eminently respectable economist, Hjalmar Schacht, provide Hitler with his techniques of "legal" robbery that turned out to be so useful for Germany and so expensive for us? Schacht is also in our hands, mercifully saved from the Russians. Did not the elegant Franz von Papen, on January 4, 1933, come to the home of the banker Schröder in Cologne and deliver to Hitler the person of the senile Hindenburg and the keys of the German republic? Von Papen, too, is our guest.

Lenience toward such obvious war criminals as Krupp, Thyssen, Schacht, and the others would be a fatal error. Without wholesale confiscation of the huge sums deposited by these men in Fascist and neutral countries, it will be impossible to prevent Germany's speedy rearmament. Herr Krupp has already smilingly declared that, with the help of a few loans, he could within a few months rebuild his factories—for producing peace-time goods, of course. All this is reminiscent of the cheerful admission by a top Nazi in 1944 that after World War I, while the Inter-Allied Commission was fruitlessly searching for hidden war implements in one room of I. G. Farben, poison gas was being manufactured in the next room. Our treatment of war criminals leads one to fear that responsible persons are hoping to employ German cartel magnates, with whom some leading American industrialists have had close and friendly contacts for years, as experts and advisers in reorganizing German industry. This is the point at which national interest will come into sharp conflict with the international solidarity of big business. The smallest compromise, even the acceptance of "technical" advice from German industrialists, will have disastrous consequences.

It is a pity that the industrialists, who will form the most dangerous element in the post-war period, do not come under the War Department's "iron-fist regulations." In deciding what to do with them we must recognize that Russia will accept no compromise. We shall have to choose between collaboration with our enemies and cooperation with our friends and allies.

All American public and private loans should be subject to approval by the United States government. It must not be forgotten that American bankers invested hundreds of millions of dollars in Germany as soon as Hindenburg became President in 1925. To the politically uninformed, the venerable old man represented order and stability. Actually he was the front behind which Germany rearmed and resumed its chauvinistic policy of conquest.

Even the War Department regulations, excellent on the whole, have one dangerous feature. They abolish the executive, but only place under control the judiciary of Nazi Germany. American officials, however, many of whom have a limited knowledge of German, will not be able to control the processes of German justice effectively. The judiciary was the Weimar Republic's most corrupt organ, wilfully contributing to its destruction. With the same loyalty German judges served first the Emperor, then the Weimar Republic, and finally the Nazis. Now they are all confirmed anti-Nazis offering their services to the Allies. There were not even a dozen German judges with sufficient conscience or pride to resign when Hitler completed the prostitution of the judiciary. No democracy can survive if its judges condemn democrats and acquit fascists. Yet that is precisely what the Weimar Republic's courts did as soon as they recognized the weakness of the democratic government. Perhaps the most fatal breach of law was committed by Judge Neithardt of the Bavarian Supreme Court in April, 1924. After Hitler was convicted of high treason for his beer-hall putsch of November 9, 1923, Judge Neithardt sentenced him to five years of honorable confinement in Landesberg Fortress (where he wrote "Mein Kampf") and then six months later released him on parole. Article 9 of the Law for the Defense of the Republic contained the compulsory regulation that a foreigner convicted of high treason must be expelled from Reich territory for life. At that time Hitler was not a German citizen. Neithardt wilfully broke the law and failed to expel the Austrian agitator. Had Hitler been forced to leave the country in 1924, he would never have been able to rebuild his shattered movement.

All German judges who served under Hitler should be dismissed without pensions. Later on some of them, carefully chosen and sifted, might be used in the administration of civil law. But criminal law, especially where it applies to political cases, must be the exclusive domain of the army of occupation's military courts. It will, for example, be extremely important to prohibit the payment of pensions to German generals so that they will not be subsidized to conspire for the next war but will be forced to seek civilian occupations. But the present Nazi Supreme Court judges would certainly declare such a ruling invalid. Given the chance, they will do everything in their power to weaken and inhibit every action taken by the Allies, just as the German courts did during the "prosecution" of war criminals after the First World War.

The Weimar Republic failed primarily because of the weakness, cowardice, and militaristic chauvinism of its leadership, which never recognized that in a period of revolutionary change only militant democracy can survive. It recognized only one foe, the German Communists. Even as late as September, 1932, when Hitler got two million fewer votes in the election than he had before, and was financially bankrupt, a dozen courageous and determined officials could have ended his movement. But the Republic's leaders capitulated without a struggle when, on July 20, 1932, von Papen executed his coup d'état against the Prussian government. Severing, the Prussian Minister of the Interior, declared he would yield only to force. And at the appointed hour force appeared in the person of the chief of police accompanied by a single policeman. Severing thereupon yielded, calmly walking out of his office and to his apartment. Shortly before this incident, the Prussian Premier, Otto Braun, who from his place of exile in Switzerland has offered to collaborate with the Allies, had taken a leave of absence "because of illness." One might expect these gravediggers of the Republic to realize that they are finished; unfortunately they refuse to admit their failure and even present their credentials as future leaders and office holders. Reich Chancellor Brüning, for example, was one of the weakest ministers of the Weimar Republic. He and Kaas, another prominent figure in the Center Party, and the man chiefly responsible for the quick conclusion of the Concordat of 1933, are being sponsored by the Vatican as candidates for leadership in the new Germany. Kaas has been unofficial adviser at the Vatican since 1933. All these men were in favor of Germany's secret rearmament, of the "Black Reichswehr," and many of them helped finance it. They are all rabidly opposed to that peaceful collaboration with Soviet Russia which is the prerequisite of world peace. Men who lacked the courage and strength to defend the Weimar Republic can hardly be expected to salvage any measure of democracy from the rubble of Nazism.

Whom, then, shall we select for civil administration; how shall we find reliable persons? We must avoid the type of error committed by the A. M. G. when it appointed von Seisser, a high-ranking reactionary Bavarian officer to the post of chief of police in Munich. Von Seisser was one of Hitler's men in the 1923 Munich putsch; with von Kahr and Lossow he shook hands with Hitler to seal their agreement. A few hours later he lost his nerve and betrayed the whole plot.

Only proved anti-fascists should be used for civil administration. Workers who have spent the past years in concentration camps may be less prepossessing than Messrs. Schacht and Krupp, but they are more trustworthy. We might, in this respect, take a leaf from the book of the Norwegians, who with full approval of their government in exile have just filled all important posts with underground fighters released from concentration camps and prisons.

It is not too difficult to find militant anti-fascists. In the United States today there is at least one proved anti-Nazi from every town and district in Germany. Hearings should be held by an existing government agency—no new agency need be created—at which these men could testify. They could supply information for a first list of reliable Germans. This could be sent to the A. M. G. for checking and possible changes. A second list of reliable anti-Nazis exists in the registers of concentration camps.

These are a few basic principles for administering Germany. Their adoption would make the complete destruction of Nazism possible and would create a climate in which Germany could prepare for democracy—instead of war.

Report on Argentina

ON JUNE 1 the New York Times published a sensational report on conditions in Argentina. It was sensational because it was written by Arnaldo Cortesi, the Times's very conservative correspondent in Buenos Aires and because Mr. Cortesi was unable to get the facts through the Argentine censorship and so sent the story out "by channels other than the normal ones." But there was nothing new in the article itself. It merely confirmed information that has appeared at frequent intervals in The Nation during the past fourteen months. On March 3 we published Torture in Argentina by John W. White, a detailed account of the Gestapo methods used in Argentina's prisons. It was subtitled A Document for the Mexico Conference, and copies were sent by air mail to every American delegate at the Chapultepec meeting. These delegates cannot claim that they acted out of ignorance when they accepted the formula which led to Argentina's inclusion in the San Francisco conference. They were fully aware of internal conditions in that country. And they had been warned in more general terms by President Roosevelt and Cordell Hull. Both had condemned the Farrell-Perón regime in words that were later to be used by Mr. Molotov when he argued against Argentina's admission to the conference.

Since Mr. Hull's opinions have generally carried great weight, it was especially amazing that the State Department should have reversed its position so drastically in such a short space of time: after rejecting all proposals to allow Argentina to attend the Chapultepec conference, it actually sponsored at that conference and at San Francisco the inclusion of Argentina in the new international organization.

"The time has come to say," writes Mr. Cortesi, "that things have happened in Buenos Aires recently that exceed anything that this correspondent can remember in his seventeen years' experience in Fascist Italy." Yet Secretary of State Stettinius made a most dramatic appeal at a plenary session of the United Nations conference for the immediate acceptance of this regime. It was as though the very success of the conference demanded that Argentina be admitted without even the brief delay requested by Mr. Molotov. The promises of reform made by the Argentine dictator were solemnly repeated, and the conference and the world were, in effect, asked to believe that the charges made by democratic groups in and out of Argentina were no longer valid. Mr. Cortesi's story in the New York Times demolishes that pretense and leaves the State Department and its Latin American colleagues exposed to the indignation of the anti-fascist world.

When the history of the Western democracies during the period of 1933-45 is written, one of the most difficult facts to explain will be the effort of the United States to restore to Argentina the prestige and the position of leadership it had lost as a result of its pro-Axis stand during the war.

New Hope for India

BY UMA SHANKAR

THE political situation in India, frozen since August, 1942, is becoming fluid; recent developments indicate an early end to the existing deadlock. Lord Wavell's protracted visit to London, unprecedented for a Viceroy during his term of office, is the most hopeful indication that a change is in the offing. It is expected that the British in the near future will release all political prisoners; form a provisional National Government at New Delhi, within the present constitution, composed entirely of Indians drawn from the major political parties; and restore the provincial autonomy which has been in abeyance in most provinces since the war.

Obstacles that, according to the British, stood in the way of the formation of a National Government in India, no longer exist. The Japanese armies are now in full retreat from Burma. After his release last year, Gandhi, the strongest proponent of the August resolution, declared that he would not support civil disobedience during the war. The British government has tacitly admitted that members of the Congress Party do not constitute a threat to the war effort. Sir Francis Mudie, Home member in the government of India responsible for political prisoners, recently declared that 90 per cent of the prisoners, mostly Congress members, had been released without any disorders resulting.

During the past six months the Congress and the Moslem League have shown signs of a rapprochement. In the Central Legislative Assembly the two parties combined to defeat the present government on all major issues. Bulabhai Desai, leader of the Congress Party in the Assembly, and Nawabzada Liaquat Ali Khan, deputy leader of the Moslem League, are reported to have agreed to form a National Government within the framework of the present constitution. The terms of the agreement were communicated by Mr. Desai to the Viceroy just before the latter left for London. Its basis was that a coalition government should be formed in which the Congress and the Moslem League would each have 40 per cent representation, the remaining 20 per cent to be divided among other Indian groups. The agreement also called for the restoration of provincial autonomy and the release of all political prisoners.

When he spoke at the Frontier Political Conference in Peshawar on April 21, Mr. Desai said: "It is true that there are now proposals before His Majesty's Government [in London] for the formation of an interim government at the Center [federal government]. . . . It is time that India assumed responsibility at the Center, even with restricted powers, so that we may find true representatives at the peace conference." Proof that the Congress Party has changed its policy since 1942 is found in the fact that a Congress Ministry has been formed in the Northwest Frontier Province. Since 1939 there had been no Congress Ministry in India.

Lord Wavell's journey to London, which has raised India's hopes, cannot have been undertaken with any expectation of repeating the Cripps fiasco and increasing existing bitterness. Official quarters say that Wavell is determined to get Cabinet action on India. He was followed to London by Sir Francis Mudie, which is significant because a necessary preliminary to the formation of a National Government in India is the release of the remaining Congress members, including Nehru. Sir Claude Auchinleck, commander-in-chief in India, has also been summoned to London. He is known to have liberal views and is reported to have no objection to serving under an Indian Defense Minister—British refusal to allow an Indian Defense Minister was one of the points which caused the Congress Party to reject the Cripps offer. Finally, the Government of India's constitutional expert, the Reforms Commissioner, is also in London. These important officials can hardly have left their posts at this time merely to celebrate V-E Day in London.

England's approaching General Election is another factor of considerable importance. Churchill and the Conservative Party have long been criticized in London for their policy in India. Editorials in the influential London Times on March 10 and 20 advocating a change in India are evidence that British public opinion demands it. It would be greatly to the advantage of the Conservative Party to face the electorate as favoring a more liberal policy in India; and the party usually knows where its advantage lies. An end to the long stalemate in India appears to be not far off.

BOOKS and the ARTS

PARIS REGAINED

BY CYRIL CONNOLLY

II

THE triumph of the literary movement of the resistance in France was in its refusal to hate. Of all the anti-fascist movements the French, I think, rose to the greatest height of humanism, as exemplified in the exquisite moderation of "Le Silence de la Mer," or of Eluard's "Liberté." Never have such warm and poetical lovers of life been so thoughtfully willing to throw it away. It is difficult for us in a country which has fought the Germans but not been occupied by them to appreciate the intolerable conditions under which the resistance labored. One must first of all imagine every petty war-time restriction under which we have chafed as being imposed not by our own government but by our conquerors, with a curfew and a continuous parade of enemy uniforms thrown in. One must then add on four years of propaganda, propaganda diabolically directed against our weaker spots, our masochism, our childhood father fears—"you have all been bad, bad, bad, you have been intolerably insolent, and now God has punished you; Hitler has punished you; Pétain, Laval, and Darnand have punished you. You have hurt them all terribly. They were all so proud of you. So punishment. No more jam, no butter, no picnics. Work! Work! Work! Work, Fatherland, and Family! And if you all work very, very hard you will be forgiven—because God, Hitler, Pétain, etc., are not really hard-hearted. They are pretty decent really—only you've hurt them so. Look how nice they are to the good children, to Bergéry, Morand, to your policeman, your mayor, the good people in the big house. And they know what's best for you. In their will is your peace."

Frenchmen have told me how utterly demoralizing was this continuous propaganda. As Eluard wrote of the traitors who made it:

Ils nous ont vanté nos bourreaux
Ils nous ont détaillé le mal
Ils n'ont rien dit innocemment . . .

Floods of anonymous denunciations kept pouring in to the Gestapo; all that is vilest in smug, bourgeois, middle-aged opportunism, fearful of discomfort or distress, went veering round to the Marshal; all that was lowest in angry boorish youth dressed up in the black uniforms, copied from the S. S., of the milices populaires. A friend of mine, one of the most kind and charming people that I know, described to me his feelings on going out into the woods of Cap d'Antibes where he was staying and discovering Mort aux juifs plastered upon every tree. He said that it was like suddenly finding that one had a loathsome disease, that he learned to shun his friends, never to speak to one unless they first spoke to him, that he divided them into those who cut him and those whose welcome was over-effusive, as if they were determined to show they were not afraid of infection. One day he woke up to find every single newspaper in the country carrying in huge headlines a denunciation of his family, which was held responsible for the war and for every evil consequence which his country was undergoing!

And having imagined all this treachery and corruption, one must then try to imagine the life of those who fought against it. The betrayals, the tortures, the separations, the executions and suicides, the denunciations of the resisters by their own people, who resented the harsher conditions which German retaliation imposed on them, the terrible uncertainties and disappointments which befall the weak who rise against the stronger. I wonder, for instance, if many people know that Inspector Boni, the chief of the French Gestapo torturers of the Rue de Lauriston, who was recently executed, specialized in impersonating British airmen. He would call at a farm in R. A. F. uniform, beg for shelter, and if favorably received, ask if he could hide his pocket transmitter in the barn. Then he would go off and return with the Gestapo. Such is the background against which the resistance worked, and it is to be wondered that once they had learned to watch their friends die in agony and to carry their own death with them in a capsule as their most precious possession, any of them could even contemplate literature as an end in itself and not merely as a means for bringing people back to the truth.

Eluard expresses this conflict in a recent poem, "Critique de la poésie," where the deaths of Lorca, the old symbolist Saint-Pol-Roux, and the young Decour, founder of the Editions de Minuit and the clandestine Lettres Françaises, peal like a funeral bell through the lovely golden sensuality of his usual image-glowing poetry:

CRITIQUE DE LA POÉSIE

Le feu réveille la forêt
Les troncs les cœurs les mains les feuilles
Le bonheur en un seul bouquet
Confus léger fondant sucré
C'est toute une forêt d'amis
Qui s'assemble aux fontaines vertes
Du bon soleil du bois flambant

García Lorca ■ été mis à mort

Maison d'une seule parole
Et des lèvres unies pour vivre
Un tout petit enfant sans larmes
Dans ses prunelles d'eau perdue
La lumière de l'avenir
Goutte à goutte elle comble l'homme
Jusqu'aux paupières transparentes

Saint-Pol-Roux ■ été mis à mort
Sa fille a été suppliciée

Ville glacée d'angles semblables
Ou je rêve de fruits en fleur
Du ciel entier et de la terre
Comme à de vierges découvertes
Dans un jeu qui n'en finit pas
Pierres fanées murs sans écho
Je vous évite d'un sourire

Decour ■ été mis à mort.

The resistance now belongs to the past, and is already becoming a legend. The resisters are slowly losing their voice in the government and may or may not lose their influence with the people. The trials of collaborationist writers and editors, however, have taken the place of the resistance as the second act in the public drama. They are No. 1 topic in Paris, and when I was there came before food (No. 2), fuel (No. 3), and Jean Genet's "Notre Dame des Fleurs" (a bad fourth). These trials arouse the most violent controversy, which revolves round the sentence passed and the culpability of the victims. The right tend to deplore the death sentences, the left to demand them. Mauriac, through his column in the Figaro, has consistently pleaded for their remission. From the psychological point of view, there is something ambivalent in all discussions of collaboration, purges, etc., and however justified each individual sentence may be, one comes to feel that the role of the English—to whom these provocations have not applied—is to urge leniency. It is not that these writers are guiltless, but that it is doubtful whether they are as guilty as many industrialists who have not been dealt with, or as many informers who have escaped. The world is full of hate, and in France, a country which has had an undeclared civil war, it is seething. Those who have the right to hate and do not choose to exercise it can do enormous good. In the words of Audisio, written in a German prison, "J'ai haï Les Allemands de toute la force de mon être. Je veux que le témoignage sincère en demeure, et malgré moi s'il le faut . . . et si je pleure, Allemands, sachez-le bien, c'est que vous m'avez amené jusque là et que je veuille le dire; c'est que vous ayez, dans la haine stérile, enfoncé des milliers et des milliers d'hommes de bonne volonté."

Justice will be done to those who have betrayed, tortured, and informed against their fellows. We must try to militate against the operation of envy, revenge, intolerance, and spite causing the death of those who have merely held the wrong opinions.

[To be continued]

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

PLAINVILLE, U. S. A." by James West—both names are pseudonyms—is a detailed study of a "backward" rural town in the southern Midwest (Columbia, $2.75). It is "addressed to anthropologists, social scientists, and general readers interested in rural people." But I think almost any general reader will soon discover that Plainville is his own more or less antediluvian home town. For the fact is that most of us, whatever our birth certificates say, were born and raised there, and Plainville still figures in our behavior.

In this light Mr. West's cool scientific treatise becomes as personal as one's family history. As such it is fascinating, irritating, and often dull. It is dull because we are constantly finding that we already knew what he has to tell us; it is fascinating because he makes us aware of what we knew and thus renders our knowledge usable; it is irritating because, quite impersonally, he exposes us to ourselves, and in the bargain shows us that in certain minimal but very important respects we are no different from millions of other people. Self-knowledge is always irritating, and I still remember how angry I was when I discovered that Margaret was a common name.

Mr. West lived in Plainville for more than a year. He learned its history and on the basis of countless interviews made a careful record of its values, conventions, and attitudes. Plainville is still relatively isolated, but it has felt, registered, and remembered, perhaps all the more vividly for being on the periphery, the vast changes of the past hundred years.

The principal lessons to be derived from this record are the persistence with which Plainvillers have carried over into each new situation the set of values generated by earlier ones, their failure to coordinate or even sort out their by now large and various collections of attitudes, their slow acceptance of new attitudes, which, once accepted, will in turn never be discarded, and the extent to which they evade their dilemma by means of the simple device of talking one way and acting another. The Plainviller today is a bundle of contradictory attitudes of many vintages held together by a web of rationalization which protects him from himself as well as from his neighbors. Which suggests that if hypocrisy has had a peculiarly lurid growth in America, it may be in part because Americans have been subjected to so many drastic changes in so short a period of time. The mask, as Constance Rourke says in "American Humor," was a "portable heirloom handed down by the pioneer," to whom it had been highly useful, both as weapon and defense. "In a primitive world crowded with pitfalls the unchanging, unaverted countenance had been a safeguard, preventing revelations of surprise, anger, or dismay. The mask had otherwise become habitual among the older Puritans. . . . Governor Bradford had encouraged its use on a considerable scale, urging certain gay spirits to enjoy themselves in secret, if they must be convivial. No doubt the mask would prove useful in a country where the Puritan was still a power and the risks of pioneering by no means over. The Yankee retained it." So have we all, though it has gone through many mutations and now deceives no one except, on occasion and not too satisfactorily, the wearer himself. I don't mean to imply that hypocrisy is not an ancient human device in use everywhere. Still, I think the Hays code may be called a peculiarly American masquerade.

The basic ingredients, social and psychological, of the Plainville man are of course European. To these was added the complex of attitudes generated by a seemingly limitless frontier and the opportunity for economic and physical independence. The end of the frontier, the Industrial Revolution, the age of specialization, and a money economy imposed other values. And when the money frontier ended and the Industrial Revolution ran into the cul-de-sac of "overproduction," of poverty in the midst of plenty, the people of Plainville were confronted with another change—alleviation, regulation, and reform carried on by government. Plainvillers have hardly begun to catch up.

No one will be surprised to learn that it is the pioneer attitudes which were most thoroughly assimilated and which still give Plainville its particular bent as well as its flavor. If you can imagine Daniel Boone driving an automobile at sixty miles an hour on a federal highway and complaining because "the gub'ment" interferes with his affairs, you will

Provocative essays by

ARTHUR KOESTLER

Photograph by Germaine Kanova

THE YOGI AND THE COMMISSAR

Arthur Koestler's fine novels (Arrival and Departure and Darkness at Noon) are an expression of his concern for human values in a time of revolution. In these thoughtful essays he attacks the same problem directly. Dealing with war, politics, literature, philosophy, and the Soviet Union, they stress the eternal antithesis of Saint and Revolutionary. $2.75

The autobiography of

GEORGE W. NORRIS

Photograph by Ferdinand Vogel

FIGHTING LIBERAL

Here is the first-hand story of a fruitful career which reached from pioneer days to the present, from the battle against Cannonism to the fight for TVA. Jonathan Daniels, reviewing the book in PM, calls it "one of the important documents of our times—essential to any understanding of liberalism in the U.S.A." $3.50 get some idea of the study in the uneven development of human beings which Plainville presents.

Take the question of class divisions. In Plainville Mr. West was told in a delightful burst of protesting too much: "We're all just one plain old class of common average working people here." What he actually found of course was a class differentiation so rigid and so thoroughly accepted that he was able to make a very neat chart of it.

Looked at coldly, Plainville's attitudes, in most cases dual attitudes, toward sex, money, reform, education, religion, its stubborn benightedness and cultural poverty, are depressing. They are also infuriating because one's heart has long since become involved, and one can look at Plainvillers no more coldly than one might contemplate flesh-and-blood relatives at a family reunion.

So one cleaves, as Plainvillers do, to their good qualities: their resistance to regimentation, their belief—more honored perhaps in the breach than in the observance but none the less doggedly held—in equality and independence, their skepticism, their determination not to be taken in.

The trouble is that it is all too easy to get sentimental about Plainville or to laugh it away—that enables us to feel superior, to disown Plainville and evade responsibility. As Mr. West says, the problem of Plainville is the problem of America. Specifically, it is the problem of growing up. We tend to rationalize and romanticize our adolescence; we even admire it as if it were a first crocus instead of a festering lily. Most fiction, radio programs, and movies pander to this tendency when they are not designed by adolescents for adolescents. Even our best and most serious writers are as likely as not to be afflicted with an appalling immaturity. As for our political behavior, it is one long and painful study in development arrested at half a dozen levels.

Assuredly the problem of Plainville is the problem of America. The solution, if one dares to be glib, lies in education, but of a sort so delicate and comprehensive, yet so committed to the proposition that education is in the end a matter of lifting oneself by one's own bootstraps, that the word becomes far too small for the process. Mr. West offers no specifications, but he has at least given us unsentimental data on the problem itself.

PLAINVILLE, of course, has its saving grace—in the recurrent miracle of the individual who transcends the limitations and demonstrates the possibilities of the Plainville man. George W. Norris was one of these. I shall discuss his autobiography next week.

The Community of Europe

EUROPE FREE AND UNITED. By Albert Guérard. Stanford University Press. $2.50.

THERE will be One World. There are at present two worlds. Their conflict, looming as the theme of World War III, can hardly be mediated unless we call into existence a third entity between Russia and the West. Its name is Europe.

On the substance and outlook of Europe Albert Guérard has written the finest and wisest book at hand. A Parisian by birth, frankly avowing his sublimated affection for the old country while sharing with unsuspectable warmth the ideals and interests of America, whose denizen and citizen he has been for nearly forty years, Guérard is the paragon of all the hyphenated. His patriotism, straddling the seas, can be described with the European words of Mazzini, "I love my country because I love all countries," or with the American words of Walt Whitman, which he ritually quotes, "O America, because I build for mankind, I build for you."

A tender bias toward France—as attractive to sentimental contemplation as it is largely inoffensive for ultimate purposes—persists below the sublimation of nationalism. Thus Guérard is not quite sure that an Arab federation would be desirable—a perplexity conditioned perhaps by anxiety for the structural firmness of French Africa. He is only "tempted," in a footnote, to add Alsace-Lorraine to the territories which have been so fiercely fought for—Macedonia, the Banat, the Sudetenland, Upper Silesia, Transylvania—and which "could be detached and made self-governing at first under federal supervision." We might like it better if he did succumb to the temptation. In general we sense overstatement in his assertions of a compact and monolithic allegiance throughout continental France and its imperial holdings. These flaws, comparatively slight, do not spoil the fabric.

The test is in Guérard's attitude toward Germany. Needless to say, there is in him not even an infinitesimal quantum of leniency toward Nazi Germany or toward any other manifestation of fascism. But neither does he show the slightest hesitation in proclaiming that a renovated Germany must in due course be reintegrated with equal status in the community of Europe. The chances that the Germans may emerge once more as the most numerous "race" in his Europe are well known to Guérard. They do not deter him; "for France," he writes, "is a smiling land, a generous spirit, and a rich tradition; it never was a race." Indeed, "Germany, the overlord, must disappear"—even though not that overlord alone: "the spirit of overlordship, the hateful Big Four delusion, must be eradicated everywhere in the world"—but "the result will not be to enslave Germany. . . . That immense power . . . will be turned to the service of the European Nation and of all mankind."

Guérard's "plan for a United Europe, a people's Europe, turns all boundary disputes into minor matters." It is a seamless garment, woven in one piece throughout. To the lazy critic, ready to mumble "Utopia," he submits a whole system

We have won the military victory in Europe—Now we must win the Peace!

- ★ How can the roots of German fascism be destroyed?
- ★ What about the punishment of German war criminals?
- ★ What of the responsibility of the German people?
- ★ What kind of territorial revision and reparations will strengthen peace?
- ★ Are military disarmament and economic control necessary for world security?
- ★ Is there hope for the democratic reorientation of the German people?

Victory Has Placed These Questions On the Agenda of History.

Read the Answers in

THE TREATMENT OF DEFEATED GERMANY

By V. J. JEROME, Co-Editor of Political Affairs

A thorough, brilliantly reasoned analysis by a noted American Marxist

At All Bookshops

Paper $3.35; Cloth $7.25

NEW CENTURY PUBLISHERS • 832 Broadway • New York 3, N. Y.

of technical proposals that should leave no doubt about his Utopia's being the stuff reality is made on. In the political field he is radical enough to demand, as soon as possible, a European Constituent Assembly elected through secret and universal suffrage by constituencies whose boundaries should neither necessarily follow nor necessarily oppose national lines. In the social field Guérard, who is far left of center, thinks that "a high degree of socialism" is "the most efficient way of reducing to order the incredible chaos created by the Nazis." Yet he remains open-minded as regards a remoter future: "I envision the Europe of tomorrow as neither committed to socialism nor afraid of socialism." The peoples of Europe are at variance in religious creeds. Harmony will be achieved by rigorous freedom of worship, threatening no indignity and extending no privilege to any confession. The peoples of Europe are locked up each one in its own particular language. Intercommunication will be secured by an auxiliary language to be taught in all schools from the Curzon Line to the Straits of Gibraltar and from Norway to Crete. It will be the official tongue of all federal offices and agencies. It will easily gain spontaneous currency in commercial and scientific exchanges as well.

Here, more strikingly than anywhere else, Guérard rises above the pride and prejudice of many a precursor. He does not so much as mention in this context Julien Benda, who—memorable though he remains for having forged first the vital phrase La Nation Européenne—succumbed to the temptation of urging French as the federal language of Europe. French, according to Guérard, may obtain a transitional pre-eminence beside English in the brief phase preceding the constitution of Europe. A constituted Europe must adopt a language as uncolored as possible by sectional primacy. "Europe Free and United" commemorates Volapük; it pays its respects to Esperanto; it has no use for Basic English. Guérard's choice for Europe, and subsequently for the world, is—and has been long since—Peano's Interlingua or Latino sine flexione, Latin with no inflections, and no syntax either, a lithe and yet solid architecture of all Latin roots, and of those alone, that are at home also in the English dictionary, an instrument of expression synthetic and natural alike, with meanings promptly transparent to a much vaster number of people than any other language, natural or synthetic, has won or can hope to win.

Thus, Guérard's Europe, a fairer sister of such older children of desire as toyed, or still toy, with clerical or near-fascist legacies—besides being thoroughly free also of hostility to Russia and of anti-British exclusiveness—stands before our eyes, articulated in her essential organs and functions and even endowed with a speech as noble in its pedigree as it is functionally adequate to the technological age. We might stop in front of her and call with Gospel words in that very speech: Europa, veni foris. Europe, come forth.

She would not budge, however. We have made her motionless—for a while.

Lin Yutang, as quoted by Guérard, asked once: "To prevent European unity is one of our unconfessed war aims?" At any rate we have behaved as if it were.

Anglo-American policy has made whatever areas of Europe it could act upon into a vacuum intended to become an experimental laboratory for the resurrection of defunct worlds

JOHN HERSEY

author of

A BELL FOR ADANO

says:

"Written with balance . . . It is a book which ought to be widely read . . . This book gives the best, the most complete and incidentally the most entertaining sense of what the Russians are like of any book about recent Russia that I have read."

These are the Russians

by RICHARD E. LAUTERBACH

Moscow Correspondent for TIME and LIFE

At all bookstores • $3.00

HARPER

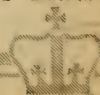

After Peace...

An International Bill OF THE Rights of Man

BY H. LAUTERPACHT

This timely and important book is a well-documented discussion of the historical and legal facts on which is based the amendment to the world charter, proposed by the American delegation at San Francisco, which provides for the establishment of a Commission on Human Rights. $3.00

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
59th ST.
near Lex
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

The Flying Tiger's Story!
"RIP-ROARING FILM"—N. Y. Times

DENNIS MORGAN

Dane Clark • Raymond Massey • Alan Hale

'GOD IS MY CO-PILOT'

Screen version of COL. SCOTT'S Autobiography

— and —

'Zombies On Broadway'

Wally Brown
Alan Carney

"One of the best of the year"—N. Y. Times

'MR. EMMANUEL'

Starring FELIX AYLMER

With GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA

Based on LOUIS GOLDING'S Famous Novel

— and —

MARY O'HARA'S

'THUNDERHEAD'

'SON OF FLICKA'—in Technicolor

RODDY McDOWALL RITA JOHNSON
PRESTON FOSTER

20th Century-Fox Presents

Fred MacMURRAY Joan Leslie June HAVER

"WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?"

IN TECHNICOLOR

PLUS — New York's Biggest Stage Show!

TONY & SALLY DE MARCO JOHN BOLES

THE PITCHMEN

EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION!

JACKIE GLEASON

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. & 50th St.

"OUT of this WORLD"

starring
Eddie BRACKEN
Veronica LAKE
Diana LYNN
with CASS DALEY
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

In Person

ALLAN JONES

GIL LAMB

EILEEN BARTON

JERRY WALD

And His Orchestra

Mighty 7th War Loan
BUY BONDS HERE

—fascist or nearly so. We have thereby aroused both the suspicion and the ambition of Russia, who has deemed it fit to take as much of Europe as feasible into protective custody. The sword she has cast across the continent is heavy indeed. There does not seem to be east of the Elbe and the Alps much chance in the near future of calling to general elections the constituencies of a Europe free and united.

That is why this book, conceived in a spirit of full realism as to its will, and molded in the limpid beauty that fits a concept irrepressibly alive, was born "utopian" as to the tempo of fulfilment. The reader to whose knowledge and thought it has brought a decisive contribution will give it a most conspicuous place on his best shelf—which is quite another thing from shelving it—ready to be taken down when the day comes that makes truthful dreams come true and nightmares go the way of all night.

G. A. BORGESE

CONTRIBUTORS

KAY BOYLE is a well-known novelist and writer of short stories. Among her books are "Avalanche," "Armistice Diary," and "The Crazy Hunter."

UMA SHANKAR is the pseudonym of an Indian journalist now in the United States.

MOTION PICTURES

Samuel Goldwyn presents
DANNY KAYE
in
"WONDER MAN"
In Technicolor
VIRGINIA MAYO • VERA-ELLEN and those Gorgeous Goldwyn Girls

ASTOR
8'way & 45th St.
Extra Late Show
Every Night
Continuous from 9 a.m.
Popular Prices

"Compelling! Vivid! David Niven superb!" — Look Magazine.
G. C. F. presents

DAVID NIVEN in THE WAY AHEAD

A Two Cities Film released by 20th Century-Fox

Now Playing VICTORIA 8'way at 46th St.

STAGE PLAYS

"A SWEET AND HAPPY HIT."—Garland, Journal-American.
Rodgers and Hammerstein present

MADY CHRISTIANS • OSCAR HOMOLKA
in JOHN VAN DRUTEN'S

I REMEMBER MAMA
from Kathryn Forbes' "Mama's Bank Account" with JOAN TETZEL

MUSIC BOX
45th Street, West of Broadway. Phone: Circle 6-4636
Exes. 8:35 Sharp. Mats. Thurs. and Sat. 2:35 Sharp

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by Music by
& DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 50th Street. Matinee Wed. & Sat.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

WHEN a good man gets a real chance in Hollywood it is not only news; the least one can do is salute those who, aware of the gamble, gave him the money and the chance and protected him in it. So, with pleasure, I salute David Loew and Robert Hakim, thanks to whom Jean Renoir has made "The Southerner," his own adaptation of George Sessions Perry's "Hold Autumn in Your Hand." "The Southerner" is an attempt to tell the story of a year in the life of a family of cotton tenant farmers. Though its people are exceedingly poor, this is not a political or social "exposure" of the tenant system, nor does it pay any attention to class or racial friction. It tries simply to be a poetic, realistic chronicle of a farm year's hope, work, need, anxiety, pride, love, disaster, and reward—a chronicle chiefly of soil, seasons, and weather, the only other dramatic conflict being furnished by a pathologically unkind neighbor. About 60 per cent of the film was made on location—in California not Texas; most of the time the rest is so well done that you can't tell the difference. Physically, exclusive of the players, it is one of the most sensitive and beautiful American-made pictures I have seen. There is a solemnly eager, smoky, foggy 'possum hunt which may have been studio-faked for all I know; it gets perfectly the mournful, hungry mysteriousness of a Southern country winter. There is an equally good small-town street; I have seldom, in a movie, seen the corner of a brick building look at once so lonely and so highly charged with sadness and fear.

Yet warmly as I respect the picture's whole desire and the many good things about it, I saw it with as much regret as pleasure. The heart of this kind of living is work, and the picture should have made the work as immediate to the watcher as to the worker in all its methods, meanings, and emotions. It offers instead, mere token shots of work; and in these, too often, the clothes aren't even sweated. Just as unfortunate and more constantly disappointing, most of the players are wrong, anywhere from a little bit to a whole world wide of the mark. I don't so much mind that the dialect is very much thinned out, or even that it lacks uniformity. The thinning, to the point of general intelligibility, is a convention I would accept, though I'd put my money on handling it straight. The lack of uniformity, though far less defensible, I would accept if only the people were right in other respects—which in that case would be unlikely. But most of the people were screeching, unbearably wrong. They didn't walk right, stand right, eat right, sound right, or look right, and, as bad or worse, behind the work of each it was clear that the basic understanding and the basic emotional and mental—or merely human—attitude were wrong, to the point of unintentional insult.

To cast and realize such a film correctly would be, I must grant, one of the hardest conceivable jobs; but when has that stopped being an artist's responsibility? The one person in the film who for all his minor mistakes is basically right, in everything from cheekbones and eyes to posture to spiritual attitude, is Zachary Scott; he was born in Texas. J. Carroll Naish is no Texan, but he is such an observant, disciplined, and clear-spirited actor that he comes close to making up the difference. I have no desire to go into unkind detail about other players such as Beulah Bondi, Betty Field, Percy Kilbride, Blanche Yurka, Norman Lloyd, and two dreadfully miscalculated children, but I'll have to a little, to make my point at all clear. Percy Kilbride is a wonderful player of certain rural types, but it is hard to imagine him much south of Connecticut or much west of the Hudson. Betty Field clearly and deeply cares for the kind of regional exactness I too care for; but her efforts to disguise the fact that she is an intelligent, sincere young artist who feels sympathy and respect for a farmer's wife are as embarrassing as mine would be if I tried to play Jeeter Lester. Beulah Bondi, an actress I generally admire, demonstrates merely how massively misguided, and how swarmed with unconscious patronage, the whole attitude of the theater has always been toward peasants. I don't want to go on. I am afraid that in my objection to this kind of inaccuracy there are streaks of parochial pedantry and snobbery. But mainly, so far as I know, my objection comes out of a respect for people. If you are going to try to show real people, in a real place, I think that you have to know how their posture and speech and facial structure can alter even within the width of one county; that you have to communicate the exact beauty of those minute particulars without their ever becoming more pointed to the audience than to the people portrayed, and without a single false tone; that if you don't, you are in grave danger of unconscious patronage, you don't see or appreciate or understand your subjects as well as you think you do, you stand likely therefore to be swamped by your mere affection or respect, and so perhaps should give up the whole idea.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THE exhibition "A Problem for Critics," now running at 67 Gallery (through June), is pointed up by Howard Putzel's catalogue note, which singles out and attempts to define a recent and most important tendency in American avant-garde painting. It is illustrated somewhat inconsistently by a show composed of works by artists as disparate as Masson, Miró, Arp, Hofmann, Pollock, Picasso, Gottlieb, Gorky, Matta, Rothko, Tamayo, Pousette-Dart, Krassner, and Seliger. Mr. Putzel ventures to call the trend a "new metamorphism" whose "real forerunners were Arp and Miró." (James Johnson Sweeney, in the spring Partisan Review, refers to it as "an expressionist direction.") There is no question that Mr. Putzel has hold of something here. Until recently abstract painting in this country and elsewhere was governed by the structural or formal or "physical" pre-occupations that are supposed to exhaust the intentions of cubism and its inheritors. Now there has come a swing back toward "poetry" and "imagination," the signs of which are the return of elements of representation, smudged contour lines, and the third dimension. Images, no longer locked to the surface in flat profile, reappear against indeterminate, atmospheric depths. Exhibited emotions give the spectator something to hang his interest on.

Aware of the dominant direction of art since the mid-nineteenth century—which, compelled by the social, psychological, and philosophical necessities of our late bourgeois age, takes painting farther and farther from illusion—one is liable to pronounce Mr. Putzel's new "ism" a step backward. But the judgment of taste does not quite agree. The aridity of orthodox abstract art—the fault belongs to the practitioners rather than to the mode—has of late been such that relief from almost any quarter seems welcome. Yet a great danger is involved in this new quasi-literary turn.

For one thing, I disagree with Mr. Putzel that the inspiration of the new tendency came from Arp and Miró—both of whom, despite their desire to restore "poetry" to modern painting, continue the flattening-out, abstracting,

RESORTS

FOREST HOUSE
FOR TIMELY VACATIONING

50 MILES
FROM N.Y.C.

VACATIONING
AT FOREST HOUSE
achieves new levels of relaxation, rest and happiness during the Spring. Unforgettable fishing; 3 lakes, congenial hospitality, all sports, fine food, splendid accommodations...
and all so near.
Tel. MAHOPAC 688

RELAX, REJOICE with SPRING at . . .

Lakecrest

On Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.
90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations.
Cordial hospitality. Recreations, library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C.R.R. to America, N.Y. Open all year.
WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS
EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 4108

REEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.

11 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Exquisitely furnished. Distinguished.
All season activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 588

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 2320

50 miles from N. Y. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Sports, Movies.
Early reservations requested
SPECIAL JUNE RATES

Timberland
WINDSOR, N.Y.

AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100

SPECIAL JUNE RATES
ALL SPORTS • PRIVATE LAKE
DANCING • LECTURES • CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42 St. LOnacre 5-3074
The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 2905

This Adult Camp...
in sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports. Six hours by train from New York.
Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director Write for booklet and rates

"YOURS FOR HEALTH & BEAUTY!"
BONA VISTA HEALTH FARM
ON ORANGE LAKE • 1 1/2 HOURS N.Y.C.

Rolling meadows, sports, concerts, and thru our scientific nutrition develop a perfect body. Only resort serving vegetables grown naturally—without animal fertilizers, and tropical fruits.
H. EIGER, Mgr.
1000 Ave. MU 2-4217

RESORTS

45 Miles from New York City
Zindorest
★ Park Monroe N. Y.
Telephone 4421
A Resort for Adults Only

Exclusive location. 150 acres of unusual beauty. All sports. Lake and Pool on premises. Delicious food, relaxing atmosphere, dancing, modern accommodations.
Greyhound, Adirondack Trailway and Short Line buses stop at main Entrance. ★

SCHROON CREST
in the Adirondacks—Pottersville, N. Y.
ON SCHROON LAKE

5 Fast Clay Tennis Courts—All Sports, Classic Receptions & Dance Orchestras. Jutes Adolphs & His Grand Entertainers, Razzle Dazzle—Excellent Cuisine.
Booklet—N. Y. Office: 142 Montague Street,
Brooklyn 2, N. Y. Phone: Main 4-8670
Leah Okun — Irv. Schoenberg

Birdland
CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.

200-ACRE ESTATE. 1,000-FT. ELEVATION.
Congenial adult resort. All sports.
Golf, fine food. Only 45 miles from N. Y.
Highland Mills 7805. DIANA & ABB HERMAN

ARCADIA
Fishkill, N. Y. Tel. Beacon 722

ALL SPORTS. Excellent tennis, volleyball, handball, ping-pong, swimming in spacious pool, etc.
Recordings. Informal social surroundings, delicious food.
Reservations for Limited Number of Families for Extended Stay Now Accepted
N. Y. Tel. WAd. 3-8936, before noon, after 7 p.m.
Weekdays
R.R. Station, Beacon, N. Y., 60 miles from city.

YOURS, TO ENJOY . . .
A unique mountain resort in an artists' and musicians' colony • Outdoor activities • Sunday concerts
by known artists • Beautiful surroundings • Cultured entertainment • Novel cuisine • Reasonable rates.

TANGLEWOOD
Woodstock, N. Y. • Write or phone Woodstock 14F13

Tall Pines
High in the Dutchess County
hills. 100 acres of beautiful rolling country . . . land and water sports . . . a design for leisure. N. Y. Central or Hudson River Day Line to Poughkeepsie.
ATTRACTIVE RATES
PLEASANT VALLEY, DUTCHESS CO., N. Y.
Phone: 2741 or 5511

OAKWOOD
NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477

Delightful...swimming & boating on private lake.
Different...the colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...our unexcelled cuisine.
Disarming...resort for listening & dancing.
All this only 53 miles from New York City
A Resort for Adults Only

FORTY-LOVE
Because South Wind (with a capacity of 100) has built its four city tennis courts with care, it has attracted a "Tennis Crowd"
—a young, eager group of the adults

SOUTH WIND
WOODBORNE, N. Y. ALL SPORTS
Large Private Lake Attractive June Rates

Additional Resort Advertising
On Inside Back Cover

CHILDREN'S CAMPS

Camp CHI-WAN-DA
FOR BOYS and GIRLS
ULSTER PARK, N.Y.

On the Mountain Lake
Esopus overlooking the
Beautiful Hudson River

We present a modern cultural environment
for your children. All cabins with latest improvements. All activities. For full information, write or call for booklet.
JACOB I. DOROSHKIN, Director
545-5th Ave., MU. 2-4217 MA. 2-5546 DL. 6-3849

Camp Allegro BOYS GIRLS
ALABEN, N.Y.

Beautifully Equipped Modern Camp, 118 Miles
from N. Y. 550 acres. Private Lake. Elevation
2400 ft. All Land-Water Sports. Complete Cultural Program. Stressing Educational-Character Growth.
SOPHIE JANCO, Director
1223 COLGATE AVENUE, BRONX, N.Y. 10473
After 5 P.M. and Sat. & Sun. Phone JE 7-9768.
BROOKLYN PHONE NA 8-0740

COUNTRY BOARD

A FEW PAYING GUESTS in exceptionally beautiful spacious Vermont home on top of lovely hill overlooking all ridges of Green Mountains. RI 9-1774, mornings or evenings, or Box 1530, c/o The Nation.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, Chatham,
New York, offers 300 New York-Massachusetts Berkshire Hills farms.

FURNISHED ROOM

BEAUTIFUL front room, newly furnished, kitchen privileges, share bath. One block
Central Park West. Preferably lady. RI
9-5281.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC handwriting analysis. Alfred
Kanter, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA.
7-0976. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, farms, industries. Lessons. By appointment only. Marital, educational, vocational, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

LANGUAGES

LANGUAGE SERVICE, Box 6, Cambridge, Mass. Phonograph Courses. All makes. Books. All Languages. Established
1936. Booklet N. State language.

SUMMER RENTALS

WOODSTOCK. Two-room bungalow, modern, bath, hot and cold water, electricity, frigidaire. Use of hotel facilities.
$500 for season. Tanglewood, phone
Woodstock 14 F13.

LIVE on scientific farm this summer.
Charming cottage, newly decorated, adjacent river, $700. June to November. Norman Kellar, New Paltz, New York.

WANTED

WANTED TO BUY. Phonograph Language Courses, LANGUAGE SERVICE,
Established 1936, Box 6, Cambridge, Mass.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic:
One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11.
Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1;
Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers'
Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review
Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs
Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

"purifying" process of cubism. And their influence, moreover, was strong in abstract painting long before the new turn came. No, that owes its impulse to surrealist "biomorphism." Whereas the cubists and post-cubists, including Arp and Miró, had either ended with the inanimate still life or made the animate inanimate by reducing it to pure silhouette, "biomorphism," restoring the third dimension, gave the elements of abstract painting the look of organic substances.

There is nothing aesthetically wrong in this per se, but it does at this moment entail a certain return to the human-all-too-human, too obvious emotion, and academic subterfuges. The novelty and apparent importance of his subject tend to keep the artist from realizing the conventionality of his methods. Instead of exploring the means of his art in order to produce his subject matter, he will hunt about for new "ideas" under which to cover up the failure to develop his means. These new "ideas" may make a sensation for a day, but they shortly begin to look woefully faded.

Many of the painters at 67 Gallery do not really belong to the new trend. Most of those who do have succumbed to its dangers. One or two, however, have accepted just enough of surrealist cross-fertilization to free themselves from the strangling personal influence of the cubist and post-cubist masters. Yet they have not abandoned the direction these masters charted. They advance their art by painterly means without relaxing the concentration and high impassiveness of true modern style.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

SOME of the musicologists' books have been bad; others—like Dr. Curt Sachs's "World History of the Dance" and "History of Musical Instruments"—have been remote from the general public's interest (but anyone who does happen to be interested in the music of India should look up an article by Wasantha Wana Singh in the November 1941 issue of Listen, in which there is a paragraph on Dr. Sachs's errors on the subject).

On the other hand Dorian's "History of Music in Performance" (Norton; $4) deals with a problem which every musician and music-lover is concerned with constantly—the problem of the correct realization of a piece of music in living sound from the written directions of the composer's score. These directions derive their meaning from the style of performance of the composer's period; we are not sure of their precise meaning even in the scores of the past 150 years which write out every sound that is to be produced and prescribe in increasing detail the manner of its production; and our uncertainty increases as we go back in time to scores which employ forms of shorthand that no longer have any meaning for us. In order, then, to produce today the sound of an eighteenth-century keyboard work in its own day it has been necessary to find out what its notation of ornaments and indications of tempo meant to an eighteenth-century performer, what they referred to in the style of performance he was familiar with, what sounds they told him to produce and how they told him to produce them. This is one of the things which the musicologists are busy with; one of those which they point to as evidence of the value of their science; one, certainly, which has the possibility of usefulness to the general public that some of their other activities have not.

But this possibility is only partly realized in Dorian's book. There are things in it like Frescobaldi's preface to the published edition of his Toccatas for organ that are illuminating; but there are even more things like the hullabaloo of historical information about the sarabande or the chaconne or the minuet, which we are told will establish the correct manner of their performance, but after which I knew no more about their performance than I had known before. Nor could I get any precise notions from the discussion of ornaments; and though a friend claimed to have got something from it by working hard over it, I think he really got it from his additional reading of Dolmetsch.

However I did get amusement from a couple of musico-political details in this work of pure scholarship: a photograph—the only one of its kind in the book—of Ormandy with Toscanini, intended to reinforce the impression Ormandy attempts to create in his foreword with things like his reference to "Toscanini and those of us who subscribe to the principles of interpretative loyalty" (that is, fidelity to the written score).

Of the books the musicologists have given us, only one that is of interest and value to the general public is first-rate: the Harvard Dictionary of Music (Harvard University Press; $6), by Dr. Willi Apel, with a few articles by other scholars. It is concerned only with music, not with musicians; and the articles I have dipped into here and there I have found to be excellent. One reader I know was irritated by the bibliographies that referred him to obscure and inaccessible European periodicals, most of them German. And I encountered one extremely bad article—the one on music criticism by Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt.

It is not so much its ideas about the task of criticism and what this requires in the critic that I am concerned with. For I should expect a German pedant and the author of "Music, History, and Ideas" to think that Calvocoressi's schematization of criticism, which distinguishes in it the critic's "predispositions," his "direct data," and his "indirect data," offers a practical method of operation for the critic, whose task is consciously "to separate these considerations and . . . to avoid undue prevalence of the personal 'predisposition' over the

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK BATHON
22 East 17th Street, New York City

FREE

to All
AUTO
owners

AUTOMOBILE USER'S GUIDE
with wartime suggestions

196 Practical Suggestions that will help you to get

- better gas mileage
- longer tire life
- better performance
- lower upkeep costs

Get a FREE COPY from any General Motors dealer or use the coupon below

Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.

Please send FREE COPY of new edition 64-page "Automobile User's Guide"—containing 156 practical suggestions in a wartime operation.

Name..... please print

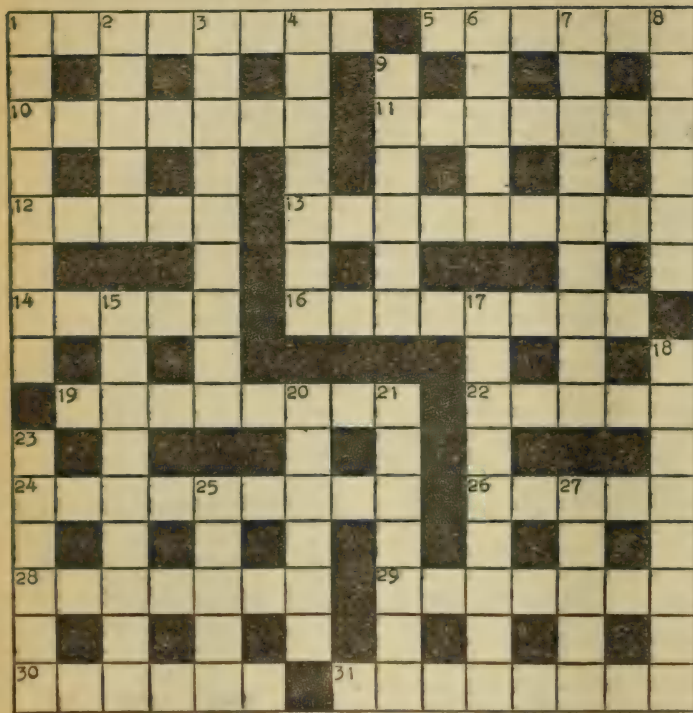

Address..... please print

City..... Zone State

Make of car.....
year owned..... year model.....

Crossword Puzzle No. 119

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 A bit touched in respect of the gentry
- 5 His ghost is more famous than he himself!
- 10 Do the walls again, back and forth
- 11 In Hollywood parlance, a repeated routine
- 12 Girl whose make-up upsets the males
- 13 Caught in the middle of the act, the Press is distinctly dispirited
- 14 "Thus Raleigh, thus immortal Sidney shone (illustrious names!) in great -----'s days"
- 16 A Jacobite defeat
- 19 Haircuts that reveal the shape of feminine heads
- 22 The clergy's portion
- 24 Gets eager (anag.)
- 26 You may also know this goose as the Great Northern Diver
- 28 Where the Grand National is run
- 29 Dried up and drank to the health of
- 30 Worthless
- 31 The old Vikings, no doubt (two words, 3 and 5)

DOWN

- 1 A worker in wood
- 2 Drive back
- 3 The fairy shoemaker of Ireland
- 4 British chieft the Romans called Caractacus
- 6 Forbidden fruit

- 7 Dormant, but the aroma remains to the end
- 8 Carry too far
- 9 Drive forward
- 15 She was placed on the altar in a rash vow by her father. A tragedy noted by Euripides and Goethe
- 17 Where light baggage might find it most tormenting (three words, 2, 3 and 4)
- 18 Islands where he adopts Mormonism
- 20 Foliage departs
- 21 "This royal throne of kings, this -----d isle"
- 23 Not on the level
- 25 A change of heart
- 27 Bandmen are required to keep one eye on the score and the other on this

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 118

ACROSS:—1 JUDAH; 6 MUSED; 9 ORATORY; 10 RUN IN; 11 SWAIN; 12 EPICURE; 16 REHASH; 19 ALSACE; 22 STILL LIFE; 23 MISS; 24 ACRE; 25 UPON; 26 ACTS; 27 MICA; 29 IRIS; 30 GREENSAND; 33 UNSEAL; 35 TOECAP; 38 CARLIST; 41 CLUCK; 42 AARON; 43 ELEANOR; 44 PEWITT; 46 YOUTH.

DOWN:—1 JUROR; 2 DINAH; 3 HONEST; 4 CADI; 5 TOLU; 6 MYSELF; 7 SCALA; 8 DANTE; 13 PHILOMELA; 14 COLD; 15 RAINCOATS; 17 ELISION; 18 ASSUAGE; 20 SEASIDE; 21 CORSICA; 23 ANIL; 31 RACKET; 32 NOTARY; 33 UNCAP; 34 SQUAW; 36 CORFU; 37 PUNCH; 39 RUED; 40 IONA.

factual 'data,' " and who in this way can "advance music criticism from the level of a hit-or-miss reaction of individuals to the rank of a real science."

What I find shocking is the sloppy, shoddy job of scholarship that is evident in the mere factual material of the article. The first section postpones journalistic criticism of performances to deal with criticism of music in books. But mention of Schumann's discussions of music sends Leichtentritt off on the tangent of other composers who were critics—among them Berlioz. Having mentioned him here, Leichtentritt does not mention him where he belongs—in the second section on musical journalism, where, ignoring the brilliant writing Berlioz did in the Journal des Débats from 1835 to 1863, Leichtentritt says: "Eduard Hanslick, who wrote from 1864 for the Neue Freie Presse (Vienna), may justly be called the father of musical journalism, if only for the reason [italics mine—B. H. H.] that, in his one-sided attitude against Wagner and for Brahms, he introduced into music criticism an element of personal aggressiveness and prejudice which, unfortunately, was imitated by a number of later critics."

Paralleling Leichtentritt's omission of Berlioz is his omission of the most brilliant of German musical journalists, the poet Heine. And when he deals with England he mentions Ernest Newman, because Newman happens to be "best known internationally," but not Bernard Shaw, one of the greatest of all music critics, whom it would have taken some effort to know about, and not even the most distinguished English critic of recent years, W. J. Turner. As for the United States, it has had "a galaxy of eminent critics who have done honor to the profession"; and first comes a list of the older generation, concerning which I will express my doubt that the judgment that Krehbiel did honor to his profession was based on any investigation into what that American Hanslick wrote. And then a list of those who "at present" are "with others . . . the best known and most esteemed critics": Downes, Oscar Thompson, Virgil Thomson, Chotzinoff, Perkins, and Leonard Liebbling—a list which includes one man who gave up his job four years ago, and fails to distinguish the men who are worthy of esteem from those who are not.

"But then," a friend remarked, "consider the reviews the book would have got if it had had a good article on criticism."

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 16, 1945

NUMBER 24

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

661

EDITORIALS

Save the FEPC!

663

Occupation of Germany

664

The Fight for S 380

664

ARTICLES

Arrest of "the Six" by I. F. Stone

666

AMG Plans for Japan

667

Hotel Behind the Lines by Kay Boyle

668

Why Germany Lost by Major H. A. DeWeerd

671

In the Wind

673

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Paris Regained, III by Cyril Connolly

674

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

675

Briefer Comment

676

Music by B. H. Haggin

679

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

680

[For reasons of space the Political War section and the Cross-Word Puzzle will be omitted from the 24-page issues published on alternate weeks during the summer.]

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

L. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

JONATHAN DANIELS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Shape of Things

CERTAIN LESSONS ARE TO BE LEARNED FROM THE seven-day veto crisis at San Francisco, so happily ended by Stalin's agreement to permit freedom of hearing and discussion before the Security Council. In the first place, as The Nation pointed out last week, it is quite clear that Russia wants the conference to succeed and intends to remain within the new security organization. Russia may be stubborn, and lack diplomatic tact, and resort exasperatingly to unilateral action when cooperation would be to everybody's advantage, but Russia knows as well as any nation the cost of armed isolation. There may be forces in Russia, just as there are in this country, pressing in that direction, but they are not centered in the Kremlin. In the second place, as a number of intelligent editorial writers have said, one reason for Russia's reluctance to permit free discussion of any matter brought to the attention of the Security Council was the clear possibility that it might be used to raise such old and settled issues as the independence of the Baltic states. Senator Vandenberg has suggested as much. Russia has not yet got rid of its deep mistrust of outside anti-Soviet forces; some of our irresponsible leaders and writers have done little to improve matters. In the third place, the resolution of the veto crisis shows that Russia respects a firm stand when it is convinced the intentions of its opponents are honest. The position of the powers small and large which fight for free discussion could not, in general, be interpreted as anti-Soviet: it was definitely in behalf of the rights of lesser nations, which Russia previously had championed. After the word of the agreement reached the conference, one of the Soviet delegates remarked: "If a point is proved to us and we see and feel that it is based on good will and justified desires, we agree to it." There's still much to learn in the United Nations school of international relations, but the first semester has seen great strides made.

★

ACCEPTANCE OF THE BRETTON WOODS PACTS by an overwhelming, bi-partisan vote in the House is the most encouraging step that Congress has yet taken in the direction of world cooperation. Powerful interests, including a large segment of the banking world, have fought bitterly against the stabilization fund provided for in the agreements. Yet in the showdown the undoubted desire of the American people for better world relations prevailed. Even the Republicans, who do not readily respond to popular pressure, supported the Bretton Woods agreements 138 to 18. And a few hours after the vote Governor Dewey, who is not insensitive to the drift of the political winds, came out in a belated indorsement of the pacts. Coming as it did a few hours before the breaking of the veto deadlock at San Francisco, the House's action should contribute substantially toward the creation of a better atmosphere for international collaboration than has existed since the early days of the United Nations Conference. Its constructive significance is counterbalanced, however, by the fact that the trade-agreements program is encountering heavy weather in the Senate. The Finance Committee, in a report favoring extension of the reciprocal trade agreements, has wiped out—by a one-vote margin—the meaning of its act by blue-penciling the section of the bill which permits the President to cut tariff rates 50 per cent below present levels. Senator George promises to try to restore the provision when the bill goes to the floor. Unless he succeeds, the heart of the measure will have been cut out. Power to negotiate lower tariffs on a reciprocal basis is quite as important as the Bretton Woods agreements.

*

THE APPOINTMENT OF GENERAL OMAR BRADLEY to succeed Brigadier General Hines as head of the Veterans' Administration is good news for the returning service men. General Bradley has had a conspicuously brilliant record in the war. His elevation to the rank of commander of the Twelfth Army Group some months prior to the landings on D-Day came after distinguished service in Tunisia and Sicily. The fact that General Bradley is considered one of the two or three best field generals in the Allied armies is evidence of his ability as an organizer and administrator. What is just as important, his unflinching concern for the men in the ranks has earned him the title of "the doughboy's general." President Truman could hardly have made a better choice. Apparently, regardless of the findings of the Rankin committee now investigating charges against the Veterans' Administration, General Bradley is being given full powers if not injunctions to clean house. The courteous dismissal of General Hines, who has held the post for twenty-two years, must be read alongside of the President's assurance that the Veterans' Administration would be streamlined and modernized to meet the needs of the veterans of this war. This statement, coupled with the Bradley appointment, is the best answer that could be given to Rankin's attempts to discredit witnesses before his committee.

*

WE AGREE WITH PRESIDENT TRUMAN THAT THE salaries of members of Congress are too low, but we do not agree that this is the time to boost them from $10,000 to "perhaps $15,000 to $25,000 a year." A straight increase, as the President pointed out, would be more honest and direct than the "annual expense account" of $2,500 which the members of the House had voted themselves. But neither is justified as long as the war is going on and other wage and salaried workers are tied to the Little Steel formula. Wayne Morse, as a former member of the War Labor Board, was naturally aware of the implications of the House vote. He said that Congress had struck a serious blow against the stabilization program and that Mr. Truman, while disapproving of the method used, had condoned it. Senator Morse is right. Certainly the Congress should set an example in self-restraint to a country already restive under war-time wage restrictions and not claim for itself advantages which are denied the rest of the population. And certainly the President should not talk about doubling Congressmen's pay on the very day he forbids any change in the Little Steel formula. We suggest a compromise for the duration: let the President veto the expense-account bill and recommend a straight increase of 15 per cent plus other adjustments available to factory hands and white-collar workers—though we don't know about merit increases! That ought to satisfy our legislators at least until V-J Day.

*

CONTINUED JAPANESE RETIREMENT IN SEVERAL areas in China has made it clear that the enemy is giving up a substantial portion of his holdings in order to strengthen his position for the inevitable American landings. The full extent of the withdrawal is not yet known. The corridor to Indo-China, which was never wide enough to provide protection against American bombings, has already been abandoned. Withdrawals have also been reported along the coast north of Foochow and west of Hongkong. Since the Chinese have no first-line troops in any of these areas and are prevented from sending them there by the Japanese corridor to Hongkong, it is clear that these retreats are of a strategic rather than a tactical nature. It may be assumed that the enemy will dispose his forces in such a way as to protect the few ports—notably Shanghai, Hongkong, and Tsingtao—seizure of which would afford ready access to the interior. The virtual completion of the Okinawa campaign makes the Japanese position in the Shanghai area particularly vulnerable. An American landing near the mouth of the Yangtze would not only open the way to the richest and most populous part of China but would bottle up huge Japanese forces in the Nanking-Hankow area, leaving them but a single railway as an unreliable communication line. Japanese efforts to create effective defenses in this area must be seriously hampered by the panic which the capture of Okinawa has created in the homeland. Leading commanders and picked troops are being withdrawn to the home islands. With its navy virtually eliminated and its air force reduced to a maximum of 4,000 combat planes, Japan has been forced to concentrate its efforts on elaborate defensive fortifications. Germany's experiences with "impregnable defenses" was hardly such as to give our remaining enemy much comfort.

*

ONE OF THE MOST INTERESTING STORIES LATELY told about our greatest novelist, Thomas Mann, appeared last week in a column by Marquis W. Childs. In 1933, soon after Hitler came to power, Mr. Childs made a pilgrimage to Lübeck, Dr. Mann's birthplace. He talked to a group of young people, sons and daughters of the leading citizens, and he told them he wanted to visit Thomas Mann's old home and the house which had been the setting for "Buddenbrooks." This request produced some embarrassment. It was plain that the young men and women were sympathetic to the very new New Order, but local pride, and perhaps even that national pride so flamboyantly proclaimed by the Führer, outweighed their fascist scruples. So they explained carefully that they disapproved of their famous fellow-townsmen's political views, and then led Marquis Childs on his pilgrimage, talking freely about the history of the Mann family, so closely woven into that of Lübeck. How much of the deep conflict that plunged the German people into the nightmare of terror and war and final destruction is summed up in that little incident! No one understands that inner conflict better than Thomas Mann. No one can do more than he, now that the battle of arms is over, to make the Germans themselves understand the meaning of what has happened to them. For the moral and psychological bases of human behavior have been the subject of his life's thought and he has appreciated more completely than any of his contemporaries the subtle processes of disintegration that lead toward individual and social collapse. Dr. Mann is seventy now, and his birthday, just past, will be celebrated on the twenty-fifth of this month at a dinner Nation Associates is holding at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York. We are thankful for the presence of Thomas Mann in America, proud to claim him as a citizen, delighted to have the opportunity to honor him on his birthday. And most of all, we are glad to know that his new country will be able to turn to him for counsel and help in its difficult dealings with the country of his birth. His great novel about Joseph is finished; but much work lies ahead of Thomas Mann.

✱

TWO WEEKS BEFORE THE CANADIAN ELECTIONS, the following note was inclosed in the pay envelopes of all the employees of Lyman's Limited, Montreal, one of Canada's largest wholesale drug firms. J. H. Andrews is the president of the company.

INTER-OFFICE MEMO

To: ALL EMPLOYEES From: J. H. ANDREWS

Monday, June 11, is Election Day. If you have a vote it is your duty as a citizen to exercise same. Vote for the party you are in favor of. BUT VOTE.

Some of you may have listened to the recent propaganda in favor of the C. C. F. Party. I have made a study of this party for the past five years. My findings are that should the C. C. F. win this election, Canada will face the same perils as did Germany under the National Socialist Party that installed Hitler to power. The C. C. F. program is to merge the railroads, banks, insurance companies, etc. I ask you the simple question—Do you know of any business successfully run by a school teacher? The C. C. F. members who will, if elected, govern this country, are made up of college professors, school teachers, and idealists. I have documentary evidence on file covering every important member of the C. C. F. Party, which is open for your inspection at any time. You may vote C. C. F. against my advice as this is your privilege. I cannot, however, accept the responsibility of maintaining employment for you and the other members of our organization for any length of time under a C. C. F. controlled government. I want you to take time to read the inclosed booklet, "The Road to Serfdom," which appeared in the April issue of Reader's Digest. This article was written by an internationally known economist. Canada faces the same problems under the C. C. F. as Central Europe faced during the rise of fascism. The fundamental truths brought to light in this booklet should convince you that Canada needs no C. C. F. or Socialist government.

Save the FEPC!

UNLESS decisive pressure is brought to bear upon Congress during the next few weeks in support of the President's appeal, the Fair Employment Practices Committee will pass out of existence on June 30. It will cease to exist just at the moment when reconversion will create the gravest danger of wholesale employment discrimination against Negro war workers. This critical situation has arisen as a result of a typical underhanded maneuver by Representative Rankin and his diehard Southern tory associates. Having overruled President Roosevelt's request for a $599,000 grant for the 1945-46 fiscal year, the House Appropriations Committee has withheld all funds for the agency on the ground that there is a bill before Congress to establish the FEPC on a permanent basis. And the appropriation measure is to be brought before the House under a rule that would make it possible for Rankin, by raising a point of order, to block any motion to provide for the FEPC. He has served notice that he will do this.

Meanwhile Rankin has seen to it that the bill for a permanent FEPC is bottled up in the Rules Committee, where it has been held for weeks. The bill continues to be kept there despite President Truman's vigorous appeal that it be brought up for action because of the urgency of the reconversion problem. In view of Mr. Truman's close association with many of the Southern Democrats who have been leading the fight against the bill, many observers doubted that he would take the lead in pushing the measure. The President not only demonstrated real political courage in defying the White Supremacy bloc, but showed once more his capacity for striking at the root of an issue when he declared that "discrimination in the matter of employment . . . because of race, creed, or color is not only un-American in nature but will lead eventually to industrial strife and unrest."

As a result of the President's leadership the Rules Committee may yet be compelled to report out the measure. If the committee continues to sabotage it, it may still be forced out on the floor by petition. This, however, can be achieved only if the voters back home begin to flood their Congressmen with messages requesting prompt action. If the bill is brought to a vote in the House, most observers believe that it can be passed.

In the Senate the situation is equally difficult, if less complicated. A bill similar to the House measure has been reported out of committee and is expected to be taken up within the next week. But the opposition has served warning that it will resort to a filibuster if necessary to prevent the bill from being passed. The chances of favorable action before June 30 are slight. Here, too, the one hope that a permanent FEPC may be set up in time for the reconversion period lies in intensive pressure from the voters. It is also possible for the Senate to force restoration of funds for the FEPC in the current war-agencies appropriation bill and thus repair the damage wrought by legislative trickery in the House. The outcome of this struggle will go a long way toward deciding whether we shall have less or more racial conflict in the post-war years.

Occupation of Germany

WITH General Eisenhower's visit to Berlin the joint occupation of Germany has begun, at least symbolically. The control commission provided for in the Yalta agreement has been set up. It has not started to function, however, and we have yet to learn whether common policies of occupation will be followed by the four occupying powers. The control commission will presumably seek to establish as many common policies as possible, but no power is committed to any in advance. Every measure—economic, political, or cultural—favored by one of the occupying powers may be presented to the control commission for consideration.

A careful analysis of our problem in Europe and of our relations with Russia must make it apparent that it is in our interest, and the interest of world peace, to have as complete agreement as possible in the occupation of Germany. Serious differences between Russia and the West might easily lead to a permanent partition of the nation. There are some who advocate such a partition, who think that it would help to destroy the German peril. But no one could maintain that it would ease the tensions between Russia and the Western Allies. A Chinese wall erected across Germany would increase the danger of a policy applied by one of the great powers being interpreted as a strategic threat by another. Such a division might even result in the secret arming of each remnant of Germany, provided a basic accord between Russia and the West is not reached.

Though the Russians seem more reluctant than the British and Americans to establish a common policy in Germany, the apparent inclination of the Western governments to press for a common policy should not be interpreted as anti-Russian. That inclination is, in fact, strongest among those American officials who look upon cooperation with Russia as the keystone of our post-war political strategy. They realize that the best chance of permanent agreement with Russia lies in the creation of an economically healthy Europe, which must include a militarily impotent but economically functioning Germany. The greatest danger to future peace with Russia would arise from the continuance of an economic desert and a political vacuum in the center of Europe. This would tempt the major victorious nations to compete for control of this great central area, to the detriment of the unity of the continent and to the peril of any permanent accord among them.

There is a more immediate reason why we should desire and strive for a common occupation of Germany. It would eliminate difficulties arising from certain disadvantages which exist in the areas controlled by the Western nations in comparison with the Russian zone. That zone has a cereal surplus; the western areas have a cereal deficit. The Russian zone has the undestroyed Silesian industrial areas; the west has the rubble heaps of the Rhine and the Ruhr industries. If Germany is not administered as an economic and political unit, starvation may sweep its western half this winter. This possibility is the more ominous because we are legally prohibited from sending food or relief to Germany, while the Russians, who will certainly take their share out of Germany, are quite willing to send goods and materials into the conquered country for pump-priming purposes.

Furthermore, certain divergences of policy between the Western Allies and the Russians have already appeared which should be eliminated as fast as possible through a common program. The Russians are clearly inclined to kill Nazis more expeditiously and to fraternize with anti-Nazis more readily than are the British and Americans. They will do the first because they are less cumbered by the multitudinous legal problems revealed in Justice Jackson's report to the President. They will do the second because from the beginning they have been more interested than we in discriminating between Nazis and anti-Nazis. Even now the Russians are arranging games and dances with approved German groups and offering special food rations to known anti-Nazi leaders, while our army is still bound and embarrassed by the non-fraternization rule, originally imposed for security reasons. A common policy with the Russians might also eliminate some of the industrial bigwigs which our army has been importing into Germany to run industry.

The situation, in brief, is that the Russians are wrong in their reluctance to establish a common policy and generally right in their own policies. We are right in wanting a common program but usually wrong in the specific policies established in our zone. There is thus a double reason for desiring a genuinely common occupation of Germany.

The Fight for S 380

THE drive for full-employment legislation is gaining momentum, and the first order of business on the domestic front for every labor and liberal organization is to get behind S 380, the Full Employment bill. That the Truman Administration intends to make the bill one of its major objectives was indicated by the release by the White House of the letter from War Mobilization Director Fred M. Vinson to Senator Robert F. Wagner giving unqualified indorsement to S 380. To have won the support of this right-of-center Kentucky Democrat was a substantial political victory, for Vinson's approval will make it easier to muster recruits in the Southern and conservative wing of the party. The President's own position was made amply clear in the Murray-Truman report on full employment last December, when he was still the senior Senator from Missouri, and it is obvious that his succession to the White House has in no way changed his opinion on this fundamental issue.

Judge Vinson deserves the highest commendation for lending his aid to the bill. His letter should make it impossible to draw the usual red herrings across the path of the fight for full employment. While affirming the necessity for

COMING IN THE NATION

BULGARIA—FROM INSIDE

By Constantine Poulos

For the past three months Mr. Poulos has been the only American or British correspondent in Bulgaria.

maintaining free enterprise, Judge Vinson goes to the heart of the problem by declaring: "History shows us that business, labor, and agriculture cannot in themselves assure the maintenance of high levels of production and employment. The government . . . must assume this responsibility and take measures broad enough to meet the issues." A distinguished retail business man, Beardsley Ruml, chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, has lent his aid to the bill in another letter to Senator Wagner, which may help to combat the theory put forward—oddly enough—by Senator Taft that full employment can be obtained only under socialism. Needless to say, Taft does not regard this as an argument for socialism but only as an argument against full-employment legislation. While Taft purports to trace the full-employment idea to Section 118 of the Soviet constitution, Ruml says the new bill is "not based on, nor does it owe its origin to, any foreign ideologies, but is an American conception."

The Full Employment bill envisages a new type of supplementary national budget, aimed to insure sufficient purchasing power to make possible the operation of business at full capacity. A graphic attempt to spell out what this would actually mean in terms of private and federal expenditure has been made by the labor-policy committee of the National Planning Association. In a pamphlet study prepared for it by

Dr. John H. G. Pierson of the United States Department of Labor the committee has sketched a national budget calling for a post-war national income of $154,500,000,000, supported by $25,600,000,000 in private-investment expenditures and aggregate governmental spending of $30,400,000,000 a year. Consumer expenditures would be lifted to $129,000,000 a year. The report also proposes the annual public investment of $5,000,000,000 in housing, regional development, and social services. So-called compensatory spending by government would be kept to a minimum.

Perhaps the most interesting report of all in this field is embodied in the letter which Secretary of Commerce Wallace has sent to Senator Wagner. This letter provides a vivid statistical picture of the business man's stake in a full-employment economy. After analyzing the huge business losses of the early thirties, Secretary Wallace urges that "when a business depression gets under way or threatens, we do not complacently permit mass unemployment and business bankruptcy when we have the financial resources to prevent these developments and when we have vast need for public improvements."

This is what S 380 intends to do. It would provide a statement of policy and a flexible framework of legislative action and consultation within which full employment could become a realizable goal.

ENGINE? WHAT ENGINE?

Arrest of "the Six"

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 11

THERE are signs of considerable official unhappiness here over the arrest of the editors of Amerasia, two State Department aides, a young naval officer, and Mark Julius Gayn, a free-lance writer on Far Eastern affairs. Through friendly channels the news was spread this weekend that neither the Department of Justice nor the FBI was enthusiastic about this assignment, and that they acted on orders from above. It is implied that the "above" is the White House. I cannot vouch for the authenticity of this information, but I can for the reliability of the source. The fact that this story was put in circulation is significant, and indicates that law-enforcement officials are queasy about the whole affair. This queasiness is not at all difficult to understand.

The headlines have been very clear, perhaps too clear for the comfort of certain editors: "FBI Nabs Six as Spies," "War Secret Leaks Widespread." But the actual charges as disclosed to the press corps publicly and in off-the-record conferences are very vague; vague enough, for different reasons, to worry both Department of Justice lawyers and Washington correspondents. For although these arrests were made under certain provisions of the Espionage Act of 1917, it has not been alleged that the persons arrested were spies or that they had revealed military secrets or that they were engaged in anything other than the favorite Washington pastime of letting "confidential" information leak out. If this is a crime, all but a hopelessly inefficient minority of Washington's officials and newspapermen ought to be put in jail.

Fortunately it would be very difficult to put them there under the Espionage Act of 1917, which is far from being the equivalent of an Official Secrets Act. The United States has no Official Secrets Act. The only law under which action can be taken for disclosing confidential information is the Espionage Act. But the 1917 act is a law against espionage, not against gossip, and the provision under which these arrests were made refers to the unlawful disclosure of documents "relating to the national defense." It is difficult to imagine this being stretched by a court to cover memoranda discussing the Chinese political situation, much less transcripts of Japanese radio broadcasts and the other miscellaneous stuff, including even newspaper clippings, which circulate in government offices here stamped "restricted," "confidential," "secret," or "top secret," depending on the whim of the official who wields the stamp.

The best exposé of this case is to be found in the transcripts—available at the State Department—of the press conferences held on and off the record to explain the arrests and their purpose. I recommend a reading of these transcripts to members of Congress who are interested. If anyone thinks I exaggerate when I refer to whimsicality in classifying official documents I suggest he reads the question and answer at Friday's press conference on the leak of confidential documents from the State Department to Ernest K. Lindley and Edward Weintal for their article in Harper's for last December. Acting Secretary Grew was asked, in view of the action taken against the six, whether "any investigation was instituted last December to determine the sources of Lindley's and Weintal's information."

This was, in a sense, a foolish question, since there was one difference between the article in Harper's and the articles in Amerasia. The former was defending State Department policy toward Franco, while the latter were criticizing recent State Department policy toward China. The department's top officials are constantly "leaking" to their friends, as the writings of Lindley, Arthur Krock, David Lawrence, Frank Kent, and others bear witness. The department objects only when there are leaks to its critics. Grew explained, in reply to the question about the Lindley-Weintal article, that top officials of the department have authority at any time to declassify, on their own judgment, information from "top secret"—the highest, hush-hush—to open information. He would not answer a question as to how far down this right to declassify extended, but it seems obvious that if documents marked "top secret" can be so easily declassified, many of them must contain nothing that is genuinely related to security, unless it be the security of the State Department from criticism.

Respective of whether the six arrested are innocent or guilty of something or other, State Department officials have said enough and done enough to indicate their purpose in this prosecution. They have exposed some people of decent and honorable record to a cruel and deadly smear in the rightist press in a campaign the purposes of which are (1) to stop leaks to critics of the State Department, (2) to frighten and get rid of younger officials who disagree with the new policy of giving the Kuomintang a blank check against the Chinese Communists, (3) to foment a red scare that must hurt relations with the Soviet Union, and (4) to prepare the public mind for a conditional "unconditional surrender" of Japan.

There is no reason whatever to believe that this is the President's policy, but it is the policy of the reactionary clique in the department headed by Grew. Some of these men in the years before Pearl Harbor were gulled by the "we-must-save-China-from-communism" line of the Japanese and are themselves spreading the same old line again. The consequences may be serious.

A reflection of this kind of thinking is found in Frank Kent's column A Way Out for Japan, published last Friday. Mr. Kent is an able, conservative journalist with excellent contacts in Washington. It is difficult to believe that he would have written as he did on so serious a subject unless he had authority in responsible sources for the views put forward. Mr. Kent said that if the Japanese surrendered they might be able to keep Korea and Formosa. He indicated that he thought we would go easy on Japanese industry. He warned that if the Japanese did not surrender soon, the Russians would be coming into the war, that this would mean a drastic peace for Japan, that the Soviet Union would take Manchuria, and that this would lead to the communization of China. He clearly implied that in this respect the United States and its enemy, Japan, had a common interest against our ally, the Soviet Union. This is the kind of hobgoblin stuff that the Japanese used to hand the American embassy in Tokyo before the war. The State Department seems to be giving it out now.

I believe that the arrest of the six will prove to have been a very rash move on the part of the State Department and the FBI, and that in this case progressive forces have an unusual opportunity to expose and to purge the reactionary clique which continues to dominate the department and the Foreign Service. This is a chance to take the indictment of that clique out of the realm of abstract discussion in the complex field of foreign affairs. If the department drops this case or fails to prove the charges in court, it will stand convicted of a hysterical attack upon its critics in an attempt to prepare the way for a drastic change in our foreign policy. That change can only be brought about in the atmosphere of a red scare so intense as to overcome the lesson taught the American people at Pearl Harbor.

I don't think Grew and Holmes and Dooman and their collaborators of the Scripps-Howard and the Hearst-Patterson-McCormick press will succeed in this plan. To play power politics in the Far East as they propose to play it would cost many American lives. It would cost American lives to encourage the Kuomintang to take more time off from the Japanese war to crush the Chinese reds. It would cost American lives to discourage the Soviet Union from entering the Far Eastern war as our ally. And it would cost American lives in another generation or two if we let the old red bogey deter us from so decisively defeating Japan and so completely transforming Japanese society as to make the rebirth of imperialism there impossible.

In the meantime FBI men have been moving into every department suspected of "leaks" critical of the new trends in official policy toward the Far East. The embassy at Chungking is being purged of men hostile to the anti-Yenan and soft-peace policy. There is good reason to believe that the Kuomintang secret service is cooperating in both Chungking and Washington by providing dossiers on American civilian and military officials suspected of "dangerous thoughts" on Far Eastern policy. I am told in Congressional circles that the Chinese embassy took a hand in the attempt to smear one reputable American official recently with the Civil Service Commission here; the intervention of a Republican Senator forced the commission to lay off. This dangerous drift in Far Eastern policy can only be stopped by the vigorous intervention of the White House and by public pressure on the White House for a shake-up in the Department of State and a full airing of the case against "the six."

The same crowd in Washington that appeased the Japanese before are out to save them now from full defeat, and for much the same reason—the old bulwark-against-you-know-what line.

AMG Plans for Japan

[The letter from which the following excerpts were taken was not intended for publication, but it is so pertinent to the subject discussed by I. F. Stone that we are printing it with the author's permission. His identity must obviously be concealed.]

DEAR SIRS: Being among the officers training for the military government of Japan, I have read the comments of your columnist "Pacifcus" on the Far East with considerable interest. I write now in particular reference to the article in which Eugene Dooman of the State Department was mentioned in a rather disparaging manner. Several of us here who have met and heard Mr. Dooman are in full accord with the opinion of Pacifcus. Incidentally, I wonder if you have noticed the allusions to Dooman in James R. Young's book, "Behind the Rising Sun." These give adequate substantiation to the view you published.

Some of us here have become increasingly aware of the subtle trend our training has been taking. It is much too shortsighted, too exclusively interested in military expediency, and seems extremely one-sided about political matters. For instance, we are told time and again that the Zaibatsu [an opposition group of large industrialists] will be our sincere friends, that they have always opposed the military, and that we as military governors will find it expedient to control the Japanese economy through them. Such men as Kurt Bloch and Dooman have presented that point of view quite strongly. Frankly, I do not go along with them and I have many reasons for not doing so. To work through the Zaibatsu and intrust them with power would be to fall right into a trap being carefully constructed and baited for us. If we do fall, another Pacific war is entirely conceivable—not a cheerful thought! The Zaibatsu have given financial support to the various militaristic organizations. As an indication of the close cooperation between the Zaibatsu and military groups, there is the fact that just prior to the 1936 mutiny of the young army officers, the members of the larger Zaibatsu families were warned to leave Tokyo.

The suggestion of the Institute of Pacific Relations that the leading industrialists of Japan should be considered war criminals has not been officially mentioned to us. In fact, none of the findings of the Institute's Hot Springs conference have been officially discussed. Why? Because they suggested that we turn to certain liberal groups in Japan for political leadership? To judge by what we are told, all the Zaibatsu are anti-militaristic and more or less pro-American and always have been.

Incidentally, you might be interested in this statement made by Mr. Dooman at the school. He was asked what would be the attitude of the United States should the Communists threaten to take power in Japan. His reply was in effect that we would use methods similar to those employed by the British in Greece. I am not an advocate of communism for this country, far from it. However, it might be that some of the men under Okana, the leader of the Japanese Communists outside Japan, would prove invaluable in the move to give birth to a liberal Japan. In any event I fail to see good reason for the United States to meddle.

Hotel Behind the Lines

BY KAY BOYLE

II

WE HAD dinner in the mess-hall, meat and carrots and white American bread, and red Italian wine—the Colonel, the Major, and I. It was the Major who had the jeep waiting at nine in the hotel's moonlit square, and he said goodby to us there. Colonel Sarett, with his cheeks shaven clean and his fresh clothes on, followed me in over the jeep's side and sat down beside me on the boards of the back seat. The doors and the sideflaps were buttoned on, for the night was cool, and our coats were belted around us. The address I gave the corporal at the wheel was not Mario's address; it was the name of the street and the villa where Mario would be.

"He said he would be there with his friend, the newspaperman, tonight," I said to Colonel Sarett, and the jeep took the corner of the square and jerked into the narrow street. "A man called Valdarno," I said. "They can tell me exactly how things are in Italy."

"Who the devil would Mario be?" said the Colonel.

Mario's mother was English, and his father had been Italian; I had known them in Florence eight years ago, I said. There had been an older brother then, a boy called Michele, who had played the mandolin and sung. He was nineteen when I knew him, and very beautiful—a good swimmer, a good runner—and he had gone to boarding-school in England and liked it there.

"What school did he go to?" asked the Colonel in spite of himself.

"That has nothing to do with it," I said in impatience.

"Very well," said the Colonel as we rode, and he drew the skirts of his overcoat around him. "I merely wanted to know."

"They live up on the hill, in the same house still, Mario told me when I telephoned tonight," I said, and I could see it clearly. There were almond and mimosa and olive trees growing fresh on the slope below it, and two little stone-walled terraces baked hard by the sun, with the shade of the cypresses marked sharp and conical, as dark as if drawn in ink, upon the terraces' pure white. "It was in the autumn, early October, of 1937, and the English mother set off for a day or two in Rome. And Michele came to the door, and he was angry, he was in a rage. His mother wrote me all this afterward," I said. "He called out after his mother as she left not to forget to bring him back some tennis shoes from Rome. 'For the damned Fascist relay races—I have to have them for the relay races,' was what he said."

"The night of the day she left, Mario came down into Florence for a concert," I said, "and he left Michele alone in the house. And then he did it."

"He did what?" asked Colonel Sarett, and his voice was a little shocked, as though he knew exactly what was to come.

"He shot himself. He killed himself," I said. "Mario came home from the concert, and there was a letter on the table, with Michele's cameo ring lying on it. The letter just said that he had had trouble finding the gun, and after he'd found it, it was so rusty that he didn't know if it would work. But it did work."

We were out of the city now, and the jeep was moving tentatively along what was no longer street but road, as if feeling its way across the temporary planks of the bridges, and between the moon-blanching walls. Then it came to a stop before a gate.

The house lay close to the road beyond the garden wall, bright white and palace-like under the moon, the substance of it seemingly too lambent for stone. Colonel Sarett rang the bell, and as we waited the trees stood close around us, motionless, fragrant, and mysteriously leafed.

"In another month the nightingales will be singing," Colonel Sarett said. He had taken his cap off, and the moonlight lay in a sharp, metallic blade across his lightish hair. "The presence of a thought," he said in a low voice, "is like the presence of a woman we love. Schopenhauer and the moonlight making me eloquent again," he added in quick apology. Then the door opened, and I saw it was Mario, eight years older, standing hesitant in the dimly lit hall.

"I hope it wasn't too difficult to find the villa," Mario said, and he closed the door behind us. Inside it was colder than it had been outside in the evening air. Mario said that Valdarno was upstairs waiting; he said that if it had not been for the state of Valdarno's health, and the lack of transportation, they would have saved me the trip out and come in to the hotel themselves. "But there are no buses, and no way of getting from one place to another," he said, "and Valdarno is not well."

Mario seemed a shy man, and at first you believed that he was shy, this delicate, slightly stooping figure with the wealth of black hair on his Latin head. You believed it until he began to speak, with his large, dark, fearless eyes on you, and then you knew that it was something more admirable than timidity which marked his bearing and the features of his face.

"Valdarno was imprisoned, you know, because of the articles he wrote," he said, and he lowered his voice a little as we started up the stairs. "A friend has lent this place to Valdarno and his wife," he said. "When Florence was liberated, Valdarno was set free, but he was penniless and he had no house in which to live." At the top of the first cold, echoing flight, he turned to the door on the right of the hall, and laid his hand on the iron latch. "He is extremely eager to meet you," he said before he opened it, and his voice was low. "We want to know what is happening in other countries—in France, America," Mario said, and he turned his head and smiled at us, a quick, gentle, half-apologetic smile.

Valdarno sat alone in the room, seated by a table on which the lamp was lighted and shone dimly, and his wild black eyes were fixed upon the door. When we entered, he stood up, trembling a little, his chest concave behind the façade of the gray tweed jacket, and he shook our hands and spoke our names.

"Sit down, sit down, please," he said. He spoke in English to us, turning in agitation and uncertainty from empty chair to chair. "My wife, unfortunately, is not here. She works at the telephone company at night. Here is a chair, Signora," he said, and he leaned to it, and drew it forward in his trembling hands. "And for the officer—for the Colonel," he murmured, and he was turning like a swift, dark animal from side to side. There was a fine, black, silky mustache under his long, narrow nose, and his lips were thin-skinned and of a red so precarious that it seemed the blood might spring from them if he spoke his words too loud. "For the officer, the large chair here—"

"Please be seated, Signor Valdarno," Colonel Sarett said, and suddenly, at these words, the flurry of movement ceased in the room. Valdarno, his eyes fixed as if in fright on the Colonel, sat slowly down in his chair. Colonel Sarett undid the belt of his trench-coat, unbuttoned it without haste, and drew his arms from the sleeves. "I ask you please to forgive my coming here, Signor Valdarno," he said, and he spoke Italian to him, speaking it softly, and quickly, and well. He was leaning forward as he talked, his elbows on his knees, his fingers interlaced, as if in this bowed position he somehow discounted the breadth and the depth of his own chest as he faced Valdarno, and the display of ribbon on it. "I'm down for a few hours from the front," he said, "and I wish you would go on talking exactly as if I were not here. I came because I wished to be with the Signora, and because it is good to be with men who are not in uniform for a little while."

He had made his explanation, he had offered his apology, and I wondered a moment; and then, as Mario began speaking again, the thing became clear. Not to Valdarno, and not to Mario, and not to himself was Colonel Sarett merely a man come in from the moonlight to sit and hear them talk of their country, or their country's shame, or to speak of their country's future. He was not a man come casually, briefly in of an evening as any visitor might have come. He was something else, and he did not like the role he had been given. He was the Army, he was the British Army; he wore its uniform, he wore its honors pinned on his breast, and nothing could take the look of it away. To them, and even to himself sitting there in the badly lighted, the unheated room, he was the Army with its ear to the ground for the subterranean whispers; the Army with its machine-guns leveled; the Army prepared to wipe out the weak and the hungry and the desperate as they came.

"We can talk of nothing but Roatta's escape," Mario was saying, quietly, evenly, as if with intention. "We can think of nothing else just now—I suppose because of the symbol it offers, the play within the play. The proceedings of Roatta's trial would have stripped the story of all but its essential drama and made it simple enough for everyone to have understood. The story, I mean," he said quietly, "of the criminal policies which ravaged this country for more than twenty years and brought her to disaster. We could have enacted in that trial—the courtroom as stage, the people of the world as spectators, and all the players perfectly cast—the history of our shame and our atonement."

"It's been a match set to tinder, that rotter getting out," said Colonel Sarett. "Demonstrations in Rome, students marching in protest—" The kind of conflagration, said the silence when he had ceased to speak, that we British have extinguished with such generous mercy; and as his voice broke off, the Colonel chewed nervously at his mustache an instant.

"Our government," Mario went on saying, "has created the climate for evasion. The accomplices in Roatta's flight are men who are still in high places, and who feared the revelations he would make—"

And Hush, said the furtive silence in Valdarno's face, bush, bush now, Mario. These things are true, they are all true, but before the British uniform they cannot be said. And Colonel Sarett sat, leaning forward, his fingers interlaced, his eyes on Mario.

"The farce we are enacting here in Italy—the farce, instead of serious, responsible theater," Mario was saying, "the monstrous farce of purging ourselves clean! Do you know how many public figures southern Italy has executed?" he said, and he looked at us, half-smiling. "One, precisely one," he said, and he lifted the forefinger of his right hand. "Free Italy has executed one man of all those accused of specific crimes committed at a specific time. At his trial Roatta, former Italian Chief of Staff, head of the Military Intelligence Office, one of the most iniquitous and murderous organizations in the world, Lieutenant General Roatta testified that he had organized two Fascist brigades called the Black Arrows and the Blue Arrows to support Franco, but declared that he himself was neither Fascist nor anti-Fascist but an Italian general who obeyed his government whatever its color might be. He said that he had once helped many Polish soldiers and more than five thousand Jews who were wanted by the Nazis. Do you see how they are going to try to save their skins?" said Mario. "Now if our slate is to be sponged clean," he said, and his clear, dark, sober eyes were on me, "then one must begin at the top and wash down the slate, as we did when we were school children. Thus, we should begin with the King—only, of course, that is absolutely unheard of. Too many Englishmen like our King—they are really devoted to our King. So, obviously, we cannot begin at all."

Hush, said the unspoken anguish in Valdarno's face. Do not bare yourself like this before him. Do not betray us all into his hands. "And the King," Mario went on, "recognizing himself in private as the perfect representation of our public treason and shame, hastily retired, hoping that if he got out of sight quickly enough the Italian people would not have the time to get a really good look at what he was. He decided, our little King, he decided very quaintly and humanly that it would be very silly indeed to execute himself, and probably quite unnecessary," Mario said, and then, abruptly, he ceased speaking, and the humor was gone, and only the bitterness was left to pull at the corners of his young mouth. To execute himself, said the silence; to execute himself, and Mario sat motionless, and he stared straight at the floor. And it might have been that the figure of Michele lay there on the boards, in the little lake of blood as he had found him eight years before—lay there, eternally nineteen, eternally silent, the voice no longer impatiently asking, for tennis shoes for the Fascist relay races, and the pistol lying near his hand.

"You know, here in Italy a great many good and brave people have died," Mario said. "They died," he said, "and their lives and their deaths have become the words of a kind of vocabulary of violence for us, and now there is no other vocabulary that men of honor can use—"

And Hush, do not say it so loudly, said Valdarno's eyes as they moved in trepidation from Mario's to the Colonel's face. We have come through prison, starvation, through torture for it. Do not give it all away to him now, do not lay your heart in his hand.

"We speak the same language," Colonel Sarett said, and because of the modest sound of petition in what he said, it might have been he who wore the thin-soled, ancient shoes and the shabby coat. Allow me, he did not add, to address you not as a unit, but as a man. Overlook the khaki and tin and the record, his humility asked of them, but he did not say the words aloud.

"And yet one would scarcely say that it was English," said Mario bitterly. "Roatta's escape was a match set to tinder, as you said—Fascist riots in prison, buses turned over and burned. The police have been denying ever since the alleged mass escapes from the Soriano del Cimino and the Vierbo prison, and when a situation comes to the point of denials, it means that something is about to happen. It will have to happen—it will have to happen in spite of the English and because of the English, in order to save Italy from the fate of Greece—"

Hush, for God's sake, keep quiet, said Valdarno's agitated silence, and he turned one more look of desperation on Mario. Then he leaned toward me and spoke a few low, hurried words across the light. "And France?" he said. "In France how is the épuration going?"

I said there were trials, sentences passed, executions every week: prefects, mayors, journalists—the little men. The big men in France had not yet been touched—the industrialists were still to be taken into custody. And as I spoke, Valdarno watched the shape of the words on my lips and shaped them in silence with his own; watching eagerly, harking, waiting for the small, faint sound of promise or hope that might be in them, as a famished man might wait at a table for what crumbs of sustenance might fall.

"Puysegur has been condemned to death," I said. "Stéphane Lauzanne has been given twenty years' hard labor. General Pinsard escaped capital punishment. No one quite knows why. Two of Mandel's murderers are to be executed—"

It was like a bar of music begun, the notes struck separately, precisely, but not completed, and as I ceased speaking, the rest of the tune hung curiously unplayed between us on the air. They ask for purity, the young men of Europe, I thought; they ask for the épuration of their countries and their souls.

Valdarno leaned one emaciated arm in the gray tweed jacket on the table beneath the light, and his long, fleshless fingers tapped quickly, nervously on the wood.

"Signora, we are not like the French," he said in a low voice, looking as if in entreaty at me. "We are less spirited, humbler, and we have been cripples for a quarter of a century now. We have been very ill," he said, and his bright red lips were trembling with intensity. "We still are not quite able to get up from bed and make our way across the room to the window where we know the light and air must be, Signora," he said, "we are just beginning to get well again, we are just learning now to get our pride back, but we are still unsteady when we try to stand alone. We need you, you Americans. Do not leave us yet. We need you until we can learn to do the mere physical things, like eating and drinking, for ourselves again. Signora," he said, and the wounds were there, unhealed still, the avowal of their pain marked in his eyes. "Do not leave us, you Americans. Do not leave us for a little while—"

"Blast it, there's no need to ask favors of any of us," Colonel Sarett cried out, and he jumped up from his chair. "The number of patriots fighting the Germans in northern Italy is twice that of the Italian regular army troops." He turned back and forth, impatient now with inaction, back and forth across the floor. "I tell you I've got an army up there on the front, an army that is fighting, damn it, bearing arms and fighting. We have camps set up where we're reclothing, re-equipping them as fast as they come. I'm talking of Italians, Italian partisans," he cried out. "They've established their own airfields at Cuneo and Pinerolo—behind the enemy lines. That's a resistance movement for you. More than two hundred and fifty thousand of them dead, resisting—"

"My sister and brother died with them," Valdarno said, and his pale hand on the table trembled, and the lamp's light shone dimly on his bloodless nails.

"Look here, Signor," said Colonel Sarett, and his voice was quieter now. He sat down on the chair again before Valdarno, leaning forward, the singular fire and vision in his eye. "There's a question on the boards now about a batch of Italian POW's interned down south. I want to get them, give them a battlefield, make men out of them," he said.

"What kind of men?" asked Valdarno, and his black, desperate eyes were halted as if in fear on the Colonel.

"Men," said the Colonel impatiently. "Men taking their part in this bloody show. Thirty thousand of them," he said, and he leaned forward, watching Valdarno eagerly. "I'm going to try through channels to get hold of them, fit them out, march them up here into the mountains with me—"

"And when the war is finished," said Mario's bitter voice; "when the north of Italy is liberated and they and the other free men come marching down on Rome to protest our decadent government, will British machine-guns be turned on them as they were turned on the people of Greece?"

"If they turn their blasted machine-guns on the partisans," said Colonel Sarett, and he had got to his feet again, "then they'll turn them on me as well, for I'll be marching with them. Out of thirty thousand," he went back to it as he paced in the room, "we can count on a third of them at least being rebels, and that leaves two-thirds of them fools, but rebels are far more eloquent than fools, and they'll do the job, a smashing job," he said.

"What job?" asked Valdarno, and his voice was cautious, and his eye was on the Colonel warily.

"The job of saving a country, blast it. This country, Italy," the Colonel cried out, and when I looked at Valdarno, I saw that the thing had happened to him: he had dropped his head forward on his hand, and the tears were running down his face.

[The first part of Miss Boyle's story was printed in last week's issue.]

Why Germany Lost

BY MAJOR H. A. DEWEERD

IT IS still too early to derive more than first impressions from the German military collapse. Yet the defeat and disintegration of what was once the strongest army in the world provoke speculation as to the causes of its ignominious and disorderly end. British and American troops have fought the German army for a number of years, and certain tentative conclusions may be drawn from their experience. Our joint operations leading to the German defeat in the west will go down in history as among the greatest military achievements of all time. Yet, in the nature of things, we could not have succeeded without the magnificent accomplishments of our Russian allies. From 1941 to 1945 the Red Army battled against the main military forces of the European Axis. In nearly four years of sanguinary fighting, to use the words of Churchill, "it tore the guts out of the German army." We shall do well to remember these things in any discussion of the Anglo-American triumph in the west.

The basic causes for the German defeat were alike in the east and the west. A strategy of over-extension arising from the political dynamism of the Nazi movement and the vagaries of the Führer's leadership progressively reduced the strength of the German military position from June, 1941, on. Before the attack on Russia Germany was in an unassailable military position on the European continent and had to all intents and purposes won the Second World War. Under no conceivable circumstances could Britain alone defeat both Germany and Italy. Yet Hitler had no program or equipment for crossing the twenty-mile tank trap of the Channel. When Britain continued the war and Hitler blundered into a life-and-death struggle against Russia, the basic unity of Germany's strategic doctrine was shattered. Heretofore the Reich had aimed at the military annihilation of its enemies. After June 21, 1941, it followed a divided strategic plan—of annihilation, against Russia; of attrition, against Britain.

Hitler's mad gamble which plunged Germany in 1941 into war with the two strongest industrial and military powers in the world, Soviet Russia and the United States of America, sealed the doom of Germany. Sober German military leaders had repeatedly warned against such madness. Writing of the German defeat in 1918, General Hans von Seeckt, creator of the Reichswehr, pointed to "the graves of countless thousands of German soldiers far from home which stood as solemn witnesses against those who [in 1914-18] had attempted to raise German might beyond human limits and had ended by destroying the very foundations of Germany's strength." Ludendorff staked the future of the German Empire on the chance that the mighty military potential of the United States could be kept from the battlefields of Europe by a relatively simple mechanical device—the U-boat. Hitler, after all his boasting about avoiding the mistakes of 1917-18, repeated this fatal error in 1941.

In the political field the Nazi concept of a "New Order" underlay the effort first to conquer and then to hold the whole continent of Europe from North Cape to Crete and from the Volga to the Pyrenees. A leadership less concerned with ideological ends would have been freer to admit occasional failures and to trim its program. But the Nazis had to keep on expanding or admit that the mainspring of their revolution had run down.

From the military standpoint the program of Nazi expansion seemed to offer certain immediate if temporary advantages. It appeared possible in 1941-43 for Germany to pillage all of Europe's resources and dragoon its people into forced labor. To the Nazi mind this promised to offset Russian and American superiority in the field of military production. In addition, it was attractive as the most colossal program of outright robbery in the world's history.

In the realm of human relationships the Nazis' arrogance and cruelty contributed to the temporary nature of their control over Europe. In three years of triumphant dealing with conquered peoples and with their own allies the Germans did not make a single trustworthy friend. In the end every ally turned its arms against the Third Reich. Not a single subject people was won over. The Nazi record is one of psychological stupidity, savagery, and bad faith unequalled in the annals of war. Nations have seldom been defeated in the past without winning the sympathy of outside peoples, as in the case of France in 1871 and 1940. Germany's downfall in 1945 was the occasion of rejoicing everywhere—except in Tokyo.

In 1941 Germany possessed the strongest single armed force in the world. Its armored divisions, tactical air force, and infantry divisions were so superior to any western army that the German people's conviction of its invincibility was shared by a good many military commentators and critics outside the Reich. In defeating Poland and France the Third Reich had triumphed over two nations possessing armies of the 1918 vintage. In doing so it revealed the pattern of its war effort and showed the world what was necessary in order to defeat it. Britain, Russia, and the United States actually learned more from the defeat of Poland and France than Germany did, for the latter did not alter its war pattern or appreciably increase the scale of its war effort until 1943. Then it was too late. By that time Germany had lost so much ground in relation to the developing war effort and technique of the United Nations that it was never able to attain a status of equality in the air or on the ground.

In the realm of military leadership the supreme mistake made by Hitler in attacking Russia was to assume that the methods and equipment which won against weak opponents in the limited-area warfare in the west would be sufficient to destroy the Soviet Union in a war of great spaces. A second major mistake was made by Hitler when, in the face of his repulse before Moscow in December, 1941, and the terrible winter of 1941-42, he thought that he could still win the war against Russia in the next campaign with the same weapons and methods that had failed in 1941. Like the military leaders of 1914-18, whose narrow professionalism he had often ridiculed, Hitler called for more men and more weapons but not for new ideas, new war methods, or a revolutionary intensification of the national war effort. An often overlooked but most important fact about the German defeat is that the Third Reich went down to disaster from 1941 to 1945 without making really sweeping changes in its war methods or equipment. Buzz-bombs and jet aircraft turned out to be mere window trimming in the undertaker's parlor. Germany was never able to raise the level of its war effort to a point where it met the approximate needs of the situation.

Perhaps one deterrent to a future revival of authoritarian regimes in Europe will be the gradually increasing consternation with which the war-weary and defeated Germans will learn the truth about the incompetence of their vaunted leaders. It was an incompetence whose evil effects could not be offset by the fanatical bravery of German troops, the ox-like tenacity of bomb-harassed civilians, or the admitted brilliance of the German minor military leadership.

When Hitler relieved Field Marshal Walther von Brauchitsch and assumed personal command as Feldherr of the Third Reich on December 21, 1941, the evils of military dilettantism were extended from the strategic to the tactical level. In the face of the Red Army's winter counter-offensive, Hitler tossed out of the window time-tested German military doctrines and introduced a military novelty which proved characteristic of all German campaigns after that time. He adopted a policy of allowing German units to be encircled and cut off by Russian troops and of ordering them to fight on until relieved. He may have received his first inspiration from the Russians, whose encircled or by-passed units fought on till they made contact with partisan forces. This new tactic was given the awkward name of sich einigeln—to "hedgehog oneself in"—by Hitler himself. Later the term Einkesselung came to be used. In terms of battlefield events, the tactic meant that a large German force at Kholm under General Scherer and the entire German Second Corps at Valdai under General Brockdorff were ordered to kesseln themselves in during the winter of 1941-42 and wait for a German relief offensive in the spring. As fate would have it, Hitler's first attempt to put this plan in practice was a partial success. The hedgehogs at Kholm and Valdai, in the north, were relieved in the spring of 1942, although at heavy cost. Strategically the experiment was not worth the effort because the only major German offensive in 1942 took place on the southern front toward Stalingrad. From the standpoint of national morale and prestige the tactic paid temporary dividends, but these led to fatal repetitions of the experiment. Kholm and Valdai were followed by Kessels at Stalingrad, the Kuban bridgehead, the Channel ports, Crete, Norway, and the Ruhr.

In the end we witnessed the ridiculous military spectacle of German forces resisting at such distant points as Crete and Jersey while the German homeland was being overrun by Russian and Allied forces. Whole armies were sacrificed to defend areas unessential to the main military effectiveness of the Reich. Amateur strategy could not, even by the wildest torture of the imagination, conjure up a situation more at variance with sound conduct or principles of war. The Götterdämmerung of death and destruction deliberately inflicted upon the German homeland by the Nazis through these methods is meaningful only in ideological terms. From a military standpoint it was madness.

History will undoubtedly show that the Nazi regime, which prided itself on speed in getting things done, lost the war by the slowness with which it responded to the changed military situation after 1942. The Nazi high command did not in fact begin the total mobilization of German manpower or industry until after the Stalingrad disaster of 1943. The order of battle of the German army from that time on shows many signs of hasty improvisation and reveals a frantic effort to turn non-Germans into Wehrmacht and S. S. troops. Preoccupation with Nazi Party interests led to favoritism in handling Waffen S. S. units as compared to the regular Wehrmacht. Thus the basic unity of the German war machine was undermined just as it met its first really great tests.

Germany's gross underestimation of the war production and military efficiency of the United Nations is revealed in every phase of the war from 1943 on. The Luftwaffe program in particular showed that the German high command failed to anticipate the speed at which the Allied air forces were to develop. Proof of this is seen in the retention of obsolescent plane types in the German service up to the last and the attempt to integrate these ancient crates into a program which also included super-fast jet planes. Jet planes, V-bombs, and rockets were no substitute for real air power.

We used to hear a good deal of ill-advised talk about the Luftwaffe as the ideal air force. While the German armies were conquering Poland and France, it was fashionable for air-power writers to base their pleas for a separate air force on the fact that the Luftwaffe was such an arm; since the Germans were winning, we should imitate it. At the risk of being repetitious it may be helpful to emphasize once more that the Luftwaffe was essentially a tactical air force and was organized and operated as such. When it was opposed by qualitatively superior Allied tactical and strategic air forces, it was doomed. It could protect neither German industry nor its own bases from destructive attack. The eventual defeat of Germany in the west was foreshadowed in June, 1944, when the Luftwaffe could not provide enough reconnaissance to warn the German high command where the invasion of France would take place. The long lines of Allied transports and landing craft crowding the narrow seas between Britain and the Cotentin Peninsula on June 5-6, 1944, provided a target beyond a bomber-force commander's wildest dreams. Yet these ships went about their business almost without interference from the German air force.

As they were too late in mobilizing their man-power and industry, the Nazis were too late in putting underground enough key aircraft plants properly to defend the Reich or to allow their armies to fight a war of movement on approximately equal terms with the Western allies. They were too late in preparing the Atlantic Wall, despite all the efforts of the German Propaganda Ministry to publicize it as an impenetrable barrier. When we landed on the Cotentin Peninsula, the beach obstacles were not completed, batteries earmarked for this area were not all mounted, and the defenses were in such limited depth that once the beaches were passed, terrain features provided the only defensible lines.

In any analysis of the causes of the German defeat some mention should be made of the really marvelous aptitude of the Nazi regime for thinking up military gadgets, trick weapons, and for relying on them to produce a decision when only orthodox military measures could bring success. Besides contributing in a very great way to their ultimate defeat by using up German resources that could ill be spared, this program provided almost endless opportunities for certain military critics to hold forth harmlessly on the alleged backwardness of American military equipment.

This gadget-making program—this military get-rich-quick legerdemain—produced an astonishing array of mechanical doodle-bugs, flying bombs, piggy-back aircraft, and stratosphere whizz-bangs, but it did not avert the German defeat. It was often very painful and in some cases made matters militarily awkward for the Allies, but it could not tip the scales in favor of the Nazis in 1944-45. In saying this I do not imply that long-range rocket weapons may not profoundly affect the nature of war in the future but simply point out what every military student knows—namely, that few if any weapons produce decisive results in their experimental phases.

Once the Allied armies were firmly ashore on the European continent the real battle in the west began. Because the German high command could not envisage the engineering resources and skill which enabled us to land and supply advancing armies over open beaches, and because in the face of our air supremacy it could not move its men and machines with a speed equal to ours, it could not fight on equal terms once we were landed. When the German armies in the west came into contact with the Anglo-American forces, they were inferior in over-all military efficiency—and they were defeated. True, they possessed tanks with wider treads and heavier armor than any Allied tanks in operation at that time, but they lost the battles of Normandy, the battles of France, the battles of the West Wall, the battles of the Rhine, and the battles of Germany. After surrendering himself to the United States Ninth Army on April 25, Lieutenant General Kurt Dittmar, radio spokesman for the Nazi high command, admitted that "the Third Reich had lost the war militarily when it failed to stop the Normandy invasion."

Having captured the headquarters records of the German Seventh Army in France, we now know how great the inferiority of the Germany army was. It could not move its armored forces on anything like the schedules set; its communications were disrupted; its units were isolated; and its general management was hampered by the ignorance of true conditions under which all officers operated—from the youngest lieutenant to Hitler himself. It could not bridge streams, string communication wires, exploit an opportunity as quickly as the Allied armies. It could not feed its own men, care for its wounded, or supply its forces as well as we could. In brief, it could not do the things which the Allied armies could do—and that is the payoff in war.

For a time in late December, 1944, and early January, 1945, the progress of Rundstedt's surprise offensive in the Ardennes seemed to belie these statements. Yet this attack was a prestige- and time-gaining affair which cost the Nazis more than it was worth. At best it delayed the ultimate fate of the Reich by only sixty days. When that offensive was stopped, the Allied armies began to advance, fought their way through the West Wall, the Saar, the Palatinate, and without pause crossed the Rhine and sprang the biggest trap in history around some 400,000 German troops in the Ruhr. Thereafter the Allied armies progressively cut the German army and the Reich into pieces. These were military achievements of the highest order.

The utter moral rottenness of the Nazi regime and the army was revealed in the craven surrenders of German officers—in many cases after ordering their men to resist to the death—and in the concentration- and prisoner-camp horrors which the army permitted to exist and in some cases controlled. In its defeat and disgrace the German army reaffirmed the ancient truth that the greatness of an army lies in the moral foundations upon which it is built.

In the Wind

PAT M. NEFF, president of Baylor University, Waco, Texas, thus addressed the graduating class at commencement exercises May 29, as quoted in the Houston Chronicle: "Baylor University has been a narrow-minded institution for 100 years, and as long as I'm connected with Baylor it will remain a narrow-minded institution. . . . I want to assure the trustees . . . that Baylor is stepping into its second century with no 'isms.' . . . If anything is a threat today, it's broad-mindedness."

LAWRENCE C. SALTER has resigned as director of public relations for the American Medical Association and organized his own public-relations firm. One of his partners is William Fishbein, brother of Dr. Morris Fishbein, editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association.

DR. ROBERT F. GÁLBRAITH, president of Westminster College, New Wilmington, Pennsylvania, offered this advice to students now in the armed forces, in the May 18 issue of the Holcad, student newspaper: "We will continue to register sweet, beautiful young women and decent, gentlemanly men. But they will not look the same to you when you come again. You have truly 'grown up' since you walked the paths at Westminster. You have experienced much. Students will have experienced nothing beyond the little routine of college life. . . . So when you come again . . . won't you come understanding the difference you will find? . . . After all, isn't it better to have our girls sweet and fine and not even aware what life can be like? I feel it is."

PUT YOUR MIND AT REST. This is the economic future forecast by the United States News of June 1: "Worry about economic problems can be postponed beyond this term, even beyond the next White House term. There may be only a few big problems. Cotton will be one. We tell you of that on page 13. Another will relate to social security and unemployment. Plans in that field are explained on page 15."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

PARIS REGAINED

BY CYRIL CONNOLLY

III

LEAVING honey-tongued Eluard, splenetic Aragon, and the politico-literary staffs of Lettres Françaises, Action, Liberté, Carrefour, Combat, Front National, and many other bellicose and brilliant newspapers to take care of the French resistance, let us explore some of the quieter corners of the battlefield.

We might do worse than pay a visit to the Café de Flore. This pleasant haunt has now become a kind of literary bourse. The brokers are the editors who sit round with their sommaires or contents page of the new magazine they are going to bring out (when they can get the paper!), and these sommaires, which are handed round and discussed like a V-Day menu, are the curb prices of literary reputations. Each  sommaire contains the same names, and many of the writers are in attendance. That excitable southern figure is Pierre Seghers, of Villeneuve-les-Avignon, whose magazine Poésie was the best of the occupational monthlies and famous for its equivocal anti-German and anti-Vichy contents. Seghers is the leader of a group of young poets and one of the bravest of them. With him is André Fréneaud, a solid young Burgundian whose French has almost an English accent and who was a prisoner of war before joining the resistance, and Loys Massan, one of the youngest and most gifted of the group. They are joined by Bertelé of Confluences, a magazine edited at Lyon and suppressed by Vichy, which has also published some interesting books. His sommaire includes a new poem by Michaux and part of a long philosophical study of Baudelaire's dandyism which Sartre is preparing. Sartre is absent from his favorite table, though generally he remains there most of the day, but his friend Mme de Beauvoir—herself the author of a novel, "L'Invitée," about the whole ambience of the Flore—will show you his sommaire for the new magazine he is going to edit, which will have a sociological and political as well as a literary character, like Dwight Macdonald's Politics. Koestler and Orwell are the writers about whom she asks for information. Sartre occupies a dominating position in the world of French literature today. He is to its prose what Eluard is to its poetry. It is a position which is criticized, for his philosophy is most obscure, and there is something Central European about his pessimistic thought which antagonizes. But taken as a philosopher, a novelist, a dramatist, and a critic, his bulk is enormous, and tends to obscure perhaps the younger and equally gifted Camus, also all of these four things and editor as well of the newspaper Combat. "Les Mouches" and "Huis Clos" of Sartre, "L'Etranger" and "Caligula" of Camus ("Le Malentendu" is a little too much) are real literary achievements, fascinating to read, deeply original and stimulating.

At another table is Max-Pol Fouchet, the gay young inspirer of Fontaine, discussing his sommaire with Pierre Emmanuel. Like Sartre a professor of philosophy, Emmanuel, who is a non-stop talker and arguer, commands several media, but unlike Sartre, he is a strong Catholic and a great admirer of Jouve. They are joined by Jean Lescure, a saturnine and gifted poet who edits both the poetry on the French wireless and also an admirable magazine, Messager, which is the best of the poetry productions, though lacking the important chroniques aspect of the monthly Poésie. At another table is Thierry Maulnier, whose quarterly La Table Ronde is a model of expensive printing and rivals the magnificent Arbalète, which is edited, printed, and published by one man, Marc Barbezat of Lyon. La Table Ronde includes some of the last writings and drawings of Max Jacob, whose terrible death in a concentration camp, wearing the Jew's yellow star, shocked the whole civilized world. It also includes a very long poem by Cocteau, "Léone," whose verse the Master describes as "marchant à pneu crevé," like a car on three wheels. It is a strange limping, somnambulant poem in which all the imagery from his other works parades past him in a waking dream, with Léone elusively personifying his muse. Cocteau you will not see at the Flore, but that smiling and somewhat rough-looking character is Jean Genet, whom Cocteau befriended, and who is the author of the extraordinary "Notre Dame des Fleurs," part of which is published in the eighth number of the Arbalète. Jean Genet, who has been in and out of prison most of his life, has managed to produce a novel which makes "Voyage au bout de la nuit," "Tropic of Cancer," and all stories of the milieu and the underworld read like Orphan Annie. It is a passionate, lyrical, and criminal book, and reminds one of those photographs of murderers with a huge fatalitas tattooed across their chest. It is the last word in the poetry of homosexual, anti-social outlaws, because the society against which Genet rebels is an unhealthy one, and because he happens to have been born a poet.

But now it is time to leave the Flore, to pay for our jus de raisin, viandox, or beer. There are still several sommaires we haven't seen—that of the charming anthologist Parisot, with his new magazine Quatre Venis and his Vrilles—and still several more writers we would like to meet: the fantastical poet Prévert, "ah, il est marron, lui," and the more somber Georges Bataille, the post-Nietzschean essayist and one-time editor of the extraordinary Acéphale. And it would not be a long walk to call on Picasso in that high studio where the world's last great alchemist turns our dross into gold, or to visit the apartment where his friend Henri Michaux, a somewhat sadistic magician, applies his verbal technique to a general Chinese slicing operation on the bourgeois personality. Or to linger in the sacred rue de l'Odéon, where those two bilingual sirens who have so long enchanted us with all that is best in two literatures, Sylvia Beach and Adrienne Monnier, still decoy. But time is short, we have a last date with Gallimard in his magnificent new office, once Talleyrand's hotel. Here is one more group of non-political literary explorers, who have come to visit Paulhan (he has a sommaire, too, for he is soon to get back the N. R. F.).

Paulhan, like Eluard, Sartre, and Michaux, is another prince in the world of letters, an impassioned critic of poetry and painting whose quiet high voice, like Lytton Strachey's, can strike terror, especially when it strikes at terrorists. (His "Fleur de Tarbes, ou la Terreur dans les lettres," is a brilliant attack on the Puritans and anti-literary philosophical pedants who would banish from literature the graces which they neither possess nor comprehend.) Paulhan, a pillar of the resistance movement, is deploring the bad effects on literature of coming into the open again. Art benefits by being clandestine and subversive, he is saying; all writers write best under another name. With him is Francis Ponge, the creator of an extraordinary kind of prose poem, both lyrical and scientific in its approach, which results in a three-dimensional picture of his usually very tangible subject. Pebbles, insects, bits of bread are his specialties. He is, in fact, a word painter of verbal still lives who has been through cubism, a prose Braque. They are joined by Raymond Queneau, also of the N. R. F., a vigorous and many-sided satirist, novelist, poet who, besides editing a new edition of "Bouvard et Pécuchet" and thus lighting the only candle in Paris to the greatest of provincials, contributes poems of a strong verbal dexterity to Messages. His "Trains dans la banlieue ouest" is a tour de force like MacNeice's "Bagpipes":

Nanterre et Rueil qui donc arruile
Qui donc arruile les roseaux qui donc enterre qui donc anteille
larmes mucus odeurs et os

Suresne' Asnière' on va-t-et-vient le long du fleuve aux bois méandres trainent les pierres trissent les chiens sur des sentiers à la chair tendre . . .

It is a pleasure to talk to the husky Queneau and to discuss his fascinating and destructive "Exercices de style"—for he speaks English well and the others merely read it. But we are now quite tired out and must trudge through the blue snow to the Métro, laden with presentation copies which the English customs officers at Newhaven will thumb and snivel over like dogs growling round a stale herring. "This is a funny kind of a book—Pie-Kasso—do you mind just coming with me?" And then in an awestruck whisper to his superior, "It's his books, sir, kind of funny if you see."

And still I have mentioned only a fraction of the literary world of Paris. I would like to be able to analyze the exhilaration which for eight weeks after leaving Paris I continued to feel, and the absence of which I now deplore. It was partly a sense of liberation, of getting out of the exhausted London atmosphere into a country where the war was felt to be over, and where individuals were their natural size, neither inflated with office nor shrunk with worry. It was partly returning to a world of ideas. For the English literary world is not a world of ideas but of personalities, a world of clubs and honors and ancestor-worship and engagement books, where a writer one wants to meet has to be hunted for several weeks until he is finally corralled at bay under some formidable mantelpiece. But French writers are not pompous; in everything but ideas they travel light; intelligence flows through them like a fast river and is not always being silted up by accretions of the personality, by sales, honors, habits, social and official positions. On the whole, the present literary world of Paris is young and poor, and its experiences in the resistance have made it both generous and brave. I think if I were to sum up its message in the way in which nearly every English visitor has felt it, it would be something like this: "Don't worry. It's all right. Everything you love is still here. The ideas, buildings, books, and pictures, the wine, the people, the trees. And they won't run away. Art and life are beginning again." The European orchestra is tuning up, and its members are as pleased to see us as we are to be with them; the freemasonry of the intellect is at work, and a new humanism is being born. For what our world now most needs is a positive and adult humanism. America could give it but is too money-bound and machine-dry; Russia lacks the sentiment of individual liberty; England is too bureaucratized and war weary. We have added the adjective "bloody-minded" to our language, and must rest our laurels on that. But France has known the tyrant, and been set free before the knowledge destroyed it. France alone, if it can survive an acute attack of nationalism, is capable of a bloodless 1789, of a new proclamation to the world of the old truths that life is meant to be lived and that liberty is its natural temperature, that brains are to be used and beauty to be worshiped, and that human beings, the only animals who can laugh, are intended to be happy.

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

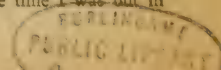

GEORGE W. NORRIS, whose autobiography has recently been published under the title "Fighting Liberal" (Macmillan, $3.50), grew up in "Plainville, U. S. A." in what were still pretty early days. His father and mother and three of their twelve children had come by wagon from New York State in 1846 to settle in Ohio, where George Norris was born in 1861. Like most farm families the Norrises worked from daylight to sundown in order to make a meager living from the land. When Norris was three, his father died. His oldest brother had fallen in the Civil War. No wonder his mother, who managed to keep farm and family going, is the heroine of George Norris's book.

Norris's parents differed from their neighbors in only one important respect. Both of them, and particularly his mother, believed in education, for boys and girls alike, that went beyond the three R's.

. . . most of these pioneer people clung to the belief that the labor of their children on the farms was infinitely more important than the study of higher mathematics or grammar. There were none more poor, and none needing labor more than my mother, but she insisted I study as extensively as the facilities permitted. Only three—Willis and Jesse Vickery and I—completed the course in grammar.

Norris not only completed the course in grammar. He managed to graduate from a private school which later became Valparaiso University.

Only once was I able to continue through an entire year. Every other year I had to stop school in order to raise money, so that at least half the time I was out in the field at work.

He also taught school during some of the intervals between his attendances at college and in the years of trial and error before he moved from Ohio to Nebraska and opened a law office "south of the square" in Beaver City.

The young lawyer was soon drawn into politics. He had been a passionate Republican at fifteen—that was the faith of his parents. In his teens he had belonged to the local debating society in Mount Carmel, Ohio, and he had continued to debate at Valparaiso.

The debates in Mount Carmel had been wide in range. Senator Norris tells us that on one occasion he had proposed the question: "Resolved, There is more pleasure in living with a neat, cross woman than with a good-natured, slouchy woman." He found that he alone was willing to defend the slouchy woman. The house was packed—and Norris won. On another occasion the question was: "Resolved, That man is a free moral agent." "I was curious then," writes Norris, "concerning the independence of the individual to serve himself and fulfil his responsibilities to his fellow-men." It remained a central question, and Norris's career is, I think, as clear and true an answer as one is likely to find.

Nebraska, when Norris settled there, was Populist. But Norris remained a staunch and even bitter Republican, though he obviously was influenced by the Populist temper. In spite of his party affiliation he was elected within a few years to the office of district judge—by a majority of two. After seven years as judge he was sent to Congress—in 1903. And he entered the national scene still convinced that his party was above reproach and the only one capable of providing good government.

Shortly afterward he began to see that he was mistaken; and the crucial thing is that having seen the truth he accepted it. He did not temper his organic principles to the functional wind. The sophistry of "party loyalty" was beyond him. He soon discovered, moreover, that there was nothing to choose between the two party machines and the powers behind them. He remained in the Republican Party, but he pursued an independent course.

Senator Norris's autobiography contains detailed and instructive accounts of his stubborn, long-drawn-out battles—against Joe Cannon, for the lame-duck amendment, for the anti-injunction law, for the TVA. The greatest of these was the TVA.

To the man from Mars it might seem paradoxical that this man from Plainville, this son of the frontier, this rank individualist, should have become the sponsor of the Tennessee Valley Authority, our most ambitious and successful venture in government financing and regulation, public ownership, and planning. Norris was a man of principle, not of theory. The TVA in his mind "just grew" out of what seemed to him the simple and sensible idea of preventing disastrous floods and saving the homes and livelihood of people in the river valleys. The interesting, indeed the exciting, thing about Norris and the TVA is the readiness with which he accepted all the implications of his simple homespun idea.

Norris and the TVA offer a resounding answer, straight from Plainville, to the well-worn myth that public ownership and long-range planning are alien to "the American way." But the answer contains a lesson for planners as well as for the N. A. M. From the beginning the emphasis, in Norris's thinking, was not on planning as an abstract good for the welfare of the abstract state but on the day-by-day interests of the specific and very real human beings who lived in the valley. The TVA has been remarkably successful as an example of regional planning. From everything I have heard of it, it has also been remarkably successful in imparting new reality to the long-abused and ruthlessly exploited but still valid concepts of self-government, private initiative, and the democratic process.

Senator Norris's autobiography is awkwardly written and haphazardly organized, but it is very much worth reading nevertheless. His nostalgic story of his childhood and his simple direct expression of his love of nature, of farm lands and of seasons, are very touching. His personality, as it is revealed in his book, has the quality of a "sweet" spring, and the same self-renewing force. There is no trace of the bitterness either of self-righteousness or of vindictiveness. He hated the evil human beings do; but his attitude, even toward the human beings he fought to a standstill when a principle was involved, was quite devoid of personal rancor. By those who obey the order of the day, "Hate thine enemy," Norris's magnanimity may seem to be that of a man whose battles were over, whose life had run its course. But it sprang from a far deeper source. It was a manifestation of his respect for himself, his abiding sense of his own worth, which along with a deep-going humility ruled out the childish, wasteful indulgence of hate.

Some weeks ago Lionel Trilling pointed out in an essay on Whitman that the sense of the importance of personal identity is in the doldrums. We are all trying to escape the responsibility it entails. Senator Norris's career was a continuous affirmation of personal identity; his autobiography is an important document for the triumphant record it contains of what can be accomplished for others by a man who feels that his first responsibility, as a free moral agent, is to his own principles and who therefore can think of other human beings only in terms of himself.

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Case of Elizabeth Canning

THE UNSOLVED MYSTERY of the servant girl Elizabeth Canning who disappeared for four weeks and returned with a wild tale of white-slaving gipsies has long been a favorite with those who recount famous trials. Lillian de la Torre has gone back to the voluminous contemporary mid-eighteenth-century accounts and in "Elizabeth Is Missing" (Knopf, $3.50) has pieced together a fascinating story which reads like fiction but, except for the hypothetical solution, invents nothing. The tale includes nearly every feature of interest that an underworld mystery could be expected to have and gains additional piquancy from the fact that Magistrate Henry Fielding was Elizabeth's London champion as well as from the fact that the heroine spent her last peaceful years in Connecticut, whither she had been transported on a quite possibly unjust conviction for perjury. Miss de la Torre has recently contributed pseudo-historical detective stories to Ellery Queen's Magazine, and the present book is lively enough for the general reader as well as sufficiently informative to interest the student of the eighteenth century. Her suggested solution is ingenious and in its central assumption at least probably correct. Connoisseurs of the hard-boiled may be reminded that at that epoch low life was good and low. There are some interesting illustrations from contemporary prints.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Baker's Memoirs

"AMERICAN CHRONICLE," by Ray Stannard Baker (Scribner's, $3.50), is the life story of a man who has sighted many horizons and gone beyond them—yet still likes best of all his own Massachusetts hillside. It is the autobiography of a man whose name is indissolubly linked in history with that of Woodrow Wilson and his fight for a better world. The characterizations of groups, movements, and events are surpassed only by the descriptions of the multitude of important persons Mr. Baker has known.

As a newspaper reporter in Chicago in the summer of 1892, which marks the start of this volume, Mr. Baker covered "Coxey's Army" and the Pullman strike. Then followed years of brilliant reporting for McClure's Magazine—"muck-raking"—his work with the American Magazine, his trips to Europe, his deep interest in the progressive movement, his writing under the pseudonym of David Grayson, and, finally, his years of association with Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. Baker characterizes himself as a "follower" rather than a "leader." But he has been a highly intelligent and critical follower. He tells us that he was always "treasuring men who are all of a piece: possessed men, sure men, inwardly united men, who expend themselves fearlessly and utterly in some great cause." Inevitably, therefore, he would be drawn to Woodrow Wilson. Mr. Baker has no illusions about Wilson's perfection—analyses of his faults and weaknesses are frequent. Such recognition lends further realism to such a tribute as this: "For he was that rarity, a leader whom a free man could follow without surrender."

Some readers, remembering our rejection of the League of Nations and its ultimate collapse, may be inclined to feel sorry for a man who devoted so many years of his life to following a rejected leader. They should not pity Mr. Baker. It is not tragic to have followed a defeated leader if, in defeat, that leader is proved worthy of being followed. Furthermore, Mr. Baker knows that in the final analysis Woodrow Wilson did not fail.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

Utopia on Credit

ADVOCATES of the Social Credit theories first proposed by Major C. H. Douglas have taken the statement that money is the root of all evil with a somewhat appalling literalness. In "Aladdin's Lamp" (Creative Age Press, $3.75) Gorham Munson has combined an unusually interesting, if biased, history of finance in the United States with a polemic for Social Credit which is frequently both naive and irritating.

Many of the world's difficulties arise from the inadequacies of traditional systems of money and credit, but it does not follow that virtually all economic and social problems could be solved overnight by a different handling of fiscal policy. Utopia is not around the corner, even if we were sure of the road to it. The experience of the last four years has demonstrated a productive capacity in the United States beyond the dream of ten years ago, but it has also demonstrated that production does have strictly finite limits in the immediate future.

If no allowance is made for price increases, the gross national product was nearly doubled between 1940 and 1943. It has not increased very much since 1943, and cannot grow much more without further substantial increases both in capital equipment and the productivity of labor. Total net production of goods and services today amounts to an average of something in the neighborhood of $4,000 a year per family. The actual median family income is about $2,600. This is far more than we have ever had before; it is not a level which would permit the complete consumer satisfaction and extensive leisure promised by Mr. Munson and the apostles of Social Credit. Nor does it indicate, as he maintains, that full employment is a mistaken ideal because we can achieve adequate production for a universally comfortable standard of living with considerably less than the total labor force. An economy of real abundance is clearly discernible within the next two or three generations, but it is no service to progress to promise that abundance can be achieved immediately by financial manipulation.

The need for fiscal reform is hampered rather than helped by a gross overstatement of the case, especially when many of the arguments can be refuted by statistics.

CHARLES E. NOYES

The Nation Associates

CORDIALLY INVITES YOU TO ATTEND

A

Dinner

IN HONOR OF

Dr. Thomas Mann

ON THE OCCASION OF HIS 70th BIRTHDAY

Monday, June 25, 7 P.M.
Waldorf-Astoria Hotel

SPEAKERS:

Dr. Thomas Mann

Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter
Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes

William L. Shirer

Foreign Correspondent and Commentator

Robert E. Sherwood

Playwright

RESERVATIONS: $25

Proceeds will be used for a program
of political education for democracy.

The Nation Associates

Twenty Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
near LEX.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENCY
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.
Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE
HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"LUBITSCH HUMOR AT ITS SLYEST!"
—World-Telegram

TALLULAH BANKHEAD • CHARLES COBURN
ANNE BAXTER • WILLIAM EYTHE

ERNST LUBITSCH'S A ROYAL SCANDAL

Screamingly Funny Satire on
Catherine of Russia and Her Amours

Plus — with Johnny Weissmuller
TARZAN AND THE AMAZONS

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYU
Coney Island
Queens
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
NICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

THE FLYING TIGER'S STORY!

"RIP-ROARING FILM"—N. Y. Times

DENNIS MORGAN

Dane Clark • Raymond Massey • Alan Hale

'GOD IS MY CO-PILOT'

Screen version of COL. SCOTT'S Autobiography

— and —

'ZOMBIES ON BROADWAY' Wally Brown
Alan Carney

MOTION PICTURES

Get ready to see . . .

How Wonderful a Motion Picture Version of a Great Stage Play Can Be!

It's got us all using such expressions as "Natch," "TerRIF" and "SenSASH!" We've even found out that a woman can still be dangerous even if she is old—21! We've just seen a preview of

"JUNIOR MISS"

You'll cheer! As Peggy Ann Garner, who stole your heart as "Francie" in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn," emerges as one of the greatest stars of our time. . . . Words alone can't describe how joyously it has been adapted and directed by George Seaton and how magnificently it has been produced by William Perlberg. . . .

IT'S SUPER ENTERTAINMENT—BUT DIFF!

Proudly presented by 20th Century-Fox!

WORLD
PREMIERE

RIVOLI

Saturday
JUNE 16th

"OUT of this WORLD"

starring
Eddie BRACKEN
Veronica LAKE
Diana LYNN
with CASS DALEY
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

In Person!

ALLAN
JONES

GIL
LAMB
EILEEN
BARTON

JERRY WALD

And His Orchestra
Mighty 7th War Loan
BUY BONDS HERE

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT

TIMES
SQUARE

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 36 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

YOU WILL NEVER MISS the pint of blood you give to the Red Cross, or the contribution you make to the Red Cross War Fund. But the first may save the life of a fighting American, and the second will help furnish him with "a home away from home."

DO IT NOW! Give your blood to replace blood shed in your defense; telephone your Red Cross Blood Donor Center today and make an appointment for a donation. Send your check today to the Red Cross War Fund.

Samuel Goldwyn presents
DANNY KAYE
in
"WONDER MAN"
In Technicolor
VIRGINIA MAYO • VERA-ELLEN
and those Gorgeous Goldwyn Girls

ASTOR
8'way & 45th St.
Extra Late Show
Every Night
Continuous from 9 a. m.
Popular Prices

Fred MacMURRAY • Joan LESLIE • June HAYER

WHERE DO WE GO FROM HERE?

A 20TH CENTURY-FOX PICTURE • IN TECHNICOLOR

PLUS—New York's Biggest Stage Show!

7th Avenue & 30th St. ROXY New Playings

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street. Matinees Wed. & Sat.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

SEEING an early Fred Astaire film led me to recall with longing the earlier stage musicals in which the book was utter nonsense devised only to bring someone like Astaire on the stage every now and then to sing a song and then to break into a dance in which he was joined by the "boys and girls" in an exciting routine of American stage dancing. The recent tendency has been to have a book that makes sense, or even to adapt it from a play like "Green Grow the Lilacs" or "Liliom"; to have ballets that arise out of the dramatic situations or at least illustrate the sense of the song; and now, in "Carousel," to set stretches of the dialogue to music. This through-composed music (as the Germans call it) in "Carousel" is inept and uninteresting; it leaves room for only a few songs of the usual Richard Rodgers type; and these, even at their best, never attain the brilliance that is offered in such profusion in "Oklahoma." As for Agnes de Mille's dances, they are charming and witty; but, as Wolcott Gibbs remarked, they begin to recall something one has seen before, and make me hungry for the sight of the stage dancing of former years.

"On the Town" is, I think, a far more successful example of this integrated type of musical show. The story provides Jerome Robbins with occasions for his translation of sharp observation of behavior and movement into stylized and humorous dance terms (e. g., the dancing of the dance-hall hostesses, the more hilarious for Alvin Colt's costumes); and the dream ballet of the second act shows deeper psychological insight. And much of Leonard Bernstein's music is very good. As a rule it gets bad when Bernstein gives his show music the benefit of his equipment as a highbrow composer; but one of the funniest songs, "I Am Carried Away," is funny precisely because of its use of one of the devices of serious music, canonic imitation, in an absurd context.

"The Seven Lively Arts" is none of my business, except insofar as it provided me with my ghastliest musical experience of the year. This was when, in between a couple of the tawdry revue numbers, Benny Goodman came swaggering out and proceeded to give the audience five minutes of Art—in the shape of the conclusion of Weber's Clarinet Concerto, which could not possibly have any meaning or effect, not only because it was placed in that context, but because it was presented without its own context of the entire work and deprived of what meaning or effect this might have given it even in those unfavorable surroundings. Convinced by its meaningless that this was indeed Art, the audience sat respectfully silent for the five minutes, and at the end gave Goodman, as he swaggered off, tremendous applause instead of the kick in the pants he deserved for his pretentiousness and his lack of the musical understanding he pretended to. It left me wondering whether Billy Rose has his Modigliani painting of Cocteau hung amid a lot of Vargas drawings.

Moreover, not content with this black eye to one serious art, Mr. Rose presented Markova not only, again, in an inappropriate context, but in some trash devised by Dolin that confirmed the audience's previous notions of the silliness of classic ballet.

Columbia has issued a recording (Set 564; $3.50) of Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole performed by Milstein with the Philadelphia Orchestra. The music is enjoyable; Milstein's performance is excellent, except for some sobbing in the first movement; and the orchestra plays well with him; but the recording falsifies the sound of orchestra and violin horribly.

Columbia's other June set (569; $6.50) offers Rachmaninov's Symphony No. 2 performed by Rodzinski with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. What can lead the conductor of a major orchestra in a city like New York to perform such rubbish and a recording company to put it on records is beyond my powers of imagination. The recorded sound is strident.

CONTRIBUTORS

KAY BOYLE is a well-known novelist and writer of short stories. Among her books are "Avalanche," "The Crazy Hunter," and "Primer for Combat."

MAJOR H. A. DEWEERD is associate editor of the Infantry Journal and author of "Great Soldiers of the Two World Wars." He was formerly associate professor of history at Denison University and editor of Military Affairs.

CYRIL CONNOLLY is editor of the London literary monthly Horizon.

Twentieth Annual Session BREAD LOAF WRITERS' CONFERENCE

(Subject to War Conditions)
Two Weeks' Summer Study for Writers:
Individual and Group Criticism and Discussion

Sponsored by Middlebury College
August 13-25
AT BREAD LOAF INN IN THE
GREEN MOUNTAINS, VERMONT
Theodore Morrison, Director

Staff:

Robert Frost, Poet
Louis Untermeyer, Poet, Anthologist
Catherine Drinker Bowen, author of Yankee from Olympus, etc.
Fletcher Pratt, Columnist, Article and Fiction Writer
Edith Mirrielees, Authority on Short Story
Walter E. Havighurst, Novelist
Helen Everitt, Magazine Writer
Walter Prichard Eaton, Drama Critic and Teacher
Colonel Joseph I. Greene, Editor, Infantry Journal

Two Classes of Membership

- 1) Contributors submit manuscript to staff for criticism.
- 2) Auditors are free to attend entire lecture and discussion program, but submit no manuscript.

All Inquiries:

LANGUAGE SCHOOLS OFFICE
Middlebury College Middlebury, Vermont

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW mailed POST-PAY.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION
22 East 17th Street, New York City

The
New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPROCKEN copy on request

THE MIGHTY

WAR LOAN

Letters to the Editors

Will Austria Become Self-governing?

Dear Sirs: Ernst Karl Winter's article on Austria in the May 26 issue of The Nation was given an enthusiastic introduction by the editor, only slightly blemished by a somewhat vague reservation regarding the author's interpretation of the role of the right and the left in Austria's past and present. This makes it a bit difficult to comment on the article. But comment is required.

Mr. Winter's article is indeed "interesting and illuminating," but mainly for what it does not say. Reading it carefully, I have found no reference to the requirements of a democratic development in Austria, particularly to the need of a thorough house-cleaning in the party to which Mr. Winter belongs, the Christian Social Party.

This is apparently no accident. Mr. Winter's lack of understanding of the strongest democratic force in Austria, the Social Democrats, seems only slightly less than that of Herr Schuschnigg, whose complete lack of political acumen he inadvertently reveals. Herr Schuschnigg is reported by Mr. Winter to have come to the conclusion—between his trip to Berchtesgaden and his final capitulation—that, if he had the choice, he would take Stalin, not Hitler, and that that "would mean Otto Bauer." This revealing idiocy of identifying the Socialist leader with Stalin was a standard theme of Dollfuss's and Schuschnigg's pro-fascist propaganda. To them the Social Democrat, Otto Bauer, was, in their language, an "Austro-Bolshevik." This was used to justify anti-labor and anti-democratic measures before the rest of the world. Many were the times that Dollfuss tried to convince the French Foreign Minister, Paul-Boncour, that the Austrian Socialists were not Socialists of the French type but Austro-Bolsheviks, and that therefore the Austro-Fascists were justified in acting as they did. If Herr Schuschnigg really felt that he preferred Otto Bauer to Hitler, why on earth was he unwilling or unable to come to terms with the Socialist underground against Hitler at the time of the plebiscite? Gedye, in his "Betrayal in Central Europe," reports in great detail how, even in this last hour before the final catastrophe, Schuschnigg procrastinated in his dealings with the underground leaders—just because he could not make up his mind between Bauer and Hitler.

Not once in his article does Mr. Winter make it clear that out of the Christian Social Party—which he mislabels the Christian Socialists—emerged the leadership of Austro-Fascism. His only fear is of a Kulturkampf—which seems strange at a moment when the new Austrian republic is confronted with so much more pressing problems. (Incidentally, there is no Minister of Public Instruction and Religion in the Austrian Cabinet. This office existed under the Hapsburg Empire and the word "religion" was dropped when the first Austrian Republic was established.) Yet, one of the basic issues of Austrian democracy is whether the rightist party will once for all rid itself of all those monarchist and fascist leanings to which it offered cordial hospitality under Seipel, Dollfuss, and Schuschnigg.

Conspicuously absent in Mr. Winter's article is also any discussion of whether the Austrian government will be allowed to govern. I share Mr. Winter's concern over the prospects of cooperation among the Big Three, but this should not make us overlook the people of Austria itself. Whether the Renner Cabinet, which, I agree, is probably the best that could be set up under the circumstances, is acceptable to all of the Big Three is one question; whether it will be allowed to govern is another question, and one which is of at least equal importance. The Moscow Declaration has made Austria independent from Germany. The question now is whether the Declaration also meant that the Austrians will be given, as rapidly as possible, the right to govern themselves.

ADOLF STURMTHAL

Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y., June 2

Attention, North Jersey

Dear Sirs: A North Jersey Progressive League was formed recently in Hudson, Bergen, and Passaic counties. Our aims are "by education and by political action on a non-partisan basis" to work for "the extension of democracy both in our domestic affairs and in our international affairs." Anyone interested is urged to write us at 516 34th Street.

LEO GAMOW

Union City, N. J., May 30

It Wasn't Fit to Print

Dear Sirs: In your May 5 issue you commented on a New York Times dispatch from Bologna reporting the "acclaim" that greeted Prince Humbert's visit there as follows: "It seems strange that during the fifteen minutes of his appearance in public the Prince found 500 assorted Bolognese ready to mill around him, etc."

I received from an American soldier in Italy the following statement, dated May 11:

About the article of the New York Times you sent me, I can state that it is a lie. Please tell the guy who wrote it to go and look at the articles printed in our Stars and Stripes between April 19 and 25.

These eyewitness stories say that around 600 persons were in the square which was crossed by Umberto heavily escorted by Military Police, but they didn't show any interest in him. The best proof that he was not noticed lies in the fact that he is still alive.

In case other lies should come out I state personally that Umberto was in complete incognito in Turin and Milan, otherwise . . .

WALTER TOSCANINI

New York, May 25

Storm Over Agee

Dear Sirs: This is a letter of applause for James Agee's article on atrocity films in the May 19 issue. He was courageous to write it and you were courageous to print it, for it is a point of view not popular right now and yet greatly needed.

R. E. WOLSELEY

Evanston, Ill., May 25

Dear Sirs: I roundly condemn your failure to censor James Agee's scandalous article on Nazi atrocity films. It could very well have been signed, "Ghost of Goebbels." Agee admits that he has not seen the films; yet he has the unmitigated gall to prejudge them and to state that, in our passion for vengeance, we are "worse . . . in some respects, than the Nazis." On the little likelihood that the article was published without your knowledge, I call upon you now to give Agee a sound journalistic thrashing in reply.

HERMAN KERSH

New York, May 27

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 23, 1945

NUMBER 25

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

681

EDITORIALS

Another Chance in India

683

Soft Peace for Japan?

683

Russia and the West by Freda Kirchwey

684

ARTICLES

Jim Crow Flies High by I. F. Stone

687

Canada Stands Pat by Maxwell Cohen

688

The OWI Under the Ax by Charles G. Bolté

690

Who Fights Health Insurance? by Geraldine Sartain

691

Columbia River Bureaucrats by Carey McWilliams

693

In the Wind

694

POLITICAL WAR

Bulgaria from the Inside by Constantine Poulos

695

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

697

"Poisonous Honey Brought from France"

698

by Joseph Wood Krutch

700

Briefer Comment

702

Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling

705

Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch

705

Music by B. H. Haggin

706

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

708

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 120 by Jack Barrett

708

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON ■ MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Shape of Things

A CITIZEN OF ABILENE, KANSAS, RETURNED TO his native land this week. No American, with the possible exception of Franklin D. Roosevelt, has so caught the imagination of all the peoples who worked to bring about the overthrow of the Nazi-Fascist war machine. Not only has General Eisenhower justified the hopes placed in him as Supreme Allied Commander, but among the leading figures of the Allied nations no one else seems to have grasped so firmly the basic reality of the cooperative effort upon which victory and the peace beyond victory so largely depended. General Ike, who did so much to bring about the victorious coalition, has become the symbol of the unity among peoples upon which the hopes of our generation are based. It is reported that a few days before D-Day an American correspondent asked General Eisenhower what in his opinion would be the greatest story to come out of the war. "The greatest story to come out of the war," Eisenhower replied, "will be the story of Canadian fliers escorting British destroyers convoying American troops to the invasion beach-heads." The man who has been accorded the highest honors from the governments of the leading United Nations sees himself honored only as the representative of those who have paid the high price for victory. "Humility must always be the portion of any man who receives acclaim earned in the blood of his followers and the sacrifices of his friends." He went on to say to the city fathers of London, who had presented him with the freedom of the city, that Abilene, Kansas, was a long way from the ancient city whose roots went back into the uncertainties of unrecorded history. "Yet kinship among nations is not determined in such measurements as proximity of size and age. Rather we should turn to those inner things—call them what you will—I mean those intangibles that are the real treasure free men possess. To preserve [them] . . . a Londoner will fight. So will a citizen of Abilene."

✱

THE ITALIAN CRISIS HAS ENDED IN COMPROMISE that favors the resistance forces. Delegates of the Committee of Liberation for North Italy solved the problem of the Premiership by proposing Ferruccio Parri for the post after Pietro Nenni had been rejected by the Christian Democratic Party. This was the only possible solution, since Alcide de Gasperi, proposed by the right wing, was unacceptable to the Socialist, Communist, and Action parties. Unlike Bonomi, the new Premier is comparatively young and has opposed fascism from the beginning. As early as 1929 Carlo Rosselli described him in these words: "Until I knew Parri, the Mazzinian hero had been a rhetorical abstraction to me. Now I see him before me in flesh and blood, with all the sorrow of the world and all the energy of the world stamped in his features." Fifteen years later the Mazzinian hero became vice-commander of the Partisan forces that contributed so decisively to the liberation of the North. The new Premier will also hold the important post of Minister of the Interior, with power over the police and local administration—a power previously exercised by the monarchists. These are the favorable aspects of the crisis. The role of the British and Americans has been less satisfactory. They opposed giving the Premiership to Nenni for the same reason that led them, six months ago, to reject Count Sforza as Foreign Minister—because both men are against the House of Savoy. Since the crisis began Nenni has maintained that Crown Prince Umberto should resign to make way for a republic and avoid civil war. That action alone was sufficient to assure him the Allies' veto. The British Tories, in particular, are committed to support of the monarchy as part of their last-ditch fight to prevent Europe from going to the left.

✱

IN BELGIUM AND IN SPAIN THE SAME GAME IS being played. A major crisis has developed in Belgium as a result of the attempt to force the return of Leopold III to the throne. Belgian labor seems to be rallying solidly behind Achille van Acker, the Socialist Premier, who last Saturday offered his resignation and that of the entire Cabinet in protest against an announcement that the King was returning from Salzburg. The General Confederation of Labor has announced that "it intends to use every means in its power to oppose the reactionary maneuver involved in Leopold's return." In Spain a more subtle maneuver is working toward a similar goal. General Franco has announced the creation of a "Council of the Realm," which would select his successor if the necessity arose. "With the exception of certain relatively short periods in our history," Franco said in an interview at Pardo Palace, "our government has been traditionally a monarchy." The Spanish dictator is convinced that if he can survive the coming critical six months on the international level, the regime will be saved. He counts on a Churchill victory in England and on a rightist orientation of Anglo-American policy as a counterweight to Russia. Foreign Minister Lequerica has persuaded Franco that his chance of remaining in power would be considerably increased should Spain now fall in line with the general movement to restore all possible monarchies in Europe. That the peoples are not prepared to support this plan is demonstrated by the angry reaction of Belgian labor, and by the savage attack in Chambery by Frenchmen on a train they believed was carrying soldiers of the Blue Division back to Spain.

✱

THE ENTIRE PRICE-STABILIZATION MECHANISM IS gravely threatened by the Wherry amendment, which the Senate, in a moment of confusion, permitted to be attached to the Price Control Act. The amendment would prevent the OPA from establishing ceilings on farm products at less than the cost of production plus a reasonable profit. Since there is no indication of whose costs are meant, the term appears to refer to any farmer. The OPA could not impose a price ceiling at a point where any farmer, regardless of his efficiency, would fail to make a profit. This is tantamount to saying that the OPA cannot exercise any effective control over farm prices, thus opening the way to a sharp rise in all food prices. Although there is a strong possibility that the Wherry amendment may be rejected by the House, the Republicans in that body have a series of other amendments ready, that are only slightly less menacing. One of the most serious is a proposal to insert into the bill a statement of Congressional intent which would require the OPA to adopt a "flexible" pricing policy in order to encourage production. This rule would compel the OPA to abandon the pricing procedures that have proved so effective during the past few years in favor of methods that are frankly inflationary. Food subsidies are the object of the usual attack from the inflationary-minded coalition of Republicans and farm-bloc Democrats. The entire program can be saved only if the public asserts itself, as it has on several occasions in the past when price control was challenged by special interests.

✱

NAZIS MAY SAFELY OPPOSE CONSCRIPTION, BUT conscientious objectors may not, according to two recent decisions by the Supreme Court. The court has acquitted twenty-four leaders of the German-American Bund convicted in a lower court of interfering with the draft. And it has upheld the Illinois Supreme Court's refusal to admit Clyde Summers, a conscientious objector, whose physical disabilities exempted him from the draft, to the practice of law in that state. The court's five-to-four decision in favor of Gerhard Kunze, former national Bund president, and his twenty-three fellow-members hinged on a provision in the Selective Service Act denying reemployment rights to Communist Party and Bund members. It was in order to test this clause, the majority decision held, the Bund counseled its members to resist service in the armed forces. In a dissenting opinion concurred in by Justices Reed, Douglas, and Jackson, Chief Justice Stone said that the Bund leaders were violating the draft act. In the Clyde Summers case the court again voted five to four. In his dissent from the majority opinion Justice Black held that he was not ready to say that a mere profession of belief in Christ's gospel "is a sufficient reason to keep otherwise well-qualified men out of the legal profession." This opinion was concurred in by Justices Douglas, Murphy, and Rutledge. Justice Douglas is to be congratulated for opposing both Nazi and native enemies of freedom; he alone dissented in both cases. Justices Roberts and Frankfurter voted with the majority in both cases. Justices Black, Murphy, and Rutledge emerged as nostalgic exponents of laissez faire liberalism, for they defended both the Bundists and the conscientious objector. Defense of the military against all comers was maintained by Chief Justice Stone and Justices Reed and Jackson. The letter of the law was stretched to the breaking point by Justice Roberts's majority opinion, which noted that the Bundists "always favored a compulsory Selective Service Act, even though they did not wish a draft army to fight with England against Germany."

NEXT WEEK

Lincoln Kirstein visits Der Suermmer. (His article is written on Julius Streicher's private letter paper.)

Another Chance in India

WE WELCOME the British government's new move to break the Indian deadlock and, particularly, the release of Nehru and other leaders from jail, a step which ought to be followed by the freeing of all political prisoners. The White Paper, to be sure, is a cautious document. It is, in fact, a slightly revised version of the Cripps plan, plus proposals for an "interim working arrangement." These proposals, it is hoped, will facilitate cooperation between leaders of the different communities in solving the constitutional problem.

At the time of the Cripps mission, in March, 1942, the Japanese were advancing rapidly through Burma. The invasion of India by land and sea appeared an ominous possibility, and the tide had not yet turned in Europe. The British government was therefore playing from a weak hand. There seemed a reasonable chance that it might be bluffing when Cripps insisted his plan must be accepted or rejected as a whole, and that Congress might be able to win further concessions. Actually, the government's weakness may have stiffened its attitude; it felt it could more easily afford civil disorder than any loosening of its grip on the Indian military machine.

With the failure of the Cripps mission, civil disorder duly broke out, but it was drastically suppressed, and since then India has remained comparatively quiet under an autocratic regime. Internally and externally the British are now in a stronger position than in 1942, but they have to look ahead to the time when the Indian army is demobilized and political agitation can no longer be forbidden on grounds of military necessity. Moreover, they cannot ignore the moral pressure of world opinion: imperialism—at least the old-fashioned variety—is unpopular with both of Britain's great allies.

The All-India Congress, also, may be more in a mood to negotiate. Although it is the outstanding political force in the country, it can stir into rebellious activity only a fraction of India's 400,000,000. The comparative ease with which the last outbreak of rioting was put down and the passivity with which the horrors of the Bengal famine were accepted suggest that revolution may not yet be a practical alternative to constitutional evolution. Political consciousness may develop from empty bellies but not from chronic malnutrition.

Another factor which Congress must weigh in considering the British offer is the strengthened strategic position of the Moslem League. Mr. Jinnah never has been able to speak for all the Indian Moslems and cannot do so now, but there are reasons to believe that his following has grown during the last three years. He is also receiving encouragement from the organization of the Arab League by his co-religionists in the Middle East. Jinnah may, therefore, be expected to press his demands for Pakistan—independent status for Indian provinces with Moslem majorities—more strongly than ever.

Congress stands for a united as well as an independent India, but the British cannot obtain union by coercing the Moslems. As the White Paper says, "The working out of India's new constitutional system is a task which can only be carried through by the Indian peoples themselves." It goes on to suggest that negotiations between the leaders of the main communities might be assisted if they came together in accepting responsibilities in the Central Executive Council and the provincial governments. The British therefore propose to reconstruct the Central Council, with all Cabinet posts filled by Indians selected by the Viceroy on the basis of nominations by the leaders of the chief parties and communities. The Viceroy would remain as chairman with the power of veto, and the British Commander-in-Chief would continue to function as Minister of War. Foreign affairs, however, would pass into Indian hands, and, it is suggested, accredited diplomatic missions could be appointed immediately to represent India abroad.

The original proposal made by Sir Stafford Cripps was rejected by the All-India Congress on the ground that it was not an offer of full Cabinet responsibility. But as Cripps probably pointed out at the time, if the Indian ministers stuck together they would gain the substance of power, for the Viceroy would long hesitate to provoke a political crisis by exercising his veto. The British Cabinet itself was changed from a royal advisory body to a fully responsible executive not by law but by usage. We hope, therefore, that the Indian leaders will regard the British plan, not as a trap to compromise them, but as an opportunity to gain a vantage point from which to press forward to full independence.

Soft Peace for Japan?

JAPANESE propagandists have given a great deal of time lately to explaining how impossible it is for loyal Japanese ever to accept "unconditional surrender." They have not said they would surrender on terms, but the implication is plain. If we are "reasonable" and provide a formula which would avoid the stigma of defeat, the Japanese might be willing to call off the war. Ordinarily, one would pay little or no attention to what the Japanese put on the air. They have never been clever in their propaganda directed at this country; and if there is one thing on which all the American people have seemed united, it is the necessity for the complete defeat of Japan and the eradication of Japanese militarism. But in the past few weeks we have suddenly begun to hear intimations from various quarters concerning the desirability of either making a conditional peace or "spelling out the terms of unconditional surrender."

Not all the advocates of a conditional peace necessarily are advocates of a soft peace. But many are. One radio commentator went so far recently as to plead for a peace that would leave Japan strong enough to prevent the expansion of Soviet influence in Asia. The New York World-Telegram outlined peace terms which conspicuously failed to mention the Cairo declaration, the fate of Formosa, the treatment to be accorded the Emperor, or the Zaibatsu. Writing in a Washington paper, Frank Kent suggested that Japan might be allowed to keep both Formosa and Korea as a reward for an early peace that would save thousands of American lives.

All this would seem of trifling importance if the arrest of six leading critics of State Department policy last week had not pointed so clearly to the existence of a powerful "soft-peace" clique in high places within the government. The last issue of Amerasia to be published before its editors were arrested quoted certain comments which Captain E. M. Zacharias, former naval attaché in Tokyo, is alleged to have made to the Japanese people after delivering President Truman's statement to them over the radio. Captain Zacharias is said to have appealed personally in the most cordial language to leading militarists and diplomats whom he had known, including ex-Premier Yonai, Admiral Nomura, Mr. Kurusu, and Premier Suzuki, and to have ended by telling the people of Japan that "they could choose a peace with honor." Amerasia pointed out that this phrase must have come as a shock to the survivors of the Bataan death march. The magazine was also critical of Under Secretary of State Grew's known tenderness toward the Zaibatsu, the equivalent of Germany's Krupps and Thyssens.

The arrest of the six may or may not be connected with these particular criticisms of State Department policy. But it seems to be more than a coincidence that the editors of a magazine that is highly critical of the tendency toward a soft peace should be arrested just at the moment that reactionary and pacifist groups are opening a drive for a negotiated peace. This drive seems to have been launched at the psychological moment when it is most likely to get a hearing. With the European war over, many Americans find it difficult to face the necessity of further heavy bloodshed for a victory that is already assured. There is bound to be a lag of several months before our full military resources can be shifted to the Pacific. Until this is accomplished the war will seem to drag after the excitement of the final campaign against Germany. Moreover, the advocates of a negotiated peace have sought to capitalize on anti-Soviet feeling by circulating wild stories about supposed Russian ambitions on the Asiatic continent.

We do not believe the American people would tolerate a peace for Japan that did not seem to involve the complete destruction of Japanese militarism. And we see no danger of conditions that would not go at least as far as the Cairo declaration. But because of the general lack of information there is danger that Americans might consent to a peace leaving Japan in the hands of the feudal-militarist clique responsible for the government's aggressive policies for the past two generations. A peace that maintained Japan's semi-feudal social system would inevitably breed another war. As long as Mr. Grew remains in his present key position, the danger of this kind of "soft peace" will continue. For Mr. Grew has repeatedly, in his book and in various public statements, attempted to distinguish between the militarists, whom he holds responsible for the war, and the "moderate" industrialists, financiers, and officials associated with the Emperor. Yet the record shows that the Zaibatsu, Mr. Grew's "moderates," not only cooperated with the militarists in preparation for the war but have been the chief obstacle to the economic and political reforms necessary for the growth of a genuinely democratic movement in Japan. This group would undoubtedly welcome any kind of peace that left their power intact. Such a peace might save many thousands of American lives during the next year. But it would do so at the cost of millions of lives later on.

Russia and the West

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

VARIOUS happenings here and abroad have, almost suddenly, lightened the atmosphere of apprehension that has hung over the international scene. The announcement of an early meeting of Truman, Churchill, and Stalin, the beginning of talks in Moscow among the Polish party leaders, the certainty that the United Nations Conference will end in at least a moderate success—all these have helped restore the public mood to normal, or nearly so. People no longer expect war with Soviet Russia day after tomorrow.

Nor is the improvement entirely atmospheric; some clear gains have been made. We know now that the responsible statesmen of the three biggest powers saw the peril of allowing differences among them to continue to accumulate and took steps to save the coalition. The dispatch of Messrs. Davies and Hopkins to London and Moscow was particularly welcome proof that President Truman, despite his properly reserved comments on changes in the State Department, realized that the situation could be remedied only by going outside the channels of ordinary diplomacy. All this is grounds for genuine encouragement.

But it would be foolish, just the same, to assume that these measures are more than emergency salvage operations. Indeed there is the danger, always present in our volatile country, that the sudden swing from panic to relief will lead people to ignore real and continuing difficulties. We cannot afford to sit back and rest on Mr. Hopkins's laurels; one mission does not make a decent foreign policy. The problem of establishing a solid basis for peaceful, cooperative relations with Russia remains unsolved and, for the most part, unfaced. And throughout the years immediately ahead that problem will overshadow every other. One can understand why Sir Stafford Cripps devoted his first speech in the British election campaign to the question of Russia and the peace. Politicians, aware of the intimate anxieties of a war-weary electorate, would prefer to fight the campaign on domestic issues, but they cannot shut out the issue of foreign policy. For, in the not-so-long run, plans for jobs and new homes in England will be only as good as are the relations between Britain and its great allies in both directions, and the shadow of another war will reduce to nothing the campaign promises of the parties—Labor, Tory, or Liberal.

Between Russia and the two chief Western powers a deep conflict of purpose and policy exists, dividing Europe now and promising to divide Asia later. The elements in that conflict cannot be resolved into easy moral categories. It is not enough to say that Russia has become a militarist, imperialist power or that the United States and Britain are supporting reaction in Europe and the Far East. One must examine the labels and analyze the stuff they are supposed to describe. For the ingredients of the conflict are not only explosive, they are very complex. They are political and economic and psychological and all three variously compounded; they arise from the desire for security and the ambition for power, and even these are likely to be aspects of the same thing. The conflict is taking shape in terms of Russia against the West, but many of the issues will have to be worked out, or fought out, within each nation. The recent Communist shift back to a popular-front policy from a policy of half-fictitious, wholly grotesque class collaboration is not merely a reflection of Russia's desire to revive left-opposition movements as a potential political weapon against the Western powers, though it is probably partly that; it is also an acknowledgement that the economic-political divisions in each country have become wider and less easy to camouflage now that wartime prosperity and the wartime need for unity have begun to diminish. And yet these internal conflicts, based on such solid facts as hunger and joblessness, or rule by reactionaries or democrats, again reflect the broader aspects of the conflict between Russia and the West. The reality behind the vision of democratic disintegration conjured up by Hitler is rapidly taking shape. A cynical friend said the other day: "Hitler has won the war." This is not true. Division among the Allies was for Hitler only a means to achieve the single end of a war between Russia and the West. He will not win a posthumous victory unless that catastrophe overwhelms the world.

The most important job for Allied diplomacy is to avoid that war. That it would end what is left of what we call civilization, everyone admits. But it would do so not only because the destructive capacity of the military machines is increasing by almost geometric jumps, but even more because it would be a civil war. The present war also involved, and developed out of, internal conflicts in each country; but the external enemy, the aggressor, was easy to identify; and the job of defeating him blurred social differences and welded at least a temporary unity in the countries of the anti-Axis coalition. A war with Russia and the Western powers would be, as Reinhold Niebuhr has called it, a "civil war within civilization." For Russia, with all its differences of policy and system, is "on our side." Not even its most ruthless and arbitrary acts have been able to kill the popular belief that the Soviet government has tackled and begun to solve the strangling problems of modern economic life. War with Russia would be a civil war in the most literal sense in every country, dividing classes, ranging party against party, breaking out in a hundred forms, from strikes and fierce propaganda struggles to open rebellion in those nations where hunger and political conflict are near the surface.

Certainly this war within civilization is not as near as irresponsible in and out of the government pretend. The criminal lunatics who openly prefer to "clean up the job while we still have our armies in the field" are unimportant. Sane persons, however much they may dislike Russia, would think more than twice before urging war with a power whose armies at the end of the war in Europe numbered twice the combined forces of the United States and Britain. Besides which, the present war is not over: the value of agreement among the Allies is still tied to the practical necessity of defeating Japan. Even our least imaginative officials recognize our present stake in Russian good will. Today, therefore, Clare Luce is an object of ridicule, hardly even a nuisance. And the fanatics who are beginning to talk about keeping Russia out of the Far Eastern struggle—the same ones, in many cases, who have consistently assailed Russia for failing to come in—are at least "premature anti-Stalinists." War with a major ally while we have still a major enemy to dispose of is not a popular cause. But the poison emitted by the Russophobes is not wasted. Its effect is insidious and cumulative. We should not dismiss it just because Russia seems to have become more amenable and a prospect of peaceful accommodation has opened. Early war is not the danger we have chiefly to fear. What is necessary is to find a basis of permanent cooperation, which alone offers the hope of peace and a gradual reconstruction of Europe and the world. A superficial job of patchwork, leaving all the problems unsolved, will give the fear-mongers and the hate-mongers a chance to do an effective job in the next five or ten years.

The real issues between the Soviet Union and Britain and the United States are profound and deeply rooted. They are issues that exist "within civilization"; the defeat of Hitler and Mussolini only made their universal character more apparent. For Europe's economic structure, badly battered by World War I, shored up with all sorts of ineffective props between 1918 and 1939, has been pulverized by World War II. The Russian revolution was one convulsion of European capitalism's collapse. Fascism was a disastrous, counter-revolutionary attempt to organize, centralize, and save it. The physical destruction of the war just ended, together with the wiping out of capital assets of all sorts, including the savings of the middle class, together with the fantastic jumble of property rights resulting from Nazi policies of expropriation and extermination and forced migration—all these have left the structure of Europe an empty shell. The financial expense of the war—which can only be computed in figures beyond human understanding—would by itself drag a private-enterprise system into profound depression. With the items above added in, I think we can consider that a revolution has been accomplished even though the form of the new system is not yet visible. Europe is living in a limbo of military government and military economics which temporarily conceal the reality and postpone the inevitable reckoning.

We are witnessing, and only half realizing that we are witnessing, one of the great political-economic upheavals of history. It is not going to be subdued by military measures or by small poultices applied in the name of relief and rehabilitation. It is not going to be checked by the imposition of governments of "order." It may, perhaps, be slowed up if America and Britain are willing to back their policy of establishing or salvaging reaction with continued outlays of money and goods in war-time amounts. But Britain cannot and America will not do this. In some form the European revolution will have to take its course. It could be steered into democratic and orderly channels, perhaps, if the great Western powers recognized that it was inevitable and encouraged the best leadership among the democratic elements in each country. But this would require a kind of statesmanship we have not yet found—even in Franklin D. Roosevelt—and we have no democratic leader as strong as he in either country. It would require statesmanship able to accept the wiping out of large property interests and the planning of an economy designed to rebuild the Continent rather than to get out profits. The House of Representatives has passed the Bretton Woods bill. This is a single and important sign that we are beginning to understand the international crisis of capitalism. But it's a long way from Bretton Woods to the encouragement of democratic revolution in Europe.

Britain, even Tory Britain, understands better than we the need of planned action. But its immediate problems are enormous and certainly its present ruling group does not see their solution in socialism either at home or abroad. If a Tory government is returned, as it probably will be, we may expect in Britain a policy of national and international controls where these are needed to protect profits, combined with energetic competition where British trade can operate advantageously on its own. Only a Labor victory offers hope of an economic program and a foreign policy directed consciously to overcoming the crisis in Europe.

Russia alone, at this moment, is in a position to act positively. Not that Russia is any less stubbornly nationalistic than Britain and the United States. On the contrary, its self-interested policy is reflected in every move it makes, whether along its own frontiers or at San Francisco. The story from Sofia printed in this issue offers illuminating evidence of Russia's drive to assert its power. But that story also shows how differently Russia's self-interest expresses itself in Bulgaria from Britain's in Greece. In economic, and therefore in political, matters Russia is not interested in preserving the property and political relationships that existed before the war. On the contrary, it stands to gain in the long run by change. For reasons of expediency—to conciliate its allies, or win certain local advantages—it has maintained here and there parties or leaders or social arrangements left over from fascist or pre-fascist days. But only a determined Russophile could believe that it has done so for reasons of permanent policy—to prevent the destruction of private property interests and retain in power moribund dynasties for the protection of those interests. In spite of the survival of a Peter or a Michael in countries where Moscow's wish is law today, the over-all effect of Russian control has been to wipe out established pre-war relationships and to smash fascist power. Nazis and collaborators are being rounded up and disposed of. Land is rapidly being divided; schools started; political activity encouraged; production stimulated. Russia would not benefit by preserving the status quo ante in Bulgaria; it can afford to jerk Bulgaria into the twentieth century. Britain believes it can protect its interests in Greece only by preventing revolution there. And so the sort of dangerous competition is developing that Mr. Poulos so well describes.

None of this is supposed to suggest that the process taking place in Eastern Europe is a model of democratic change or that Russia's unilateral moves have contributed to an easy solution of the differences between itself and the Western powers. Neither is true. Certainly, from the little we have learned, Russian methods are often both overbearing and ruthless: along with fascists, many democratic elements are suppressed or wiped out. And Russia's calm disregard for even the forms of collaboration in many critical instances has created antagonism in Washington and London where it could easily have been avoided. But this conduct, too, must be examined in the light of the unhappy past. One must constantly bear in mind how deep and essentially well-founded are Russian fears of hostile action. How can any honest person who thinks back over the past twenty-six years—from the first attempts by the Allies to crush the new Revolution by direct armed intervention and the subsidizing of every local uprising, through the careful construction of the cordon sanitaire, down to the final betrayal of collective security at Munich—doubt that Russia is genuinely obsessed with the problem of security? Sir Stafford Cripps warned against saying or doing "rash and impetuous things that are, or reasonably appear to be, hostile to the Soviet Union." He insisted that for Russia there are two possible forms of security—one "a strong international organization in which all countries cooperate with friendship," the other "the sphere of influence and control which, failing a wider system of security, will at least prevent neighboring states from being used as jumping-off ground for future aggression, as they have been used many times in the past."

Certainly the threatening talk of persons in important posts in our own army and of members of the American Congress is not calculated to still Moscow's suspicions or induce it to rely solely on the collective method of achieving security. And if we point out that Moscow's behavior is itself partly responsible for those threats, we are only completing the circle of reciprocal fear and provocation which must be broken if peace is to last between Russia and the West.

To demand of Russia more conciliatory behavior is quite proper. This has been done at San Francisco with considerable success. But I think we may as well admit that, in the long run, Russia will be moved not by arguments but by actions. If the Western powers had a policy that indicated an understanding of what is going on in Europe, that showed strength and a belief in the democratic principles they expound, that showed some tangible results in economic revival and social peace, then, I believe, we might hope for a substantial gain in understanding. Today, British and American criticism of Russia is neutralized in Italy and Spain and Greece—and even more in Germany; it can become effective only on the basis of a positive democratic policy of our own.

It is pure dilettantism to sit back and attack "impartially" both Russia and the West. This may be fun but it leads nowhere. The job of the political analyst is not to shoot his arrows at all wicked men but to try to explain the causes of the difficulties he has discovered and advocate policies which may remove them. Specifically the greatest need today is a united, determined effort on the part of British and American liberals and leftists to point out the immense dangers in their governments' foreign policies and to demand unceasingly a change in men and in direction.

Western Europe still has tremendous resources of democratic energy. During the war the resistance movements organized that energy into a magnificent common effort. Today the Western Allies, with deliberate intent, are dissipating and repressing it. They are doing so to prevent social and political change. Quite rapidly they are converting to enmity the warm and welcoming spirit of the anti-fascists of the Continent. The people of Europe deserve a chance to find their own way to peace and freedom; they deserve the help of the dominant powers. With help, they might work out their economic revolution in terms of democracy. Without help, against opposition, they will inevitably be driven toward the solution offered by Russia; and the world will be driven toward that "war within civilization" on which Hitler staked his final hope.

Jim Crow Flies High

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 15

IN 1919," according to Malcolm Ross, chairman of the FEPC, speaking before the House Appropriations Committee, "there were twenty-six race riots, most of them caused by this fight for jobs by unemployed people. We had no method of controlling those situations in 1919." We shall have no method of controlling such situations in 1945 after exactly fifteen days, unless public pressure forces action in the Senate on the FEPC appropriation for the next fiscal year or in the House on the bill for a permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee. A renewed appropriation for the FEPC and legislation to make it permanent are needed for three reasons: first, in order to continue measures for full mobilization of man-power until the Japanese war is over; second, to demonstrate to the colored peoples of the East, whose help we need in that war, that the United States is making progress away from race prejudice; third, to provide a post-war preventive measure to forestall racial outbreaks in the inevitable unemployment of the reconversion period. We do not want a repetition of the dreadful scenes which occurred under similar circumstances after the last war. W. E. B. Du Bois, in his book "Dusk of Dawn," has provided a vivid picture of the race riots of 1919. The dead included "thirty-eight killed in a Chicago riot of August; from twenty-five to fifty in Phillips County, Arkansas, and six killed in Washington," "For a day," Du Bois continues, "the city of Washington in July, 1919, was actually in the hands of a black mob fighting against the aggression of the whites with hand grenades."

It is not difficult to imagine outbreaks of this kind again in such cities as Washington and Detroit if nothing is done now to prevent them. The FEPC, despite all the hostility it has aroused, is a puny enough measure. A stepchild among Washington's swarming war agencies, it is probably the smallest agency of government in the capital, with a staff of but 127 persons all told, including stenographers and office boys. It is asking $599,000 for the next fiscal year, a drop in the bucket of the huge federal war budget. The FEPC has had a backlog of 2,500 cases for some time and has been just about able to close out enough old ones to balance the new cases coming in. If we were not so half-hearted and almost surreptitious in taking action against race prejudice, the FEPC would have an appropriation at least ten times what it is asking and has as yet been unable to obtain. The inadequacy of its funds becomes strikingly clear when one looks at its regional offices, where complaints are investigated and cases brought. A staff of seven, including three stenographers, handles all the New England states and New York. Three examiners and two stenographers are all the FEPC has for its Atlanta office, which takes care of five states—Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Florida. There is a staff of three, including one stenographer, for the state of Michigan. From its San Antonio office two examiners and a stenographer must handle all the FEPC complaints of western Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Utah, and Colorado. It is a miracle that the FEPC has been able to accomplish as much as it has, and for that miracle great credit is due its chairman, Malcolm Ross. Bringing deep devotion and almost superhuman patience to his difficult task—the breaking down of race prejudice and discrimination in industry, primarily against the Negro—he has made a sizable contribution to the war effort.

About one worker in every twelve in war industry today is a Negro. Negroes are 12 per cent of the workers in shipbuilding, 10 per cent of those in combat vehicles and ammunition, 7 per cent of those in aircraft. The last to be hired, they are apt to be the first to be fired. In the Southern shipyards, in Detroit with its 260,000 Negroes, in Los Angeles with 150,000, in Portland, Oregon, where there has been a phenomenal increase in the Negro population, there may be serious trouble as cutbacks increase and industry shuts down or reconverts. Unfortunately, the FEPC as at present constituted by executive order is limited to war plants. It cannot offer protection to racial or religious minorities in business and factories reconverted to peace-time output, though this is where FEPC action is most needed. Today the FEPC is fighting for its life as a war agency, as well as asking for establishment as a permanent instrument of government.

The House Appropriations Committee, which spent three days grilling FEPC officials last year, was alarmingly swift in dealing with the committee this year. Hearings took little over a day, and the questioning was not much more than a formality. A majority of the committee had their minds made up to kill the FEPC appropriation. In the subcommittee the vote was four to four. Ludlow of Indiana and Dirksen of Illinois, the former a Democrat, the latter a Republican, led the fight for the FEPC, while Taber of New York, who watches the pennies for the G. O. P., led the Southern Democrats into battle against the agency. In the full committee Coffee of Washington and Koppleman of Connecticut fought hard to win approval for the requested appropriation, but lost eighteen to eleven. The committee reported ingenuously that since legislation to make the FEPC permanent was pending, "the only logical course" was to withhold action on the appropriation. This was an interesting squeeze play.

There is still a fighting chance for the appropriation in the Senate. A slim majority of the members of the Senate Appropriations Committee are friendly to the FEPC, though the chairman, Senator McKellar, is hostile. Last year McKellar had the annual appropriation bill printed without the FEPC item, and the committee had to overrule him and order a new bill printed. Should the appropriation lose in committee, which is possible, and be offered as an amendment from the floor, then McKellar as presiding officer would be in a position to rule it out of order. Some public pressure on the committee would be most useful. The men who need it on the Democratic side are Tydings of Maryland and McCarran of Nevada. The Republicans on the committee who are unfriendly to the FEPC are Bridges of New Hampshire, Wherry of Nebraska, White of Maine, Gurney of South Dakota, Reed of Kansas, and Willis of Indiana. Anyone who helps to build a fire under them on this issue will be doing a good deed.

Prodding is equally urgent on the bill to make the FEPC permanent. Progressives in Ohio might begin by taking some pot shots at Taft. The senior Senator from Ohio and leading corporation lawyer of Cincinnati was chairman of the committee which drafted the last Republican platform, and that platform said, "We pledge establishment by federal legislation of a permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee." But Taft himself was the only Republican member of the Senate Education and Labor Committee who voted against favorably reporting the Chavez bill for a permanent FEPC. The committee is a progressive one. The vote was twelve to six in favor of the bill, and it can be called up in the Senate at any time. In the Senate the Chavez bill was also sponsored by Senators Wagner, Murray, Downey, Aiken, Langer, and Capper.

Its counterpart in the House, the Norton bill, is a composite of bills for a permanent FEPC introduced by six Republicans and six Democrats. The Republicans are Baldwin, New York; Bender, Ohio; Clason, Massachusetts; Dirksen, Illinois; La Follette, Indiana; and Vorys, Ohio. The Democrats are Dawson, Illinois; Douglas, California; Doyle, California; Hook, Michigan; Norton, New Jersey; and Powell, New York. The House bill was reported favorably by the House Labor Committee, with only two dissenting votes, Hoffman of Michigan and Fisher of Texas. The former needs no introduction, as they say at banquets, to Nation readers. The latter is a sheep-raiser from southwestern Texas near the Mexican border. The House bill was reported out three months ago and has been bottled up ever since in the Rules Committee.

The Rules Committee, theoretically, is the "traffic cop" of the House of Representatives. It is supposed to expedite action, not to block it. It is authorized to determine when it would be best to let a bill move to the floor and what limitations should be imposed on debate. It is not supposed to consider the merits of legislation. It does, of course, constantly exercise an unauthorized veto on legislation and is trying to do so in this case. Its chairman, Sabath, announced on the floor of the House last Wednesday that he was signing the petition for discharge of the Rules Committee so that a vote could be had on the bill. The fate of the discharge petition depends on the Republican Party, which supported the similar petition on the poll-tax bill last week but has until now played a devious role on the FEPC. The four Republican members of the House Rules Committee did indeed vote in favor of the Norton bill but only after helping the Southern Democrats to delay a vote for three months. And the Republicans did not vote for the bill until they were sure there were enough anti-FEPC Democrats present to block it.

Canada Stands Pat

BY MAXWELL COHEN

IN A world and in a generation that has not yet resolved the great social contests between left and right the Canadian people have sought the shelter of the center. The federal election of June 11 has returned Mackenzie King to power with at least 118 "straight" Liberals to support him and another 8 to 16 Independents, many of whom will vote with him on all major issues of confidence. The victory was scarcely a clean-cut one, for Mr. King, needing 123 seats out of 245, will live precariously on the margin of majority, depending often on the balloting bounty of Quebec and other anti-conscriptionist Independents.

As this is being written, the Canadian press tabulation remains the best unofficial source of the distribution of the vote. But since the armed-service vote will not be announced until Monday, June 18—when it will probably account for another four or five hundred thousand—the conclusions to be drawn with respect to specific numbers and certain seats have a necessarily tentative character. Nevertheless, the main outlines of the result are now evident. Of the total Canadian vote cast of 4,622,513—including armed-service personnel resident and voting in their constituencies—the party totals and percentages were as follows:

Party	Votes	Seats	Votes	Seats
Liberal	1,809,206	118	39 per cent	48.2 per cent
Progressive
Conservative	1,299,484	66	28 " "	26.9 " "
C. C. F.	670,476	26	15 " "	10.6 " "
Social Credit	186,423	13	4 " "	5.3 " "
Labor
Progressive	105,409	1	2 " "	.4 " "
Others	551,519	21	12 " "	8.6 " "

Among the "others" are 8 Independent Liberals, 8 Independents, 2 Bloc Populaire, and one or two other new-born and obscure hyphenates.

There is, of course, no glib, short interpretation of this the first major post-war election in any part of the English-speaking world. The Progressive Conservative Party, formed in December, 1942, out of the ranks of the lagging, twice-defeated Conservatives, had great hopes. Mr. King's refusal to introduce compulsory military service for overseas and the resultant series of crises in his Cabinet, in the House, and in popular sentiment—all topped by his piecemeal approach to compulsory reinforcement—provided a natural campaign platform for a party always well within the flag-waving tradition. The Progressive Conservatives had written off Quebec and were satisfied to fight on the straight issue of a divided Canada—although Quebec was not entirely outside their calculations, since they probably counted on the Bloc Populaire to help overturn the government should Mr. King's margin turn out to be slim.

At the same time the C. C. F. loomed larger than any third party since the western Progressives under Tom Crerar had challenged the Liberals in the early twenties. In the late fall of 1943 the C. C. F., according to a Gallup poll, had risen to command 29 per cent of the potential vote. In Saskatchewan it swept into power and demolished a provincial Liberal machine that had functioned with only one or two interruptions since 1905. In Ottawa it had mustered ten members by 1944, most of whom were articulate, hard-working, and idealistic and at the same time effective parliamentarians. The troops were becoming partial to change, and more than a quarter of a million uniformed Canadians had lived in the politically leftist climate of the United Kingdom. By 1943-44 the C. C. F. looked like the real thing, an authentic political threat to the major parties.

Meanwhile in Quebec the Liberal government of Premier Godbout was beaten, and in federal politics the extreme French right wing, the French Canadian Bloc Populaire, was making political capital at Mr. King's expense. Only the Labor Progressives, the whilom Communists, were no real threat to Mr. King as the election drew near; they were busily knifing the moderately socialist C. C. F. in almost every urban community. Their "line" now was to rally to those from whom the Big Three and particularly the Soviet Union would receive the most likely support. By these curious standards Mr. King warranted their acclaim and, in the constituencies not contested by them, their votes.

The results of the Ontario election on June 11 changed the pattern of Mr. King's opposition somewhat, but appeared in no way to improve his chances. Premier George Drew was returned to office with immensely increased strength. The Liberals lost some ground, and the C. C. F. representation was whittled down disastrously from thirty-four to seven seats. The province of Ontario, with eighty-two federal seats, appeared to be in the Tories' pocket, and June 11 was just one week away.

Why did the results on June 11 run counter to the logic of political decent developments? Why is Mr. King still Prime Minister? There are at least five facts that help explain the results:

1. The Liberal Party continues to be the only great party with a fully recognizable body of support in every province and region of Canada. And while it has leaned perhaps too heavily on Quebec, it has, nevertheless, a truly national flavor and cuts deeply across class lines. It has found support among big business and small farmers, liberal intellectuals and urban workers.

2. For five and a half years the Liberal government has done a first-class war-time administrative job. Fiscal policy, price and wage control, production policy (farm and industry), the compulsory mobilization and use of labor, the mushrooming of the fighting services, all have been handled competently, without fuss, and in some cases brilliantly.

3. The Canadian people have experienced "full" employment, a wider distribution of more than doubled national income, and a rise in "real" income. War-time prosperity has made them almost forget the bitter frustrations of the depression thirties, when government economic policy was pre-Keynes in method and antediluvian in understanding.

4. Nothing that the progressive Conservatives have offered either in domestic economic policies or in international political and economic ideas sounded more "progressive" or more in tune with the major items of the impending post-war world than had already been set out by the Liberals in platform statements as well as in legislation passed or pending. The voter who had not been convinced by the main P. C. line about Mr. King and Quebec could find little in P. C. declarations or leadership to make him hope that this was the party for an uncertain tomorrow.

5. The C. C. F. declined steadily in the last weeks of the spring down to the very day of the election. In the election, the party that had often appeared to be the spearhead of progressive thinking and action in Canada lost its only seat in Ontario, and although it will come to the House with at least sixteen more seats than it had last time, all but one are from the West. Six months ago it was thought the C. C. F. would win sixty or seventy seats. This loss of ground during recent months is not easy to explain. But undoubtedly the most serious handicap for the socialistic C. C. F. was war-time prosperity—the reality of several years of full employment and rising standards in a liberal capitalist society. Capitalism seemed to be working.

The C. C. F. still spoke the old language of the Fabians, still talked about nationalization, still pointed the moral finger at big business and monopolies. But this was the world of Keynes, Beveridge, and Hansen, where private ownership was subsumed, where the real issues were not refinements in the distribution of the national-income pie but the methods of insuring a greater pie, with improving minimum shares for all. Nor did the C. C. F. learn how to translate the great issues of fascism and anti-fascism—of the potential fascism even in Anglo-American society and therefore even in Canada—into concrete believable terms. Mr. Jolliffe's attempt in the Ontario election to saddle Mr. Drew with the ignominy of a political Gestapo spying on his opposition was apparently not enough out of which to make substantial political capital. And finally the C. C. F. said little to meet the great debate implicit in its program, namely, the struggle between freedom and organization. It said little to assure the relatively inhibited Canadian middle-class voter that the C. C. F. had thought out the problems of curbing and qualifying the administrative power of the bureaucracy which would be needed to carry out any full-scale program of nationalization or of controlled private investments.

For these and doubtless many other reasons Mr. King is Canada's First Minister again. He is committed to the attempt to maintain a high national income and maximized employment and to share in all the international obligations soon to be undertaken by the United Nations. He will have perhaps the strongest opposition in the House that he has had since 1925. But out of its criticism and out of the immense fund of his own experience may emerge a more solid national unity and a more skilful approach to the greater difficulties ahead.

The OWI Under the Ax

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

Washington, June 14

UNLESS the Senate reverses next week the House action cutting the OWI appropriation for European activities, America will lose a voice on the Continent at precisely the most crucial stage of the post-war battle for men's minds. With President Truman, in his statement of yesterday, backing the OWI's appropriation request, and with protest over this surrender of the still bleeding European field so widespread, the Senate may well restore the cut. However, the issue is still in doubt here, and it needs airing whatever action the Senate takes. OWI activities to date have cost the American people a bit more than the cost of a battleship before the war. The OWI operated last year on about what it costs the United States to run its share of the war four and three-quarters hours. The OWI spent last year 10 per cent of what Dr. Goebbels spent, and a good deal less than American advertisers spend annually to promote the sale of toiletries. Working on this modest budget, the OWI has had considerable success in accomplishing its primary purpose, to save American lives by shortening the war, and its secondary purpose, to win friends and influence people. Impressive evidence on the first count has been presented to Congress in the form of letters and messages of commendation from various theater commanders: the agency's most celebrated accomplishments were the surrender of the Italian fleet, which was engineered by the OWI radio in North Africa, and the mass surrenders of German troops in the Battle of France under a barrage from OWI mobile transmitters. Even General MacArthur, who long frowned on having OWI personnel in his command, has come around, and recently requested an increase in the psychological-warfare staff. On Guam, according to Major General Henry L. Larsen, new psychological-warfare tactics resulted in the highest proportion of Japanese prisoners ever taken; on Saipan the construction of a medium-wave broadcasting station was the first work ordered after the completion of the B-29 air base; a recent editorial in Stars and Stripes declared that "words are cheaper than blood, and both are helping to win the war."

Confronted with this evidence, the House passed an appropriation of $17,000,000 for psychological warfare in the Pacific. It cut the $17,000,000 appropriation for activities in Europe and the United States, the latter amounting only to $1,225,000. In effect, then, the House said it wasn't interested in the OWI's second objective, to win friends and influence people. A more ill-timed move could hardly be imagined.

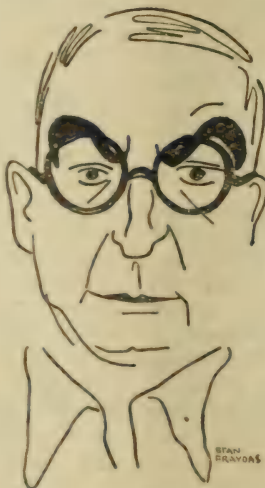

Elmer Davis, head of the OWI, presented the case neatly in his recent testimony before the House Appropriations Committee:

It is evident that the news the Germans are getting now is beginning their education, and every effort is being made to see that the news will give them a real picture of the world they live in—something of which the Nazi government has deprived them for twelve years past. They must learn why they were defeated, why they would certainly be defeated if they ever tried it again, what crimes their army and their government have committed against other nations, why the individuals guilty of those crimes are being punished, and why the German people, which permitted them, share in the responsibility. Somebody will have to take over the American part of that job when the OWI is through; the objectives and the processes will have to be laid down by the best combined judgment of the entire government—and any thorough reeducation will cost far more than the modest amount provided in our budget for its beginnings—nevertheless, the OWI and the Army, in partnership, are responsible for those beginnings, which are already under way. Provision for Germans of coldly objective news about what is happening to them and why it is happening, as well as factual reporting of what is going on in the rest of the world, seems the best way we can begin. What is our job in the liberated countries, now that the shooting war is over in Europe? Basically it depends on three facts: . . . there is still a shooting war in the Pacific; there will be American soldiers in some parts of Europe for an indefinite period; and until the conclusion of peace nations which for years have had most of their information about America from hostile sources must be told the truth about America in the hope and confidence that the more they know about us, the more they will be inclined to be well disposed toward this country, and to give their support to American foreign policies and plans for the peace settlement. Wherever and whenever troops of a foreign country are in the midst of a civilian population, even the population of an ally, there is bound to be some friction. To minimize the effects of that friction has been part of the duty of the OWI since its inception in areas so widely scattered as India, Iceland, and Iraq. We have now undertaken that duty, at the urgent request of the army, in France and Belgium.

These objectives—reeducating Germans, insuring the support of liberated countries, and winning acceptance of American troops abroad—are of undeniable importance. Beyond them lies the necessity of presenting the whole picture of American policy, which can only be set forth by the OWI: neither the State nor the War Department is prepared to do the job. Surely it is better to have our policy set forth in American terms and by responsible authority than in foreign terms and by irresponsible persons. The only valid test of any activity in war time—or in the present distressingly warlike "post-war" period—is its result, not the motive or the relative inefficiency of the operation, or the personalities of those directing it, or the expense. By this test the OWI has served its purpose; it has produced results within the field to which it was assigned, and that field cannot now be vacated. Propaganda is a continuing process; the OWI changed the whole attitude of Iceland's highly cultured leaders toward the United States with a series of articles and radio programs on American arts and science, and helped further Icelandic cooperation with the United States troops stationed there, but last spring the outpost was closed, leaving the field for British and Russian propaganda. The results are not altogether happy to contemplate.

Elmer Davis

We may have to get over our abhorrence of "government propaganda," and decide that if we are to live amicably with our neighbors in the world of tomorrow, we had better try to tell them more about what kind of people we are and the way we operate.

Who Fights Health Insurance?

BY GERALDINE SARTAIN

THE battle against health insurance is on again, this time characterized by several new developments. The most important of these are the advertising campaigns promoted by the organized medical profession in its last-ditch stand against what it calls "socialized medicine." One campaign uses the press as its medium and another the air waves. It is interesting to note that in order to underwrite this type of propaganda the doctors had to do a complete about-face and lay aside their traditional opposition to paid advertising.

Even before Senator Wagner introduced the streamlined Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill on May 24, the organized medicals had gone into action. For the fear of "political medicine" has hung over the American Medical Association ever since the late thirties, when Senator Wagner first introduced an extended social-security measure containing insurance provisions that would enable 135,000,000 people to receive comprehensive medical care. His present bill also would provide every man, woman, and child in the country with good medical care, paid for by 1½ per cent of every wage-earner's pay check, plus a like sum from the employer, plus 3 per cent of the earnings of the self-employed, plus government taxes to cover the indigent.

Through the National Physicians' Committee for the Extension of Medical Service, which has the blessing of the A. M. A., a series of six paid advertisements entitled "Editorials to Editors" and designed to reach the thousands of newspaper editors in this country began running last month in Editor and Publisher and other newspaper trade journals. Each of the series contains a statement of policy in which the committee frankly admits that it "is utilizing to maximum capacity its resources and organization strength in ceaseless efforts to preserve our system of private enterprise." Nothing is said about preserving the health of the nation.

The advertisements urge editors to tell the American people what perils await them: that their "priceless heritage," the private-enterprise system, is endangered; that "the sacred relationship between doctor and patient" is similarly threatened (no mention is made of the millions of our people who have virtually no relationship with doctors, sacred or otherwise, because they haven't the money to pay for it); that "the sanctity of human personality" will be undermined; that doctors are "to be regimented and made subordinate to the bureaucrat, and the people forced by law to accept such medical care as could be provided by a politically appointed bureaucrat."

John M. Pratt, author of the series, executive administrator and publicity man for the committee, has explained that the idea of propagandizing newspaper editors—at a cost of $7,000 for the six advertisements—was the result of two years of experiment on various approaches "to a very delicate public-relations problem." The problem was solved by slanting the editorials so they would arouse fear, while dark hints that health insurance "is a fatal step toward complete totalitarian control over the lives and destinies of all men" play further upon the emotions.

The radio campaign is a large-scale attempt at direct popular propaganda, using the fear technique also, but more subtly. A weekly fifteen-minute radio series called American Medicine started last fall over twelve stations of the Michigan network under the auspices of the Michigan Medical Society. Now this is planned as a national program to be put on by the medical societies of sixteen states and the District of Columbia. It is a disarmingly friendly program, made up of sweet music with a final commercial plug just before the theme song, "When Day Is Done." This plug contains "a brief message from your family doctor" warning the listeners that "no theoretical plan, government controlled and operated and paid for by taxation, should replace the present plan, which allows you to choose your own doctor." Actually the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill specifically safeguards Mr. and Mrs. America in the right to choose their own doctor and the doctor in his right to choose or reject his patients, as well as to join the new health-insurance system or remain outside it.

The proposed national radio show was auditioned recently by the heads of the seventeen medical societies meeting at the headquarters of the Wayne County (Michigan) Medical Society in Detroit. They promptly voted to underwrite the cost. According to the amusement magazine Billboard, the program "is angled at the hottest potato in the field of medical practice today, namely, the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill now before Congress, which sundry medical societies, backboned by anti-Administration pressure groups, have widely smeared with the label of 'socialized medicine.'" A station in Detroit will originate the program and feed it to a special network hook-up of eighteen high-power stations if they accept the program.

Some of them refused it after Billboard ran a streamer line on its almost full-page story, plus an editorial, warning the radio industry that such special pleading presented in the guise of entertainment is bad for radio. Billboard pointed out that the program American Medicine was first turned down by CBS and by stations owned and operated by Columbia because it was controversial. It quoted C. H. Chapman of the Detroit advertising agency handling the program to the effect that it would reach 71,000,000 listeners in 90 per cent of the radio homes at a cost of $70,000 for thirteen weeks. This cost included an $8,000 appropriation for special promotion material to be distributed by doctors belonging to the sponsoring medical societies.

It was figured that the program would cost the 75,000 physicians belonging to the seventeen societies 7 cents a week, or less than $1 a member for the thirteen-week series. The Michigan Medical Society has already spent $21,000 for radio within the borders of the state, Billboard estimates, starting with a five-minute show over twelve small stations which was later stepped up to fifteen minutes. Its current program is a dramatized sketch based on "true-to-life" medical experiences from listeners' letters, the bait for the letters being a weekly prize of $35 in war bonds.

These two campaigns, although new and somewhat startling for the medical profession, are a logical development of its line of propaganda during the last few years. The trade association of organized medicine, the American Medical Association—which fought hospital insurance and prepayment health plans in general until it lost its battle against medical cooperatives in the United States Supreme Court—has long been the spearhead of the fight against both compulsory national health insurance and state legislation providing the same benefits. It has now united with some drug manufacturers and casualty-insurance companies, and seeks to woo big business in general. In California the State Medical Society, with the help of chambers of commerce and other business groups, was able to bottle up in committee both Governor Earl Warren's compulsory health-insurance bill and a similar bill put forward by organized labor.

The National Physicians' Committee for the Extension of Medical Service, sponsored by the A. M. A., has for some time been engaged in a double-barreled, three-year campaign, for which it is raising a million and a half dollars, to kill the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill and to push health-insurance coverage by commercial insurance companies. The committee is pursuing this course despite the fact that commercial health insurance offers no medical services but merely cash benefits for hospitalization and surgery—in other words, provides for catastrophic illness only and ignores the preventive aspects of medical care. Moreover, since commercial health insurance offers coverage only to people belonging to sizable employed groups, the great masses of the population are ineligible for its benefits.

At a public meeting last year the committee held out to these companies the lure of a billion dollars in new business. It has already circulated, through drugstores, doctors' offices, and other media, millions of copies of a pamphlet attacking the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill as "political medicine and the socialization of medical practice in the United States." Some Nation readers have doubtless received this pamphlet inclosed with their doctors' bills or the packages their druggists hand them. In addition, the committee sends regular releases to 12,000 publications to scare the public away from all government plans, state or federal.

All of this is happening in the face of Senator Wagner's clear-as-glass statement and the plain language of the bill itself. Senator Wagner has said:

Health insurance is not socialized medicine; it is not state medicine. It is simply a method of paying medical costs in advance and in average amounts . . . of assuring a person ready access to the medical care that he or she needs by eliminating the financial barrier between the patient and the doctor or the hospital. Therefore it should be obvious that health insurance does not involve regimentation of doctors or patients. Neither do I believe that the doctors of this country will lower the standards of medical care simply because they are guaranteed payment for their services. . . . Social insurance has not interfered with our system of free enterprise; on the contrary, it has helped to make our system of free enterprise operate more smoothly and effectively.

Similarly, Arthur J. Altmeyer, chairman of the Social Security Board, has said:

We think a good program of social security is absolutely necessary if we are to continue to make economic progress, maintain a stable society, and promote a more productive system of free enterprise. When we loose the chains of fear, we really give enterprise a tremendous boost.

In their opposition to compulsory health insurance the A. M. A. and its allied groups have been joined by the American Bar Association, the United States Chamber of Commerce, some other business groups, hospital organizations with a vested interest in voluntary health insurance, some of the farm agencies, the Health and Accident Underwriters' Conference, which has a vested interest in voluntary plans because of the 30,000,000 health and accident policies and the 16,000,000 hospitalization policies in the United States, the American Taxpayers' Association, and similar groups pledged to keep taxes down. On the other hand, all branches of organized labor are for it, and so are the National Farmers' Union and the National Lawyers' Guild. And one must point out that several organizations of progressive physicians have emerged in the last few years. The most important is the Physicians' Forum, the chairman of which is Dr. Ernst Boas, distinguished New York heart specialist, son of the late renowned anthropologist, Dr. Franz Boas. The Forum is an expanding and militant body with growing influence in both professional and lay circles. It is pledged to support the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill and corresponding legislation. The Committee of Physicians for the Improvement of Medical Care, a small, compact group made up mostly of doctors on the staffs of top-rank medical schools, is another progressive medical body supporting national health insurance.

The battle lines are drawn. Hearings before the Senate Finance Committee and the House Ways and Means Committee are promised for this year. Only a few years ago health insurance was a social problem perceived and understood by a mere handful of persons. Today many national polls show that it is wanted by the majority of the American people.

Columbia River Bureaucrats

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

THE novel aspect of the fight now gathering strength in the Northwest over the Columbia Valley Authority is found in the fact that two government agencies are playing an active role in organizing the opposition. Though they are traditionally rival agencies, the Army Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation have formed an agreement to oppose the creation of river-valley authorities. Their chief purpose is to forestall a Missouri Valley Authority, but their opposition extends to one for the Columbia.

Both the Army Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation are old-established, highly centralized agencies, with powerful political connections formed over a period of years. Both regard their traditional policies and procedures with a semi-religious veneration. Within the limitations of this attitude, both agencies are efficiently operated and can be credited with truly impressive accomplishments. Enduring examples of the great work they have done may be found throughout the West. In the past they have frequently clashed over matters of policy, but the opposition which they share to integrated regional authorities has effected a reconciliation. Both organizations are today conducting an under-cover campaign against the various proposals to create a Columbia Valley Authority, particularly Senator Hugh Mitchell's Senate Bill No. 460. The Bureau of Reclamation has always regarded power development as incidental to reclamation; the Army Engineers have always thought of it as incidental to navigation and flood control. It is quite natural that the two agencies should be critical of proposals fundamentally at variance with their respective philosophies. But their clandestine alliance with various special-interest groups constitutes a major public scandal.

The link between these agencies and the private interests that oppose a CVA is the National Reclamation Association and its state and regional affiliates. Since "reclamation" is a magic word in the West, the association provides the perfect front for the forces fighting river authorities. For many years the National Reclamation Association has been an arm—more accurately the "private lobby"—of the Bureau of Reclamation. Its officials have always worked in close collaboration with the Commissioner of Reclamation. Like the bureau, the association is interested not in power development but in old-style, single-purpose reclamation projects. It was once a vital and progressive force, but the dirt farmers of the West have gradually withdrawn from membership, and today both the national association and its affiliates are dominated by the railroads and the private power interests.

The campaign against the CVA was launched at the convention of the National Reclamation Association held at Denver in November, 1944. It was apparent to the genuine reclamationists at this meeting that the private power interests were in control. Two basic themes were emphasized—opposition to regional authorities, including a CVA, and praise for the concordat between the Army Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation. Adoption at this meeting of a resolution opposing valley authorities and recommending river development by existing agencies was followed by the adoption of similar resolutions at meetings of the branch organizations.

At these state and regional meetings "the private power boys" were again much in evidence. The chairman of the resolutions committee at the Oregon Reclamation Congress, for example, was the attorney and principal lobbyist for the Pacific Power and Light Company. At a regional meeting held in Spokane a representative of the Washington Water Power Company acted as page and doorkeeper, and the company supplied the stenographic service.

High-ranking officials of the Army Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation also attended the meetings. When called upon to present the point of view of the Bureau of Reclamation on river-valley authorities, one prominent official declined to speak on the ground that the issue was "too hot." The Army Engineers, however, unhampered by any connection with the Department of the Interior, have not hesitated to make known their views. At a recent meeting of the Montana Reclamation Association, Colonel Conrad P. Hardy, district engineer, exclaimed: "While our young men are giving their lives in this war, are we going to let fascism be set up right in this country? Although river authorities are not fascist in name, they are fascist in character." The general strategy of the fight against a CVA was prepared at these meetings, and the delegates were repeatedly assured that "ample funds" would be "forthcoming" to finance the campaign. At the Oregon meeting speakers suggested that the Power Division of the Department of the Interior be abolished and its functions returned to the Bureau of Reclamation.

Next the various state legislatures were urged to go on record against a CVA. A memorial asking Congress to defeat "any bill to establish a Columbia Valley Authority" was approved by the Oregon legislature after it had "studied" Senator Hugh Mitchell's bill for exactly ten minutes. This memorial was introduced at the request of the Oregon Reclamation Association (Portland Oregonian, March 3). A regional meeting of the reclamation association was held in Spokane on March 9 for the specific purpose of organizing a grass-roots campaign against a CVA. As a result, resolutions and petitions against Senator Mitchell's bill were adopted by civic groups, chambers of commerce, and similar organizations throughout the Northwest.

Thus a number of interests are lined up against the CVA: two old-line government agencies, with many "friends" throughout the West; the private power interests and the railroads, working through the various reclamation associations; the reclamation associations themselves; the chambers of commerce; and many absentee-owned or -controlled industries. In addition, organized labor is to some extent opposed. In the Northwest the private power interests have shrewdly cultivated the political support of organized labor by working out satisfactory agreements with such unions as the electrical workers. Dave Beck, the dominant labor leader in the region, is reported to be unfriendly, if not actively hostile, to the idea of a CVA. Lined up in support of a CVA are the various public-utility districts, the Oregon Grange and the Washington Grange, the C. I. O., and the unnumbered but also unorganized friends of public power throughout the Northwest. Not a single metropolitan newspaper in the area supports the proposed CVA, nor does the rural press, with a few notable exceptions. The fact that the public-power fight cuts across party lines in the Northwest makes it difficult to present the proposal as a clear-cut political issue.

Other federal agencies in the region, while not as actively hostile to a CVA as the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army Engineers, give it only lukewarm support. Some of their officials like to quote Mr. Ickes's remark that the problems of the world cannot be solved "by lighting a candle and intoning 'TVA, TVA, TVA!'" And they stress the differences between the Tennessee Valley and the Columbia Valley. Admittedly such differences exist. Soil-erosion and flood control were important considerations in the Tennessee Valley; neither is a major problem in the Northwest. Irrigation was not greatly needed in the Tennessee Valley; it is of paramount importance in the Columbia basin. The development of domestic water supplies was a need in the Tennessee Valley; it is not particularly urgent in the Columbia Valley. Fishing and logging, minor factors in the Tennessee Valley, are major industries in the Northwest. There were no pre-existing reclamation projects in the Tennessee as there are in the Columbia Valley, and the problem of government lands was not involved. In considering the powers to be granted to a Columbia Valley Authority these differences should be carefully examined, but they should not be permitted to obscure the necessity for regional planning. It was required in the Tennessee Valley to rehabilitate an area; it is required in the Northwest to develop an area.

The really important difference between the two regions lies in the fact that existing government agencies had confessed their inability to solve the problems of the Tennessee Valley. The TVA did not have to cope with the opposition of such powerful agencies as the Bureau of Reclamation and the Forestry Service. While Mr. Ickes, by his support of river-valley authorities, has indicated a commendable willingness to permit the reorganization of the Department of the Interior, his subordinates yet stubbornly resist such proposals.

A major reorganization of all federal agencies concerned with the protection and utilization of natural resources is implicitly involved in the idea of river-valley authorities. In the past such agencies have functioned nationally in their specific separate fields—wild life, parks, forests, soils, or mineral resources; the success of the TVA shows the value of a different approach—of an integrated development of natural resources on a regional basis. For this the most efficient tool is the public corporation.

While the need for a reorganization of federal agencies concerned with natural resources was not stressed in the fight for the TVA, it will be a major issue in the fight for the Western valley authorities, those proposed for the Columbia, Rio Grande, Central, and Missouri rivers. The public should therefore scrutinize carefully any changes President Truman may make in the Cabinet. To supplant Mr. Ickes, for example, with some Westerner identified with the work of the Bureau of Reclamation or the Army Engineers, whatever his reputation as a "conservationist" or "reclamationist," would certainly not improve the prospects for the early establishment of a Columbia Valley Authority. As a doughty fighter, Mr. Ickes is just the man to deal with the bureaucratic collaborationists in the Department of Interior. At the proper time and place he can be relied on to curb their thinly veiled political activities against the public interest.

[This is the last of three articles on the development of the Columbia River Valley and the need for a CVA.]

In the Wind

ERICH VON KUEHNELT-LEDDIHN, journalistic apologist for Franco and the House of Hapsburg, has dropped the pseudonym "Francis Stuart Campbell." His articles are now signed "Richard F. Kestrick."

THE COLE CHEMICAL COMPANY of St. Louis is currently advertising "Bral—for Relief of Hangovers" in medical publications. With each advertisement is a postcard which a doctor may send for a professional sample.

RIDERS ON THE SUBWAYS of New York can now contemplate these two advertisements: (1) "Meet Miss Subways—Charming Veronica Robinson. Blue-eyed and lovely, Veronica is a statistician who dreams of being a model." (2) "'Low, I am with you always.'—Mathew 20:20. Best Seller Publicity of New York."

V. S. PRITCHETT, the urbane London diarist of England's New Statesman and Nation, records in the issue of May 19 a conversation he had with a horse on V-E Day. "A damn good thing it's over," said the horse. "Now we can get rid of . . . all these damn regulations and damn foreigners, Dutch, French, Greeks, the whole damn lot. Send the Jews back to Palestine, the Americans back to America, the Italians back to Italy. They've been the ruin of this damn country, filling it with half-caste Negro babies. It will take us two generations to recover from it, and unless we put some discipline into people this poor old country will sink to the level of the damn Portuguese." "At which," says Mr. Pritchett, "she cantered off. Quite a number of the damned horses in my part of the country think like this. What have all these foreigners done for us (they ask) that they should now eat our food? One of the repressed emotions of the war: Xenophobia is about to be released like poison gas."

LEGISLATIVE MEMO: The salaries of postal employees range from $1,200 a year to $2,100. A temporary cost-of-living bonus, amounting to $300, will expire June 30. The Post Office Employees' Salary Reclassification bill, which would grant a permanent increase of $400, has been passed by the House and is now in the Senate Committee on Post Offices, headed by Kenneth McKellar of Tennessee. This would be the first permanent increase since 1925.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

Bulgaria from the Inside

BY CONSTANTINE POULOS

Sofia, June 2

IN GREECE people say, "Wait until the British troops leave." In Bulgaria they say, "Wait until the Russians leave."

It may be too early to judge, but in both countries the failure of Great Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States to agree on a constructive post-war policy is apparently having tragic consequences. The people of these countries, one a long-time ally and the other a former Axis satellite, are being squeezed between the conflicting purposes of Tory Britain and Russia. In Greece the British have suppressed a popular movement and strangled the hopes of the Greek people for social and economic freedom. As a result, fascists and quislings are now riding herd over the patriots who not only resisted the Germans but preserved the faith of the Greek people in an Allied victory. In Bulgaria made-in-Moscow Communists are attempting to shape a popular movement according to Russia's needs. The typical trappings of Communist strategy—despotism, maneuvers, seduction, and the repression of existing or potential opposition—threaten to revive the old sharp antagonisms and to prevent the free social development of the Bulgarian people.

Instead of an honest understanding between England and Russia, which would develop into a common effort to help small nations like Greece and Bulgaria to work out their economic and social salvation, we have, on the one hand, British intervention to stifle a social revolt, and, on the other, Soviet determination to exercise complete control over a people's government. The alternative to such one-sided, selfish action—joint Allied action in support of the truly democratic socialist movements which have developed naturally out of the liberation struggle—has been made impossible by the struggle for strategic bases and spheres of influence.

The chief onus falls on British Tory policy. Long before Tito had rallied the majority of Yugoslavs to the partisan cause, long before Bulgaria came under Communist influence, even before the Greek Communists had escaped from the island dungeons of Metaxas, which were turned over intact to the Nazis by the King's ministers, the British decision to maintain control of Greece was publicly proclaimed. In other words, the pretense that Britain acted suddenly in Greece to prevent the bolshevization of the Balkan peninsula and the extension of Russian influence to the Mediterranean should be respectfully interred. Prime Minister Churchill's barefaced reactionary solution in Greece was certainly a challenge to the Soviet Union, and after last December's sordid events in Athens the Russian grip on Bulgaria inevitably tightened.

Russian interference in Bulgaria has not yet reached the degree of British intervention in Greece, even though Bulgaria, unlike Greece, was behind an active war front. The presence of Russian troops enables the Bulgarian Communist Party—the favored political party of the occupying forces, according to the Teheran formula—to dominate the present Fatherland Front government of Bulgaria, an unnatural coalition of the Agrarian, Communist, Social Democrat, and Zveno parties, the last-named made up of reactionary army officers and conservative intellectuals. Among other important factors which strengthen the position of the Bulgarian Communists is the hope that Russia will oppose the efforts of those members of the United Nations which want to make Bulgaria pay heavily for its alliance with Hitler. There are also a number of sincere Agrarian-leftists who fear that a break-up of the coalition might ease the way for such a bloody suppression of popular forces as took place in 1923-25; they therefore favor close cooperation with the Communists even though for the present it means playing a subordinate role. Bulgarian Socialists, far to the left of the Communists, are supporting the government because they believe that the present opportunity to start the Bulgarian nation on a new path toward progress and democracy should not be lost. The liberal, non-Communist youth look across the border at the fascists holding sway in Greece and draw closer to Russia.

Thus the influence wielded by the Bulgarian Communist Party today is far out of proportion to its actual size. Controlling the Ministry of Interior and the national militia, it is trying to force unquestioning adherence to the party line by all Bulgarians and to strengthen its position for the eventual showdown. Though none of the honest Democrats or Agrarians desire the dissolution of the Fatherland Front, they are determined, especially since they have seen the Communists in action, to cut the Communist Party down to its real strength by a revision of the relationship of the parties and by obtaining their participation in the government on the basis of actual membership. Now that the war is over, this will be done as soon as it seems possible without incurring the wrath of the Russians. The only danger that this internal showdown will be violent and bloody comes from the military, who are professionally inclined toward a coup d'état, and from opportunist agrarians, conservative intellectuals, and chauvinist politicians who fear the increasing power of the workers and socialist trends among the peasants.

Undeniably the Fatherland Front government has brought Bulgaria a long way since the bloodless revolt of September 9, 1944, which followed the Russian declaration of war and the entrance of Russian troops into the country. A Bulgarian army fought with the Russians against the Germans in Hungary. Most of the men who formulated and carried out the pro-Nazi policy have been punished. Many social and economic reforms have been initiated: the democratic organization of cooperatives has been encouraged, higher education is being decentralized, and laws for the protection of workers' rights have been strengthened. A trade agreement has been signed with the Soviet Union, and diplomatic relations have been reestablished with Yugoslavia.

On the other side of the ledger, altogether too many middle- and upper-class Bulgarians still smugly defend Boris's pro-Nazi policy as having been in the best interest of the country. "It kept us out of trouble," they say, "and besides what else could we do? Our only mistake was to declare war on Great Britain and the United States." They ignore the various anti-Allied acts of the pro-Nazi government. They don't like to talk about how Bulgaria supplied the Germans with coal, bolstered the German economy in other ways, and policed sections of Greece and Yugoslavia for the Nazis. They try to forget their part in stripping Yugoslav territory of all livestock and food products and in stealing tobacco, grain, wine, and olive oil from Greece—even the books from its public libraries. They see nothing significant in the fact that Bulgaria has suffered less than any other belligerent country on the Continent. Only the effects of our very successful political bombings of Sofia hint that the war passed this way. Food is abundant, the faces of the people glow with health, and in the fields one sees plenty of livestock. The trains, hotels, restaurants, shops, and bars are crowded with people whose pockets are full of money.

These Bulgarians want the Russian soldiers to leave because then, they think, the workers' aspirations can be curbed; the Russians irk them, moreover, by parking their tanks on the courts of the Tennis Club. As in Greece, the pro-Nazis, the anti-Semites, the non-resisters, and the war profiteers have all become vociferous pals of the Anglo-Americans.

Their attitude, however, does not alter the basic fact that the present government of Bulgaria represents not only an honest effort to break with the past but also the stirrings of awakened peasants and workers who are trying to keep step with the forward march of peasants and workers in other European countries. The workers who took part in a great May Day parade in Sofia were resolute and proud, enthusiastically demonstrating their strength. Like the Greek workers and peasants before the British intervened, the Bulgarian workers and peasants are expressing a strong will for freedom—not just their dislike of the King, their desire for bread and work, but their will to abolish tyranny over their lives and minds. In Greece the British ruthlessly drove this feeling as far underground as it had been under Metaxas, and in Bulgaria the Russians are disciplining it according to a strict party pattern. The Greek workers who demanded "bread and work" last fall are now dead, in jail, or terrorized into silence. The Bulgarian workers who recently made similar demands were publicly denounced by the Communists as diversionists and enemies of the state; a handful of coal miners who struck for higher wages in March were castigated as "anarchists" and rushed off to jail by the Communist-controlled militia.

Possibly Russia's attitude can be explained in terms of the insecurity it feels, of its belief that the capitalist countries are resuming the below-the-belt opposition they gave up in 1941. The Russians know that the British deliberately encouraged anti-Russian feeling in Greece to such an extent that regular Greek soldiers in Salonika beat up Soviet soldiers who had been German prisoners of war ("They were not Russians, they were Armenians," was the comment of the British consul-general in Salonika) and in Athens tore down photographs of Stalin and burned the Soviet flag.

The Russians know that after the liberation of Greece the British told the Greek people that for them the war was over, that they had contributed far beyond their full measure to the common struggle. The resistance forces were urged to lay down their arms and return to their homes and fields to take up the task of reconstruction. Yet three months later the British helped the puppet Plastiras to raise and equip an army of 300,000 carefully selected anti-Communists, thousands of whom had been members of the Nazi-created Security Battalions. For what? The Russians have good reason to fear that the British are trying to build up Greece, and Turkey too, as a buffer state. And so we have a vicious circle—and the Russians do not stay the hand of the Bulgarian Communists.

The war ends on this sour note. The common people of Greece and Bulgaria, full of hope for democratic, socialist development, for peaceful regeneration and lasting happiness, are trapped between reactionary intervention which is destroying their hope and strength, and restrictive interference which denies them freedom of action and expression. The tragedy of this, as Harold Laski and many others have so often pointed out, is that the United States, symbol of liberty, trusted and respected by the Russians as well as by the common people of Bulgaria and Greece, could have acted as the balance wheel. It could have insisted on a middle course and saved these people from the pressure of the extremes. The revolution could have been guided, instead of being crushed.

In the decisive past two years the respect and trust for the United States which Wendell Willkie aptly labeled "a reservoir of good will" has been utterly wasted by indecision, appeasement, and reaction. We failed to live up to the American promise because we failed to comprehend the social upheaval that was closely linked with the anti-fascist liberation struggle and turned up our noses at the awakened popular forces of Southeastern Europe. We flirted publicly with Otto; we dismissed men from the Greek section of the OWI's Overseas Branch because they dared to mention the E. A. M. in broadcasts to Greece; we stopped the Bulgarian section of the OWI from broadcasting denunciations of King Boris and his policies to the Bulgarian people; we forbade the Italian section to refer to the Italian partisans as "partisans"; we closed our eyes to the struggle in Yugoslavia and tried to make believe that Tito didn't exist; we listened to decadent diplomats and prejudiced missionaries who told us that the people of Rumania and Hungary didn't want democracy.

Today any change may be too late. Our influence and prestige are no longer enough. Our talk of free government and economic well-being sounds very hollow to the frightened, confused people of Europe's small nations who are huddled on the sidelines watching the British and the Russians maneuver. Our task has become more difficult and our obligations greater. We must move quickly and effectively if we are to obtain for the common people of the world security and material plenty without a sacrifice of personal and political freedom. It is, of course, far more likely that this heavy task will fall to the British Labor Party and the British workers. But how much greater would be the chance of averting the new catastrophe if the United States did its share!

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

AUSTRALIA is coming to seem very close. It appears that the American editor of Angry Penguins is in New York, and he has sent The Nation a long angry letter about my comments on the Ern Malley hoax with the demand that it be printed in full. He obviously has picked up Australian ideas of space which don't apply to these pages. Here are the more pertinent parts of his letter.

In The Nation of May 5 your literary editor returns to the Australian literary magazine Angry Penguins, and in her double-jointed summary of the Affaire Malley she commits errors of fact and at least one error in spelling, which error gives the impression that she is as authoritative as some theater and literary critics who neither bother their objectivity too much by going to the play or by turning a page of a closed book. . . .

If Miss Marshall had read the poems and comments with less fulsome dispatch she would have correctly read the name of Lieutenant McAuley. He becomes McAuliffe in her perception and column, and three times tried at that. Further, Miss Marshall correctly objects to the philistines, noting that the hoax, to them, now discredits modern poetry. Yet she quotes a philistine point of view by Dorothy Green which has the added virtue of stemming from the Communist literary front and is intended to add discredit, not only to the Malley poems as a whole or in part, but to any avant-gardism not seeing eye to eye with them. . . . The Herbert Read cable was followed by a letter from Read which illustrated a point of view held by T. S. Eliot (to be published later) and by many other critics, but Miss Marshall preferred [to quote] the telegraphic response. . . .

. . . A recent note from a friend in Sydney establishes the fact that Lieutenant McAuley is now writing in his best Malley form, as a convinced disciple of his own creation. Read the poems, Miss Marshall.

I apologize—to Lieutenant McAuley—for turning him into McAuliffe. Mrs. Green may be a philistine. The remarks I quoted were not of that order. As for her politics, my opposition to party-liners would be ill served if I resorted to their own tactics and denied the soundness, in this case, of Mrs. Green's observations merely because she is a Communist. For the rest, I did read the poems—that old and by now toothless saw used by critics of critics, namely, the charge that "he didn't even read the book," really ought to be retired; I quoted their defenders; I attacked the philistines. To be sure, I also gave the editors of Angry Penguins due credit for providing the philistines with so fine an opportunity. Was I expected to insist that the poems were authentic—no matter how authentic a poet may have invented them—when they had been proved otherwise?

The most interesting item in the letter is the news that Lieutenant McAuley is now writing in the Malley manner.

A FEW WEEKS AGO I made some rather sad remarks about the passive non-resistance of American movie audiences. I should have gone on to say that I don't for a moment think that all the people all the time are taken in by the idiotic situations, the unlikely characterizations, and the false values of the radio, the movies, the pulps. They are taken in by the assumption that they can't do anything about it. What this country needs is ten thousand cat-call clubs, equipped with boos and penny postcards and dedicated to the proposition that the laws of credibility, if not of aesthetics, should be observed. I can already see the march on Hollywood—and I think the police would go over to the people.

Take, for instance, the Utah ranch home portrayed in "Thunderhead." The rancher and his family are no richer than most Utah ranch people, but they live in an elegant fieldstone house straight out of Westchester and furnished by House Beautiful. No wonder I had my doubts about the authenticity of the behavior of the horses. And I couldn't help thinking how good the picture might have been if it had conveyed the real quality of ranch life.

"YOU ARE CURIOUS TO KNOW," writes the principal of a school in Detroit, "what [advertising] material is being used in the schools." Then he continues:

Literally tons of advertising material is sent openly into the schools in the form of "helps" to teachers—much better "helps" than the taxpayers are willing to pay for by taxation. Of course they pay for the advertising. Overworked and naive teachers gobble up these colorful charts, booklets, cut-outs, pictures, essay contests, etc.

Administrators and executives are dined and fussed over. Just today I "missed" a dinner given by the Chamber of Commerce. Superintendent Stoddard of Philadelphia said last month that "the marriage of business and education must be consummated." What have we been up to all these years?

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST came out for Gertrude Stein in its issue of May 12. In an editorial it called "Wars I Have Seen" a "mighty fine book" and even put forth an ingenious and amusing defense of Miss Stein's grammar. "Some people think that [hers] is a cockeyed way of writing, but you could say that it is actually in the great tradition of American letters—that is, you could if you included in that tradition the testimony of eminent Americans before investigating committees." Then the editorial quotes two examples:

But it got along in the winter, and then it came February, as I seem to recall it, of 1934, and my company got a telegram, the General Motors people got a telegram, and all the companies that were in the automobile manufacturers' code got telegrams; and the same telegram went to the President of the United States, and the same telegram went to General Hugh Johnson, the head of the National Recovery Administration. It was like these telegrams that go about now.

It had not been many months before that I had been here in Detroit many long weeks in the interest of the company I represent because the banks had closed, and with the banks the automobile plants were practically closed and it was a very serious thing.

The story of a people's movement, its rise to power, its policies and its program.

LEFT TURN CANADA

by M. J. COLDWELL

With an Introduction by Eric Estorick

The Parliamentary leader of the C. C. F. relates the development of the farmer-labour organization and surveys Canada's world role as a Middle Power.

$2.75

at all bookstores

DUELL, SLOAN and PEARCE

I HAVE A SUMMARY of an interesting report on the winter theater season in Rome which was written for the Italian newspaper Il Popolo by Dr. Carlo Trabucco. American plays aroused the greatest interest. These included Clare Boothe Luce's "The Women," Irwin Shaw's "The Gentle People," John Steinbeck's "The Moon Is Down," Lillian Hellman's "Watch on the Rhine," and Ernest Hemingway's "The Fifth Column." I'm not surprised to hear that "The Women" had a great success. "The Gentle People" was also popular. The other three were "not warmly received." The Germans of Steinbeck and Hellman, according to Dr. Trabucco, seemed unreal to the Italians, who have so far not met with "such romantic and generous Germans." I haven't seen "Watch on the Rhine," but I should agree with the Roman verdict on "The Moon Is Down." On the other hand, Lincoln Kirstein reported that the Steinbeck play was liked in France.

Mr. Kirstein reports, incidentally, that the Austrians, "with a heavy German accent," refer to Hitler not as the Führer but as GAK and GROFAZ. "The way they say it," he adds, "it sounds wonderfully filthy." GAK stands for Ganz Alte Kämpfer (Real Old Fighter); GROFAZ for Grösste Feldherr Aller Zeit (Greatest War Lord of All Time).

Mr. Kirstein has also sent me two items about Knut Hamsun, recently arrested. One reports that Hamsun had a nervous breakdown when he heard that Germany had capitulated. The other quotes an article Hamsun published in the Norwegian paper Aftenposten:

I am not worthy to speak noisy words on Adolf Hitler, and his life and work present no opportunity for sentimentalities. He was a fighter—a fighter for humanity—and it was his mission to proclaim the gospel of the rights of every nation. His was the figure of a reformer of the highest rank. It was his historic destiny, to live in an era of unparalleled brutality, to which he finally succumbed. This is the view which all ordinary Western Europeans can take of Adolf Hitler. And we his intimate disciples bow our heads in face of his death.

"Ordinary Western Europeans" would certainly be the first to admit that Hitler succeeded in "reforming" large segments of humanity into blood and soil. Buchenwald and Dachau were only the most impressive of the graveyards he built.

"Poisonous Honey Brought from France"

THE AESTHETIC ADVENTURE. By William Gaunt. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

MR. GAUNT begins his survey of the aesthetic movement with Gautier and ends it with Roger Fry, whose theory of Significant Form he calls "art for art's sake brought up to date." Obviously this is a considerable field to treat in a 250-page book crowded with names and picturesque details. There is, to be sure, a theory to account for the rise and fall of aestheticism, but it serves chiefly to furnish some sort of cohesion, and the stress is upon narration and description. All the principal figures get at least one anecdote, plus a brief characterization; some of the lesser ones, including the unfortunate Simeon Solomon, who

The Nation Associates

CORDIALLY INVITES YOU TO ATTEND A

Dinner

IN HONOR OF

Dr. Thomas Mann

ON THE OCCASION OF HIS 70th BIRTHDAY

Monday, June 25, 7 P.M.
Waldorf-Astoria Hotel

SPEAKERS:

Dr. Thomas Mann

Supreme Court Justice Felix Frankfurter
Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes

Dr. Juan Negrin

Prime Minister of the last Republican Government of Spain

William L. Shirer

Foreign Correspondent and Commentator

Robert E. Sherwood

Playwright

RESERVATIONS: $25

Proceeds will be used for a program
of political education for democracy.

The Nation Associates
Twenty Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

damned himself as irretrievably as Baudelaire or Wilde but got no more for his soul than Enoch Soames got, come in for proportionately fuller treatment. The stories of Whistler's suit against Ruskin and of Oscar Wilde's condemnation are also told well, even though they have been told a good many times before, and certainly the book is an entertaining pot-pourri. Perhaps it is also the best rapid survey of the whole field, though it obviously cannot go very deeply into the work or character of any one man.

Possibly the aesthetic movement doesn't deserve much fuller treatment. Chesterton once remarked that there are two ways of being a slave to the public: one way is to be afraid to disagree with it; the other to be afraid to agree. And it may be persuasively argued that even the biggest men who linked themselves with the movement—even, let us say, Baudelaire and Whistler—were too much concerned with the trivial business of shocking the public, too much therefore slaves of the public, to be really of the very first class.

Mr. Gaunt's theory is that the aesthetic movement began in France as a protest against the philistinism of the post-Napoleonic era. "Thus," he writes, "the artists were gradually forced by circumstances into the position of an aristocracy. The squalor of bohemianism was an accident. . . . With contempt for those who did not understand there grew up the feeling that art was necessarily divorced from the common affairs of men." Here the disputable word is "forced." I realize, of course, that during the decade now just past the tendency has been to assume that everything and everybody is always "forced"—usually by something called "conditions"—to be whatever it or he is. But I wonder whether it is not the business of a good man or a good artist to refuse to be precisely what "conditions" force him to be, and I wonder whether, indeed, one of the measures of the goodness of either a man or an artist is not just his ability to resist this "forcing." From what I read here and there I gather that Evil with a big "E" and even Original Sin are coming into favor again with certain philosophers. Personally I am not too much attracted by theological terms, but I must say that until it can be shown much more conclusively than it ever has been that men who have been exposed to the same "conditions" behave in the same way, I think it necessary to assume the existence of some force operating from outside these conditions. Henry James and Emily Dickinson did not waste so much of their time shocking the public as Oscar Wilde and Swinburne did. Does that mean merely that they were not "forced" by so many "conditions," or does it mean that they were better artists and therefore less slaves to the public?

Mr. Gaunt remarks shrewdly that the "aesthetic man," a creature who recognizes no duties and pursues no interests except those of art, is a fiction comparable to the "economic man" postulated by a different set of theorists. In the words of the aesthetes "great thoughts, great emotions were lacking. They were, indeed, deliberately avoided." But as Chesterton, again, pointed out, the most damning charge which can be brought against the aesthetes is that they were frauds, that they did not practice what they preached. Art, they said, has nothing to do with morality, or as Wilde put it, "there is no

BOOKS FROM CORNELL

WRITERS AND THEIR CRITICS

By HENRI PEYRE

Sterling Professor of French, Yale University

"Professor Peyre gives us a shrewd and sensible document and himself embodies his own theory that scholarship has a duty to the public."—Howard Mumford Jones, The New York Times 340 pp., $3.00

SAFEGUARDING CIVIL LIBERTY TODAY

By BECKER, LERNER, FLY, CUSHMAN, BIDDLE, and DAY

These essays are the Edward L. Bernays lectures on civil liberties for 1944. The five lecturers have all been conspicuously involved either in the public discussion of our civil liberties or in official responsibility with respect to them. 158 pp., $2.00

CIVILIZATION AND DISEASE

By HENRY E. SIGERIST

William H. Welch Professor of the History of Medicine in The Johns Hopkins University

"A thoroughly readable book in one of the most fascinating fields of history. . . . Dr. Sigerist treats his rich material with admirable organization and selection, and writes clearly, urbanely, and unpretentiously."

—John T. Frederick, The Chicago Sun
255 pages, 52 illustrations,
8vo, cloth, $3.75

ORDER FROM YOUR BOOKSELLER OR CORNELL UNIVERSITY PRESS
ITHACA, NEW YORK

Harper Books on Timely Topics

BIG GOVERNMENT

CAN WE CONTROL IT?

By Merlo J. Pusey

Editorial Writer, Washington (D.C.) Post

Foreword by Charles A. Beard

President Truman's recent request for Congressional action on the reorganization of Federal big business as discussed in this widely acclaimed book suggests its urgent interest and timely value.

"The great importance of this book lies in its warning and instruction for theorists and practitioners now inclined to an extreme specialization."—Washington Post. • "... an important contribution to one of the most serious questions of our time—how to reconcile personal liberty with strong government."—Thomas K. Finletter, Free World. $2.50

TIME FOR PLANNING

A Social-Economic Theory and Program
for the 20th Century

By Lewis L. Lorwin

Former Economic Consultant, National Resources Planning Board

Foreword by M. C. Hedges, Director of Research, International Brotherhood, Electrical Workers.

This book answers those recent writers who assert that only "free enterprise" can assure freedom from "sectionism." "A thoughtful, informing and sober-minded guide."—Chicago Sun. "... it is so logical and realistic that even the most diehard opponents of planning are likely to find themselves persuaded if they can overcome their prejudices sufficiently to read the book."—The Nation. $3.00

ECONOMIC DEMOCRACY AND PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

A Study of the Relation of Economic Groups to the Federal Government

By Michael O'Shaughnessy

Author of Peace and Reconstruction

This book which shows how our economic system can yield a high standard of life for all and still assure a more democratic basis of operation will be of interest to all concerned to see what "religion in business" may mean today.

"An unusually thoughtful job in defending the right of the common man to the American way of life."—Henry A. Wallace. "A provocative book which should be studied by all of those who are sincerely interested in achieving full production and employment in the postwar world."—Philip Murray, President C.I.O. $2.00

All books available at your bookstore or from

HARPER & BROTHERS 49 East 33rd Street
New York 16, N. Y.

such thing as a moral or immoral book." But many, perhaps most of them, were actually, like Wilde himself, obsessed by morality, and the fact that it was morality in reverse does not change the result. Few Victorians ever strove more persistently to be pure than Wilde strove to be perverse, and the limitations which he thereby imposed upon himself were, if anything, narrower than those of the most rigid bourgeois respectability. The Hays Office is no doubt a bad influence upon the present-day movie. But it is probably not nearly so deadening as it would be if, as the result of some fantastic change of policy, it should draw up a code designed to guarantee conspicuous and pervasive naughtiness in every film turned out.

Few will be disposed to dispute the conclusion that the "nineties grow smaller" in retrospect, but some may wonder whether it is equally certain that "there was in total result a grain of beauty, impossible to weigh and estimate against the insignificant expenditure of lives." Even as a destructive force used to disrupt an ossified Victorianism the aesthetic movement was far less effective than was that sponsored by such new prophets and preachers as Wells and Shaw—possibly because, as the latter insisted, man is so incorrigibly a moral animal that it is always to the preaching of a new morality, never to the mere denial of any current moral code, that he responds. Moreover, even the puritan Shaw forgets to be instructive rather more often than most of the aesthetes forgot to be perverse. They used to pretend that the perception of beauty could not really begin until one had got over being shocked. The truth is that when one ceases to be shocked, one ceases to find any interest in most of their writing. It is shocking or it isn't anything—which is why it is read chiefly by the very young—in mind if not in years.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

BRIEFER COMMENT

Business Man's Dream

ALTHOUGH LISTED AS A SERIOUS BOOK on economics, "Prosperity—We Can Have It if We Want It," by Murray Shields and Donald B. Woodward (McGraw-Hill, $2), really belongs in the class of light summer fiction. It is, in fact, a veritable tale of Schéherazade that the economist of the Irving Trust Company and the assistant to the president of the Mutual Life Insurance Company have concocted for the delectation of tired business men. It is a tale of a business men's paradise, where the New Deal ogres are chained down, where corporations literally do not have enough taxes to worry about, where the cost of running the government in the post-war period—outside of interest on the debt—is far less than even before the war although the business men's income is tripled or quadrupled, where business men dress up as Santa Claus the whole year round and through "plastics, electronics, synthetics, and innumerable other magic procedures... give to us more than any Christmas tree of our childhood promised in our fondest expectations to contain"—a paradise, in short, where all of us, rich and poor, live in a perpetual "age of miracles, and the greatest miracle of all is the certain knowledge that tomorrow will contain a greater miracle than today."

The title of the book is quite appropriate. All that is necessary for business men to do in order to get their prosperity is, first, to eat a good dinner at the club, then sit back in a comfortable overstuffed chair, light up a king's-size perfecto—and dream.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG

The Jewish Case

ERNST FRANKENSTEIN, an eminent German-Jewish émigré jurist, has presented the case for a Palestinian homeland for the Jews as persuasively as it can be stated in "Justice for My People" (Dial, $2.50). "The Jewish people," he declares, "will never commit suicide or slowly disintegrate under the impact of Communist or internationalist tendencies. Since, then, the Jewish problem will not be solved by the disappearance of the people, there is no alternative but the removal of Jewish homelessness." This excellent treatise is somewhat marred by a note of pretentiousness. There is no reason why any author, writing on this subject, should say: "I have tried to state the [Jewish] case to the best of my powers. Another man might have succeeded better. But none was there to take up the task, and my people could wait no longer." Such a statement makes sense only if the author is thinking of the strictly "legal" case which he presents. The case has frequently been presented in non-legal terms. Actually this, as many another cause of justice, is not most persuasive in its strictly legal terms. The morality of the issue outweighs the question of legality.

Uriah Zevi Engelman's "Rise of the Jew in the Western World" (Behrman's Jewish Book House, $3) is an invaluable historical study of the social and economic evolution of Jewry in Western Europe from the beginning of the Diaspora through the development of bourgeois society. Population and other social statistics add valuable data to the social study. The thesis of the volume is succinctly expressed in its closing sentence: "Jewish modern population expansion came with liberal capitalism. Will it go down with it?"

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The German Character

IS NATIONAL CHARACTER AN ILLUSION as Hamilton Fyfe thinks, or is it a reality as Emil Ludwig wants us to believe? A century ago the German was generally supposed to be intelligent, kindly, peaceable, gently patriotic, fond of music and of home. An entirely different character grins at us from the portrait Ludwig offers in his recent book, "The Moral Conquest of Germany" (Doubleday, Doran, $2). The Germans are eternally dissatisfied; Faust is the typical German. They crave power, we are told, but at the same time their ambition is to obey; they are inclined to harshness, do not know or love liberty, and have a mystical urge for expansion. German nationalists as a rule have insisted upon the fixity and clarity of their abstract character. It is surprising, therefore, that Ludwig too believes "there is hardly any difference between the German character of eighty years ago and the type which will be found by the armies of occupation." This divergence of views on the immutability of the national character would matter less were it not for the conclusion that the treatment of Germany should be based upon

A German Testament

HITLER AND BEYOND

by Erich Koch-Weser

SIDNEY B. FAY, Professor of History at Harvard, says:

"As one of the framers of the Weimar Constitution, and later as Minister of Interior and of Justice, Erich Koch-Weser played a notable part in the efforts to save his country from the Nazis, whom he abhorred. With genuine honesty and deep feeling he gives a very interesting, temperate and well-balanced analysis of why the efforts failed. He corrects many prevalent misconceptions and holds out hope for a new and peaceful Germany. His volume, completed just before his death in exile, is a valuable contribution to the understanding of Germany."

$2.75

This is a BORZOI BOOK.
It is for sale at all bookshops and is published in New York by ALFRED A. KNOPE

PROSPERITY CAN BE PERMANENT!

Peace, as well as war, CAN produce
60 MILLION JOBS

Depressions are NOT Inevitable!

Henry A. Wallace believes that total employment IS possible. He not only believes this, but has THE PLAN to bring it about. So grandly simple are the details, so urgent that you know them NOW, that you owe it to your future to read—

AN UNCOMMON MAN:
Henry Wallace and

60
MILLION JOBS

by DR. FRANK KINGDOM

- The America we have. What do we want? How can we get it?
- "The world's highest standard of living"
- 7 steps to 60 Million Jobs through world trade
- 60 Million Jobs and Discrimination
- Patents: For Monopoly or Progress?
- Super Social Security
- Two Worlds: Men vs. Dollars
- How to Tame a Cartel
- Henry Wallace: Paradox

Here is the first book to explain Henry A. Wallace's hotly debated plan for 60 million jobs and permanent prosperity. It breaks down into tangible facts and figures the means by which the 60 million jobs can be established and made secure, points out the obstacles that must (and can) be removed.

Here, too, is THE book about America's stormy petrel, the most controversial, most hailed-and-damned figure of the decade. Read AN UNCOMMON MAN and you will, perhaps for the first time, know the truth about the famous Wallace-Jones feud, the ganging up of the Southern senators against Wallace, the strange events that kept him from re-nomination as Vice-President.

For a fascinating size-up of Henry A. Wallace and his plan for 60 Million Jobs, read Frank Kingdom's plain-spoken, timely book: AN UNCOMMON MAN.

Regular Edition, $1
DeLuxe Cloth Edition, $2

THE READER'S PRESS, Inc.
220 Fifth Ave., New York 1, N. Y.

Please send me a copy of AN UNCOMMON MAN, by Frank Kingdom, in the

- ☐ Regular Edition, @ $1
☐ DeLuxe Cloth Edition, @ $2

I enclose $..... in payment.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

Zone..... State.....

the analysis of this character, of which Goethe and Beethoven, Hindenburg and Hitler are assumed to be equally representative.

Generally speaking, it is correct that "the true German intelligentsia has for four hundred years remained without influence on public affairs," but the treatment of Germany suggested by Ludwig does not guarantee the restoration of this influence. In the rules for American occupation officers he warns against professors and "scholars" as the most dangerous group. With respect to disarmament, including the production of toy arms, Ludwig indorses the program of Lord Vansittart: "I would give to all Germans a full life and a full larder, but keep their arsenals empty." However, re-education can scarcely be achieved by refusing the Germans permission to travel outside of Germany, by suppressing the freedom of the press, by burning all Nazi books, by banning Wagner from the stage, by humiliating the German people, by "the dismissal of four thousand university teachers," in short, by imitating Nazi methods. The homeopathic treatment of megalomania seems scarcely to fit the aim of instilling "tolerance and liberalism."

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Study of Colonial Agents

DR. ELLA LONN, professor of history at Goucher College and author of several excellent monographs on the Civil War period, enhances her already fine reputation with a study of the men who represented Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, and the Carolinas in London during our colonial period. "The Colonial Agents of the Southern Colonies" (University of North Carolina Press, $5) discusses the beginnings of the practice of sending agents, the manner of their selection, their duties, their contacts with the colonial legislatures, their cooperation with British merchants, and their successes and failures.

Readers will be amazed at the diversity and difficulty of the work of these colonial agents. Few other than specialists in the area have realized the extent either of their duties or of their successes. The writing and teaching of colonial history will be enriched by Dr. Lonn's careful research. This book has an excellent index, a very fine bibliography, and extensive footnotes. The author displays to a high degree the qualities of a fine historian—objectivity, logical organization, a clear interesting style, a sure grasp of the material, and excellent synthesis.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

FICTION IN REVIEW

IF WALTER VAN TILBURG CLARK'S new novel, "The City of Trembling Leaves" (Random House, $3), proved to be at all to my liking, I had intended, before writing about it, to read "The Ox-Bow Incident," his highly esteemed first novel. But the 690 pages of Mr. Clark's present book—it is the detailed story of the boyhood and young manhood of one Timothy Hazard of Reno, Nevada—strained my endurance to the point where no consideration of critical thoroughness could persuade me to pursue this intention. "The Ox-Bow Incident" has been described to me as a tightly knit, dramatic narrative, very much in contrast to the loosely constructed, undramatic "City of Trembling Leaves," and it has even been suggested that in actual composition the second novel may be the earlier work. Be that as it may, I am content to let it rest that "The Ox-Bow Incident" was all it was said to be and that it is only on Mr. Clark's new novel that my opinion diverges so sharply from majority opinion.

I find little virtue in "The City of Trembling Leaves" and a myriad of all too familiar modern vices, of style and thinking and feeling. It is a novel of boogie-woogie Weltschmerz, an anatomy of the melancholy that seems to flourish in the shadow of the bandstand. I have often referred to the influence of hot jazz on current fiction: the more novels I read which are written in the rhythm and vernacular of hot-jazz addiction, and geared intellectually to the level of popular music, the more my distaste for the jazz idiom in literature crystallizes into solid prejudice. This is certainly not to attack popular music, or to offer a low estimate of people to whom jazz is more important than it is to me. It is simply to take a firm position against treating the novel as if it were generated as far below the head as, I gather, hot-jazz music is. And if that will be protested that jazz is an art, if a popular one, with its own discipline and cerebration, then I, in turn, must protest that its discipline and cerebration are not of a kind which artists in literature can borrow to any good purpose. No more than a novelist can gainfully follow the direction of, say, non-representational painting, can the novelist gainfully assimilate to himself the thought processes of the jazz musician.

Here, for instance, is a sample of what I mean by the jazz thinking of "The City of Trembling Leaves"; it is the closing passage of a letter in which Mr. Clark's hero discusses "The Education of Henry Adams":

"So I told Adams one more thing, in order that I should remember it myself. 'Adams,' I said, 'your trouble, after all, wasn't that you wanted too big and too soon. You really wanted the past, Adams, and not enough to go around. You didn't want out, Adams; you wanted in.'

"And I asked him one last nasty question.

" 'Adams, weren't you in love with a stained-glass Virgin? "

Mr. Clark's protagonist has already discredited Adams by calling him to account for not properly appreciating Lincoln (the relation, by the way, between left-progressive political attitudes and hot jazz in current fiction is itself a big, provocative subject which I hope some day soon to have time to dwell on) and by paralleling a thirteenth-century peasant contemplating the stained-glass Virgin and a twentieth-century boy gazing in awe at a new motor car. Surely this is a style of thought which, if not bred in the murky atmosphere of the jazz hangout, would nowhere be more quickly taken for the happy light of a real mind-at-work. Nor do the high Nevada mountains to which Mr. Clark flees from the dark smoky places purify his thinking; they only embarrassingly exalt it. To one reader, Mr. Clark's novel has a way of being cheapest when it reaches for the highest peaks. This is also true of Timothy Hazard's symphony—he is a serious composer as well as an inspired jazz player—which reads on paper like nothing so much as a Hollywood dream of musical stupendousness.

THE MALE HORMONE

"A bold, lucid, thorough job on a tough subject."—CHICAGO SUN

by Paul de Kruif

An exciting scientific story of the discovery and accomplishments of the new drug, testosterone, and how it bids fair to maintain total vitality for countless men.

H. LISSER, M.D., Clinical Professor of Medicine, University of California Medical School: "The story of the fundamental biologic and chemical researches culminating in the synthesis of testosterone, and its consequent clinical administration to those whose bodies have an insufficient supply, constitutes a vibrant, inspiring narrative, scientifically correct and indisputable, yet stranger and more astounding than fiction."

NEWSWEEK: "Told in galloping prose and backed by solid, scientific case studies, The Male Hormone traces the history of the hormone that can give men renewed vigor at a time when life is richest and its demands the heaviest."

WILLIAM DEKLEINE, M.D., Commissioner, Michigan Department of Health: "The boldest death fighting story Paul de Kruif has ever penned . . . It is an adventure in plain speaking and daring linguistics."

PHILADELPHIA RECORD: "Vivid personal glimpses of the men behind this discovery . . . fascinating case histories of the men on whom testosterone was tried experimentally . . . Mr. de Kruif has done justice to a very difficult and important subject." $2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York 17

PUBLIC LIBRARY

MOTION PICTURES

NOW RKO

BROOKLYN &amp; QUEENS

ALDEN
Jamaica
BUSHWICK
DYKER
Kellie's
FLUSHING
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
Kellie's
RICHMOND HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway
TILYU

"LUBITSCH HUMOR AT ITS SLYEST!"
World-Telegram

TALLULAH
BANKHEAD • CHARLES ANNE • COBURN
BAXTER • EYTHE
ERNST LUBITSCH'S

A ROYAL SCANDAL

Screamingly Funny Satire on
Catherine of Russia and Her Amours

TARZAN AND THE AMAZONS with Johnny Weissmuller

Samuel Goldwyn
presents
DANNY KAYE
in
"WONDER MAN"
In Technicolor
VIRGINIA MAYO • VERA-ELLEN
and those Gorgeous
Goldwyn Girls

ASTOR
8 Way & 45th St.
Extra Late Show
Every Night
Continuous
from 9 a.m.
Popular Prices

"OUT of this WORLD"

starring
Eddie BRACKEN
Veronica LAKE
Diana LYNN
with CASS DALEY
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

In Person!
ALLAN JONES
GIL LAMB
BILEEN BARTON
JERRY WALD
And His Orchestra
Mighty 7th War Loan
BUY BONDS HERE

NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE
STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
BROADWAY THEA. at 53rd Street. Mats. Wed. & Sat. AIR CONDITIONED

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

The point is, of course, that no novel is bigger than its people and that Timothy Hazard and his associates, although they are considered by their author to be persons of stature and dignity, are actually third-rate types. This is not as apparent in the first half of "The City of Trembling Leaves," where Tim is still a boy and his biography is chiefly a morbidly, protracted shadow-fight with sex, as it is when Tim and his friends grow up and their sentimental maunderings are presented as mature struggles for salvation, their beery bitterness as a tragic commentary on the life of the artist. "You and I tasted the worm with the nipple, Hazard," one of Timothy's painter friends finally puts it; and there is no one even to whisper whatever it is that describes the next degree of the maudlin and platitudinous after "corny."

I read another long book this week, Mary Lavin's "The House in Clewe Street" (Little, Brown: Atlantic Monthly Press, $3)—530 pages. Miss Lavin's novel has none of the inflated quality of Mr. Clark's book; indeed it has none of the obvious modern vices except wordiness; and Miss Lavin's words, although far too many, are almost excessively tempered. "The House in Clewe Street" is what is called, I think, an estimable book, a three-generations portrait of an Irish small-town, middle-class family, done with sympathy and sobriety but crying aloud for both the editorial scissors and creative flair. Even as a change from the self-indulgence and pretentiousness of most contemporary writing, it is hardly worth getting excited about.

DIANA TRILLING

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Dear Sirs:

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

THE Nation

with Harpers
Magazine $6.50

You save $2.50

with Consumers

Union $7.50

You save $1.50

with HARPERS &

Consumers
Union $9.00

You save $3.50

with Free World $7.50

You save $1.50

with Saturday

Review $8.50

You save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION BY ITSELF

1 Year $ 2 Years $11
3 Years $11

Servicemen's Rate:

$3 a Year

Canadian and Foreign
Postage, $1 a Year Extra

☐ Remittance enclosed ☐ Bill me

NAME.....

STREET.....

CITY..... ZONE..... STATE.....

6-23-45

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

PROBABLY no one will ever know why there were two "Hot Mikados" a few years ago or why there should appear now, within a week of each other, two modernized versions of "Pinafores." One of these "Pinafores" keeps some of the old words but re-scores the music as "swing"; the other sets an entirely new book to the music as written; and the two are so different that it would be confusing not to treat them separately. Probably the only general conclusion to be drawn is that Sullivan's score continues to come through with surprising vitality.

The swing version—called "Memphis Bound" and housed in the Broadway Theater—exhibits the virtue and the defect most conspicuous in nearly every all-Negro musical show I have ever seen: the virtue being the gusto with which individual bits are performed, the defect a lack of organization plus a very uncertain pace. Bill Robinson plays Sir Joseph Porter, and his conspicuous presence would be alone sufficient to make almost any performance worth seeing. At an announced sixty-seven he is still an incomparable dancer; but since that fact is generally recognized, it may be more important to point out that Mr. Robinson is also one of the most authoritative comic actors now visible in the United States.

Old-timers like to tell us that all the favorites of their day, ingenue and tragedian alike, had in themselves a power to command attention even when the words they were given to speak were feeble or foolish. Mr. Robinson makes it possible for us to believe that something of the sort may have been true, for he dominates the stage, and he needs only to lift a finger to focus every eye upon him. Something in his very presence seems to say, "Watch me. It will be worth your while." And it always is. No serious actor now playing on our stage really has that power, and though there are two or three comedians—Ed Wynn, for example—who approach it, only Bobby Clark can really challenge comparison with Mr. Robinson. Avon Long, who gets second billing, rises also to considerable heights, and several of the feminine members of the cast distinguish themselves; but the plot, which wastes more than half the evening in an unnecessary attempt to explain why "Pinafore" is being performed at all, is unusually trying even as musical-comedy plots go. Some of the swing arrangements, notably that of the love-versus-reason song, are ingenious and amusing; others seemed to me, who am no aficionado, merely far too noisy.

Any description of George Kaufman's scheme for his "Hollywood Pinafore" (Alvin Theater) is bound to make it seem unmanageable. The idea that the good ship of Gilbert's imagination might become a Hollywood studio ruled over by an incompetent Joseph Porter, frequented by a ten-percenter named Dick Live-Eye, and haunted by a gossip columnist called Little Miss Butter-up, sounds like one of those ideas which occur to farce writers late at night and are given up next morning. Thanks, however, to Mr. Kaufman's unrivaled theatrical dexterity, the whole affair works out very smoothly, and the love of a director's star daughter for a humble writer becomes as unthinkable as that of Gilbert's original heroine for a common sailor. Music from several of the Sullivan operas is nicely adapted to new words, and whatever else "Hollywood Pinafore" may or may not be, it is pleasant to listen to, pleasant to look at, and so deftly paced that its very expertness is a delight and makes one wish that Mr. Kaufman, who is director as well as lord high everything else of the production, would undertake to stage an "Iolanthe" or a "Patience" as originally written.

Several reviewers have complained that the jibes at Hollywood are too reminiscent of those the author has delivered himself of on previous occasions, and even that the movies have so matured that they should now be treated with respect. Possibly there is something to be said for these objections, or at least for the first of them. But the really original musical-comedy books of the last few years can be counted on the thumbs, and "Hollywood Pinafore," besides having the advantage of a distinguished score, is better danced, better sung, better costumed, and better directed than most current musical shows. The charm of William Gaxton usually escapes me, but he is funnier than usual as Dick Live-Eye, and Victor Moore is his usual engaging self. Shirley Booth sings her "I Am Called Butter-up" song so expertly as to stop the show, and Viola Essen, once of Mordkin's Ballet, gives a brilliant performance in one of those dance interludes which have come to be a regular feature of the musical show. This one tells an amusing story about a small-town girl who gets a contract.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IN ADDITION to the plausible falsehoods with which Rimsky-Korsakov described and justified his revision of Mussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" after Mussorgsky had died and could no longer protect his work against this vandalism, there was the plausible argument that if the world found the revision wrong it could always go back to Mussorgsky's original version. But Rimsky published his revision, and had it produced in Moscow and St. Petersburg with Chaliapin in the title role, and brought this production to Paris, from where the revised version was carried all over the world; and once it had taken root in opera houses and in the minds of musicians and the general public, then routine, inertia, and lack of understanding kept it there even after the revelation of the outrageousness of what Rimsky had done.

If it had been discovered that some third-rater had touched up a painting

Stenographic Report of a Debate Between

UPTON SINCLAIR AND GEORGE SOKOLSKY "IS THE AMERICAN FORM OF CAPITALISM ESSENTIAL TO THE AMERICAN FORM OF DEMOCRACY?"

The subject of this debate is of interest to all persons who want to understand the position of capitalism in a democratic order. Mr. Sokolsky supports Capitalism, while Upton Sinclair is against that system. This debate included a long questions and answers period, in which each debater hurled questions at the other. The points brought out are of great value, especially in these days when the assumptions of capitalism are being questioned in so many sections of the world and democracy is being knifed by reactionary forces that want the world to be run along totalitarian lines. Copies of this enthralling and thought-provoking debate are ready for immediate delivery. Ask for "IS THE AMERICAN FORM OF CAPITALISM ESSENTIAL TO THE AMERICAN FORM OF DEMOCRACY?" 25¢ per copy; 10 copies for $1.50; 100 copies for $10. Prepaid. Send orders to: E. Haldeman-Julius, Box 477, Girard, Kansas.

of El Greco to reduce its distortion and make its colors more conventional, everyone would have been horrified and the attempt would have been made at once to restore the painting to its original state. But even musicians and critics haven't seemed to realize that Rimsky did the equivalent when he altered melody, harmony, rhythm, phrase-length, and form in "Boris Godunov": far from being horrified, they have argued that the revision sounded good, failing to understand that the work ought to sound as Mussorgsky intended; and so there has been no pressure on opera companies to counteract the routine and inertia that have caused them to go on presenting Rimsky's falsification years after the score of Mussorgsky's original work had been published. Even after the opera had been out of the Metropolitan's repertory for about ten years and had to be learned anew, Rimsky's falsification was relearned. And it is the falsification to which Victor has again given the permanence and wide circulation of recording in its new volume of excerpts, when it could have recorded the Mussorgsky originals, since Kipnis had learned them for a broadcast, and the other musicians—the tenor Ilya Tamarin, the chorus trained by Robert Shaw, the orchestra directed by Nicolai Berezovsky—were not from the Metropolitan and, having to learn the music, could have learned the original as easily as the falsification.

The volume (Set 1000; $5.50) offers for the most part the well-known excerpts: the orchestral introduction and opening chorus (one side); the Coronation Scene (two sides); Varlaam's In the Town of Kazan (one side); Boris's I Have Attained the Highest Power (one side); part of the subsequent dialogue of Boris and Shuisky, hitherto unrecorded (two sides); Boris's Ab, I Am Suffocating (one side); and the Death of Boris (two sides). The music, most of it, is wonderful; the performances are good (though some fussy phrasing and an erratic tempo caught my ear on the first side). By that I mean, among other things, that Kipnis's singing is richly sonorous; but it would be even better if it were less sonorous more frequently; and at its best it lacks the extraordinary timbre and expressive coloring that make Chaliapin's performances incomparable. On the other hand the new volume offers the choral and orchestral parts reproduced with spaciousness, clarity, and beauty of sound—though I must add that my copy also produced a lot of noisy chatter and "hash" from both surfaces and speakers.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Louis Fischer Elaborates

Dear Sirs: Doesn't your reply to my letter of resignation support my charge that The Nation has a "line" and sacred cows? Your reply admits to at least one sacred cow, Russia.

I have other grounds for criticizing The Nation's treatment of world affairs. I think that your handling of the San Francisco conference, for instance, has been inadequate and misleading. During the many weeks your editors attended that conference I waited, in vain, to see your analysis of the deadly effects of the veto. You remember I wrote against the veto in The Nation a year ago. How much have you said about it since then? I would have other complaints. I thought you would ask me to elaborate. Instead, you say you will elaborate. You promise to "fully develop The Nation's position . . . in an early issue." It will not be too early. If I have hastened the coming of that explanation I have done a last service to the readers of The Nation, to whom I remain attached.

Because you raised the Russian issue I beg leave to reply. I am worried, no less than you are, by the spreading talk of war with Russia. Such a war would be a horrible disaster for mankind. But what is the reason for the mounting "hatred and fear of Russia in the United States"? I abhor the policy that brought Argentina into the San Francisco conference. But surely it is not this which intensifies the peril of war. I condemn the British and American official relation to Franco Spain. But this, obviously, does not threaten to precipitate a clash between the Western powers and Russia. Nor can the growing antagonism to Russia be traced to the unfortunate policies of Great Britain or the United States in India, Greece, or Italy.

What accounts for the present high peak of fear of Russia is Russia's expansion in Eastern and Central Europe. You seem to overlook that factor. You put the blame solely on Britain and America. I think the blame ought to be distributed more widely. I think the Big Three, perhaps all the Big Five, are helping to ruin the peace. But to you, England and the United States are the devils, whereas Stalin, though he misbehaves on occasions, is the archangel. Such preference reflects unclear thinking. It is born of double standards in politics. This is my real quarrel with you—the double standards. You condone and apologize for what Russia does. When you do hint ever so lightly that Moscow may have made a mistake, you immediately point to grave capitalist sins. You discriminate; you therefore distort.

Perhaps you believe that the present hatred and fear of Russia stem from ideological differences. I wonder. Haven't we just finished pumping more than eight billion dollars' worth of lend-lease into Russia? We did not do it out of love for Russia. It was dictated by sensible self-interest. And that self-interest was stronger than ideology. Today too, in my opinion, the tension between Russia and the West is due, chiefly, to national and imperial factors.

You say Russia's expansion is not imperialism but "primarily a security policy." How many sins have been committed in the name of security. You cannot prove that Russia's policy is for security. You could prove that all imperialists and aggressors have pleaded security as their motive. Japan wanted Manchuria for "security." Then it wanted China for the "security" of Manchuria, then Siam, Malaya, and the Indies for the "security" of China. Hitler had similar apologies and Mussolini too. In the present air age there is no security in territory. The only security is in effective international organization. The current quest for "security" via spheres of influence and empires will destroy, has possibly already destroyed, the chances of effective international organization. Is this correct? Have you stressed it?

I see this is getting long. I will stop in a moment. You contend that Russia "is carrying through an anti-fascist policy." I could give you a list a yard long of Soviet steps, at home and abroad, that are not anti-fascist, that are, on the contrary, dictatorial, unilateral, anti-democratic, and conducive to neither freedom nor peace. Was the partition of Poland between Hitler and

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating. Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK NATION

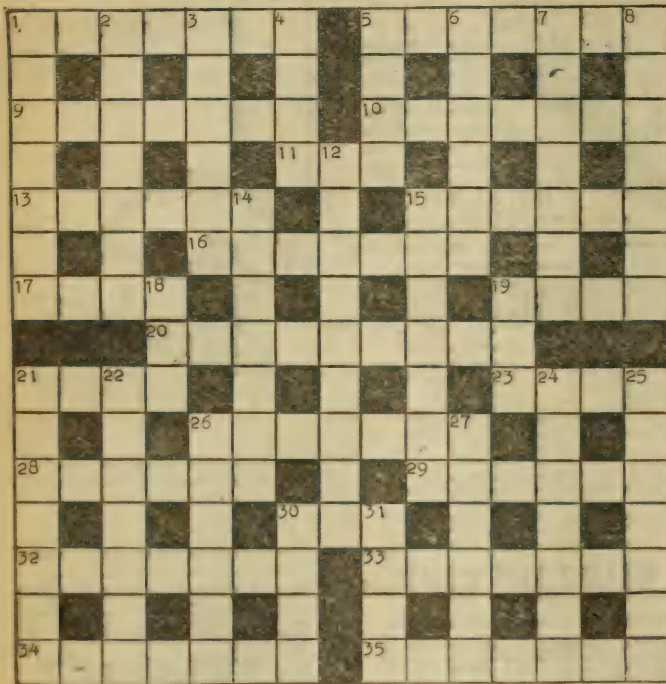

22 East 17th Street, New York City

RESORTS

On Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.
90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of
DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations.
Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N. Y. C. R. R. to Amenia, N. Y. Open all year
WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATION
EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 4108

Crossword Puzzle No. 120

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Giant in Pilgrim's Progress, owner of Doubting Castle
- 5 Greek goddess after whom Athens was named
- 9 A miser, of course, but why drag gin back for him?
- 10 Family prominent in Dickens' Nicholas Nickleby
- 11 German river
- 13 Half of what we hear and a third of what we read, usually
- 15 What the S in H. S. H. stands for
- 16 A man of learning, or his pupil perhaps
- 17 Is up and down and looks like going off
- 19 The seer has gone all Irish
- 20 Exam reply (anag.)
- 21 The dream of a waking man
- 23 Mixed diet
- 26 Well-devised, and all that's needed to make a politician of Ian
- 28 In which a cue-man shows quickness of perception
- 29 A sister of mercy in close contact with the C.I.O. might well bring a message from the Pope!
- 30 It is fit for a pig
- 32 Dispossess
- 33 Restaurant where you can see what you're getting for your money
- 34 Couches for night-watchmen?
- 35 Back-stage employee. (Wife and furniture in one for some lucky man!)

DOWN

- 1 Unfinished Byron poem, and basis of Mozart's Don Giovanni (two words, 3 and 4)
- 2 Easy to see how it could make Ted sigh

- 3 One thing at least the Chinese can count on
- 4 Isle of Wight town in which saddlers should flourish
- 5 Cryptogram
- 6 Dr. Gallup can't get an opinion out of him
- 7 Animal less common than its red namesake (hyphen, 3-4)
- 8 Stern as a U. S. tree
- 12 The purpose of our ancestors' meetings is debatable (two words, 4 & 5)
- 14 Troops advancing in this formation have a clear view ahead
- 15 A foe of crusaders, but a lad at heart
- 18 Order to view
- 19 Peeping Tom risked one—and lost it!
- 21 O, her Dad kept a secret stock
- 22 The "I hope I don't intrude?" gentleman (two words, 4 and 3)
- 24 Scamped (anag.)
- 25 Pig's foot
- 26 Small, feminine and French
- 27 It is not a mug's game that ends in a draw
- 30 Tess hardens
- 31 Space the wagon turned into

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 119

ACROSS:—1 FORELOCK; 5 BANQUO; 10 REPAVER; 11 REPRIZE; 12 SELMA; 13 DEPRESSED; 14 ELIZA; 16 CULLODEN; 19 SPINGLES; 22 TITHE; 24 SEGREGATE; 26 EMBER; 28 AINTREE; 29 TOASTED; 30 TRASHY; 31 SEA KINGS.

DOWN:—1 FORESTER; 2 REPEL; 3 LEPRACAUN; 4 CARADOC; 6 APPLE; 7 QUIESCENT; 8 OVERDO; 9 PROPEL; 15 IPIUGENIA; 17 ON THE RACK; 18 HEBRIDES; 20 LEAVES; 21 SCEPTRE; 23 ASLANT; 25 EARTH; 27 BATON.

[During the summer months the Crossword Puzzle will appear every other week.]

Stalin anti-fascist? Is Stalin's annexation of eastern Poland, in clear violation of the Atlantic Charter (which Russia has accepted three times in writing), an anti-fascist measure? Is the setting up of a Moscow-made puppet government in Poland anti-fascist and democratic? Is the purging of democratic, anti-fascist, and peasant groups in Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia anti-fascist? Is it anti-fascism which impels the Soviet government to demand that Sweden suppress a magazine which criticized Stalin and to ask that it doesn't happen again. (I recall that Japan made a similar protest to the United States government when Bill Gropper lampooned Hirohito in an American magazine.)

You declare that Russia "has not used its power to keep fascist or ex-fascist kings and generals and admirals in office." No? What about King Michael of Rumania? What about the pro-Nazi generals in the present governments of Bulgaria and Hungary? What about the coddling of over fifty Reichswehr generals in Moscow, although while they were in command of the Ukraine and other territories terrible atrocities were committed there? What about Soviet and Italian Communist support of Badoglio? What about the readiness of Spanish Communists to unite with Spanish pro-Franco Catholics? You will of course tell me that England and America have done similar things. That is correct. But why don't you say that Russia has done similar things? If you discriminate, you mislead.

I have no wish to enter into a controversy. For me this is the end of the matter. I resigned because I did not want to give even the appearance of responsibility for The Nation's partial and therefore wrong presentation of world affairs. I think your reply proves my point.

LOUIS FISCHER

New York, June 12

CONTRIBUTORS

MAXWELL COHEN is a Canadian lawyer and writer now serving in the armed forces.

GERALDINE SARTAIN has worked for the San Francisco Chronicle, the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, the Shanghai China Press, the Paris Temps, and the New York World-Telegram. She is now a free-lance magazine writer.

CONSTANTINE POULOS has been the only American or British correspondent in Bulgaria for the last three months.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 30, 1945

NUMBER 26

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

Spain Stays Out by Freda Kirchwey

Target, Labor's Rights

ARTICLES

Two Major Court Decisions by I. F. Stone

The French View on Syria by Michael Clark

In Free Czechoslovakia by Klaus Mann

Detroit Plans for Chaos by Irving Richter

In the Wind

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

A Visit to "Der Stuermer" by Lincoln Kirstein

Koestler's Alternatives by Martin Lebowitz

Briefer Comment

Music by B. H. Haggin

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Editor and Publisher
FRED A. KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor
J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARK

Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL      JONATHAN DANIELS
CAREY MCWILLIAMS      REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1873, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

709 THE SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE HAS WOUND up its work: President Truman has pronounced a benediction; and as we write these words the delegates are already preparing to start on their long voyages home. What has been accomplished? Is the result worth the effort? People will answer these questions according to their political predispositions, in the light of their hopes and, even more, their fears. Certainly the new world organization will not be hampered in its operations by the shining illusions that bedeviled the League of Nations from the beginning. Rather the danger is that it will be impeded by cynicism and political differences. An advantage of enormous practical importance, which the old League did not possess, lies in the membership of Russia and the United States. Our own view of the new charter is one of very restrained optimism. It promises an instrument which can be used for the preservation of peace if the powers desire peace. It offers a forum for the debate of world problems and a court for the adjudication of disputes. In some structural respects it is better than the League of Nations; certainly it makes more effective provision for the use of force in cases of aggression. It does not create either a world government or a federation of nations; it does not modify in any important degree the existing colonial system; it does not establish freedom where none now exists. The separate sovereignty of the states comprising the new organization is elaborately protected and the authority of the greatest powers is strongly entrenched behind the unanimity rule. But anything less than this would have been rejected, not only by Russia and probably by Britain, but certainly by the United States Senate. The simple fact is that a more democratic instrument would imply a world in which nationalism had been replaced by international brotherhood; such a world could hardly have been fabricated by the gentlemen assembled at San Francisco. A full analysis of the new organization by Percy E. Corbett will appear shortly in these pages together with further editorial discussion.

✱

SOLUTION OF THE POLISH ISSUE HAS REMOVED the greatest immediate obstacle to collaboration among the Big Three and has cleared the air for their next meeting. The Russians were wise not to impose severe sentences on General Okulicki and the fifteen other Poles accused of carrying on diversionary activities behind the Red Army lines. Had any of them been sentenced to death the conversations on the revision of the Polish government would have been gravely threatened; and former Premier Mikolajczyk and the Socialist leader Jan Stanczyk could not have participated in the new government. Some may say that there should have been neither arrests nor trials. But it would have been too much to demand that the Russians should simply renounce the opportunity of proving their case against the London government in the interest of harmony and conciliation. Those whose minds are already set against Russia will dismiss the declaration made by the defendants as "another farcical performance of typical Soviet injustice"—as certain Poles opposed to the new Warsaw government have already done. But this attitude is an offense against the unanimously recognized personal courage of the Polish people, and particularly of General Okulicki. The accused were the last people likely to yield to pressure or fear of reprisal. The London Times, which has never been accused of "following the line," presents a more convincing view. It states that anyone who has been in contact with some of the Polish émigrés in London and has had an opportunity to measure their hatred of Russia could not be greatly surprised to find them involved in anti-Russian activities.

✱

THE MOST ENCOURAGING ASPECT OF THE NEW Polish government is the appointment to the Presidential Council of Three of Wincenty Witos from inside Poland and Stanislaw Grabski from London. No one who respects facts can charge that either one is "in the service of Moscow." Under the present constitution the Presidential Council has great authority. The presence of Witos and Grabski is, therefore, a hopeful sign that Moscow does not intend to force the new Cabinet into a hopeless position of dependence. Nor is there reason to assume that men like Mikolajczyk and Stanczyk, who, on various previous occasions, refused to join the Warsaw regime, have now suddenly resigned themselves to being puppets. These four men seem to offer a reasonable guaranty that the revised government will act, not under the dictates of a single party, but according to the will of the wide range of political groups that comprise it. At the same time it must be recognized that much of the new government's success in the difficult task of reconciling conflicting elements among the population will depend upon the Russians. It will be to Moscow's greatest interest to dispel the suspicions that have surrounded the Polish problem and to prove finally that it is serious when it speaks of an independent, democratic Poland. If truly free elections are held in Poland as soon as possible Russia's moral position, after the months of controversy that almost ruined the San Francisco conference, will be greatly strengthened and distrust reduced to a minimum.

✱

THE APPOINTMENT OF "VINEGAR JOE" STILWELL to command the Tenth Army, conquerors of Okinawa, is bad news for the Japanese but extremely good news for the United Nations. General Stilwell's military prowess is legendary in the Pacific. With a handful of Americans and a few thousand ill-trained Chinese he put up a brilliant defensive battle for Burma in 1942. Three years later these same Chinese, trained in modern warfare, with the aid of a somewhat larger force of American and British troops, reconquered Burma in accordance with a strategic plan drawn up by Stilwell and defended by him against stubborn British and Chinese opposition. Stilwell's value in the final drive against Japan is enhanced by the fact that he is the only American general officer who has specialized on the Far East, is fully familiar with its geography, and has a thorough understanding of both the Chinese and the Japanese. If he leads his Tenth Army into China, he will find ready and enthusiastic cooperation both from the local provincial troops and the guerrilla forces which operate along the China coasts. But above all, Stilwell is a fighting general, the kind of leader who inspires his men to great sacrifices. His appointment indicates that the war is just beginning for Hirohito.

✱

REPORTS OF BOTH CHINESE VICTORIES AND Japanese advances have presented the average newspaper reader with a most confusing picture of the military situation in China. But careful study of the map reveals a clear pattern in recent Japanese operations. Faced by the prospect of an early American landing, the enemy has withdrawn from a large part of the insecure land corridor to Indo-China but has taken steps to widen and strengthen the vital route to Canton and Hongkong. Since those two cities are the key to the rich economic resources of South China, the shift has served to consolidate Japan's position and make the Allied task more difficult than ever. Much the same sort of shift has been under way on the China coast. The Japanese have retreated northward some miles beyond Wenchow but have established powerful defenses to protect Hangchow Bay and the vital industrial area northward toward Shanghai. Although the evacuation of the China coast opposite Okinawa seems to invite an American invasion in this area, the difficult communications between this stretch of coast and the interior render such an expedition of doubtful value. The Japanese may have been weakened by our air attacks on the home islands, but their strategic position in China is still strong.

✱

EXCEPT FOR ONE SECTION, WHICH SEEMS TO safeguard Jewish rights in Palestine, we see nothing to commend and much to deplore in the so-called United Nations charter for colonial peoples. The trusteeship idea emerges as a glamorous fraud, a maximum cover for standard imperialism but hardly even a meager concession to the just aspirations for self-rule and self-development of 750,000,000 colonial and colored peoples. The powers may annex whatever colonial territories of the Axis they feel necessary to their security; this takes care of "our" Pacific islands. Whether any conquered territory or existing mandate is placed under the new trusteeship council will depend entirely on the possessing or mandatory power. There is no provision for native representation on the council, or for a right to appeal to it, or for the right of dependent peoples to request an investigation of their grievances. The principal change, so far as dependent peoples are concerned, is that the great powers are permitted to fortify colonial areas and to levy on their population and resources for the defense of the empire which holds them in fief. The powers could not do this under the League mandates system: that is, they could not do it legally; they did do it covertly. Hardly a historic reform.

✱

THE CANADIAN SOLDIER VOTE MERITS STUDY. It shows a distinctly more leftward slant than the civilian poll. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation received 32 per cent of the soldiers' ballots, 16 per cent of the civilian vote; both old-line parties, Liberals and Progressive Conservatives, showed less soldier than civilian backing. The most spectacular C. C. F. victory was, of course, in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, where E. L. Bowerman dislodged Prime Minister W. L. MacKenzie King from his well-worn seat. In Ottawa, the C. C. F. total has now moved up from 10 members in the last Parliament to 28 members—a sizable progressive bloc. Throughout the country its popular vote was well over 800,000, more than twice the vote the party received in 1940. The Toronto Star, commenting on the service vote, wrote editorially: "The military vote is all the more important because it is the vote of young or comparatively young men and women, and may therefore be thought to reflect future trends of thought. No doubt it does reflect such trends. Youth seeks reform. . . . The returning men and women of the armed forces will expect a better Canada than they left behind." It is a pleasure to be able to revise our earlier appraisal of the Canadian election in this hopeful direction. Canada, which in a phrase of Mr. Maxwell Cohen in last week's Nation seemed to be seeking "the shelter of the center," has apparently received an infusion of progressive new opinion from the battlefields which will not be contented with the old political patterns. The C. C. F. is in a crucial position to give responsible leadership.

✱

CONGRESS MADE AMENDS LAST WEEK FOR SOME of its recent misdeeds. In an impressive reversal, the Senate deleted the Finance Committee's limitation on the tariff-cutting powers of the President in the Trade Agreements Act and passed the measure by a vote of fifty-four to twenty-one. Although the Republicans had voted almost solidly against it in committee and had vigorously, but vainly, pressed for crippling amendments, nearly half of them supported the bill in the final showdown. The result seems to presage early acceptance of the legislation setting up the Bretton Woods stabilization program. Meanwhile the Senate Appropriations Committee voted to restore most of the funds for the OWI and the FEPC, which had been eliminated by the House, but the Southern Democrats are expected to carry the fight against the latter agency to the Senate floor. In the House the disastrous Wherry amendment was struck out of the price-control bill, but House Republicans succeeded in pushing through a series of amendments designed to weaken the effectiveness of the OPA's control over food prices. It is to be hoped that most of these last-minute changes, together with the Wherry amendment, will be dropped by the Senate-House conference.

✱

MEANWHILE DIFFICULTIES CREATED BY THE House Appropriations Committee, which has been out of bounds again, remain unresolved. One of its recent attempts to influence policy in the course of providing or withholding funds for federal agencies immediately affects several hundred thousand workers and next winter's food supply. By a recent amendment to the National War Agencies Appropriations bill the House denied the War Labor Board jurisdiction in disputes involving "agricultural labor" as defined by the Social Security Act. This definition includes a larger number of agricultural workers than any of the other definitions adopted by Congress and the various federal administrative agencies. If the bill is passed by the Senate in its present form, existing administrative confusion concerning the status of an extremely large number of agricultural workers will be greatly increased. The situation might then well arise in which the National Labor Relations Board would certify a union as the sole collective-bargaining agency for a group of workers but the War Labor Board would be powerless to settle any strike or dispute to which the union so designated was a party. During the war there have been remarkably few labor disputes in industrialized agricultural areas such as California and Texas. But if the War Labor Board is divested of all jurisdiction over "agricultural laborers" labor unrest is bound to increase there and in other large commercial farming areas. If Congress is really concerned about the food situation it will promptly reconsider this provocative amendment.

Spain Stays Out

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

IN A letter written to the Friends of the Spanish Republic in San Francisco on May 4 Secretary Stettinius insisted that "the question of the admission to the proposed International Organization of specific states not at war with the enemies of the United Nations is not one which is expected to be brought before the conference." He admitted in the same letter that a request for admission by Spain "might properly be entertained by the International Organization after its formation." In a second letter, dated May 25, the Secretary of State repeated the first point and then went on to say that the provision in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals covering the admission of new members would almost certainly "be written into the charter substantially without change." These words represented the view and undoubtedly the intention of the State Department a month ago. It is interesting to recall them today, for events turned out very differently from Mr. Stettinius's prediction—and in the end the American representative on the Commission on General Provisions found it expedient to support the reversal.

The vigorous intervention in the meeting of that commission by Luis Quintanilla, former Mexican Ambassador to Russia, had been long expected and often postponed. But when it came, it was effective beyond the best hopes of the democratic delegates; for Quintanilla's declaration, part of an impassioned speech attacking Franco by name and with specific charges of pro-Axis behavior, was approved by acclamation and will be incorporated in the record of the commission. And among the half-dozen or so supporting statements was one by James Dunn, Assistant Secretary of State, who said, "The United States government is in accord with the sentiments expressed by the Mexican delegate and wishes to associate itself with them." The declaration was general in its terms, asserting only that membership in the new international organization cannot be claimed by states whose regimes were established with the help of countries that waged war against the United Nations "as long as these regimes remain in power." But Señor Quintanilla's explanation of the formula made its meaning amply clear: "We have in mind not only the puppet government of Manchukuo . . . but, closer to us Latin American republics, that in Spain."

Obviously it would have been far better if the wording of the membership clause in the charter had itself been rewritten in the sense of the Mexican declaration, and this was the view taken by the Friends of the Spanish Republic, which had worked consistently for an amendment. But in view of the context in which the declaration was made and the sense of the speeches which supported it—all of them except Mr. Dunn's explicit in their references to Franco—it would be rather difficult for the council of the new world organization to find a loophole for the Generalissimo to crawl through. And so we have reason to rejoice both in the result and in the fact that our own delegation, flatly opposed throughout the conference to any consideration of the question of Spain, was forced at the end to come around far enough to "associate itself" with Señor Quintanilla's eloquent attack on Spanish fascism.

The meaning of the gesture on the part of our government is worth exploring a bit. We don't need to linger over the question whether Mr. Dunn, consistent enemy of Republican Spain, experienced a sudden change of heart. The important problem is whether his statement indicates a change of policy in the State Department. Newspaper comment on the incident has suggested that the United States wished to go along with the Latin American countries—Mexico particularly—in their evident desire to veto in advance any application for membership from Franco. But this is not a very convincing explanation. The Latin American countries tried desperately to bring the issue of Spain before the Chapultepec conference, and the State Department succeeded in preventing it. A more realistic view is that the State Department yielded to a demand which had become too general to ignore or oppose, but managed to do it in a form which leaves its hands untied. First, the declaration has not the force of a clause in the Charter in any case. And, second, if Franco's regime survives, it would be possible, at some later date, to argue—as the Madrid Foreign Office has already argued—that the declaration had no bearing on Spain, since "the [Franco] government was proclaimed October 1, 1936, when no foreigner fought for Spain." This is a lie, but it is a lie which was accepted as truth by the Non-Intervention Committee in London. And if the Security Council also found it convenient to accept it, a way might be found to admit a renovated Franco regime or, even more easily, a regime remodeled to look like something quite different. For the news from Spain indicates clearly that Franco is preparing the way for a new monarchist-plus-fascist set-up. On July 18, the anniversary of his rebellion, he plans to establish a "Council of the Realm," which will be empowered to deal with the question of succession in accordance with Spain's "monarchist traditions." And while cooking up plans to keep himself in power by going through the motions of preparing to replace himself, Franco is also busy reporting to the war-battered Continent that Spain is orderly, well-fed, and about to have a lot of new civil liberties.

The declaration at San Francisco ruling out Franco's dictatorship was a valuable move. The next necessary step is a reunion of the democratic Spanish forces and the restoration of a republic in Spain. The help outside nations can provide in this process is necessarily limited; but one thing at least they can do: they can break with the regime they have shut out of the new security organization. In our own country, we suggest that the Congress adopt without further delay the Coffee resolution calling for an end of relations, diplomatic and economic, with Franco Spain. Then there would no longer be any doubt about the meaning we want to attach to Mr. Dunn's remarks at San Francisco last week.

Target, Labor's Rights

THE Hatch-Burton-Ball Labor Disputes bill marks the resumption of the pre-war campaign by big employing interests and their middle-class sympathizers to amend the Wagner Act so as to make it apply "equally"—as their phrase has it—to employers and employees. This plausible but specious premise overlooks the basic fact that the Wagner Act merely gave labor rights of self-organization for collective bargaining that capital has always had. It did not create an inequality; it corrected one. As far back as the Senatorial campaign of 1938 certain publishers who hated to bargain collectively with their own men offered to support Wagner for reelection if he agreed to amendments of the kind now outlined. It is to his credit that he refused and won without the publishers' support.

Great shrewdness in the field of public relations is evident in the way this new bill has been presented. Senators Hatch, Burton, and Ball, with Hill of Alabama, sponsored the famous B2H2 resolution for world peace. Now, as Hatch told the Senate, they bring forward a plan for industrial peace. Of these four Senators only one, Lister Hill, has been close to the labor movement. It is significant that he has not associated himself with the new bill. Its prime mover seems to be Donald R. Richberg, who trades on his past record as a labor lawyer. But the assets of good-will so acquired have long been dissipated. Mr. Richberg's effort to use Section 7-a of the old NRA to stifle rather than encourage collective bargaining marked his desertion of pro-labor ranks. He has since enjoyed a lucrative practice as a corporation lawyer in Washington, representing notably the Standard Oil interests. The cloven hoof in his thinking is apparent in the velvety phrases of the "Outline of a Program for Industrial Peace," which he made public as chairman of the self-appointed committee that drafted the bill. When Mr. Richberg objects, as he does in this foreword, to the exemption of labor unions from the anti-trust laws, it is evident where his sympathies lie and whom he serves. This hard-won exemption, gained under Woodrow Wilson in the Clayton Act, has always rankled with the corporate bar. If Mr. Richberg could have his way, he would apparently undo not merely Roosevelt's but Wilson's work in insuring minimum rights to labor and minimum protection against "government by injunction."

Many provisions of the bill will impress persons not too aware of the realities of labor's struggle and the inevitable orientation of the courts toward property rights. A few suggestions in it are good. We do not question the good faith of the Senators who sponsor the bill or of all the people associated with Mr. Richberg in this venture. But the skilled corporation lawyer will instantly see its advantages in weakening the Norris-La Guardia anti-injunction law, in opening rich avenues of litigation, in increasing "the law's delays" in the labor field, and in entangling unions within a net of costly and time-consuming adjudication. As one reads the bill, phrase after phrase strikes the eye which will require elucidation in the courts and invite lengthy appeals at every step.

The bill cuts down the area of collective bargaining by exempting agricultural workers, domestic workers, and workers in establishments employing less than twenty men. We are especially concerned with workers on farms and in processing plants, who need protection badly in an era of ever-increasing mechanization of agriculture, and we call attention here to the still-born La Follette bill to insure their rights. The bill also removes from the protection of the Wagner Act a large area of activities that lie between clearly interstate and clearly intrastate business. It then proposes to launch us on the hazardous seas of compulsory arbitration under legal conditions which would make many legitimate union activities punishable by injunction. Workers, for example, are to be protected from "interference, influence, or coercion . . . by any party in collective bargaining." What if a union official tries to influence non-members to join; would that become illegal under the new bill? Individual employees or groups of employees may take up grievances directly with management irrespective of union representation in the shop. This is a good way to split and weaken a union. The bill looks therefore like a measure to cut down labor's rights and to foment litigation. It would upset the measure of stability achieved through judicial interpretation of the Wagner Act, replace the existing National Labor Relations Board, and throw every phase of labor relations open to controversy again. This does not seem to us a wise way to procure stable labor relations after the war.

The thinking behind this bill is, at best, the thinking of the United States Chamber of Commerce. Senator Ball told the Senate that we faced "two major post-war problems." One was a "sound" tax program, the other a "fair" federal labor-relations policy. "Not one, but scores of employers have told me," he said, "that unless and until there is a clarification of federal labor-relations policy . . . there is scant chance that managers of smaller enterprises will risk much expansion in the reconversion period." This is the old familiar bogey. The effective organization of our economy for full employment is the crucial necessity. If we achieve that, labor relations will take care of themselves and taxes will be payable.

UNITED NATIONS CLUB

RULE: All players to play together, but not so as to cramp any player's style. (That would be unrealistic)

'A FINE TEAM—BUT COULD DO WITH A DASH OF UNITY....'

Two Major Court Decisions

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 21

LIBERALS won two victories in the United States Supreme Court this week. One was in the case of Harry Bridges. The other was in the anti-trust suit against the Associated Press. But neither decision was satisfactory. Both were evasive. We have a right to expect more from a New Deal Supreme Court largely made up of younger men with progressive reputations.

It is true that it took courage to free Harry Bridges from deportation and to rule against the Associated Press. Powerful forces, of commanding influence in Congress, the country, and the press, have pursued Bridges with unrelenting hostility for more than a decade. The Associated Press is a combination of the greatest newspapers in the country; their A. P. "franchises" are worth millions of dollars, and their power to make life miserable for any man in political life is obvious.

In the Bridges decision it was disappointing to find the Chief Justice in the minority with Roberts and Frankfurter; Chief Justice Stone's record is a liberal one. There was no surprise in the position taken by Roberts and, truth to tell, little surprise that Frankfurter joined with him and the Chief Justice in about as unenlightened and narrowly legalistic an opinion as has ever come from the Supreme Court. Van Devanter could not have been more complaisant than were Stone, Roberts, and Frankfurter in their acceptance of views which would leave aliens in deportation cases with no protection whatsoever against Congressional bigotry and with very little against administrative oppression. In Frankfurter's case it is hard to believe that this is the same man who fought so bravely for the rights of aliens in the "deportations delirium" after the last war.

Justice Douglas's majority opinion, for himself and Justices Black, Reed, and Rutledge, was narrow and cautious. It invalidated the Bridges deportation order on two grounds. One was that Bridges had not been given a fair hearing on the question of his membership in the Communist Party. The other was that the Attorney General and the lower courts had misconstrued the term "affiliation" as used in the statute. On this second point the majority established a wholesome precedent, of great value in future red hunts and Dies-style persecutions of aliens, government employees, and others. The statute provides for the deportation of persons who are members of, or affiliated with, organizations which advocate the overthrow of the government by force and violence. "But," the majority held, "he who cooperates with such an organization only in its wholly lawful activities cannot by that fact be said as a matter of law to be 'affiliated' with it" (the italics are the court's). This should make it more difficult in the future to deport or to oust from government employment persons whose sole "crime" is that they cooperated with Communists in strikes, in aid to Loyalist Spain, or in other lawful causes.

Unfortunately, having done so much, the majority found it unnecessary "to consider the larger constitutional questions" involved in the Bridges case. It was to those larger questions that Justice Murphy devoted himself in a fiercely eloquent separate opinion concurring in the result reached by the majority but on broader and deeper grounds. The final passage of that opinion ranks with the best of Holmes and Brandeis in its passion for justice and its devotion to traditional American ideals of liberty.

The minority did deal with these larger constitutional questions. No one denies that the guaranties of the Constitution, the Bill of Rights and the procedural clauses, protect aliens equally with citizens. But Stone, Roberts, and Frankfurter agreed with former Attorney General Biddle that Congress can deport aliens for any reason whatever, regardless of the Bill of Rights or these other guaranties. They agreed that an alien who is to be deported has a right only to so much of a fair hearing as is accorded him in the regulations of the administrative agency which handles deportation. And they agreed that the courts must uphold the deportation if there is "more than a scintilla" of evidence to support the order. The majority did not contest these propositions. It contented itself with ruling that Congress did not intend "affiliation" to be construed as loosely as it was in this case and that the Attorney General did not obey his own rules in determining whether Bridges was a Communist.

Justice Murphy felt that to leave the minority opinion uncontested on the broader issues was to free Bridges but to jeopardize the rights of 3,500,000 aliens. If Congress is subject to no constitutional limitations in deportation, Justice Murphy argued, then "the color of their skin, their racial background, or their religious faith may conceivably be used as the basis for their banishment." Justice Murphy attacked the precedents which hold that due process does not apply to deportation hearings because these are purely administrative and technically non-criminal. "The impact of deportation upon the life of an alien," he wrote, "is often as great as if not greater than the imposition of a criminal sentence. . . . There is thus no justifiable reason for discarding the democratic and humane tenets of our legal system and descending to the practices of despotism in dealing with deportation."

Justice Murphy raised two other fundamental points in declaring the deportation statute unconstitutional. He said that "the statute completely ignores the traditional American doctrine requiring personal guilt rather than guilt by association or imputation." It does not require that an alien, to be deportable, "must personally advocate or believe in the forceful overthrow of the government." It is enough if he is a member of, or affiliated with, an organization advocating such doctrine. This brings us to Justice Murphy's second point. He said the statute was invalid under the "clear-and-present-danger" test developed by Holmes and Brandeis to protect basic liberties. "Not the slightest evidence," Murphy pointed out, "was introduced to show that either Bridges or the Communist Party seriously and imminently threatens to uproot the government by force or violence." The statute, the Alien Registration Act of 1940, requires no such proof. These are all issues that the majority must some day face if basic liberties are to be secure in America.

Justice Black wrote a vigorous majority decision in the Associated Press case. The issue of law should be familiar by now. "Freedom of the press" can no more properly be stretched to exempt the newspaper business from the anti-trust laws than to exempt it from the Wagner Act or minimum-wage legislation. "The effect of our judgment," Judge Learned Hand said in the lower court, "will be, not to restrict Associated Press members as to what they shall print, but only to compel them to make their dispatches accessible to others." The issue of fact is whether the membership by-laws of the A. P. and its exclusive arrangements for the exchange of news with its members operate to restrain trade in the newspaper business. If they do, the courts may properly enjoin them. "It would be strange indeed," Justice Black said, "if the grave concern for freedom of the press which prompted adoption of the First Amendment should be read as a command that the government was without power to protect that freedom" from private interference.

The general principles laid down by Justice Black and in the separate concurring opinions of Justices Frankfurter and Douglas are excellent. Unfortunately, anti-trust adjudication is not a contest in philosophic disquisition. The test is the decree resulting from the decision, and the Supreme Court declined to strengthen the decree issued by the lower court, which is as turgid as it is ambiguous. The decree would forbid an A. P. member from vetoing an application for membership from a competing publisher, and it solemnly enjoins other members not to think of these competitive factors in passing on applications. "It is of course true," Judge Hand said, "that the members may disregard the last provision in practice, but that is not to be assumed." Judge Hand seems to have forgotten that he sits in the Southern District of New York, not within the Pearly Gates.

Publishers, an earthy lot, have not been slow to see the advantages of this judicial honor system. One of their sages has already suggested, in Editor and Publisher, that while a member of the A. P. "may remain seemingly inactive" when a competitor applies, "he can have his friends elsewhere kindly administer the anaesthetic." Some cryptic dicta from the Supreme Court indicate that the justices might frown on such procedure. More effective would have been the simple, common-sense ruling that the A. P. must serve all comers. But a decree without loopholes would be a break with the most venerable tradition of anti-trust "enforcement."

The French View on Syria

BY MICHAEL CLARK

Paris, June 21 (by cable)

THE expulsion of the French from Syria, apparently completed last week, has provoked here the profoundest distress. Nobody questions the real meaning of the events in the Levant. The operation carried out under British auspices is seen as designed to liquidate the position of France in the Middle East and compromise it seriously everywhere, particularly in North Africa and the Far East. The weakened French feel they are being forced to yield to the higher interest and superior force of Anglo-American expansion—our new positions must be occupied fast to forestall the possible designs of Russian expansion. But here in Paris the remoter consequences fade before the immediate spectacle: the exodus of French soldiers, priests, nuns, civil servants, professors, and merchants, uprooted and despoiled, occasionally massacred, under the so-called protection of the British army and in a country summoned to play a mature role in the civilized world. François Mauriac, writing in Figaro, expressed in measured terms the feeling of most Frenchmen: "When Mr. Churchill and Mr. Eden in all good faith addressed themselves to France, showering her with promises, they spoke as gentlemen, as Europeans faithful to a humanist and Christian culture. In Syria we are not dealing with gentlemen but with the course of English history, expressed by no human voice, taking no account of human sentiment."

Earlier the British excused their action by invoking the Japanese war and the possible revolt of the entire Arab world, and based press attacks against France and the "chauvinistic," "megalomaniac" De Gaulle on distorted dispatches from the Levant. England was shocked that the French, having brought in reinforcements, proceeded to destroy Damascus by artillery and air bombardment. Armed intervention seemed its sacred duty. Hammering on a pan-Arab sounding board, which only yesterday vibrated to the beat of German propaganda, the British roused the Arab world to a crescendo of anti-French shrieks and howls.

The French delegate in Syria, General Oliva-Roget, recently in Paris, explained what really happened in Damascus. The picture has been completed by various declarations by De Gaulle and Bidault, in addition to speeches delivered in the Consultative Assembly, where the Syria debates closed on Tuesday. This picture is believed here despite the denials of Churchill, Grigg, Paget, et al.

On May 19 General Beynet, General Delegate to the Levant, communicated to the Syrian and Lebanese governments a memorandum designed to form the basis of negotiations leading to a final settlement but in no sense an ultimatum. Beirut and Damascus were in no mood to negotiate. Since the Syrian campaign in 1941, when the British obtained joint control of the Levant, local British intervention and provocation have been directed constantly toward making the French position untenable and assuring the defeat of the Franco-Syrian-Lebanese treaties. France, which had granted Syria and Lebanon a greater degree of independence than any Arab country had under British control, wanted to protect its established interests through a treaty considerably more liberal than the Anglo-Iraqi treaty.* The local governments, however, made the arrival of a few hundred French troops a pretext for breaking off negotiations.

To describe the dispatch of such a small contingent of troops to a country occupied by the vastly superior British Ninth Army as an act of intimidation is obviously far fetched. France, although specifically charged by the Lyttleton-De Gaulle agreement with the maintenance of order in the Levant, had in 1942 withdrawn virtually all its own troops to Libya, leaving in the Levant a territorial force called troupes spéciales, composed of some 29,000 Lebanese and Syrian officers and men under French command. As a gesture of good-will several battalions of these troupes spéciales were recently transferred to the Syrian government. The arrival of 500 F. F. I. troops should not have been taken amiss, particularly when the British constantly move far greater numbers to and from Syria at will. Politically, however, the timing of the reinforcements, delayed by shipping difficulties, constituted a blunder.

Recruiting for the Syrian national army has been carried on for a long time in Damascus, and the troupes spéciales have been exhorted to desert en masse. On January 23 Jamil Mardam Bey declared from the balcony of the Damascus government palace, "The army which we will obtain is the army now serving under French orders." On May 19—the date is important—Hilmi Atassi laid before the Syrian Parliament a bill, Article two of which said, "All Syrians employed in the troupes spéciales are asked to leave their posts within one month after publication of this law and enlist in the national army." At the same time the national army was supplied with British arms. At a Paris press conference on June 7 Oliva-Roget said, "Beginning on May 19 British trucks came almost nightly to the Citadel to deliver arms and ammunition. I assert nothing by guesswork. During the night of May 22-23 sixty British trucks were seen to enter the Citadel and leave arms for the equipment of what is piously called the Syrian National Army." Apparently the Syrian government and the British were confident that the troupes spéciales would desert in droves and that the French, thus diminished, would be unable to control the situation. The troupes spéciales, however, remained loyal—only 11 men and no officers deserted from 21,000—and had to be detached forcibly from French command. Oliva-Roget read a letter by Captain Mohammed Hamer, commanding the Seventh Druse Light Squadron, promising that he and his men would fight to the finish.

On May 20 anti-French demonstrations, partly the result of an incendiary press campaign, flared up in Damascus and Aleppo. By the evening of May 30 order had been restored in Damascus. The "destruction of Damascus" had amounted to the dropping of three bombs of a hundred kilograms on the Citadel, plus twenty cannon shots at the Parliament, where Syrian irregulars and gendarmes had opened fire from behind sandbags on the French headquarters. Elsewhere the French, when attacked, returned fire. On the morning of May 31 Oliva-Roget received envoys from several quarters of the city. They had not come on behalf of the government, then inoperative, but on behalf of certain municipal authorities offering to submit. Oliva-Roget accepted in principle, and the emissaries promised to return at 4 p.m. with a final answer. The emissaries did not return, however, because in the interim it was learned that British intervention was imminent. On June 1 Oliva-Roget received a letter written by Colonel Morgan for the British command on May 31, that is, after fighting in Damascus had stopped. The letter said:

I am charged by the Commander-in-Chief of the Middle East to communicate to you the following order: (1) You have at present no authority except disciplinary authority over your own troops in their barracks. (2) I have assumed responsibility for assuring the protection of the French barracks and installations in Damascus. (3) This being so, there will be no excuse under any circumstances for French troops to open fire in their own defense. (4) I must warn you also that should any French troops open fire, the barracks of these troops will be bombed immediately. I have personally communicated these orders to my troops. (5) All guard posts will be removed immediately; otherwise force may be used. (6) All armored vehicles without exception will be taken to the barracks. (7) No French military personnel will go into the streets without my authorization. (8) Please acknowledge receipt of this communication.

Obedying orders from Paris and London, therefore, the French soldiers silently witnessed their own humiliation and the pillage and murder of their compatriots. These facts are confirmed by a letter written June 3 from Damascus by British Liaison Officer Renton and published in the New Statesman and Nation in London.

Pierre Kauffmann, correspondent of Combat, returned yesterday from Beirut. He writes in today's Combat:

On the plane with me traveled a lieutenant in the Camel Corps. A few days ago he gathered together his company near Palmyra and said, "You have before you an isolated French officer whom you can murder before disbanding." These men from the desert chose to remain under his orders. Shortly afterward the British command intervened, and the lieutenant, according to general practice, was treated as a prisoner by the British. . . . It was to say things like this that I returned to Paris; the cables I sent from Beirut were stopped. . . . Documents exist which prove beyond doubt the nature of the policy followed in the Levant by eminent Foreign Office representatives. General Paget's intervention plan was ready four months ago. . . . The day the pan-Arab conference opened in Cairo, the Anglo-Egyptian censorship prevented mention of the speech of the Syrian delegate, Sahadallah Djabri, thanking Britain for a gift to Syria of 5,000 rifles and 35,000 tons of wheat. . . . The British government pursues in the Levant a policy which shows its determination to eliminate every vestige of French presence. Our people are excluded from the administration of the railways; we are losing the Damascus air base; the role of our officers in joint commissions has become laughable.

General De Gaulle's speech in the Consultative Assembly on Tuesday made it clear that France cannot be bound by a coup de force. Rejecting the fait accompli, De Gaulle offered to hear British proposals transmitted through diplomatic channels; failing which, only international arbitration remains, to which France is ready to submit.

* See Syria, Near-East Cockpit, by Michael Clark, in The Nation for March 17, 1945.

In Free Czechoslovakia

BY KLAUS MANN

Somewhere in Czechoslovakia, May 17

THIS date line has nothing to do with military security; I simply don't know where we are. Maybe this place doesn't have any name? It isn't even a village—just an isolated hamlet, with three or four farmhouses and a tiny church. Well, we are not in a position to be particular. Our car broke down. It was our capricious vehicle which picked this out-of-the-world place to stop.

I am feeling keyed up because I am abroad—in another country. This part of Czechoslovakia has been liberated, and is now being protected, by the Czech and Russian armies. As long as you stick to American-occupied areas, you have never left home. Of course, the scenery changes as you move from one "theater" to another, but there are always the same American uniforms and vehicles, the same American faces and accents, the same American officers and regulations. As soon as you step out of "our" zone, however, things begin suddenly to look different.

We took off from Linz, Austria, this morning and proceeded eastward, leaving behind our familiar G. I. world. Everybody seems pleased to see a couple of Americans. The Czech civilians in the villages wave at us, and the soldiers—Russian as well as Czech—salute and grin and shout "Amerikanski!" The Czech and Russian troops seem to be on the best of terms with each other as well. There is heavy military traffic on the highways—partly in American-made jeeps and trucks, partly in horse-drawn vehicles—and long columns of liberated slave workers and prisoners. At crossroads and particularly crowded spots these movements are directed by smartly uniformed Russian police women, who have at once an authoritative and a graceful manner of manipulating their little red and yellow flags.

You see flags all over the countryside—a lavish display of Czechoslovakia's national colors side by side with the red Soviet banner, the Union Jack, and the Stars and Stripes. Even the smallest villages through which we have passed are festively decorated and have pictures of Benes, Masaryk, and Stalin in the windows.

The peasant woman in whose house we may have to stay tonight told us that Benes had just returned to Prague and received a great ovation. The room into which she has invited us has already been fixed for some Russian officers whom our hostess expects to arrive any day. The wall behind the beds is adorned with a huge crucifix, hanging just over the trinity—Stalin, Masaryk, Benes.

Prague, May 18

It's wonderful to be here, to see the city again, to find it free and practically undamaged. The lights are on, most stores and hotels are open, the streets are teeming with people. And all those flags! Prague looks indeed like a victorious capital.

Benes's popularity seems to have increased enormously during his absence. He has always been liked and respected, but now he is loved as the symbol of national freedom. I daresay his prestige today equals that of his great master and predecessor, Thomas G. Masaryk. Czechoslovakia has a new "President-Liberator."

From our room at the good old Shroubeck Hotel we have a beautiful view over the Wenzels Square. It's fun to watch the crowd—Czech civilians and soldiers, with a sprinkling of Russian uniforms. No Germans. The great question is where to get a bite to eat. The Shroubeck manager informed us politely but positively that he could not feed us unless we had ration cards. Unfortunately, we haven't any.

There was a chap hanging around in the lobby—a slim, gray-haired, rather distinguished-looking fellow—who told us that he was an American, and that he could easily get us all the food we wanted. But for some reason I don't feel like accepting his offer.

May 19

Breakfast and lunch at the Alcron Hotel, which most members of the new administration have made their provisional home. A Czech doctor and government official, just returned from exile, introduced us and made the necessary arrangements. Yet the man hardly knows us. He simply met us in the square and welcomed us as Americans.

In the Alcron lobby we were presented to the new Prime Minister, Zdenek Fierlinger, former Czechoslovak ambassador to Moscow, and to Professor Pazak, Minister of Information. We told Pazak we should like to get an interview with Benes, and he said he would forward our request to the President's office. We were tactfully advised, however, that just now the President is exceedingly occupied and would hardly have time to receive any correspondents.

One of Professor Pazak's assistants, Vaclav Zizka, deputy chief of the press department, suggested that we might like to meet General Charles Kutelvaser, the military leader who directed the uprising of Prague's population. On our way from the Alcron to Kutelvaser's headquarters we passed the ruins of the ancient City Hall, destroyed by German bombs after the armistice had been signed. In many streets we found the pavement still torn open or inadequately repaired—reminding us of the barricades behind which Czech men and women had risked their lives in the fight against the oppressors. Everybody we met seemed eager to tell us all about that violent and glorious episode.

General Kutelvaser, with whom we had a long and cordial talk, described dramatically the development of the patriotic rebellion. It started on the evening of May 4, when people in certain districts of the capital demonstrated against the Nazi regime by tearing down German street signs and posters. The next day came the first clashes between Czech patriots and German troops; the street fighting continued and increased in violence until May 11.

The rebellion was a spontaneous, not to say improvised, uprising. The patriots lacked arms and ammunition. Constantly harried by the Gestapo, they had been unable to communicate among themselves or coordinate their plans. There was no such thing as a revolutionary army; the movement consisted of numerous isolated groups—Czech deserters from the Wehrmacht, units of the Prague police force, student organizations, and so forth. But once the fighting started, this vanguard of liberation was joined by the masses.

"You must keep this in mind if you want to understand what has really happened," the General insisted. "The Battle of Prague was not fought by professional soldiers but by the people. Everybody took part, not only men but women and children. Those who were unable to fight helped by building barricades or carrying weapons and supplies."

In spite of so much patriotic unity and collective heroism, the situation looked grim by May 11. General Toussaint, commander of the German occupation army, had asked for reinforcements; five German divisions were approaching the capital. "The Russians came just in time to relieve us!" said General Kutelvaser. "They looked like angels to us as they moved in from Dresden with their heavy armor and artillery. But they might not have been able to take the city as quickly as they did if it had not been for our preparatory action. And if we had not kept the Germans busy, Prague might not exist today; those vandals would undoubtedly have carried out their plan to blow up the city."

I have just had a telephone call from the Ministry of Information. The President will see us this afternoon! Two Stars and Stripes men will be the first correspondents to be received by Benes in the liberated capital.

The same day, later

I didn't find Benes much changed. He received us in the same room in the Hradshin where I talked with him in 1937. As I congratulated him on his triumphant return, he said: "I have never doubted that I would come back, a little sooner or a little later, and that I would be welcomed by my people the way I actually was. The men and women of Czechoslovakia are with me because they know that my heart has always been with them, even when I was compelled to fight and work for my nation in foreign lands."

The country, he told us, has emerged from the ordeal in astonishingly good shape. The nation is today more united than ever; there have been hardly any quislings. "As for our economic situation, it will quickly improve," he said. "Important parts of our industrial plants have fortunately remained intact. I predict that two or three years from now Czechoslovakia will have regained the prosperity it enjoyed before the German invasion."

The country's present division into two separate zones—one occupied by the Americans, the other by the Russians—does not seem to worry him. "The administration of the Republic is firmly in the hands of the Czechoslovak government," he insisted. Of course the presence of foreign armies always involves certain inconveniences. But Benes emphasized, the behavior of both the Russians and the Americans is absolutely correct. "The Russians," he said, "have so far fulfilled conscientiously all their promises, and I don't doubt that they will continue to do so. Naturally, we shall have to live up to our obligations as well. For instance, it is our duty to feed the Russian forces as long as they are in our country. That may not be easy, but it has to be done."

There was one point which Benes stressed repeatedly. "The future well-being of Czechoslovakia and of Europe," he said again and again, "depends on one vital, indispensable condition—unity among Great Britain, the United States, and the Soviet Union. If they continue to collaborate in peace as they did in war, we may live to witness an era of progress and prosperity; if they fail to do so, there will be anarchy and disaster."

I left Benes, after one hour of stimulating talk, as full of respect and admiration as I had been after our first meeting. His idealistic élan is combined with a good deal of political shrewdness and realism. He possesses both faith and flexibility—a combination which makes him akin to a great American President, the late Franklin D. Roosevelt.

May 20

What a curious place this Hotel Alcron is, with its colorful crowd of government functionaries, high-ranking Czech and Russian officers, diplomats, newspapermen, Czech pilots in dapper R. A. F. uniforms! Most of these people have just come home, after six years of exile. They seem to feel somewhat strange and forlorn in their own country. One young flier told me that he had been born and brought up in Prague, and had spent the past six years in Poland, France, England, and in the skies over many a battlefield, always longing to be home. "Now I am back at last," he said. "It's wonderful, of course, but somehow it isn't quite what I expected. So far I haven't been able to locate any of my relatives or old friends. The Nazis knew I was fighting them; that was why they arrested my whole family."

Any reporter who hangs around this lobby long enough should be able to pick up a lot of stories. But to me the most remarkable thing about the Alcron is the food. In the morning all these important-looking gentlemen and their ladies assemble in the hotel restaurant—the typical pompous dining-room of a typical pompous European palace caravansary. Respectfully welcomed by well-trained and dignified waiters, they take their places at beautifully set tables. The waiters, with long coat tails, white neckties, and all, rush to the kitchen and after a while return, to present—what? A cup of lukewarm Ersatz coffee without cream or sugar, two slices of incredibly poor black bread, and a bit of very dubious jam. That is what the government has for breakfast; if you offered such rations to any G. I. outfit, mutiny would break out. And the lunches and dinners aren't any better.

But nobody here seems to mind; the Alcron clientèle has other worries and interests. They talk heatedly during their pathetic meals and afterward in the lobby. There are so many things to discuss, so many problems to tackle.

"We'll have to work—all of us. We'll have to work very hard," exclaimed one of Czechoslovakia's leading bankers with whom we had dinner tonight. "Reconstruction is a hard, sober task. Words won't help us. One thing that would help us, the thing we need most urgently right now, is transportation. We need lorries. How can we start reconstruction unless we have enough vehicles to transport our men and materials? Lorries, that's what we should have! A tremendous number of them." "Liberation was just a beginning," he went on. "Now we've entered a new phase. The phase of lorries—if you know what I mean."

Let's send plenty of lorries to Czechoslovakia.

May 21

We have had a curious, rather unpleasant experience with the gray-haired American who lives in our hotel. We finally accepted his invitation to have a glass of wine with him in his room. He talked a lot in a nervous, uneasy manner. Though he tried to appear nonchalant, he could not conceal a peculiar embarrassment; there was something hectic about the friendliness with which he treated us. Soon enough we were to find out what made him so fidgety and apologetic.

He had been in Germany during the whole war, without ever getting interned. Afterward he kept away from American authorities and had not yet visited the American-held zone of Czechoslovakia. He asserted, however, that he was anxious to return to the "good old U. S. A."—mainly for the purpose of suing one of the popular New York weeklies which had "slandered" him two or three years ago.

At this point our host did something almost incredibly reckless. He produced the allegedly "slandering" article and the letter he had written to his lawyer regarding the whole affair. This letter, which he was so naive or so foolhardy as to show us, confirmed beyond any doubt the exposé published in the American magazine. The man whose fairly good red wine we were enjoying was described by the New York weekly as a "short-wave traitor" in the service of Dr. Goebbels. And that is what he actually was, according to his own representation. A resident of Berlin for a number of years and an ardent Nazi sympathizer, he had made a living before and after Pearl Harbor by broadcasting German propaganda to the United States. In other words, our nervous host was a minor Lord Haw-Haw or Ezra Pound.

It was only toward the end of the war, when German victory became more and more doubtful, that he retired from his lovely job. The past two years or so he had spent in a Bohemian spa, proceeding to Prague after the German collapse. The first thing he did in the Czech capital was to present himself as an American citizen to the Ministry of Information and to broadcast an enthusiastic eulogy of the anti-Nazi uprising. A fellow with principles!

Obviously he had expected us to be amused by his story or even to sympathize with him in his predicament. Our disgust and indignation seemed to surprise him greatly. "I'm extremely sorry you're taking this view," was all he had to say as we expressed our feelings in straightforward words.

We went over to the Alcron and reported the case to a Czech official. An hour later we were informed that our short-wave traitor had been arrested by the Czech police and would be turned over to American authorities in Pilsen. I suppose investigations about him may still be going on; that is why I prefer not to mention his name.*

May 22

I hate to leave Prague. There are so many issues about which I should like to gather more information.

What about the Sudeten problem? Will it be possible for the Czechs to live in peace with the Goebbels-infected Germans of that area?

What about Slovakia? An English correspondent just arrived from Bratislava told me that Nazi propaganda and Nazi bribes have not been without effect in that part of the republic. The Slovak administration, I understand, still recognizes certain anti-Semitic laws introduced by the Germans.

And what about those lorries?

Clearly, there are plenty of difficulties confronting Benes and his co-workers. But I have a lot of confidence in Benes, and I have a lot of confidence in Czechoslovakia. If any nation has, and deserves, a chance to recover quickly from the tribulations of the past few years, then it is this one. Democrats by instinct and tradition, the Czechs cherish their own freedom and respect the rights of others. They have a shrewd, courageous leader. And they have a beautiful capital—I really hate to leave Prague.

* The traitor who betrayed himself to Klaus Mann is Edward Leo Delaney; his arrest was reported in the American press last Wednesday.—EDITORS THE NATION.

Detroit Plans for Chaos

BY IRVING RICHTER

WHILE the United States Chamber of Commerce has been entering into a Labor-Management Charter with the Congress of Industrial Organizations and the American Federation of Labor, and while progressive management generally is seeking to reconvert to peacetime production with a minimum of economic dislocation, the major corporations in the automobile industry are deliberately fostering disorder and planning for chaos. They have adopted and are acting upon the philosophy set forth last August by John W. Scoville, chief economist for the Chrysler Corporation: "If you believe in economic freedom and competition, then you will be opposed to collective bargaining. . . . As industrial turmoil increases, more and more people will see the evils generated by collective bargaining, and we should look forward to the time when all federal labor laws will be repealed."

To hasten that happy day, automobile manufacturers are actively stirring up the "industrial turmoil" on which they rely. They are doing it in at least five ways. They are fomenting strikes, conducting lockouts which they call strikes, and utilizing all their power as advertisers to discredit labor for striking. They are following a veterans' reemployment and seniority policy which, while it offers little to veterans entering or returning to the industry, attempts to persuade them that their security depends upon the destruction of union organization. They are conducting a campaign to split off locals of the United Automobile Workers' national organization and to reduce them to the status of "independent" or company unions, as a first step toward eliminating collective bargaining altogether. They are carrying on an active anti-labor, anti-Wagner Act, anti-NLRB lobby in Washington. And they are seeking to carry over segments of our economy—notably the National Association of Manufacturers and the farm organizations—with them on the road to post-war strife. The detailed documentation of these charges must await the Congressional investigation which U. A. W. officials have demanded, but enough is already known to make the pattern clear.

First, the widely publicized strikes. Two examples are typical. One day last February plant supervisors at Chrysler's Dodge factory in Detroit summarily fired eight officials of the local union while a dispute on production schedules was going through the established grievance procedure. The next day supervisors at the Briggs plant, a close Chrysler affiliate, similarly dismissed eight officials of the local. Men at both plants, exasperated by a number of earlier incidents, struck. Officials of the union charged that the plant supervisors were acting under explicit orders from the top Chrysler management, whose reliance on "industrial turmoil" has been noted. A subsequent event confirmed their suspicions. When union trouble-shooters, whose task it is to enforce the no-strike pledge, appeared at the struck Chrysler plant, the bitterest opposition to their back-to-work arguments came from a plant committeeman, Ray Lovelace. Despite his efforts, the men voted to end the strike—only to learn that Lovelace had been promoted to a company labor-relations job in the South. "Was this a reward for services rendered?" asked the union.

Where provocation by management fails to achieve more than a momentary work stoppage, the company may resort to lockouts, as in the recent Packard episode. There a small group of men walked out when established grievance procedure was ignored. When the rest of the 20,000 workers reported to work next day, they found the plant gates locked against them. The men hung around or went home—only to read in all three Detroit newspapers, "20,000 Packard Workers Continue to Strike; Cause Unknown." The press generally, hungry for automobile advertising, has played the company game with greater ardor than usual.

The industry's ultimate goal—a return to non-union individual bargaining as it existed in the days of Coolidge—is clear both from its words and from its actions. The Automotive Council for War Production—war-time alias of the Automobile Manufacturers' Association—is actively lobbying for amendments to the Wagner Act and decreased NLRB appropriations; its director, George Romney, has been quoted in the New York Times as warning that reconversion will be delayed by "the operation of collective bargaining."

While publicly bemoaning the war-time strikes, Romney has advocated "more democracy for local unions" and has asked the government to "decentralize C. I. O. power." He knows, of course, that it has been the international officers and regional directors who have made the no-strike pledge stick. What better proof that Romney and his principals, like Scoville, want more strikes, not fewer?

The General Motors Corporation has recently issued to all its foremen an order which strikes at the heart of established procedure for collective bargaining. The order requires the foreman to refuse to call a union committeeman to hear an aggrieved worker unless the worker has first given the complete story of his grievance to the foreman. It further orders the foreman to remain present at all times while the worker and the committeeman discuss the grievance. Obviously this will discourage all but the toughest union men from reporting a grievance. And if the union cannot be used for handling grievances, the natural reaction of the worker will be to balk at joining or paying dues to the union.

Chrysler's economist, John W. Scoville, makes it very clear why the corporations are out to destroy the C. I. O. Automobile Workers: "Fair wages are wages that are just high enough to attract the required number of employees of the desired quality. No labor unions are required to secure fair wage rates." But it is with respect to veteran reemployment and seniority that the industry has most obviously tipped its hand, and sown dragon's teeth which may some day cause serious trouble in Detroit. The U. A. W., with 300,000 members in the armed forces, has a staff of seven veterans working full time on veterans' needs. The organization knows what may happen if efforts to turn veteran against worker succeed and has demanded that all collective-bargaining contracts be reopened for the insertion of veteran-seniority clauses. To date none of the Big Three has complied.

Instead, the industry's proposal is to grant to veterans a so-called "super-seniority" which in effect provides that the employer can fire anybody at any time, even a veteran of World War I who has been with the company ever since, in order to put a returned veteran in his place. Having displaced the senior employee, however, the returned veteran does not achieve seniority himself under the company proposal. On the contrary, he can be fired like any other novice after the one year provided in the Selective Service Act. In short, the automobile industry proposes to destroy seniority altogether, for veterans and non-veterans alike, under the guise of providing jobs for returned service men. Ultimately the best protection for the veteran as for everyone else will be jobs for all—60,000,000 jobs. The industry's program is to sell the veteran the notion that the only way for him to get a job is to take it away from someone else.

Detroit has tasted full employment—and the companies don't like its savor. Rufus Tucker, General Motors economist, puts it this way: "I believe that three million is the minimum possible allowance for unemployment, even in years when the demand for labor is high." Actually, Tucker's figures call for seven million unemployed in 1950—the three million mentioned, plus four million others—"practically all the men in the emergency labor force and practically all the women who would normally have retired, and at least two-thirds of the women who would not normally have entered the labor force." Scoville, the Chrysler economist, writing in Barron's, adds that the right to a job is "one of the most absurd of the current fallacies"; it could be established only by "replacing freedom with communism."

With so many millions out of work, who will buy Detroit's automobiles? The industry has an answer to that one, too. Current demands on the OPA to permit a 25 per cent price increase for automobiles show one side of the coin. The other side is the low production quota of 200,000 automobiles for the rest of 1945, made necessary by present steel shortages. After six months of such limited production, with plants like Willow Run closed down altogether without plans for reopening, Detroit will have sufficient unemployment and industrial turmoil to satisfy the most turmoil-loving enemy of collective bargaining. Incidentally, limiting automobile production to a few hundred thousand a quarter, divided among half a dozen companies—instead of the 10,000,000 annual production the U. A. W. says is possible and practicable—will make an unassailable case for price rises and open up a post-war perspective featured by fewer cars, more unemployment, racial tension, veteran unrest, and wider profit margins than ever before. Already progress has been made, with an estimated 120,000 let out of jobs since or in anticipation of V-E Day.

Fortunately, attempts to seat other economic interests on the same post-war toboggan have so far not succeeded. The automobile lobby in Washington has joined hands with food processors and with Senator Lee O'Daniel's Christian America Association to cripple enforcement of the Wagner Act in the food industries through a rider to the NLRB appropriation bill. In return, Ivan McDaniel of the fruit-packing lobby, whose earlier anti-labor activities were uncovered by the La Follette committee, is backing the automobile industry's drive for other anti-labor legislation. But the farm organizations generally have shown a most encouraging unwillingness to go along.

The National Farmers' Union, of course, continues its established policy of farmer-labor cooperation. And neither the Farm Bureau Federation nor the Grange has swallowed the Automotive Council bait. Ed O'Neal, Farm Bureau president, has said, "It is axiomatic that national income cannot be maintained unless labor is practically fully employed, and at fair wages"; and a recent Grange report on foreign trade stressed the need "to maintain full employment and thus assure a basis to preserve our American standard of living for agriculture as well as for industry." Perhaps farm leaders have taken warning from the words of Scoville of Chrysler: "While I condemn collective bargaining as an assault on liberty, as an evil thing . . . I realize that collective bargaining is only one chick in the foul breed of vultures that seek to pick the meat from the bones of honest men. . . . Farmer schemes for parity prices are of this malignant type."

But support for the automobile industry's position is being sought chiefly in the Executive Committee of the N. A. M. George Romney of the Automotive Council, though not a member, sat in on the committee's meetings when it decided not to sign the Labor-Management Charter; subsequently he attacked the charter in a series of radio broadcasts. B. E. Hutchinson, vice-president of Chrysler, attacked particularly the provision in the charter which stipulates that "the fundamental rights of labor to organize and engage in collective bargaining shall be preserved." Hutchinson objected that this provision froze "the present situation in regard to labor law." The N. A. M., however, has not yet surrendered to the voices of reaction from Detroit; members of its Executive Committee have let it be known that Romney was asked to leave the most recent meeting of the committee.

Automobile manufacturers themselves, it is important to note, are not solid in their support of the Automotive Council's program for a return to the labor-relations policies and the scarcity of the Hoover era. Paul Hoffman, president of Studebaker and chairman of the Committee for Economic Development, is working hard to implement the labor-management charter. The Ford Company, though it has joined General Motors and Chrysler in playing veterans off against workers, refrained from the general assault which the industry launched against unionization at the Mead committee hearings in Detroit in April. Even within the companies which support Romney important executives can be found who see the dangers to democracy in the industry's present course. But their fears are voiced only in their homes and clubs; to date not a single management in Detroit has protested.

Eighteen months ago Charles E. Wilson of General Electric warned the National Association of Manufacturers as follows: "I tell you frankly that I am deeply alarmed today over the possibility that a right-wing reaction may draw some sections of capital so far away from our traditions as to imperil the entire structure of American life as we know it." Consciously or unconsciously, Wilson was describing the present high command of the automobile industry.

In the Wind

MORE THAN A THOUSAND white Georgians prominent in business and the professions have signed a petition to Congress to establish a permanent Fair Employment Practice Commission and signatures are still coming in.

THE JOHN C. WINSTON COMPANY, publishers of dictionaries, will omit the word "nigger" from all future editions, beginning with those copyrighted this year; other terms of racial opprobrium, such as "coon," "dago," "sheeney," and "wop," will be deleted as soon as is technically possible.

MOSS A. PLUNKETT of Roanoke, Virginia, president of the Southern Electoral Reform League and a leader in the fight against the poll tax, will seek the Democratic nomination for Governor of Virginia at the primary on August 7. If he is elected it will be a blow to Senator Harry Flood Byrd, a leader of the anti-New Deal Democrats, who comes up for reelection next year. The present Governor, Colgate W. Darden, Jr., is an important part of the Byrd machine.

PUBLISHERS' WEEKLY for June 9 reports that the Treasury Department has ordered a copy of Stuart Chase's book "Where's the Money Coming From?"

THIS IS FROM A LETTER to the San Francisco Chronicle of June 13: "The mere fact that we, as Americans, have suffered more and deprived ourselves of more of the necessities of life than any other people, save for the Chinese, perhaps, denotes that world leadership is our destiny. Furthermore, I suggest that the United Nations Conference should set aside a day during which the delegates might pay homage and respect to us, who have saved them from Nazism."

LEGISLATIVE MEMO: R. H. 2328, which would close the mails to material inciting to racial prejudice, is now in the House Committee on Post Offices, headed by Thomas G. Burch of Virginia; H. J. Res. 173, which would authorize a Congressional investigation of Jim Crow baseball, is in the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, headed by Clarence F. Lea of California.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

A VISIT TO "DER STUERMER"

BY LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

Nürnberg, June 4

REMEMBER the brochures bound in heavy brown or rag paper called "Little Journeys" to the homes of eminent authors, painters, and the like, written by Elbert Hubbard and printed by the Roycroft Brotherhood in East Aurora, New York? My favorite was "A Little Journey to the Home of Albrecht Dürer," the old German artist who lived in the "toy" city of Nürnberg, where Hans Sachs and the Meistersingers loved and joked.

Yesterday I made a visit to Albrecht Dürer's home town to inspect the office of Julius Streicher, who already on November 9, 1923, had marched with Hitler to the Feldherrnhalle in Munich, in the demonstration of premature power which was the baptism by fire of the Nazi movement. Even then he was well known for his anti-Semitic obsession. In the years to come his newspaper, Der Stürmer, would be the chief weapon against the Jewish peril. Hitler appointed him Gauleiter of Franconia. He was a heavy, bald man who looked like his own caricatures of the criminal international Jew. He had enormous physical energy and painted thin water colors of sunsets.

Nürnberg, since it was once the most perfect large medieval city in Northern Europe, presents the most sickening aspect of any German ruin. A woman in the street told me that there was one month when prisoners detailed to bury bombing victims worked uninterruptedly in three eight-hour shifts. In Mainz, Frankfurt, Würzburg, even Munich, the interiors of some of the fine churches can at least be restored. Nürnberg is a withered, ferocious horror. Almost the only relatively livable building now standing inside the Old Town is Pfannenschmiedsgasse 19, a modern apartment house, on whose second floor Streicher had his office as editor of the Stürmer. The paper was printed across the street. A direct hit at the back of the building blew out all the glass, and a fine heavy layer of dust lies over everything that has not already been carried off.

The entrance hall of the office has the usual photographs of Hitler. A plaster head of Streicher has been smashed. An Islamic cocktail bar is propped in a corner. In the editorial rooms disarray prevails. Proof, papier-mâché mats, old copies of the Stürmer lie about. I recognize pictures—hideously retouched—of the Oberbürgermeister von New York, Obergaußer La Guardia, Swearing in a Neger as Advocate Against the White Population; of Anna Rosenberg at a Press Conference Plotting Suppression of Free Speech; of Moritz Fischbein Dictating to non-Jewish Doctors with Roosevelt Protection.

In a smashed bookcase is a whole row of anti-Hitler books—Heiden's biographies, Röhm's "Memoirs," early exposés of Dachau, an American slick-paper comic of "Hitler the Murderer," and the Marley Report. One shelf is devoted to the complete works of Jakob Wassermann; another shelf holds the Manns—Thomas, Erika, and Klaus. Underneath are violet and green leather-bound, privately printed German translations of Rétif de la Bretonne, the Marquis de Sade, the Earl of Rochester's "Sodom," a set of paper-bound novels in French—"Miss," by Elsie Birchwhip, "Mary et Son Hussard," by Irène. There are also some monographs by Magnus Hirschfeld, Moll, Freud, Krafft-Ebing and a lot of semi-scientific books on male and female prostitution.

These books were formerly locked up. On the open shelves, on two large floors and in the basement, is a very fine miscellaneous library of Jewish material, literary, theological, economic, political, and historical, with a huge collection of ancient texts, silver circumcision plate, and so on. Streicher read no Hebrew, but he kept a little man who did. The library is well card-indexed. Streicher's editorial method was simple. He would go through a book, underline in red what was useful, have it typed off, and then recast it with the proper slant. He had an excellent collection of seventeenth-century anti-Semitic and anti-Masonic books in French and German, lives of Disraeli in English, and Harold Nicolson's "Peacemaking."

This was a book I had wanted someone to send me for a long time. Lucid, clear, honest, and decent, it is certainly among the best source-books of the present war. There is a particularly effective account of the whole Bela Kun affair, Hungary's first faltering attempt to make a Communist regime. It is brilliantly written, with the able virulence of the hereditary diplomat. "Bela Kun was no gentleman." Streicher had heavily underlined it, a juicy bit.

The day before I had gone into the country, about fifty miles from Nürnberg, to Streicher's farm, a huge, modern, three-winged, barn-like factory of a place sitting in the middle of nowhere. Here he had a private week-end study reserved for more concentrated work. The library was less interesting—his own leather-bound selected works, recent contributions to the Mendelian theory, and packages of Life and Fortune still tied up. He used the pictures in these magazines as they seemed apposite, having them retouched to accentuate doubtful Jewish facial features and filed for the moment in world history when they could be pulled out to point a moral.

There were many photographs in albums showing Streicher as Gauleiter laying cornerstones for Hitler Jugend homes, Streicher stripped to the waist (a real atrocity picture) digging a swimming pool, Streicher marching at the head of a parade, reenacting ten years later the original march to the Feldherrnhalle. This was a horrible photograph: Streicher, a bolt of anthropoid energy, bathed in light, behind him three huge, beatific S. S. guards, breasting, between pylons fuming artificial smoke, serried ranks of heiling hands. But these were not the worst pictures. Streicher kept his own private police files here, like a memory book. There were a lot of line-up portraits of people, very ordinary people, coming from the towns and villages of the vicinity of his farm. Their occupations were given as farmer, postman, notary, butcher. Below each was pasted a newspaper clipping telling of their condemnation and hanging "for offenses against the security of the state." None of them were Jews. The dates were all added in Streicher's hand.

I spent a busy afternoon in the Stürmer office. The art-reference library still bore the bookplates of Jewish owners. So did the Aretino and the Marquis de Sade. There were vellum rolls from Prague and Amsterdam. The musical items, which had been used for the compilation of an elaborate "Jewish Enemy in Music," were from Vienna. There were any number of memorial albums in honor of eminent Jewish scholars, art historians, economists, biologists—mostly collections of essays offered by students on a seventy-fifth birthday, with all the signatures on the flyleaf. Only on leaving did I realize that the cocktail bar, which looked like a Moorish whatnot, had formerly been used as a pulpit.

Koestler's Alternatives

THE YOGI AND THE COMMISSAR, AND OTHER ESSAYS. By Arthur Koestler. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

SPATIAL metaphors dominate Arthur Koestler's thinking. One of necessity belongs to either the right or the left, and is either progressive or regressive. The yogi and the commissar are diametrical symbols of crucial alternatives: change from within and change from without. History is forever on the move, either upward or downward. Everything is an affair of planes, of levels, of stages. The war is not "horizontal," like the Spanish war, but "vertical," a Tory war. Freud and Marx are the provenance of his ideas; they satisfy his passion for rough dichotomies and graphic analogies.

Koestler's work is journalistic in that it repeats many familiar beliefs without clarifying or refining them. The great weakness of Marxism, he feels, is its spiritual aridity, its intransigent materialism; but he accepts Freud uncritically, which is to say topographically: the unconscious for him is a literal fact rather than a necessary assumption, rather, that is to say, than a definition of the total area of psychological inquiry, and hence a tautology. (The Freudians tend to regard the unconscious as a primordial mass, the emotional as opposed to the intellectual self, or the private as opposed to the social one; the reverse, as Koestler himself seems to imply in his allusions to Jung's "archetypes," is probably much closer to the truth. Emotion rather than thought is the index of consciousness; the thought process is largely subliminal.) One is scarcely reminded in these pages of Koestler's remarkable narrative gift, his brilliant flair for intellectualized melodrama. The essay is a univocal medium compared with the novel, demanding a different kind and degree of intellectual awareness, which, except perhaps in his piece on the intelligentsia, Koestler is hardly able to furnish.

The Intelligentsia is the best thing in the book, partly because it is something of a self-portrait. Koestler himself has the quality of an archetype. He is, with some variations of course, a kind of platonic idea of the modern intellectual. His work is marked, for one thing, by a certain gratuitous coarseness that, for better or worse, peculiarly belongs to the corrupt modern sensibility; and he has the vividness, the intensity, and the inflexibility of a true ideologue. It is typical of the pertinacity of his convictions that he should write a methodical, heavily documented indictment of the Soviet Union, charging mainly that it has abandoned the principle of equality, and yet allow himself to say that its "economic structure is historically progressive," and, in the same essay, that "the Russian experiment neither proves nor disproves the possibility of socialism; it was an experiment carried out under the most unfavorable laboratory conditions and hence inconclusive." T. S. Eliot remarks somewhere that wisdom consists largely of uncynical disillusion. Koestler is plainly cynical and, it would appear, undisillusioned.

"In this war," he says, "we are fighting against a total lie in the name of a half-truth," as if it were ever, in the nature of things, reasonable to expect to fight for anything better. It is odd that Koestler, a proponent of dialectics, should ignore this truism. His cynicism amounts, in fact, to a kind of dejected, or inverted, idealism; it is a relaxed, relatively impotent version of the very thing he attacks in "Darkness at Noon." There is a good deal of rather arbitrary pessimism in this book concerning the immediate future. What makes it suspect is that it is virtually identical with Koestler's pessimism about the future of the Socialist movement.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ

BRIEFER COMMENT

Tom Paine

TOM PAINE, the voice of the American Revolution, was vilified during his lifetime far more viciously than, for example, the "atheist" and "Jacobin" Jefferson, and historians have been slow to set the record straight. The first biography of Paine, published in England after the appearance of "The Rights of Man," was commissioned and paid for by his enemies and issued for the express purpose of discrediting him. A second biography, published in the United States shortly after his death, was written by one of the shrillest opponents of his ideas in America. For years these two books were the chief source of information about his life. It was not until the 1890's that the authoritative biography by Moncreu Conway and a complete edition of Paine's writings appeared. During the past two decades Paine has attracted increasing attention. A new edition of his writings in ten volumes and a biography appeared in 1925. Two years later Mary Agnes Best published her "Tom Paine: Prophet and Martyr of Democracy." Hesketh Pearson's "Tom Paine: Friend of Mankind" appeared in 1937, and Frank Smith's "Thomas Paine: Liberator" in 1938. The most widely known portrait of Paine today, of course, is Howard Fast's novel, "Citizen Tom Paine."

W. E. Woodward, author of the most recent volume about Paine, "Tom Paine: America's Godfather" (Dutton, $3.50), has shown courage in tackling a subject so recently and so thoroughly preempted by a popular novel. Woodward argues, however, that even an author as aware of Paine's merits as Fast has not been free of the influence of the detractors. He contends that Paine was throughout his life more abstemious than one would suppose from the novel, that Fast's opening scene describing Paine's first meeting with Franklin is wholly out of character, and that Fast's description of Paine's physical appearance has little relation to fact. But however interesting such matters may be, they are of slight consequence compared to an evaluation of Paine's ideas—which were still dangerous enough ten years after his death for a London bookseller to be fined fifteen hundred pounds and sent to prison for three years for selling copies of his books. And here I suspect that Woodward is rather wide of the mark when he argues that "Paine was not a radical within the meaning of that term as it is used today." Gilbert Chinard has written that the Federalists of Jefferson's day had "paroxysms" of indignation when the President invited the old and ailing Paine to return to the United States from France. I doubt whether the Federalists of today would be more hospitable. But if Woodward offers little in the way of interpretation, he will have performed a public service if he scrapes a little of the mud off Paine's reputation—and an even greater one if he sends a few readers back to "Common Sense," "The Rights of Man," and "The Age of Reason."

COLEMAN ROSENBERGER

The Future in the Pacific

FOR A THOROUGH ORIENTATION in the problems of the Pacific as seen by several scores of our leading authorities in this field, Americans can do no better than to study carefully "Security in the Pacific," a preliminary report of the Ninth Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations (Institute of Pacific Relations, $2.50). The report summarizes the conference's round-table discussions of such topics as The Future of Japan, Economic Recovery and Progress in Pacific Countries, Cultural and Race Relations, the Future of Dependent Areas, and Collective Security. While sharp differences of opinion on all of these issues are revealed, there is a surprisingly large core of agreement among the experts on many matters which are little understood by the public at large. Only through recognition and appraisal of the conflicting viewpoints can we hope to build a sound and lasting peace in the Pacific.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

The Challenge of Housing

DOROTHY ROSENMAN has grappled with the housing problem both as a settlement leader and as chairman of the National Committee on Housing. In "A Million Homes a Year" (Harcourt, Brace, $2.50), her exposition of causes and cures, there are neither tears for the slum dweller nor cheers for the building industry. There are only hard facts and homily.

The author is not too pessimistic about reduction in building costs and sees hope for greater standardization in due time; she heaves out at the critics of public housing, but saves a few blows for the public-housing enthusiasts too, charging that they stand apart from the community when they should be stimulating private as well as public housing and circulating more facts for lay consumption. She hurls a challenge at industry to come forth and do for housing what it did for the automobile, but then expounds upon the obstacles—blight, high municipal taxes, high land and building costs, poor zoning, and reckless subdivision practices.

The book is sprinkled with interesting tables and information, and a good case is made for action. But like others recently issued, it will leave the reader perplexed. How can the job be done and how soon? With a need for 12,000,000 housing units or more in the next ten years, are we to go back to the same old routine of jerry-building, the same old speculation in homes, and the same old trickle of slum-clearance operations? Mrs. Rosenman says no: city planning is necessary. She wants full employment and also more public works. She sees no need for the middleman who laps up profits on materials as they flow from factory to builder. She wants less speculation in land. She wants many things, in fact. But she doesn't tell the reader when and how housing, her "Cinderella of the industrial era," will ever find the prince. "A method must be found" to cure this ailment, and "attentive consideration" must be given to that ailment, but her prescription is a simple compound of "grit," "determination," "patience," and the "pursuit of facts."

There are many stimulating and informative passages in the book, particularly its defense of the public housing program, but it leaves unanswered the big current question, which even the government has dodged: "Where do we go from here?"

CHARLES ABRAMS

Uncommunicated Excitement

QUENTIN REYNOLDS says of Alice Leone-Moats, author of "No Passport for Paris" (Putnam, $2.50), that you could drop her into a potato patch in the County Donegal and she would find something to write about, and I quite agree. She would write two sentences about potatoes, a patronizing chapter on the potato growers, and several volumes about the more distinguished of the persons she charmed or outwitted or talked to a standstill. It would all be very, very mysterious and important—and boring. That, at least, is how I find this garrulous book. In some quarters Miss Moats has been regarded as an apologist for Franco. That is not really so, for though her book can be quite unpleasant in its general frivolity, it contains many statements which are critical of the Franco regime. Perhaps it would be just to say that Miss Moats shows little capacity for moral indignation about great matters. She is prone to minimize well-mannered evil.

The second part of the book deals with Miss Moats's clandestine journey into occupied France, for which she was severely reprimanded by the State Department. Without being ready to declare a belief that she has told the whole truth about that escapade, I cannot for the life of me understand why she did it unless it was for the excitement, which she has failed to communicate. Certainly few journalists have ever failed so miserably to make an adventure interesting. And when one notes the comparative ease and comfort of her emotions in circulating among Frenchmen who were risking their lives, one is almost moved to anger. The State Department was making too much of a small matter, but the underground officials who took Miss Moats into France would certainly not have had my trust. A wordy, dull book of unimportant sensations and political chatter, of conservative but not perverse import.

RALPH BATES

MOTION PICTURES

WARNER BROS. MAGNIFICENT

RHAPSODY IN BLUE

THE GEORGE GERSHWIN NOVELLA STORY!

NOW HOLLYWOOD THEATRES

HUMPHREY

Bogart

ALEXIS SMITH • SYDNEY GREENSTREET in WARNERS

Conflict

 LOUIS PRIMA
 AND HIS ORCHESTRA
 STAR OF "HOLLYWOOD CANTEN" person DANE CLARK
 STRAND

"OUT of this WORLD"

 starring
Eddie BRACKEN
Veronica LAKE
Diana LYNN
 with CASS DALEY
 A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

 In Person!
ALLAN JONES
GIL LAMB
EILEEN BARTON
JERRY WALD
 And His Orchestra
 Mighty 7th War Loan
 BUY BONDS HERE

 NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD Presents

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

 Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
 & DOROTHY FIELDS
 BROADWAY THEATRE, Broadway & 53rd Street, Matinees Wed. & Sat.
 REALLY AIR-CONDITIONED

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review

may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy on request

MOTION PICTURE

Get ready to see . . .

How Wonderful a Motion Picture Version of a Great Stage Play Can Be!

It's got all using such expressions as "Natch," "TerRIF" and "SenSASH!" We've even found out that a woman can still be dangerous even if she is old—21! We've just seen a preview of

"JUNIOR MISS"

You'll cheer! As Peggy Ann Garner, who stole your heart as "Francie" in "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn," emerges as one of the greatest stars of our time. . . . Words alone can't describe how joyously it has been adapted and directed by George Seaton and how magnificently it has been produced by William Perlberg. . . .

 IT'S SUPER ENTERTAINMENT—BUT DIF!
 Proudly presented by 20th Century-Fox!
RIVOLI

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
 20 Vesey Street
 New York 7, N. Y.

Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

THE Nation
 with Harpers Magazine $6.50
 You save $2.50

 with Consumers Union $7.50
 You save $1.50

 with HARPERS & Consumers Union $5.00
 You save $3.50

 with Free World $7.50
 You save $1.50

 with Saturday Review $3.50
 You save $1.50

Dear Sirs:

 I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION BY ITSELF

 1 Year $4 2 Years $8
 3 Years $11

 Servicemen's Rate:
 $3 a Year

 Canadian and Foreign
 Postage, $1 a Year Extra

☐ Remittance enclosed ☐ Bill me

NAME.....

STREET.....

CITY..... ZONE..... STATE.....

6-30-45

YOU WILL NEVER MISS the pint of blood you give to the Red Cross, or the contribution you make to the Red Cross War Fund. But the first may save the life of a fighting American, and the second will help furnish him with "a home away from home."

DO IT NOW! Give your blood to replace blood shed in your defense; telephone your Red Cross Blood Donor Center today and make an appointment for a donation. Send your check today to the Red Cross War Fund.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IN 1936 Toscanini recorded with the New York Philharmonic the performances of Dawn and Siegfried's Rhine Journey from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung" and the Prelude to "Lohengrin" that are in Victor Set 308. About three years ago Victor issued, in Set 853, a recording of a later performance of the "Götterdämmerung" music by Toscanini with the N. B. C. Symphony; and now it has issued, on 11-8807 ($1), a recording of their later performance of the "Lohengrin" Prelude that must have been made at the same time, since it has the same characteristics. In certain important respects the recorded sound of the later performances is superior to that of the earlier ones; but in others that are no less important it is the sound of the earlier ones that is superior. The later ones are recorded with a wider frequency-range, which gives the sound a distinctness, liveliness, and brilliance on top that it lacks on the old record—the high violins and woodwinds in the first part of the Prelude being breathtakingly real and beautiful. But as the piece continues and the sound descends one hears that the later performance is recorded with insufficient bass, which deprives it of the body and depth that it has on the old record; and as it builds up to its climax one hears that it is recorded with a limitation on volume, which deprives that climax of the massiveness and power, and the entire performance of the correct organic proportions, that they have on the old record. Apart from all this, the sound of the new recording, which was made in Carnegie Hall, is very beautiful, with none of the hardness and reverberance of even the best of the recordings made in Studio 8H.

There are a few extraneous noises; but they are not disturbing.

Victor also has issued, in one of its useless new 25-cent "showpiece albums," the recently made recording of Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloé" Suit No. 2 (Set SP-1; $2.25). The music is marvelously orchestrated trash; the performance has long been one of the wonders of our time, unequaled by any other. I speak of the performance as I have heard it in New York—of the particular sonorities, of their refinement, glow, shimmer, and radiance in the particular, and superior, acoustic conditions of Carnegie Hall. I probably would not hear them in Symphony Hall; and probably they could not be reproduced completely by any recording; certainly they are not by either the old or the new one. Here again it turns out that the new one has obvious and important points of superiority over the old; but that the old one is not without important points of superiority over the new. Again there is evidence of the vastly extended frequency-range in the wonderful distinctness and liveliness of the murmuring strings and woodwinds at the beginning, the brilliance on top as the violins take over the melody from the cellos. But again there is evidence of insufficient bass in the lack of depth and body in the wonderful chord that is the climax of that melodic line and one of the great moments of the performance. There is too much bass in the old recording; but it gives that chord its effect. Moreover, the reverberation in Symphony Hall that produced such noisy confusion in the loud portions of "Harold in Italy" also produces it at the climaxes of "Daphnis et Chloé"—for example, at the end of the first side. The old recording is free of this; and the absence of excessive reverberation may be one reason for its greater smoothness and refinement of sound in quieter passages; but another reason may be the fact that the older performance itself is more relaxed. I hope, therefore, that the old recording will be retained in the catalogue.

Oddly enough, a recording (11-8745; $1) of a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave" Overture by Fiedler with the Boston "Pops" Orchestra has excellent balance of treble and bass in its beautiful sound, and no trace of excessive reverberation. The work is charming; the performance good.

Victor's other June releases have not yet arrived.

CONTRIBUTORS

MICHAEL CLARK, an accredited correspondent of The Nation, was in the Middle East from 1942 to 1944 and is on his way back there now.

KLAUS MANN, son of Thomas Mann and well known as a novelist in his own right, is now on the staff of the Mediterranean edition of Stars and Stripes.

IRVING RICHTER is the national legislative representative of the United Automobile Workers, C. I. O. He has written for the Journal of Political Economy and other publications.

LINCOLN KIRSTEIN is in Germany with the Third Army, attached to the Monuments, Fine Arts, and Archives Section.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ has contributed to the Journal of Philosophy and the Kenyon Review.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

DOES THE STATE DEPARTMENT WANT A SOFT PEACE FOR JAPAN?

The Nation for July 14 will print three articles on the character of the enemy and the threat of an unsatisfactory peace.

Moderates or War-Makers?

The role of the Zaibatsu (the big-business group) in obstructing social progress in Japan and in laying the basis for Pearl Harbor.

The Strange Story of Mr. Grew

BY I. F. STONE

How our Under Secretary of State earned his reputation for "understanding" the Japanese.

A Program for Post-War Japan

BY T. A. BISSON

The kind of program needed to eradicate Japanese militarism contrasted with the program proposed by the State Department.

With an editorial on the need for reorganizing the State Department's Far Eastern division.

RESORTS

ADIRONDACKS

ESTATE providing exquisite natural charm for gracious, modest living . . .

CRYSTAL LAKE—a 60 acre natural spring-fed lake, entirely within the property of 800 acres, surrounded by rich woodland with magnificent mountain views.

Accommodations in main Residence and Cottages (steam heated), Bathhouse, Tennis, Riding, Fishing, Golf nearby. Every facility conveniently located.

5½ hrs. from Grand Central Station 2½ hrs. from LaGuardia Field, Colonial Airline

June Rate $75

CRYSTAL LAKE LODGE I. H. KESSLER
Chestertown, N. Y. 271 Madison Avenue
N. Y. C.—MU 5-9493

An Adult Camp

SCHROON CREST

(Formerly Moon Hill)

In the Adirondacks — Pottersville, N. Y.
On Schroon Lake — Open Until Sept. 10th
5 Clay Tennis Courts—Sports, Cocktail Lounge, Classic Recordings & Dance Orchestra, Jules Adolph & His Group Entertainers, Rustic Beauty—excellent Cuisine.
Booklet — N. Y. Office: 142 Montague Street, Brooklyn 2, N. Y. Phone: MAin 4-8578
Leah Okun — Irv. Schoenberg

BERKSHIRE PINES

WEST COPAKE NEW YORK

The Small Resort At Its Very Best

Wildly famous for its adult comforts and sports—golf, tennis, swimming, dancing, entertainment. Separate day camp for children. 13 experienced counselors. Cultural and modern camp activities. 11 a.m. to bedtime.

For information Address PEARL CHEIFETZ
West Copake, N. Y. (Phone Copake 46)

Tall Pines

High in the Dutchess County hills. 100 acres of beautiful rolling country . . . land and water sports . . . a design for leisure. N. Y. Central or Hudson River Day Line to Poughkeepsie.

ATTRACTIONAL RATES

PLEASANT VALLEY, DUTCHESS CO., N. Y.
Phones: 2741 or 5511

NEW — Opened by Veteran World War II
THE COLONIAL Hotel & Restaurant
TERRACE Peekskill, N. Y.

Open All Year

Swimming • Tennis • Ping Pong
Field Activities • Dietary Laws
Rates and Information on Request

Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director

This Adult Camp...

In sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports. Six hours by train from New York.

Write for booklet and rates

KRAMER'S

ON LUZON LAKE
HURLEYVILLE, N. Y.

A Vacation Resort for People who love a Beautiful Lake—A fine Swimming Pool and Outdoor Sports of every description.
New York City Phone: ME 3-1591

RESORTS

Announcing Membership in the West End Casino

Our guests are invited to enjoy all the facilities of this Ocean Front Beach Club, including the Pool, Beach and Evening Entertainment, also our own excellent Tennis, Handball, Cycling, Golf & Riding available. Dancing and Delicious Food. Join us in the gay and diversified activities at our own beautiful Resort Estate.

The Oaks

ELBERON, NEW JERSEY
Telephone: Long Beach 2433

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, Chatham, New York, offers 300 New York-Massachusetts Berkshire Hills farms.

SUMMER RENTAL

MODERN HOUSE, 7 rooms, completely furnished. Frigidaire, fireplace, piano, screened porch, 2 baths, 18 acres, view. 2½ hours N. Y. C. AL 4-9727. Box 1539, c/o The Nation.

POSITION WANTED

GIFTED young girl, recently received B.A. degree, having majored in Anthropology and Psychology, desires position in Anthropological field or research work for about a year or so before continuing studies in Anthropology for advanced degree. Call RE 9-5696.

CLASSIFIED

ADVERTISING RATES

62c a line (six words)

Minimum 3 lines

$6.16 per inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

BArclay 7-1066

Additional Resort Advertising on Inside Back Cover

PAMPHLET

"THE ACHIEVEMENT of personality." 72 pages. A rational explanation of the rise of human personality and human institutions from the jungle. An arsenal of liberal thought. A New York editor says, Brilliantly written. The beginning and the end of everything. Introductory price, 29 cents. R. H. Bass, 863 Sterling Place, Brooklyn 16, N. Y. Money back guarantee.

PSYCHOANALYSIS

ALERT, Intelligent Readers and Writers should belong to BASIC BOOKS, the new time and money-saving way of keeping posted on current literature on psychoanalysis, psychosomatic medicine, psychiatry and psychology. For information write Dept. P-3, BASIC BOOKS, 714 Madison Ave., New York 21.

HELP WANTED

PROGRESSIVE ORGANIZATION in New York City with established reputation in over-all liberal field needs executive director with organizing experience, speaking ability and knowledge of liberal movement. Salary open. Send applications, giving qualifications, to Box 1536, c/o The Nation.

STENOGRAPHER, expert, and rapid typist. Literary and commercial. 9 to 5. Five-day week. Box 1537, c/o The Nation.

EXPERT Stenographer, varied experience also manuscripts. 2 to 6:30 daily. Box 1538, c/o The Nation.

40% off

In place of its regular yearly subscription rate of $5, The Nation offers a special 40 per cent reduced rate of $3 a year to all men now in the armed forces who have a service address in the United States or United States possessions.

to the Men
in the Armed Forces

Letters to the Editors

THE FISCHER-NATION DEBATE

THE response from our readers on the exchange of letters between Louis Fischer and The Nation indicates a three-to-one support of The Nation's position. The many comments we have received from all sections of the country show how widespread is the concern over American relations with Russia and their effect on world peace. Limitations of space prevent our printing any of the letters in full. Several have been summarized below.

Reinhold Niebuhr, one of our contributing editors, supports The Nation's position in general terms but believes that we are oversimplifying the problem when we say that, despite mistakes, the Russians have a more rigorous anti-fascist policy than the Americans. Mr. Niebuhr points out that Russia is using fascist forces in Rumania and Hungary. "If Russia destroys the independence of Czechoslovakia completely, as now seems likely, and if it refurbishes Marxism as an instrument of policy in the central and western parts of Europe, while holding the eastern part through pan-Slavism, etc., this will present us with problems that transcend the fascist-anti-fascist category you use. Our primary mistake may not be the use of fascist forces but the general lack of a creative economic policy. Russia's mistake will be that it will destroy possibilities of mutual security by unilateral actions, prompted by fear but creating the object it fears."

Raymond Walsh, New York City, feels that The Nation's record is completely sound and that the editors have handled the magazine in an excellent way during a terribly difficult period."

Jacob Fishman, New York City, is "not exactly in love with Mr. Fischer's acrobatics," but neither can he "fathom the intellectual myopia of The Nation about Russia." He asks whether the formation of Communist Party cells throughout the world and the sealing off of its own territory and of countries within its sphere of influence are part of Russia's "security policy."

Joseph Kovner, Washington, D. C., holds that liberals have had to make many compromises "in supporting the war as a struggle against fascism." He believes that The Nation has, in a sense, "mortgaged its principles and has taken for security the promises of statesmen and the I. O. U.'s of its own wishful thinking." He doubts that it is "the function of a liberal magazine to bargain with expediency for the sake of apparent action" and suggests that we should rather press for freedom and human rights "above all considerations of power politics and the security of official organizations."

Neal Gilkyson, Washington, D. C., read Mr. Fischer's letter with "alarm and indignation." She insists that "the whole business of objective reporting has become more or less a myth and that the merit of a partisan journal is determined by the values it cleaves to." She approves those of The Nation and contrasts them with "that notoriously objective magazine, Time."

Dean Beslich, San Francisco, California, who has read The Nation for thirty years and describes himself as "merely one of the customers," supports our position and suggests that in view of the crucial issues that lie ahead liberals can ill afford to bother much about the Louis Fischers of the world.

A. E. Swan, Madison, South Dakota, feels that Mr. Fischer's accusations are actually compliments. He points out that no magazine engaged in interpreting important news of the day can avoid having an attitude for or against democracy, world cooperation, and so on, and that such an attitude can always be dismissed as a "line" by those opposing it.

William Weber, Detroit, Michigan, who is eighty-nine and has read The Nation for seventy years, criticizes us for not having taken the first steps in severing relations with Mr. Fischer. (Several other readers expressed similar sentiments.) Mr. Weber warns that preparations are being made for World War III by the Catholic hierarchy, British Tories, and certain elements in the State Department.

Eva Robin, New York City, who says she once regarded Mr. Fischer as a "guide and teacher," writes a letter of personal reminiscence excoriating his anti-Soviet bias.

C. H. Coyle, Berwyn, Illinois, congratulates The Nation on Mr. Fischer's resignation and states that only a distinctly anti-Soviet tone, not an impartial one, would have pleased him.

Daniel Kester, Wichita, Kansas, says that anti-Russian sentiment has been developed by capitalists, imperialists, and Roman Catholics to goad the American people into an economic war with Russia.

W. W. Lyman, St. Helena, California, a subscriber of thirty years' standing, asks if it is not "evident that Russia's attitude is due to the anti-Russian basis of fascism rather than to a dislike of fascism per se. To say that to see Russian conditions clearly and to judge them according to the fundamental principles of justice is to promote war with Russia is obviously untrue. We got on very well with Czarist Russia and get on very well with Vargas's Brazil. Stalin is a 'realist'; he might even be influenced in the direction of democracy by a powerful and candid world opinion."

James A. Hardy, Saginaw, Michigan, agrees with The Nation's position and discusses local attitudes toward Russia. "It is quite disturbing that so many people out here show an anti-Russian bias. Heretofore it had been held down by the war. But now newspapers carrying articles by people like von Wiegand and H. J. Taylor are stirring up latent anti-Russian sentiments. The official attitude on lend-lease to Russia is baffling. All shipments of completed machines have been sent to storage depots this past month, and now orders have come through to hold up all production work pending further notice. It may be that this is part of pressure diplomacy, but it certainly seems like a good way to get the Russians upset."

Our subscription department was gratified to note that four readers expressed material support of The Nation by renewing subscriptions because of Mr. Fischer's resignation. No cancellations have yet resulted, although Joseph Kovner warned us that he does "not now intend to cancel" his subscription. Mrs. Elizabeth Uhling of West Allis, Wisconsin, indulged in a "hollow laugh" when she thought of the $20 she had contributed to what she had hoped "would be a better cause."

